THE Marquis of Ripon has become President of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. That announcement does not mean much to the casual reader; but it may make a considerable difference in the fortunes of persons whose only fortunes are ill ones. The Society, named after the French "Apostle of the Poor," consists of members who visit the poor and the sick in their own homes, administering money relief as well as kind words. The "brothers" are ordinary laymen, and their district visiting and their "conference meetings" are demands on the spare time which very busy men could hardly meet, except that very busy men have the knack of finding time for everything. Lord Ripon, when out of office at any rate, feels that he can undertake the acting duties of a "Brother of St. Vincent de Paul," and he has agreed also to be the President of the Society for all England. Branches exist already in various towns; but the new impulse brought by the leadership of Lord Ripon is counted upon to increase immensely the number of volunteers for this service of the poor, and also the amount of money placed in their hands for distribution.

A Fable.

A MUSICIAN died, and his sleeping soul waited at the Gate. Then said the Angel: "Has this man sinned?"

"Yes," answered the voices of the neighbours; "he has played his own works all day."

"What shall be his punishment?" asked the Angel.

"Let him hear those works for ever," cried the voices.

So the soul was awakened in Hell by the chanting of its own music.

"This must be Heaven," it said.

Correspondence.

Green's "Short History."

SIR,—In common with many of your readers, I was extremely pleased with the instructive and suggestive letter of Mr. J. J. Poynter on Green's Short History which appeared in your issue for February 18, and I shall be still further obliged if he, or some other of your readers, can give me any information as to what seems to me to be a strange mistake later on in Green's Short History.

In the description of the death of Charles II., at the bottom of page 648 (of the 1875 edition), are the words: "The bishops around his bed fell on their knees, and implored his blessing, and Charles with outstretched hands solemnly gave it to them." I believe there were only two bishops present at all during his illness, namely, Sancroft (Archbishop) and Ken. Neither of them could do anything with him. He would not listen to their exhortations, and finally they were dismissed and Father Huddleston admitted, from whom the King received the last Sacraments.

Macaulay writes: "The King seemed much relieved by what had passed. His natural children were brought to his bedside, the Dukes of Grafton, &c.—Charles blessed them all," &c.

Burnet, in his History of his own times, says, "Bishop Ken was censured for a piece of indecency. He presented the Duke of Richmond, Lady Portsmouth's son, to be blessed by the King. Upon this some that were in the room cried out the King was their common father. And upon that all kneeled down for his blessing, which he gave them."

Who were these kneeling persons—Bishops? or is it another word beginning with B? Can Green have read shorthand notes and misread?—I am, &c.,

"Time's Revenges."

SIR,—A short time ago the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred by St. Andrew's University on Mrs. Henry Fawcett. All eyes were strained to attention, and to one onlooker at least the climax of an interesting ceremony was reached when the cap that had once been John Knox's rested for a moment in academic benediction on the brow of this distinguished lady, so long the champion of the political rights of her sex—one might almost say, the uncrowned queen of England's revolted daughters. "Women are weak, frail, impatient, feeble, foolish. God has denied to them wisdom to consider or providence to foresee what is profitable for the commonwealth," said the great Reformer; and in no measured language he condemned "the monstiferous empire of women," and asserted what Stevenson has called "his sense of unspeakable masculine authority." Truly Fate has not dealt over kindly with the shade of the churlish author of the First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women.—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of No. 22.

"A MIDDLE-AGED, unmarried lady, who attends University Extension lectures, subscribes to Mudie's, and lives in a London suburb with a parrot, a Pomeranian dog, and two servants, keeps on a little shelf beside the fireplace her dozen permanent favourite books. What are they?" This was the question we asked last week. A careful collation of the numerous lists sent in this week shows that the twelve books which our imaginary maiden lady ought to like best are as follows:

Tennyson.
Shakespeare.
Robert Browning, selections.
Sesame and Lilies.
The Imitation of Christ.
The Bible.
Pride and Prejudice.
The Mill on the Floss.
Lamb's Essays.
Macaulay's Essays.
Mrs. Browning, selections.
Sartor Resartus.

Two competitors—Miss Alice Thompson, 22, Grosvenor-crescent, Scarborough, and Mr. A. H. Meiklejohn, 4, Leamington-avenue, West Didsbury, Manchester—named each seven out of the twelve, and, therefore, one guinea has been divided between them.

The remaining books (Browning having been given as two) on Miss Thompson's list were:

Dante's Divine Comedy,
Emerson's Essays,
Ruskin's Frondees Agrestes, Carlyle's Heroes;

and on Mr. Meiklejohn's:

Boswell's J. Johnson,
Carlyle's French Revolution,
Green's Short History,
Pendennis,
Adam Bede.

Against the voice of the majority there is, of course, no appeal; but several of the lists sent in seem to us to represent the probable tastes of the lady more nearly than the books forming the ideal dozen. Palgrave's Golden Treasury, Charles Kingsley's Life, The Christian Year, and Middlemarch may be mentioned as books which we and certain competitors would expect to find on that little shelf.

Competition No. 23.

WE print this week, in the middle of the issue, several columns of publishers' announcements. We ask competitors to select from those columns the twelve best books. A comparison of all answers sent in will be made, and a prize of one guinea awarded to the competitor whose list agrees in largest proportion with the general sense.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, March 14. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 312, or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

THE WISDOM OF PLOTINUS.

BY C. J. W.

C. J. W. has provided us with pleasant entertainment for an hour. He set to himself the task of expounding Neoplatonism, and we think he has accomplished it very well. As will be seen from the excerpt which will follow, he writes lucidly, as a scholar should: "Plotinus defines Love as the desire to be united with a beautiful object, and thereby to produce or to create beauty. Thus Nature herself—or the soul of the universe, that soul of which Nature is the express manifestation—creates in virtue of the contemplation (spiritual union with) celestial or intelligible beauty. Those human beings who, loving beauty in the sensible world, have not the reminiscence or intuition of intellectual or ideal beauty, still owe their love of the former to the fact that it is an image of the latter. Love is always the result of an affinity, conscious or otherwise, between the soul of the lover and the object of his passion. Our desire to produce is the direct outcome of the instinctive craving for immortality, for the essence which is immortal is none other than Beauty itself. Those (and those only) who love beautiful bodies without the craving to be united with them love them for their ideal beauty alone. From the attention with which the celestial soul applies itself to contemplate the Divine Life which is its object, the supreme Love is born—an eye full of the object which it beholds, a vision made one with the image which it forms. Below the celestial soul exists Nature—the soul of the world as such—and of its contemplation and desire the love which is its eye, and which presides over earthly marriages, is born." Although a trifle pragmatism, that is not bad philosophy; but it has been expounded by such Englishmen as Mr. Myers and Mr. William Knight in a style more modern. Plotinus is a hard nut to crack. C. J. W. cracks him as well, we think, as he could be cracked; but we are not sure that the cracking would have a sufficient audience.

WITH WEIGHTED WINGS.

BY F. J. T.

We are unhappy about this book. Now and then we come upon an original thought expressed with elegance. For example, the school-boy Dacombe, when he had persuaded the bully to fight him, "tried not to recognise the measure of ambition which had helped so materially to make the duty obvious—that ambition which is the devil's share in most noble deeds, and is the unsuspected spur which goads wavering hearts to acts of chivalry." The idea is well expressed, but the desert remains predominant. F. J. T.'s story is sensational and incredible. Published as a book, for the general reader of novels, it would do no good at all.

UNEXPECTATIONS.

BY W. W. W.

We do not like to seem cruel; but it is necessary to say that this novel has almost no merit whatsoever. We hope that the author is a very young man. If he is, he need not despair. He has energy in abundance, and experience may give him insight. In order that he may perceive the main error of his way, let us merely mention, in friendliness, that the hero of "Unexpectedness," whom we are expected to admire, is a miracle of self-satisfied ignorance.

REPRINT OF THE

“ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA”

(NINTH EDITION)

Can no longer be purchased at the present low prices.

BEFORE IT IS TOO LATE.

It will soon be too late to join the majority—to be included in the number of those whose hesitation ended in time. It is a year, all but twelve days, since THE TIMES Reprint of the ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA was first offered for sale. Ten thousand or more people have made up their minds with more or less promptness. It is the purpose of this advertisement to add the reader's name to this list of those who have not waited too long. A minority still wait; there are probably two or three thousand persons who are still asking themselves whether they should or should not subscribe for THE TIMES Reprint of the ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA. They have lost, by waiting, the use for a certain number of months of the best work of reference in the world. That is not a very serious matter, but the loss of the use of the ENCYCLOPÆDIA for all the future weeks and months and years would be a graver loss. Yet the reader must either suffer that loss or make up his mind at once, or pay more money for the ENCYCLOPÆDIA when he does make up his mind.

These are the three possibilities.

The twenty-five volumes will cost more on Friday, the 24th of March, than on Thursday, the 23rd of March, and they will be no better worth the money. There will still be only 16,000 articles, written by only 1,100 contributors, only 9,000 illustrations, only 30,000,000 words of letterpress. Something is to be lost, and nothing is to be gained by waiting. The minority who wait decreases from day to day, for the announcement of the discontinuance of the sale brings every day an increasing number of orders to the office of THE TIMES. It will be a very small minority when the last day has passed. It is often said that a minority may be in the right, but in this case the minority will be in the wrong, and have to pay for their error. The question to be considered with regard to the ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA is not whether one will buy it, but when one will buy it. Everyone who can afford to buy any books at all buys it sooner or later. Those who buy it later will buy it at higher prices. It is of no use to wait for a cheaper price, and it is of no use to wait for a tenth edition. Some people have been hesitating because they believed that a tenth edition was in course of preparation, but that rumour is finally put out of court by a letter which was printed in THE TIMES of March 4th, over the signature of the publishers of the ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA, and for that matter, by the announcement that a supplement to the ninth edition is soon to be published.

At the foot of this page there appears an order blank. It will certainly be to the reader's advantage to make use of it; to do to-day what cannot be done five days hence.

PRICES, UNTIL MARCH 23RD, FOR THE 25 VOLUMES.

Sufficient provision will be made for the filling of Orders promptly post, either from the United Kingdom or the Colonies; but applicants who hesitate may find that the offer has been withdrawn, or the prices increased, without further notice.

MONTHLY PAYMENTS.

(ONE GUINEA to be sent with Order; nothing more to be paid until the 25 volumes have been delivered, all of one time, to the purchaser.)
CLOTH BINDING, 16 Monthly Payments of ONE GUINEA each, or with Bookcase, 19 Monthly Payments of ONE GUINEA each.
HALF MOROCCO BINDING (which we recommend), 20 Monthly Payments of ONE GUINEA each, or with the Bookcase, 23 Monthly Payments of ONE GUINEA each.
FULL MOROCCO BINDING (the very best binding), 27 Monthly Payments of ONE GUINEA each, or with the Bookcase, 30 Monthly Payments of ONE GUINEA each.
NOTE.—If the Purchaser sends a cheque for the full amount at the cash prices—£16 for the Cloth Binding, £20 for the Half Morocco Binding, £27 for the Full Morocco Binding—we will effect a saving of One Shilling in the Guinea, and no Order Form need be used. All Cheques should be drawn to Order of H. E. HOOPER. The Form which follows is for the use of purchasers who prefer to make monthly payments.
[The Cloth binding is of the same quality as that sold by the publishers at £37, and is as strong as a cloth binding can be. But it can be recommended only to purchasers who feel obliged to take the ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA in that form or not at all. The size and weight of the volumes, and the permanent value of the work, alike call for a solid Half Morocco binding; and if the price of the Full Morocco is within the purchaser's means, it makes a splendid addition to the equipment of a handsome house.]

EARLY VALOIS QUEENS. By CATHERINE BEARNE. Illustrated by Edward H. Bearn. Cloth, 10s. 6d.

This book treats of the first sixty years of the fourteenth century, when the Valois succeeded to the throne of France. The halo of romance and chivalry with which they are surrounded, the splendour of their court, the calamities of the hundred years war, the terrors of the plague, wild adventures of brigades, daring deeds of soldiers and heroes, saintly lives in the cloister, and gloomy legends of medieval superstition are described in the histories of the reigns of the three queens, about whom so little has hitherto been written in English, or known by the average English reader, whose acquaintance with the history of France frequently dates from the reign of Francis I.

IN this number of the ACADEMY is printed the complete text of "A Repentance," the one-act drama by John Oliver Hobbes which is now being performed at the St. James's Theatre. Readers of the same author's School for Saints will remember that the Countess Des Escas, the heroine of the play, also figures in that romance.

THE William Black Memorial Committee is to be a very strong one. The following gentlemen have already joined it:—J. M. Barrie, Sir Walter Besant, Dr. Lauder Brunton, J. L. Toole, Colin Hunter, A.R.A., J. W. MacWhirter, R.A., Alfred Parsons, Sir Theodore Martin, Sir H. C. Mackenzie, Marquis of Lorne, Duchess of Sutherland, Lady Victoria Campbell, Sir Felix Semon, Sir Wemyss Reid, Lindsay Macarthur, Madame de Navarro (Mary Anderson), E. Marston, W. L. Thomas, Major Macdonald Hall, C. W. M'IVaine, the Editor of THE ACADEMY, the Editor of the Oban Times, Lord Archibald Campbell (Hon. Treasurer).

WRITERS of introductions to standard English novels come in for hard treatment in the current Blackwood. Therein a writer examines some of the results of the Education Act of 1870. The cultured products of that epoch-making enactment, he says, "are not satisfied with the newest effects of fiction. They would scrape a bowing acquaintance with the masters who are dead and gone. So there are prepared for their delight countless reprints, pleasant to look upon and light to hold, which shall perform the trick of introduction. The reprints are prefaced by a brief essay, which gives the criticsasters something to write about, and serves as a buffer between the hastily educated and the superhuman task of perusing a classic. Neither Dickens nor Scott can make a direct appeal nowadays to their readers. The shock is always decently broken; and if the reader never gets as far as the original, he at least knows what somebody else thinks about it."

THIS is a piece of the true Maga scornfulness. There is another side to the case. The fact that the Education Act makes people want a bowing acquaintance with good literature at all is something. And if they will not come direct to these books, but demand an intermediary, why hold that useful person up to ridicule? His services—if he is competent and modest—may be the means of transforming a bowing acquaintance into close intimacy. But, as a matter of fact, it is not for the product of the Education Act that these editions are designed. There are many genuine lovers of Dickens and Scott and Miss Austen who are interested in collecting opinions on the books, and welcome every new introduction.

A NEW edition of the novels of the Brontë sisters is about to be published by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., with introductions by Mrs. Humphry Ward. These, we imagine, will hardly come under the ban of the Blackwood contributor.

THE death of M. Emile Erckmann has an almost anti-quarian interest. In one sense M. Erckmann did not survive M. Chatrian, for the names of the two men were always uttered together and often hyphenated. For forty years they collaborated, turning out stories and dramas in incredible numbers. Alsations both, they had as much in common as two friends can; perhaps that is why they quarrelled so bitterly at the last. Their names were very familiar to many in England who, as schoolboys, were set to read the Conscrit de 1813, and as men have seen the presentation of their Juif Polonais ("The Bells") by Sir Henry Irving.

TO the rapidly increasing list of sixpenny books is to be added Miss Beatrice Harraden's Ships that Pass in the Night. Meanwhile, this writer's new novel, The Fowler, is almost ready for publication.

ON our Prize Competition page will be found the results of the voting on the best books of the Spring publishing season. We give not only the first twelve books selected by popular opinion, but also the second twelve. It must be remembered, however, that certain of these works are merely announced, not yet published. We give this warning in order that readers may not expect to procure the books at once.

THERE was in life not much resemblance between James Russell Lowell and Danton, but in death they have this similarity, that two independent Lives of each are published at the same moment. In Danton's case the biographers are Mr. Beesley and Mr. Belloc; in Lowell's, Dr. Edward Everett Hale and his son, Prof. Edward Everett Hale. The two Lives of Lowell are due almost at once. We trust that this competition does not mean that the house of Hale is divided against itself.

SINCE "tall paper" copies of books went out of fashion, more attention has been paid to the decoration of the ordinary editions. In this respect the designs on the covers of some novels published recently have been quite attractive, characterised by spirit and taste. Many of these designs, we understand, are due to Mr. F. R. Kimbrough, a young American artist, at present studying under Prof. Herkomer at Bushey.

THE valuable library of Mr. John Crosby will be sold in Glasgow on the 21st and 24th of this month, by Messrs. Morrison, Dick & McCulloch. The catalogue should be examined by librarians and others, its contents being varied and popular.

THE Daily Telegraph's scheme for bringing out one hundred novels has been reported as complete. It will not, however, be announced this month.

WE understand that Messrs. Black will publish a supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica, bringing a number of articles up to date. This supplement will be issued through the Times, and it is expected to be complete "before the end of the century." Whether this expression means before the end of 1899, or before the end of 1900, is a matter of doubt.

WITH the reviewer, at any rate, Mr. Dooley is already a favourite. Whether the general reader takes kindly to the patois of the Irish Chicagoan remains to be seen. The story of his origin shows that Mr. Dooley began as many a good series has begun ere this—in the suggestion of an editor. The Chicago Evening Post started a Sunday edition, and Mr. Dunne, who was one of the younger members of the staff, was told off to fill an odd column of the first number, which suddenly manifested itself. He asked for guidance as to subject: "‘Oh, anything or anybody,’ replied Mr. M’Auliffe, the editor, ‘interview Jim M’Garry or the man in the moon or anybody you like, only give us a column, and give it quick.’" Jim M’Garry was a saloon keeper, whose views on things in general, delivered in a rich Irish-American brogue, always gave amusement to his patrons. So Mr. Dunne wrote a column giving an imaginary conversation between "M’Gearin" and "Jawn" M’Kenna, a local politician. Next week the Sunday Post was again short of copy, and Dunne was called upon once more. The column then became a prominent weekly feature. In the meantime, however, M’Garry complained to the editor that "Peter Dunne, a decent boy," but a villain, had served him a low, mean trick, and generally made life miserable for him. The result of his pleadings was that "M’Gearin" gave place to "Dooley."

So little, according to the New York Critic, did Mr. Dunne think of the Dooley articles more than of his other regular "copy," that he did not even preserve the papers containing them, and when publishers began to make offers to him for the book rights, and he finally consented to collect the little papers as best he could, it was an admirer of Mr. Dooley, unknown to Mr. Dooley's author but known to some of his friends, who came forward with a complete file, or nearly complete, and made the book possible. It has been a pronounced success, from more than one point of view, and publishers are making flattering offers to Mr. Dunne looking toward more ambitious portrayal of Irish-American life. Mr. Dunne's wit is inevitable; it is his birthright. The Irish people he knows well, though he has never been in Ireland. The dialect of Mr. Dooley, it may interest some to know, is the dialect of County Roscommon, and natives of that county have enthusiastically approved its accuracy.

MR. SHELDON'S books, it has been remarked, are enjoying no unique popularity. Among works which have been selling by thousands for years and years must be included Anna Sewell's Black Beauty, a story that is still a favourite in the nursery. Of this book Messrs. Jarrold & Sons will shortly issue 100,000 copies in sixpenny form. Already Black Beauty has gone through forty-seven editions in this country, and has been translated into French, German, Norwegian, and Italian. In the United States, where unfortunately for author and publisher the copyright was not secured, some two or three million copies, published under the auspices of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, have been sold, and a vast quantity distributed gratis.

A LETTER from Mr. Kipling to an author who lost his little son, which is printed in M. A. P., has a pathetic application to-day. This is a passage: "People say that that kind of wound heals. It doesn't. It only skins over; but there is at least some black consolation to be got from the old and bitter thought that the boy is safe from the chances of the after-years. I don't know that that helps, unless you happen to know some man who is under deeper sorrow than yours—a man, say, who has watched the child of his begetting go body and soul to the Devil, and feels that he is responsible. But it is the mother that bore him who suffers most when the young life goes out."

A CAUSTIC rhymers comments, in the current World, on some of the less restrained telegrams which were despatched to Mr. Kipling. He writes:

Had this homage been intended
Solely for your private ear,
It might well have been defended
As spontaneous and sincere:
But this sort of demonstration
Loses its impressiveness
By concurrent publication
In the columns of the Press.

A recapitulation of messages follows:

From each corner and each cranny
Of the Kailyard cables flew:
While the voice of Florence Annie
Pleaded for the mild Hindoo.

Minor poets, blubbering blindly,
Cabled from Parnassus' slope:
Anthony assured you kindly,
While there's life there must be Hope:
Till, by diut of constant churning,
Everywhere was plainly seen
Milk of human kindness turning Into merest margarine.

This is truly a day when a strong searchlight beats upon sentiment. The slightest lapse from reticence and dignity that finds its way into the Press finds also its castigator.

A SIXPENNY edition of Mr. Kipling's Departmental Ditties is about to be issued by Messrs. Newnes. This is the book which, owing to copyright difficulties, Messrs. Macmillan were unable to include in their uniform edition of Mr. Kipling's writings. Messrs. Thacker, who were the previous owners of the copyright, have now transferred it to its present holders.

THE new volume of the Biographical Thackeray, which contains "Lovel the Widower," the "Roundabout Papers," and "Denis Duval," is enriched by a hitherto unpublished chapter of the last-named story. In her Introduction Mrs. Ritchie carries the story of her father's life to the end. Here is a portion of a letter written by Thackeray to his mother not long before his death:

So with our diseases—we die because we are born; we decay because we grow. I have a right to say, "O, Father, give me submission to bear cheerfully (if possible) and patiently my sufferings"; but I can't request any special change in my behalf from the ordinary processes, or see any special Divine animus superintending my illnesses or wellnesses. Those people seem to me presumptuous who are for ever dragging the Awful Divinity into a participation with their private concerns. In health, disease, birth, life, death, here, hereafter, I am the subject and creature. He lifts me up and sets me down certainly—so He orders my beard to grow. Yonder on my table in the next room is a number of the "Earthen Vessel"—Brother Jones writes of Brother Brown how preciously he has been dealt with: Brown has been blessed by an illness; he has had the blessing of getting better; he has relapsed, and finally has the blessing of being called out of the world altogether. I don't differ with Brown essentially—only in the compliments, as it were, which he thinks it is proper to be forever paying. I am well: Amen. I am ill: Amen. I die: Amen always. I can't say that having a tooth out is a blessing—is a punishment for my sins. I say it's having a tooth out.

IN another place Mrs. Ritchie gives this account of her father's reading habits: "As far as I can remember, I do not believe that he had any particular feeling for special editions. He used a cheap, battered old Boswell with double columns; the companion with whom, as he said, he could have been quite content to dwell upon that problematical desert island. He also liked his shabby, worm-eaten copies of Johnson's poets. Milton's Sonnet to Shakespeare in Johnson's poets was one of the last things he ever read. When he did not sleep well, sometimes in summer-time he used to get up very early, about 4 o'clock—long before the house was astir—and we would come down to breakfast and find him standing reading by his bookshelves. . . . If he read a book he turned page after page without stopping at all, in a rapid methodical way, and he used to say that from long habit he could glean the contents of each page as he glanced at it. It was only the other day that an eminent politician of this present time declared to a friend that it was almost impossible to him to read less than three lines at once, and some such power must have belonged to my father's short-sighted eyes."

THE house in which Robert Louis Stevenson was born, lately advertised for sale, has now changed hands at the sum of £800. The purchaser is Mr. J. C. Dibdin, a descendant of the nautical song-writer and the author of Annals of the Edinburgh Stage. He has recently, says the Scots Pictorial, blossomed into a novelist, "and now, under the Stevensonian roof, there is no saying what he may do with the pen."

A NEW sixpenny magazine for schoolboys, entitled the Captain, will be published by Messrs. Newnes on the 24th inst. The Captain will have two serial stories, short tales, competitions, and a regular article on pastimes and athletics by Mr. C. B. Fry. It will be illustrated, and an attempt is to be made to interest also the undergraduate. The statement, however, which is made in the circular before us, that at present there is no sixpenny magazine for boys, is not strictly accurate. There is the monthly issue of the Boy's Own Paper, and there is the Public School Magazine.

CONTINUING our series of portraits of prominent men of letters in their studies, we give this week Mr. Grant Allen. Mr. Grant Allen is a Canadian by birth and cosmopolitan by training. He was educated in the United States, in France, and at Oxford. Subsequently he taught, and Darwin had no apter exponent. His early books displayed this bent: Physiological Aesthetics, The Evolutionist at Large, The Colour Sense. But there is not much money in Evolution; hence this agile mind turned to fiction. Philistia appeared, and short stories appeared, and Babylon appeared, all signed with persuasive pseudonyms—"Cecil Power" or "J. Arbutnot Wilson"; while The Colour of Flowers, Flowers and their Pedigree, still testified to the old love. Gradually, however, fiction won the mastery, and For Maimie's Sake, The Tents of Shem, The Devil's Die, This Mortal Coil, bore witness to the author's energy. Meanwhile he reviewed much, and was busy journalistically, as was explained in that famous confession, in which, rather than write for a living, said he, a man should sweep a crossing. The next phase was hectic sociology. That was the period of the hill-top and The Woman who Did, mother of a long line of the fiction of revolt. Then came The Lower Slopes, a collection of poems, and then more novels of a less serious type, and The Evolution of the Idea of God. And now Mr. Allen is guiding tourists about Europe with one hand, and doling out more fiction with the other. He wrote better once than to-day, but that is only natural when his tremendous output is considered. Mr. Allen's mind is of extraordinary quickness, and his knowledge is encyclopædic. He lives at Hind Head; and is just fifty-one.

IN Mrs. Julia Ward Howe's reminiscences in the March Atlantic Monthly is an amusing story of Theodore Parker, the American divine, and his devotion to his wife. Says Mrs. Howe:

His affection for his wife was very great. From a natural love of paradox, he was accustomed to style this mild creature "Bear"; and he delighted to carry out this pleasantry by adorning his étagère with miniature bears, in wood-carving, porcelain, and so on. His gold shirt stud bore the impress of a bear. At one Christmas time he showed me a breakfast cup upon which a bear had been painted, by his express order, as a gift for his wife. At another he granted me a view of a fine silver candlestick in the shape of a bear and staff, which was also intended for her. He even confided to me the first clauses of a little catechism, which ran as follows:

"What creature is this?"

"A bear."

"What sort of a bear is it?"

"The very best sort of bear."

"What shall it do to be saved?"

"Have cubs."

Which, alas! the poor Bear did never accomplish.

The attitude of clever men to their wives would make an entertaining magazine study. In the case of the Carlyles the bearishness was on the other side. The Grotes have never been rightly presented.

ROUEN now has a bust of Guy de Maupassant. It stands near that of Flaubert, Maupassant's master in literature. On the occasion of the unveiling, two of the author's stories were read in the theatre; his play, "Histoire du Vieux Temps," was acted; and M. Jacques Normand read a paper on Maupassant's dramatic method.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Many years ago a brother of mine sent an old edition of Sir Walter Scott's novels to be bound, and to his wrath The Talisman and The Legend of Montrose came home with these backings—'The Tallish Man' and 'The Leg End of Montrose.'"

THE Literary Review, an American periodical devoted to current literature, has just undergone revision and enlargement. Among its new features is "A Novel Readers' Guide," in which all works of fiction will be noticed. Therein we seem to detect the influence of the ACADEMY.

Bibliographical.

THE three-and-sixpenny edition of Tennyson's Works is, it seems, to be minus the Plays. The Plays, of course, are bulky things; they occupy some 260 pages in the seven-and-sixpenny edition of the Works. It is easy to see why they are not to be included in the cheaper volume; but why not put them into a volume by themselves? Tennyson, we are all agreed, was not a great dramatist; he was not even a fine one. But, for all that, his plays contain a good deal of genuine and charming poetry. It is, therefore, not quite fair to him as a poet that they should not be easily acquired by those who want them. I submit the suggestion to Messrs. Macmillan. Let us have two three-and-sixpenny volumes—one Poems, the other Plays.

Lieut.-Col. Newnham-Davis's coming book on Dinners and Dinners should be an acceptable companion and complement to the Cakes and Ale and Flowing Bowl of Mr. Edward Spencer. I presume it will partake of the character of a pleasant guide to good eating. I remember reading some years ago, in the pages of All the Year Round (I think), a series of articles on "Famous Dinners," dealing with the repasts which have found a place in historic and biographic records. They struck me as very interesting, and I have sometimes wondered why they were not formed into a volume. Some dinners have had an unquestionable influence upon the fate of nations. Was it not a spell of postprandial indigestion which made Napoleon lose the Battle of Leipsic?

The selection from the verse of James Thomson ("B. V."), which Mr. Bertram Dobell has just made and published, is not, of course, the first of its kind. Just a decade ago Mr. Dobell joined Reeves & Turner in issuing a little volume called, like the new one, The City of Dreadful Night, and Other Poems. In this there was no "Weddah and Om-el-Bonain," no "Mater Terebrarum," no "Blake" or "Burns," and so forth. On the other hand, the 1888 book did contain the "Attempts at Translation from Heine," which one is sorry to find absent from the book of 1899. However, those who desire to study Thomson's verse as a whole will, of course, discard the selections both of 1899 and 1888, and turn to the Poetical Works in two volumes.

Can anyone tell me anything about the Mr., Mrs., or Miss L. Melville who is announced as the author of a forthcoming Life of William Makepeace Thackeray? In view of the biography of her father which Mrs. Ritchie has been giving us in instalments lately, this announcement of another and an unauthorised Life of Thackeray naturally strikes the eye. We have had the compilation which John Camden Hotten published, and the monograph by Anthony Trollope, and the more recent "Great Writers" volume by Messrs. H. C. Merivale and F. T. Marzials. I submit that unless Mr. or Mrs. or Miss L. Melville has something new to tell us about Thackeray, his or her effort has the air (in the meantime) of being supererogatory.

The Realms of Gold is the happy title Mr. John Dennis has hit upon for his "new book for youthful students in English literature." The phrase is taken, of course, from the first line of Keats's sonnet on Chapman's Homer—a poem which Mr. Dennis naturally included in the pretty little collection of English Sonnets published by him so long ago as 1873. That collection was the forerunner of several such collections from other hands. That Mr. Dennis is well qualified to cater for "youthful students" his English Poetry for Young Readers, issued some fifteen years ago, sufficiently attests. He has a real knowledge of English literature, well illustrated, of late years, by his volume on The Age of Pope.

We may take for granted, I think, that there will be no new biography of Mrs. Keeley. Mr. Walter Goodman's book about The Keeleys on the Stage and at Home, published four years ago, is a flimsy performance; but it holds the field, and a very few lines would bring it "down to date." It seems inevitable that theatrical memoirs should be rather vague and superficial. Before Mr. Goodman's volume appeared, the late Montagu Williams had introduced into his own Autobiography two chapters (if I remember rightly) of delightful gossip with Mrs. Keeley about her professional career—Mrs. Keeley, as all the world knows, being the autobiographer's mother-in-law.

Mr. W. P. James has been criticising the policy of inclusion and exclusion adopted in the case of the "English Men of Letters" series, and has mentioned among the regrettable omissions the name of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. But in this Mr. James has made a slip. The said series does comprise a monograph on Sheridan, and a very poor one it is. Mrs. Oliphant wrote it, and rarely has there been a more unsatisfactory bit of book-making. Mrs. Oliphant was no authority on either the Life or the Works of Sheridan: why was she selected for the task?

A Natural Man.

The Treatises of Benvenuto Cellini on Goldsmithing and Sculpture. Translated by C. R. Ashbee. (Arnold. 35s.)

THE Renaissance was the last universal outbreak of human nature in the colloquial sense, and Benvenuto Cellini in this context has been rightly called its ultimate word and its epitome. This fact, and not his artistic achievement, assures him a cheerful eternity on earth. Were all the creations of his facile hand pulverised to-morrow, our impression of him would not be weakened, for his unpractised pen pictured his times and himself, the luminous point upon which all their rays were focussed, with the perfection that is attained only once in a fortunate epoch. He combines the merits of a human document of the greatest rarity with those of a unique genius who accidentally wrote one of the more excellent books among the most excellent.

It is on this ground that one accords an expectant welcome to the first English version of his Treatises on Goldsmithing and Sculpture, dedicated to the "Metal Workers of the Guild of Handicraft" by C. R. Ashbee, and illustrated by the blocks originally used in Eugène Plén's magnificent volume, Benvenuto Cellini, Orfèvre, Medailleur, Sculpteur. The translator has done his best to imitate the method of Mr. Symonds in that writer's vivid rendering of the Vita—a piece of work that takes out of Roscoe's version all the life and colour it ever boasted—and it is not too much to say that he has succeeded in the attempt. But we must confess to repeated shocks of incongruity on hearing modern English slang put into the mouth of the sixteenth century Tuscan, as when he is taught to speak of a man's action being "all off his own bat." Though Mr. Ashbee has fitly chosen to address his labours to men engaged in the actual processes of the goldsmith's art, he might surely have retained, without any loss of lucidity, a little more of the archaic flavour of the original.

This is not the place to deal with the Treatises from a technical standpoint. We did not open them to learn "How to Give a Diamond its Reflector," but in the hope that they might reflect light upon Benvenuto. And they do. The fantastic, exuberant, irrepressible creature has everywhere stamped his emphatic seal. He tells us in his first sentence that "what prompted him to write, was the knowledge of how fond people are of hearing anything new," and later on that, "wishing to give God some sort of thanks for having made me the man I was, I set to write what I am now writing." Were reasons more humanly persuasive ever given for the existence of a scientific handbook? He characteristically proceeds: "Then, in the second place, I felt much troubled in mind because of all sorts of annoying things, the which I purpose in the following treatise, with due modesty, to recount." It is with a thrill of pleasure that we learn that the old bravo of the Vita is, as ever, ready to finger his sword hilt. But we throw up our hands at the modesty of the man who, after several lurid manslaughters, performed with infinite gusto, pointed out to the friends who had acquired the keenest relish for him, that his head had been blessed with an aureole, visible even to their disenchanted eyes!

The note of self-revelation and self-appreciation, struck so early in the book, is insisted upon again and again with such robust candour and fervid joy, that the reading of his driest technicalities is an exhilarating exercise. Here are a few more utterances of the kind: "Now I'm not the sort of fellow who's feared of any mortal thing"; "I minded me of those gifts from God Himself, and which come to a man without any toil of his own: comeliness, for instance, or strength, or handiness—and to me methought God had given surety of purpose"; "Suddenly, as in a frenzy, my own inborn daring came upon me: it's not a thing one can learn, this! it's in a man's nature." In these and in other instances that might be adduced, we perceive that the Treatises form a supplement to that more exhaustive eulogy, the Autobiography, which Walpole in his best superficial manner qualified as "more amusing than any novel." Always true to his intense personality, Cellini illustrates each of the arts he describes by explicit references to his own works. Thus, when he speaks of the tinting of diamonds, he relates his difficulties with the magnificent stone bestowed by Charles V. upon Pope Paul III.; when he unfolds the mystery of Minuterie Work he presents us with a graphic history of the Morse he fashioned for Clement VII., and gossips of the famous salt-cellar that adorned the banquets of Francis of "the Field of the Cloth of Gold"; and when he treats of Casting in Bronze he recites the stormy epic of his "Perseus." Of course, in all this we renew our acquaintance with stories that we have already heard from the lips of their hero; but when that hero is Benvenuto, where is his admirer who will not gladly listen to them again, recounted with the old fire, and with many a new touch of passion, humour, wrong-headedness, and enthusiasm, amazingly united with the nicest observation?

And here recurs the idea that recurs until it convinces us as we consider Cellini—that he must be weighed as a man and a writer rather than as an artist. It is perhaps generally admitted that Cellini the artist smacks of the jeweller and of decadence, and that even Cellini the jeweller may be too Corinthian an artificer. His crowning work, the "Perseus," is indeed the figure of a "pretty man." He stands above poor trussed Medusa like a gladiator upon a vanquished rival, holding aloft the gory head with "pardonable insolence" for the applause of the thundering circus. But there is nothing elemental in the statue beyond florid youthful strength, which is the less elemental in that it is florid. There is no touch of the triumph of clear heroic serenity, no trace of the austere simplicity of great inspiration; yet it was devoutly worshipped by its creator as the masterpiece of a transcendent genius.

No; to have worked upon wax and marble is assuredly not Cellini's distinction: to have been "wax to receive, and marble to retain," is his felicity. It has become a commonplace to say that his reception of an impression was marvellously sharp and impersonal, and that it never grew dulled. But the singularity of these facts has perhaps never been sufficiently emphasised. It is to be found in this—that the man whose spirit was so properly his own in its self-absorption, so entirely not his own in the welter of his passions, and who saw himself purblindly in a mist of false and shifting colours, should be a medium so faithful and transparent for the transmission and record of external images. The reading of the Autobiography for the first time is a milestone in one's literary experience. One cannot forget the wonderful differentiation of the units that cross its stage, or the sense of brilliant confusion that follows the final descent of the curtain. It leaves the reader's imagination full of sound, life, and colour; of the blaze of southern suns, of the crimson of cardinals, of the oppressive and blatant magnificence of popes and princes; of dusty battles and bloody treacheries; of junketings where Petronius Arbitrator would have lolled an apt host and scarce have bankered after Neronian Rome; of fair galleries cool with the breath of marble, and of streets simmering with packed humanity; of the clash of arms and the click of the trowel, and the reverberation of imperial salutes. Such is the spectacle that moves in Cellini, where its flaming masses are portrayed as in a magic crystal.

Through these motley multitudes the indomitable Ego of Benvenuto winds its way, and "swims, or sinks, or wades, or creeps, or flies." Baretti, watching the progress of that turbulent soul, says: "We derive from it something of the same pleasure which we feel in contemplating a terrible wild beast who cannot get near enough to hurt us." This is true, but not entirely true. If Cellini in many moods much resembled the Pietro Torrigiano whom he has immortalised—Pietro of the terrible brows and demoniac gestures, who battered stone into statues, and statues, when he judged them better than his own, into stone—he had others as mild as that of his father, Giovanni, the architect and recluse, who delighted his soul with the music of flute and viol, and prayed God to spare his days until he should see Benvenuto the first utterer of sweet sounds in Florence. In short, Cellini is the Natural Man raised to the hundredth power, and forced into magnificent growth in the hot-bed of the Italian Renaissance. We rise from our last meeting with him in the pages of Mr. Ashbee's translation stimulated and refreshed, and close the plain sage-green volume with regret. Could its cover adequately suggest its original author, it should be mounted in enamelled gold and set with gems.

Young Love and Old Love-Tales.

"If all the world and love were young" (as Raleigh's famous line has it), then might the modern masters of the short story be still writing such tales as these. The world being old, and love yet older, we may thank Miss Una Taylor for showing English readers how the short-story-writer of the Middle Ages pleased the Italian public. She does not profess to be a literal translator, and confesses to omissions—partly necessitated by the difference of modern taste; so that she calls these stories "retold." Nevertheless she allows that they "are given in the main as they were written." No English is childlike enough to suggest the delicious lisp of Tuscan of these old novellisti. But she has done wisely in refraining from the sham Elizabethan which is the usual resort of translators in rendering old-world literature. Instead, she gives us simple and elegant modern English; the naïf sentence-structure and manner of narration alone suggesting the style of the originals, and doing so very efficiently.

These old tales are young tales: young in their ingenuous directness, in their ways of thought, in the society they depict, and in the love they exalt. It is the love of a young world, and it is also useful love, the love of young men and maidens. You might think, to read these novelle, there was no love after thirty—nay, after twenty-five. Doubtless, in those days, this was no such untruthful impression as it seems to us. When no over-crowded and over-competitive social conditions artificially impeded marriage, we may take it, probably, that early marriage was the rule. Young love, and southern love, and the love of a young society, it is direct, tyrannous, self-abandoned, rushing over all obstacles to its end—with the blind instinct of animals. It is southern love, also, in that it quickly turns to hatred, and is as extreme in the one shape as the other. That terrible convention prevails in it (still lingering in France and on the French stage) of the outraged husband's right to visit death upon the adulterous wife. Miss Una Taylor shows us this in the sternly dramatic climax of "Madonna Laura." After that striking scene where the husband bids the youth give her the harlot's price, Masuccio tells us in the most incidental, matter-of-custom fashion: "Calling his servants, he made Alfonso enter a richly furnished chamber made ready for his coming. When this was done, before he, too, sought his couch, the knight bade prepare poison for the last sleeping-cup of his wife." No more has the novelist to say of it or her: it is as though the man had bid them poison his dog. Hideous!

There are twelve stories, from the pens of seven novelists, and they cover the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries. There is a distinct progression in manner, not altogether for the better. We begin with Boccaccio—direct, simple, clear-cut; nothing too much, everything adequate; symmetrical and most seeming-artless. Extract is far more helpless with him than with Chaucer. The touches of tenderness are not unlike in both—as in the tale where the girl has a dream signifying her lover's sudden snatching from her, and he dreams to like issue. They relate their dreams beside a garden fountain, where they sit gathering kisses and roses; but he would fain make light of the twin visions:

Presently, as thus they abode together, Gabriotto gave a deep sigh, and, outstretching his arms to her, he cried: "Alas, my soul! help me, for I die!" So saying he fell backwards upon the grass. The girl lifted him upon her knee, and, weeping, said:

"Oh, sweet my lord, what dost thou feel amiss?"

But Gabriotto answered her not, and, breathing hard and covered with sweat, in a short space he passed from this present life.

She summons her serving-woman, and they resolve to carry the body to his house:

She bade the woman quickly fetch a piece of silken cloth she had laid by in a chest. When it was brought she spread it as best she could beneath the body of Gabriotto, and she put his head upon a soft pillow. With many tears she closed his eyes and his mouth, and she made him a rose-garland, and the roses they two had gathered she heaped around him. . . . Then, because the day drew near apace, the woman prevailed upon her with much entreaty, and she rose, and that same ring with which Gabriotto had wedded her, she drew from her finger and set it weeping upon his hand, saying:

"Dear my lord, if thy soul now sees my crying—or if it be that in the corpse whence the spirit is departed there is neither knowledge nor feeling—receive with kindness her last gift whom living thou didst love so much."

This said she swooned, falling backwards upon his body.

Infelicitously did Keats apostrophise "eloquent and fanned Boccaccio." This unstrained and natural pathos is more than all eloquence.

Then from Giovanni Fiorentino we have a story which all will recognise as the groundwork of the "Merchant of Venice." A skilful and charming tale, it is yet interesting to see how unerringly Shakespeare has improved it. The plot with regard to the Jew's bond he has taken unaltered; the trial-scene keeps strictly to the lines of the original, even the dialogue being merely a wonderful poetisation of the original dialogue; and, indeed, the scene in the novel is so dramatic that it could not be bettered as a skeleton for the dramatist. But the incident of the caskets he has taken from elsewhere. In the "Lady of Belmonte" (as Miss Una Taylor names the story) it is replaced by a scheme strongly resembling one in the Arabian Nights. The suitors have to go through the ordeal of remaining awake all night; and if they fail, their ship, with all the property they have brought, is forfeit to the lady. The difficulty is that they are presented with a cup of drugged wine before they retire to their couch. The hero, after losing two ships of costly merchandise, succeeds only at the third attempt, when an attendant of the lady in pity tells him the secret of the drugged cup. The callous treachery and avarice of the lady and the lady's scheme before his success contrasts abruptly with her devotion afterwards. Shakespeare, consummate dramatist, saw that the character fell in two halves, and wisely preferred another test for the suitors.

With Masuccio and the fifteenth century we get more of modern detail, less direct keeping to the essentials. Yet the close of "Madonna Laura" has a certain terrible force, which must be read to be appreciated. With the sixteenth century the departure from simplicity increases, though there is still charm and ingenuousness in Cintio and Straparoli, till in Erizzo we get downright speeches of set eloquence. The change is at its height in the final story from Bandello, which provided the plot of "Much Ado About Nothing." Here the tale is told at length, with detail and free use of dialogue, often with lengthy outpourings of eloquence. But it is dramatic, affecting, and effective. No wonder that Shakespeare seized on it. Yet here his admirable judiciousness of adaptation is more than ever conspicuous. Benedick and Beatrice are altogether his own additions. The trick by which the heroine is brought to shame is much less plausible in Bandello's tale. The villain is only seen to scale the balcony of her house; the waiting-woman talking with him in her mistress's clothes is Shakespeare's addition. So also he has given to Claudio traits of levity which make his ready belief of the slander more credible. In Bandello the lady's lover is a high-minded gentleman. In Bandello the slanderer is a rival, who indulges in romantic repentance, and is forgiven by everyone with inconceivably generous ease. Shakespeare assigns the odious part to the irredeemable scoundrel Don John. But Bandello shows marked dramatic skill, particularly in his speeches, now strong, now moving, now noble and pathetic. Take the message in which the hero casts off the heroine:

"Signor Timbreo bids you and your wife provide yourselves with another son-in-law, for that he will not ally himself with you. And this for no shortcoming of yours: you he holds good and true, but because with his own eyes he has witnessed of Fenicia that which, hearing, he would have held incredible, therefore he bids you look well to your own affairs. To thee, Fenicia, he says, the love he bore to you deserved no such guerdon as that thou hast bestowed upon, it, and that as thou hast taken to thyself another lover, another husband shalt thou seek. With thee he has no more to do."

Exceedingly beautiful, but too long to quote, is the speech of Fenicia in answer to the accusation, when she believes herself dying. Altogether a charming book, yet more charming for the very beautiful illustrations of Mr. H. J. Ford.

Sympathy and Satire.

No. 5, John-street. By Richard Whiteing. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

A PRACTISED journalist, a keen observer, a man of feeling and reading, Mr. Richard Whiteing is one of those authors—alas, not too common!—who are content to produce two or three books in a lifetime. In The Island, published eleven years ago, he gave us his notion of an ideal community; in No. 5, John-street he offers us his matured views on that eternal problem, the contrast between the lives of rich and poor. He uses the autobiographic convention, imagining himself to be a man of fortune (£10,000 a year), with a reflective temperament and unique powers of adaptability. Through the death of his friend, the first-person-singular of The Island, who, like himself, suffered from "one of the most serious maladies of the time—the impossibility of telling what the deuce it all means," he takes upon his shoulders the burden of Agent-General of the aforesaid Gilbertian island and contracts to deliver a report on the laws, customs, institutions, and manners of the mother country. In the first wild rush for light, he attends a conference at the Mansion House on the social question; but the proceedings do not inspire him. In his cab on the way home the better plan of seeing for himself occurs to him. He will live in a slum on starvation wages, and earn them. He will live so for six weeks.

The motive is not new, such tales of mean streets have been told again and again; but Mr. Whiteing arrests attention by his vigorous and engaging method of presentment. His style is gay, and goes with a lilt; he has a neat gift of characterisation; his satire bites, and underlying is a strong and deep sympathy for all vicarious sufferers. He just presents the battered side of the shield; he has no pet panacea to offer; he does not try to soothe by the promise that there may yet be balm in Gilead. Also, Mr. Whiteing sees clearly. The foolish anarchist is flied with contempt, the bland company promoter is chastised with scorpions. And yet—if Mr. Whiteing were not so facile a writer and thinker this would have been a better book. For years his busy brain has been so accustomed to weave articles on any subject proposed to him, that he is apt, in the delight of composition, to glide over the exact moment when bit and bridle must be clapped upon the imagination. Again and again, passages of observation—sure, direct, and convincing—are followed by passages where the brain goes on to imagine what the eye has not seen. Low Covey, a philosophic vagabond of the slums, excellently drawn, is a case in point. He receives a call from a Salvation Army lass, and being what he is, an independent, cute man of the slums, the dialogue that follows is natural and convincing:

"Now, brother, come and be saved this very minute. You promised me for to-day."

"Don't want to disgrace myself, Captin'. Wish I may die, if I'd larf; and if I didn't, I should have to bust."

"Larf as long as yer like, only come."

"It ain't you what I should be larfin' at. It's them other cures."

"I know; poor old Colonel Slocum. But he's such a dear!"

"Kunnel Slocum! Why, 'e's only a coaley—jest as I might be. I can't stand that."

"Never mind, brother, larf at 'im. It'll only make 'im pray for yer twice as 'ard. 'Allelujah! Come, and do let us finish off the job this time. Save yer while yer wait."

"I ain't a goin' to sit along with no sinners, not me—to be talked down to by a Gospel shark."

"You shall be saved all by yourself."

Covey softens—"I don't mind goin' jest as far as the door of the barricks—to see yer march out. But I won't go in."

That is so. "I won't go in." Low Covey is not the kind that "goes in." But Mr. Whiteing cannot leave him outside, smoking his cutty, taking an amused, tolerant interest in the proceedings. No! Mr. Whiteing's imagination takes Low Covey the whole way, even to the "sinners' form, with his pipe smouldering in his pocket, his head bowed, and his shoulders rounded in the collapse of repentance."

The narrator does not remain in his slum in all the 337 pages. Through several chapters he leads the bright existence of a man with £10,000 a year, in the prime of life, and in the pink of health; but we find the slum recital the more interesting. Tilda, the flower girl, Low Covey, Nance, and Ole Ikey are real and human, and the narrator's comments—half serious, half pathetic—are always to the point. At a tea party given by Tilda in her bedroom, Low Covey obliges the company with his famous imitations of bird-calls.

"Cleverest bird-call in London, bar none," whispers Mammy to me, as the applause subsides. "If he was more genteel-like to look at, he might make a fortune at the music 'alls. But there, you can't get him into a black coat. He splits it, if it's anything of a fit. And some days there ain't a note in 'im."

She speaks half in pity, half in admiration, as though the Divine finger had been laid on Covey, and had oppressed him with its weight. It is the attitude of all simple natures and simple races towards genius, or the gift. They reverence the burden; they pity the bearer. See a naked dervish in the East haranguing a crowd that bates no jot of veneration for him, though it regards clothing as almost a religious rite. He is not to be judged by their law; he has been "touched."

A deeper note is struck in the pathetic story of Nance, who dies of disease contracted in the indiarubber factory where she works. Here is a passage from a poignant analysis of the last hours of this unhappy child of circumstance :

With the dying girl, as the awful clouds gathered about her, it was the abjectness of sheer physical misery—the sense that the house of the body was a house falling in on all sides.

With this there was the terror of the unknown, unexperienced anguish that might yet be to come, inspired by fragmentary recollections of old teachings of God as Judge, of eternities, of torment, still physical in their nature.

This was rendered only more exquisite by attempted propitiations of confession, as though a midge sought to make a clean breast of it in regard to the infirmities of midge life. These poor consolations soon yielded to the sense that tremendous powers, pitiless, unmoral, working out a law of their own, have us in their grip, and will deal with us according to that law. So the engine-room of an ocean liner would deal with one who had toppled over into its pulverising order of wheel and piston working at their full speed.

And ever yet, in contrast with the sense of that little, vague, and half unknown “naughtiness” of wrong done, the sense of that mighty, yet still vague and unknown, wrath of retribution—the fear that death was going “to hurt,” now and hereafter; the wonder why the irresponsible and unresponsive powers could not let “poor little me” alone.

The explosion of the bomb at the house of the millionaire capitalist does not convince. This is another example of the imagination carrying on the work of eye and insight. It is not to belittle Mr. Whiteing's very real power to say that the gift of making the abnormal seem inevitable is not his. No. 5, John-street is a book to read. It is not unhappy reading. To us it proclaims the moral, consoling to many philanthropists, and sweetening their labour, that happiness—and the kinds and degrees of happiness are as the sands of the sea—may be, and often is, quite independent of environment and the shocks of life.

In Brightest Japan.

A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan. By Mrs. Hugh Fraser. (Hutchinson & Co. 2 vols. 32s.)

THAT women write good books of travel has been acknowledged again and again. Their quickness to notice and compare small things, their readiness to chat and linger and exclaim, go far to ensure success. But where a sense of style is added, where the heart as well as the eye is employed, and where the subject is itself alluring, then a woman's account of her residence in a foreign land has a radiant excellence. Mrs. Fraser's book is of this higher kind: it is more than a book of travel, it is an outpouring of the heart and the expression of a grafted patriotism. In its superiority to the ordinary travel book it is comparable to Eothen. Otherwise it is very unlike that book. Eothen is a criticism of life enforced and adorned by new surroundings. The surroundings are not essential, but are rather used as a convention of style and a source of illustration. It did not matter where Kinglake travelled: he wrote from a cool and witty head, and would have done as well in Kamschatka or “by the lazy Scheldt or wandering Po.” But Mrs Fraser writes from the heart, and her subject is all. She, too, has brains; her pages lack nothing of gaiety and twinkling detail; but her impulse is sheer love of Japan.

Mrs. Fraser's first glimpse of the islands came during a break in her voyage to Tokyo, where her husband was to take up his duties as head of the British legation.

The only thing that came to me as I stepped on shore at Nagasaki was a fit of really light-hearted laughter—laughter of the joyous and unreasonable kind whose tax is mostly paid in tears. Life suddenly presented itself as a thing of fun and joy: the people, the shops, the galloping jinriksha coolies, the toy houses treated as serious dwellings by fathers of families, all combined to give me a day of the purest amusement that has ever been granted to me yet.

The approach to Tokyo was by the Inland Sea, with its shores of pine-fringed hills and clinging mists—mists which really cling and curl and wave and hang as they are made to do by Japanese artists. Here is enchantment:

A fresh wind came tearing down some watercourse in the hills; it swept under the brooding mists, and rolled them up like a scroll; and then—we were on a sparkling sea, flooded with sunshine, enclosed by green mountains, and dotted with innumerable islands. On one, just before us, a lovely temple with a red torri (gate) stood right out on the flood, which bathed the feet of its sentinel pines. The deep was suddenly covered with what seemed a flotilla of white nautilus shells, with sails all set, closing in around us with a flutter of wings, and the cool music of a hundred prows rushing through the water in the sun. Every fishing-boat from every village had put out on that liberating breeze, and the moving crowd of silver sails on the morning sea made a sight too bewildering to paint in words. The peculiar warm sheen of the junk sails, square above and round below, made in long strips, seamed and held together in a thousand lovely patterns by the interlacing ropes strained against the breeze, gave the impression of a web of silver against the blue; and the calm majesty of the silky rush on the water's surface made me feel that our great coal-fed, screw-driven liner was a blot on the universe, and had no title to travel with that fair company.

One might pick a score of passages as good. Here are cherry blossoms:

Tokyo is the city of cherry blossoms; every avenue is planted with them in full, close-set rows, every garden boasts its carefully nurtured trees; over the river at Mukogima they dip to the water, and spread away inland like a rosy tidal wave; and the great park at Ueno seems to have caught the sunset clouds of a hundred skies, and kept them captive along its wild forest ways. . . . There is a tall grove of cherry trees in my garden, and as I look from my upper window I see the soft branches moving against the sky, and far away, rosy white as they, Fujiyama, the queen of mountains, flushing in the sunset.

Although Mrs. Fraser writes with such fulness and feeling of Japanese scenery, she does not neglect Japanese life. Her pages abound in character sketches, and her notes on manners, arts, and occasions are always keen and interesting. Take her womanly reading of the character of Marquis Ito, or her account of the doll festival in March—the girls' month—when the ancestral dolls are produced and all little maidens are happy from Hako-date to Nagasaki; or the mushroom parties in the autumn, when the heats are past, and the happy folk of Kyoto say one to another: “Let us walk on pine needles and quote poetry, and let us gather and roast the matsu-také, for its time has come.”

THE CHILD OF A MIXED MARRIAGE

Mrs. Fraser was not an onlooker only; she took her share in the life around her. One of her first acts was to “stand godmother” to a little waif of the Tsukiji

Orphanage, which is kept by the Black Nuns. At the baptism she was overcome, as well she might be, to see the good missionary father pour the holy water over the child's head from a china tea-pot. The nuns keep a school to which a few European girls and a few daughters of mixed marriages go. Of mixed marriages Mrs. Fraser has little to say; but the portrait we reproduce is not the least interesting picture in a book which is illustrated with much taste.

Whatever this book contains of observation, gossip, and wit, its under-note of emotion prevails. Returning to Japan in 1894, just before the death of her husband at Tokyo, Mrs. Fraser wrote:

I do not think I have really been so far from Japan that I did not sometimes see the cherry blossoms drifting on the wind, did not sometimes hear the scream of the wild goose through the winter sky, and the long roll of the surf thundering up the Atami beaches. Whatever life brings or takes away—and I came with a heavy heart to this other home of my love, as if life or death, I knew not which, were chanting some final dirge in my ears with every break of the sea against the ship's side—whatever comes, Japan will always be my second home. One cannot explain these things. I have lived in many countries, north and south and east and west, and, except in the Rome of our childhood, in none have I found the spirit of beauty, the spirit of peace, the skirts of Nature's robe ever at hand to cling to, as I have here, "east of the sun, west of the moon," in the land of the gods, reed-growing Japan.

Our enjoyment of Mrs. Fraser's book has been complete.

Arms and the Man.

The Right to Bear Arms. By "X.," of the Saturday Review. (Elliot Stock.)

Armorial Families. By A. C. Fox-Davies. (Jack.)

Two genealogical experts of marked ability have been doing yeoman's service of recent years in preaching and conducting a crusade against bogus titles and fictitious or pilfered coats of arms. These are Mr. A. C. Fox-Davies and the mysterious and terrible "X.," of the Saturday Review. It is a strange, but happy, coincidence that twin champions—the one of acknowledged, the other of evident, authority—should come forward simultaneously to do battle in this righteous cause. The vigorous articles of the latter writer have now been reissued in permanent form, under the title of The Right to Bear Arms; while it is satisfactory to find that the success of Armorial Families has been such as to justify the publication of a third and revised edition of that magnificent volume. Who steals my purse may or may not steal trash; but he that helps himself to my name or my escutcheon steals what makes me no poorer by the theft, and makes him richer only in the contempt of all men of honour and good sense. The Right to Bear Arms puts the iniquity of this practice with striking force and lucidity. The book is excellent reading, and carries conviction with it. Its pages are full of interest throughout. The history of armory in England is sketched in outline; the exact position and powers of the Earl Marshal and the College of Arms are defined; the methods followed in the Heraldic Visitations of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries are described; and the whole is illustrated, where requisite, by copies of original documents and by specimens of official grants of arms early and recent. Nor are "Lyon" and "Ulster" neglected, an account being given of heraldic regulations in Scotland and Ireland. Altogether, The Right to Bear Arms is a volume which both those who do and those who do not possess the right will be wise to acquire. Many of the "gentle" will probably learn from it much about the nature of that right as to which they were not very clear before; while its perusal should convince the "ungentle" that the unauthorised assumption of coat armour is an offence alike against the canons of honesty and taste. With regard to Armorial

Families, it is, of course, impossible within the limits of a review to do justice to so important a work: we must be content to point out its scope and object. This is twofold. The Introduction, on the one hand, gives a survey of the chief rules relating to the bearing of arms, explains the proper practice as to liveries and the much-used and much-abused cockade, and adds a variety of further information on kindred topics, which, it is to be hoped, will do something towards dispelling the extraordinary ignorance that prevails concerning such subjects. The body of the work, on the other hand, records armigerous persons whose coats have been duly registered in the Heralds' College down to date, and holds up to derision the names of a number of soi-disant armigers who have assumed bearings for which they can show no official sanction.

Coat armour was primarily a medieval military and genealogical symbol. Although employed as late as the Great Civil War, its value for martial purposes virtually died out in the first half of the sixteenth century, but its use in connexion with family history ceased only when the Heraldic Visitations came to an end in the reign of James II., and when, about contemporaneously with this, the parochial registers began to be more carefully kept than was previously the case. It may not be obvious to everyone what object a man achieves by obtaining the grant of a modern coat of arms. A patent of arms, however, confers a hereditary rank of gentility, just as a patent of peerage confers a peerage, and the object of a modern grant of arms is to obtain that rank. So far back as upwards of three hundred years ago William Wyrley, in his conspicuously sensible booklet, entitled The True Use of Armorie, which appeared in 1592, was moved to denounce the prevailing slackness in matters armorial, and laid the blame for this to laxity on the part of some of the officers of arms; but a rigid and uncompromising exertion of their powers was no easy task, and, as we know, was often resented. Indeed, the famous Boke of Saint Albans wound up with the following anarchical declaration: "It is the opinion of many men that a herald of arms may give arms. But I say if any such arms be borne given by any herald that those arms be of no more authority than those arms which be taken by a man's own authority." But Dame Juliana Berners must not be taken too seriously; and this, moreover, was in 1486, when the newly incorporated Heralds' College, like other excellent products of the rule of the much maligned Richard III., was temporarily under a cloud. Institutions, as well as individuals, have their vicissitudes, and even the College of Arms has not at all times enjoyed the respect it now commands. But, whatever revolt there may have been now and again against the jurisdiction of that corporation, the appropriation of another man's coat of arms has, from the earliest days of organised heraldry, been invariably and unhesitatingly condemned. Witness, for instance, the celebrated Scrope and Grosvenor controversy, decided in 1390; and, says the Boke of Saint Albans, not even the Prince may righteously grant arms that any man already bears.

The editor is justly severe upon the "heraldic purveyor," as he terms the advertising stationer who dispenses shields, crests, and war-cries to his gallant customers, after the fashion of the enterprising grocer who presents each purchaser of a pound of cheap tea with a gaudy pot in which to stew it. We know, though, from Wyrley that the heraldic "painter-fellow," or quality-monger, was already freely trading on the snobbery of the baser sort in the spacious days of great Elizabeth.

Before closing we should like to call attention to the ingenious and quite practicable plan suggested by Mr. Fox-Davies for the permanent endowment of hereditary titles. If carried out, it would effect the reforms needed to ensure rightful succession. It only remains to say that Armorial Families is in every sense a μέγα βιβλίον, which "The Italicised" will probably in their wrath vote to be also a μέγα κακόν.

Beardsley's Monument.

The Early Work of Aubrey Beardsley. With a Prefatory Note by H. C. Marillier. (Lane. 31s. 6d. net.)

THIS handsome volume is Aubrey Beardsley's monument. It will be less enduring than brass, but for many, many years, and perhaps generations, curious-minded people and students of draughtsmanship will examine its pages. The complete career of the artist is not represented—there are no specimens from his ornate French period, the period of "The Rape of the Lock"—but sufficient examples have been reproduced here to prove emphatically, even to the most prejudiced opponents of Beardsleyism, that by Aubrey Beardsley's death was lost an extraordinary decorative genius. Beardsleyism may describe two totally different classes of person: those that are attracted by his decadence, his schoolboy candour, his power of suggesting wickedness; and those that cannot too greatly admire his delicacy of line, his masses of black, his superb gift for ornamentation, and his skill in composition. These latter care nothing for the picture's subject; the former care very little for anything else. It is the former who admire "The Stomach Dance," "Enter Herodias," "Messalina," the stupidly obscene designs for the "Lysistrata" of Aristophanes (not reproduced here), and all the rest of the rather puerile and for the most part very ridiculous emanations of the less healthy side of Beardsley's nature. Whether they represented a natural bent, or whether they were drawn from him by the plaudits and other encouragements of misguided friends, we are not aware; but they form the inferior portion of his output. Compared with his best work they are nowhere: his "Peacock Skirt," "The Toilet," the "Revenants de Musique," the title-page for Salome, the "Eyes of Herod," the peacock's feather in the Neophyte and Black Art drawing, the figure of the girl in the tail-piece to Salome. The hand that produced such exquisite decorative effects as these can hardly be too highly extolled. Judged by his worst, Beardsley is still unique and remarkable. Judged by his best, he is great.

Of the man himself—the private individual at the back of his work—enough has been said of late, both in our columns and elsewhere. Mr. Marillier, who contributes an introduction to this volume, speaks well when he says:

Those who live healthy, normal lives, untroubled by hæmorrhage, untroubled by genius, may try to picture the life of one harassed by both at once. They may hate the man's work if they must, and if their souls are built that way, but they might try and find some spark of sympathy for the man. One can scarcely realise what it means to have only six real years of life, and to feel that they are precarious. To have done as much in them as Beardsley did, of actual solid work, is no mean achievement, apart from the fact that so much is work of almost microscopic delicacy.

This passage may be commended to the enemies of Beardsley's art, who usually contrive to be also the enemies of Beardsley's character.

We find two faults with the book. One is the title. When an artist's career is so brief as that of Aubrey Beardsley—little more than six years—it is misleading to use the phrase "early work" unless one proposes to adhere to it. Beardsley's "early work," strictly speaking, would comprise only the drawings which he made before the days of Salome and the The Yellow Book. With those publications his middle—or Lane—period began. Then came his last—or Smithers—period, when his style changed once more, and he produced the exquisite "Rape of the Lock" drawings and the very inferior designs for The Savoy. As a matter of fact, as he died in his twenty-sixth year, all Beardsley's work was early; but confusion would have been saved had this volume borne another title. Our second grumble is that no dates are appended to the drawings. For the most part they seem to be chronologically arranged, but at the end comes a batch of Pall Mall Budget work which takes us back into time at a jump. They ought to be at the beginning. The presence of accurate or approximate dates throughout the book would lend it increased value. Nothing, however, could augment its magnificence. The volume has been prepared by printers and binders with the greatest care, and it reflects the highest credit on Mr. Lane's thoroughness and taste.

A Gentle Philosopher.

Michael Faraday, His Life and Work. By Silvanus P. Thompson. (Cassell. 3s. 6d.)

IT was as a lecturer that Faraday won the affection of the public. Many people now living sat as children in the theatre in Albemarle-street spell-bound by the old man's kindly talk as he explained the chemistry of a candle. One listener, Lady Pollock, has recorded her impressions of Faraday as follows:

His quick sympathies put him so closely in relation with the child that he saw with the boy's new wonder, and looked, and most likely felt for the moment, as if he had never seen the thing before. Quick feelings, quick movement, quick thought, vividness of expression and of perception belonged to him. He came across you like a flash of light, and he seemed to leave some of his light with you. His presence was always stimulating.

A few people there must be who can recall Faraday's more elaborate and impassioned address to adults. His lecturing seemed to be without art, yet it was most carefully studied, as Prof. Thompson shows. Of its effect there can be no doubt, for we hear of the kindly old man enchaining his hearers by the most gradual and persuasive arts, and then lifting them on a tide of feeling and lofty speculation. With all his eloquence Faraday knew the value of a plain and slow delivery, of a quiet and dignified bearing. He believed in experiments, and rehearsed the simplest. When lecturing on the magnet he would, with delightful accuracy and abandon, throw a coal-scuttle full of coals and a poker and a pair of tongs at the great magnet, where they stuck to the intense amusement of his audience.

But the crowds which thronged the theatre on a Faraday night saw more than an orator and a fine manipulator. The character of the lecturer shone in his face, and all could read the simplicity of the man who had refused to turn a single one of his discoveries to his own profit; who preferred his laboratory and his home to the dinner tables of Mayfair; and who was not ashamed to belong to the insignificant sect of the Sandemanians.

Prof. Thompson tells the story of Faraday's life with sympathy and completeness; he is alive to the quaint attractiveness of the man who shocked his scientific friends by the freedom of his speculations, but who "never admitted the possibility of human flaw in the printing, editing, translation, collation, or construction of the Bible."

Notes on New Books.

FRAGMENTS OF AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. BY FELIX MOSCHELES.

Mr. Moscheles began his interesting life among musicians and continued it among artists, of whom he is himself one. He has also known many distinguished authors. Barry Cornwall wrote a song for his christening; he painted Robert Browning's portrait, and once collaborated in a poem with him; and that pleasant little book In Bohemia with Du Maurier is from his pen. Mr. Moscheles, however, has not very much to tell, but he tells it genially. The Browning passages of his volume will be perhaps the most interesting. This is the Browning-Moscheles effort, in which, however, Mr. Moscheles' part was a very modest one. First version:

And as I wandered by the happy shores
And breathed the sunset air of balmy climes,
I waking dreamt of some transcendent shape—
A woman's, framed by opalescent shells—
Peacefully lulled by Nature's harmonies.

Second version:

Wind-wafted from the sunset, o'er the swell
Of summer's slumbrous sea, herself asleep,
Came shoreward, in her iridescent shell
Cradled, the isle's enchantress. You who keep
A drowsy watch beside her—watch her well!

The lines were used to describe Mr. Moscheles' picture, "The Isle's Enchantress." On another occasion Browning made the following impromptu translation of some familiar lines in Horace's Third Satire:

All sorts of singers have this common vice:
To sing 'mid friends you have to ask them twice!
If you don't ask them, that's another thing:
Until the judgment-day be sure they'll sing!

And the same friend once translated thus two verses by Klingemann, written for Mr. Moscheles' father's birthday:

Hail to the man who upwards strives
Ever in happy unconcern,
Whom neither blame nor praise contrives
From his own nature's path to turn.
On and still on, the journey went,
Yet has he kept us all in view,
Working in age with youth's intent,
In living—fresh, in loving—true.

THE MUNICIPAL PARKS. BY LIEUT.-COL. J. I. SEXBY.

This book is far too diffuse. Luckily its scope excludes the Royal Parks, the history of which would have swelled Lieut.-Col. Sexby's book to proportions which we are afraid even to imagine. As it is the book contains 634 pages, not counting the index. Our author's enthusiasm has led him to take every open space as a text for a gossiping account of the neighbourhood. Thus his chapter on the recreation ground in Leicester-square gravely begins: "The task of writing the history of Leicester-square is a difficult one, owing to the wealth of materials at the chronicler's disposal." Surely it had been better if he had been content to write the history of the "municipal park" and portray its frequenters. Then a page or two on the associations of the surrounding streets and houses would have been welcome. But Lieut.-Col. Sexby's seven pages on the recreation ground are overwhelmed by fourteen pages of familiar history and literary gossip about the square generally. In the case of Lincoln's Inn-fields, four pages about the opening of the garden are succeeded by twenty pages of historical matter relating to the surrounding streets and houses. Imagine the effect of this generosity in a book which surveys the London parks and open spaces from Hampstead to Tooting and from Battersea to Hackney Marsh. We can applaud Lieut.-Col. Sexby's industry. His book is a mine of facts, but we have had so many such! What we want, and do not get, is the book about London which is pointed and original, and reveals an observant eye as well as an acquaintance with books. We are tempted to imagine how a clever Frenchman would have treated this theme; his book would hardly have weighed 3½ lbs. (Stock. £1 1s.)

THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

BY SIR C. DILKE.

Sir Charles Dilke is one of the aptest pupils of the school of Lord Beaconsfield and Prof. Seeley, who discovered the British Empire in its modern sense. But Sir Charles is more, for he invented the term "Greater Britain" as long ago as 1867, though his use of the phrase was for the countries of English speech and English law, in addition to those of British rule. The present little book is a useful handbook to the Empire, and consists of a series of articles contributed to several periodicals during the past year, the whole subject being summed up in 150 pages of good-sized print. In these circumstances Sir Charles Dilke's remarks are naturally somewhat curtailed, but for that very reason they will perhaps prove more attractive to the general reader, for whom, and not for the expert, they are intended. Sir Charles at once strikes the reader's imagination by pointing out that the British Empire has an area of nearly four Europes, public revenues of 260 millions sterling, a population of 400 millions, and half the carrying trade of the world. The people who love to illustrate statistics by means of squares and circles have to keep their largest figures for the British empire, except in the matter of army, silver, tobacco, coffee, and sugar. In the production of gold we are about level with the United States and the Transvaal, while in coal and iron we are run hard by the States. The methods of government throughout the Empire are strange and divergent, for while eleven colonies govern themselves, others are under the Foreign, Colonial, and India Offices. Sir Charles in one passage couples Gibraltar and Malta together; which may give rise to a false impression, for the two possessions are very differently governed, and one of the first things to be done is to put Malta on the footing of Gibraltar. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)

SPAIN (1479-1788).

BY MARTIN A. S. HUME.

Major Hume is really the most prolific of historians. The intimate knowledge which he has acquired of the sixteenth century relations of England and Spain in the course of calendaring the State papers at Simancas has already yielded him a Life of Philip II., as well as much material for a series of studies bearing more particularly on the same question from the English point of view. It now furnishes a considerable part of the present work, which, though not on a very large scale, is comprehensive in its scope, covering as it does the brief period of Spanish glory, and the long centuries of ruin and decay through which that once mighty empire crumbled into nothingness. Major Hume elects to stop with the eighteenth century; but in so doing he left his story not quite finished, as, indeed, is shown by an editorial note which points out that even since part of the book was printed off the loss of Cuba and other islands by Spain has rendered it, in a measure, obsolete. The rapidity of Major Hume's literary production has not, to all appearance, affected either the solidity of his study or the effectiveness of his presentment. His portrait of Philip, politician first and bigot afterwards, is an interesting one, and should lead to some modification of the traditional view of the English Protestant historian. The book is of permanent value. (Pitt Press.)

CHINA.

BY PROF. R. K. DOUGLAS.

There is a certain irony in the addition of this book to the "Story of the Nations" series, for the real history of China seems to be just beginning. No wonder that the first half of the book accounts for a period which "dwarfs into insignificance the antiquity of Egypt and Chaldea," while the second half is packed with events that have occurred since 1840. A spirited account is given of General Gordon's suppression of the Taiping Rebellion. Doubtless many people have forgotten that Gordon once seized a rifle with the intention of shooting Li Hung Chang. In spite of his solemn promise to Gordon to spare the lives of certain rebel commanders, who surrendered on that understanding, Li had sent them to instant execution. "The news of this inhuman treachery reached Gordon in Soochow, and he then, for the first time during the campaign, took a weapon in his hand. Arming himself with a rifle, he went in search of the treacherous Li, and would unquestionably have shot him if the Governor, having received timely warning of his danger, had not taken to flight." The book is well illustrated and indexed, and we note that it is the fiftieth volume in this well-written series. (Unwin. 5s.)

CHINA AND ITS FUTURE.

BY JAMES JOHNSTON.

Mr. Johnston's book begins where Prof. Douglas's leaves off. It is a plea for the national integrity of China under the protection of Great Britain. As for the "partition of China," Mr. Johnston thinks "it is impossible to read with philosophic calmness the pretensions of the upstart nations of Europe to carve out for themselves, from that vast and venerable empire, provinces larger and with populations more numerous than their own territories and people." Mr. Johnston is scornful of the claims of France and Germany to assist in civilising China, and he would have England train a Chinese army, to prevent Russia seizing Manchuria. But Russia might be given the freedom of the valley of the Amur, and be left to develop the railways in peace. (Stock.)

THE STORY OF OLD FORT LOUDON.

BY C. E. CRADDOCK.

In this book a writer who was once prominent among novelists, but has lately done but little, makes her reappearance. We say her, for Charles Egbert Craddock, author of The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains, is in reality a Miss Murfree. The work before us is a contribution to a series entitled "Stories from America's History," wherein facts are set in an attractive environment of fiction. Herein the Red Man is again prominent, for the Cherokee Indians were intent upon securing Fort Loudon. Hence the struggle. The history is told well, but a map would have made the book much more valuable. (Macmillan. 6s.)

OBSERVATIONS AT DUMRAON.

BY V. DE CAMPIONEULLES.

While large and well-equipped parties of scientific men were observing the solar eclipse of January 22, 1898, in various parts of India, a small band of Jesuit Fathers, belonging to the West Bengal Mission, were taking observations with self-constructed instruments and poor resources. This is their account of the matter. The book has undoubted scientific value. Besides the scientific analysis of the eclipse we have a graphic account of the camp and the arrangements. The moment of totality is thus described:

Soon, from the telescope, came the first warning for totality. "Five minutes more!" Operators, assistants, everyone was already at his post; one scarcely dared to move or breathe. Then, at an interval of a few seconds, came in quick succession: "Ready! Go!" here, as in most stations, a few seconds sooner than expected. Suddenly, to the deathlike immobility of suspense succeeded a feverish activity. Nothing, however, was heard but the telling of the seconds, sounding as monotonous as a dreary death-knell, and the numbers of operators notifying their several exposures. "Ninety-five! Ready for the over!" But the warning was scarcely given when it was over, taking again everyone by surprise at Dumraon, as elsewhere, so that no negatives could be secured at the exact moment of last internal contact.

The book is admirably produced and illustrated. (Longmans. 10s. 6d.)

AN INTRODUCTION TO ASTRONOMY.

BY W. H. S. MONCK.

This is a useful little book composed of chapters which have appeared in Popular Astronomy. Although only an "Introduction" to its subject, the writer speculates freely, and claims for the List of Bright Stars which he gives at the end of the book that it includes additions, and shows, as no other published list does, "all the more important features presented by the principal stars which naturally attract the notice of the ordinary observer in our nocturnal sky." The book is illustrated with photographs of stars on the scale of one millimetre to forty-eight seconds of an arc. The rapidity with which our knowledge of the fixed stars is advancing is highly embarrassing to authors: Mr. Monck has been compelled to print a page of "Alterations while Printing" in order to correct a few conclusions upon which doubt has been thrown by the publication of spectroscopic researches at the Lick Observatory. (Hutchinson. 3s. 6d.)

THE GOSPEL PROBLEMS AND THEIR SOLUTION.

BY JOSEPH PALMER.

The cover of this book bears the impress of four keys—one big one and three little. The big one represents the theory that the narrative parts of the Gospels are records contemporary with the events they narrate, and that the longer discourses were taken down as they were spoken. The little ones symbolise (1) that our Lord spoke sometimes in Aramaic, sometimes in Greek; and that the discourses delivered in the former tongue are those which have been preserved by the three synoptists, while St. John records the Greek utterances; (2) that the synoptic Gospels represent the united testimony of the Twelve, severally reported; (3) that the chronological discrepancies between the records of the first three Evangelists are explicable by the supposition that the writers' notes became disarranged, and in the case of Luke by the premature death of the compiler. Mr. Palmer writes with full conviction; but while there is much that is striking in the coincidences which he points out, the chain of his argument is in places perilously thin. (H. R. Allenson.)

If That Were Enough.

To thrill with the joy of girded men,
To go on for ever and fail, and go on again,
And be mauled to the earth and arise,
And contend for the shade of a word and a thing not seen with the eyes:
With the half of a broken hope for a pillow at night
That somehow the right is the right
And the smooth shall bloom from the rough:
Lord, if that were enough?

From R. L. Stevenson.

Fiction.

The Amazing Lady. By M. Bowles.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

THIS book has two values: it is a story of more or less interest, according to the taste of the reader; and it is a contribution to the social history of the end of the nineteenth century. The social historian, when he comes to the early nineties and would deal with a certain feminine type which belonged to them, will find this record of the thoughts, words, and actions of Magda Staepool of priceless service. For it is a little epic of Beardsleyism. The whole "Yellow" movement is focussed in this amazing lady: its emotions, its preferences, its dislikes, and its vocabulary. The author has mastered her subject. Every novel that contains a type minutely and accurately set forth is an addition to fiction, and not often does a new writer begin with such fidelity to the fact.

Interest in the wayward character of the heroine once assured, the story will be read throughout. But not everyone will acquire that interest. Most people like fiction to describe persons who in given situations behave approximately as they themselves would; for the presentation of types, however skilfully done, they care less. To the reader antipathetic to "Yellow" women and their affected oddities this story will come as a piece of sustained artifice. He will refuse to be interested in its emotional paradoxes and its elaborate sentences. It will be useless, therefore, for readers of this class to attempt it. But to the student of types we recommend it with confidence.

Miss Bowles gives evidences of painstaking search for the fitting epithet, often with happy result, but often, also, with a result that is little short of disastrous. Her failure comes of two causes: in her desire to reproduce in words extreme subtleties—divisions and sub-divisions—of meaning, she takes liberties with the language which are not permissible, and, in other hands, not necessary; and also she aims at elaborate words rather than simple ones. As a matter of fact there is no situation which short words will not describe as well as long. With a less studied form of diction this story would be far more readable. But in a new writer the fault is not serious. If Miss Bowles can acquire simplicity of style, or, at any rate, complete command of words (at present she is somewhat in their power), she may write a notable book. But we suspect that she will ever be attracted more to the psychology of capricious womanhood than to other subject-matter.

Odd Issues. By S. Squire Sprigge.
(Leonard Smithers & Co. 6s.)

DR. SQUIRE SPRIGGE writes with admirable care and precision, and he is evidently a trained observer. But fiction, especially the short-story form, is not his medium, which, it seems to us, should be the essay. There are thirteen tales in this volume; each contains a quantity of excellent work, and each is—we are bound to say it—a complete failure. The reason for this failure appears to be that Dr. Sprigge is interested in the statics rather than the dynamics of life. He will describe to you the complications of a microcosm at rest—a school, a university, a capital city—and do so with notable skill; but when confronted by event, by movement of any sort, he loses his good qualities, fights shy of difficulties, and ends by running away. The result is that, while his stories are beautifully "prepared," with all imaginable laborious elaboration, they gradually decline (instead of developing) towards an anti-climax which is usually ludicrous. Take the first story, "Mr. Bonnamy's Bishopric." It opens with a fine statement of the respective positions of a tutor and an undergraduate in a famous college. Both characters are minutely set forth, and the milieu is carefully studied. In the result the undergraduate hides certain questionable French books behind learned tomes in the tutor's ante-room. Then a Prime Minister comes down to offer in person a bishopric to the tutor (sufficiently improbable this!). The statesman takes his turn with the rest in the ante-room, and, while awaiting an audience of his old tutor, discovers the French books. He at once assumes (more improbably!) that the tutor has secret vicious tastes, and he departs without even seeing the tutor. He goes to the rooms of an old friend, talks the matter over (here occurs the only bit of dialogue in the story), and ultimately decides to return to the tutor and make the offer. The fact that he actually did so is stated in a few lines. As a story "Mr. Bonnamy's Bishopric" is not good. Yet it contains pages of first-rate writing. In the other stories the same fatal lack of dramatic perception, the same incoherence (we use the word in its etymological sense), is noticeable. In one tale, "Two Women and a Millionaire," the author does seem to have made an attempt to give dramatic significance to his narrative, but the attempt is clumsy, necessitating a succession of four coincidences, each of which is more ridiculous than the one before it.

We regret to have to condemn Dr. Sprigge, qua novelist, so unreservedly. For he is the possessor of a dignified and adroit style; he can observe accurately and describe faithfully. Also, he is rather original, not only in choice of theme, but in attitude towards his material. Best of all, he has a grave and charming humour. Here is a specimen of it:

"Which way are you going, please?"

"To Norwich, missy."

"Will you take me to Hensham Rectory first?"

"It's a goodish bit of way," said the driver, pondering.

"I would give you my watch," said Alice.

"It ain't that, missy. But, you see, I don't know as I should like to take you all that way without knowing more about you."

"I'm Miss Vaughan Vincent, the daughter of the rector," said Alice, drawing herself to her whole four-feet-six. "It's marked on my handkerchief, and in this book"—holding the articles de circonstance towards him. "My father will be pleased with you and will give you some beer. And my mamma will put your wife into the clothing-club. And we will come and see you at Christmas, if mamma is well enough, and give you some tobacco, and your wife some tea."

By Berwen Banks. By Allen Raine.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

THOSE who like pathos and a good deal of agony, introduced with the urbane intention of whetting the appetite for a happy ending, should read By Berwen Banks. Another Welsh novel, Aylwin, deprived the heroine of her memory: in this novel the hero is deprived of his. But whereas it was a very good thing for Winifred Wynne to forget her past, it was a very bad thing for Cardo Wynne, inasmuch as his wife was the subject of his oblivion, and hence the product of a marriage whose secret she had promised to keep was regarded as illegitimate. The heroine's enforced silence brings out the astonishing magnanimity of her twin sister. "'Now speak,' said Gwladys, taking her [Valmai's] hand and holding it on her own fast-beating heart; 'now tell me, here as we kneel before the all-seeing God and His holy angels, do you know of any reason why we two, when we have dropped these bodies, should not stand in equal purity before the throne of God?'" Replies Valmai: "'Before God there is none! Of course, Gwladys, my heart is full of the frailties and sin belonging to our human nature.'" Whereupon Gwladys: "'I will believe you, darling.'" A little of such Grundeian eloquence goes a long way, though it sheds a wonderful radiance on wedding rings and registers. One is glad to say, therefore, that Valmai is, earlier in the book, a charming, unsophisticated girl who introduces "whatever" into her conversation with most engaging irrelevance. There is also a fine old sea dog who "tarnishes" everything instead of damning it. "'John,' Ay sez, 'you are a d—d fool. You're killing your mother with your foolish swears. Pull up short,' sez Ay, 'and tray and faind some other word that'll do.' So I fixed upon 'tarnished,' and Ay'm dashed if may mother wasn't perfectly satisfied. It's a grand word! Puts you in mind of tar and 'tarnal, and tarpauling, and lots of shipping things." An excellent portrait is the "Vicारे du," with his secret remorse for his unkind behaviour towards his deceased wife, his hatred of Methodists, his love for his son Cardo and gradual conversion to Cardo's point of view with regard to a Methodist's beautiful daughter. The pathos of this deep and reticent nature, with its ugly surface-faults, is distinctly moving. Gwladys, her glory of rhetoric notwithstanding, is the one failure of the book.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE AMATEUR CRACKSMAN.

BY E. W. HORNUNG.

The dedication of this book runs thus: "To A. C. D., this form of flattery." The initials stand for A. Conan Doyle, and the form of flattery is imitation, Mr. Hornung's central character being one Raffles, a Sherlock-Holmes type of man, who, however, not only detects crimes, but also perpetrates them for the sheer fun of the thing. A very readable set of stories. (Methuen. 6s.)

YOUNG LIVES.

BY RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

Mr. Le Gallienne's new romance follows, as its title indicates, on his favourite lines. Youth, with its raptures and foibles, its generousities and poetry, has always appealed to him. Here we have it again. The young lives are those of a little company of friends, chief among whom are Henry and Esther Mesurier, brother and sister, who indulge a "Charles and Mary Lamb dream" of existence. Another character is Ned Hazell. Together Henry and Ned "had read Keats for the first wonderful time, together learned Shakespeare's Sonnets by heart, together rolled out, over tavern tables, the sumptuous cadences of De Quincey." (Arrowsmith. 6s.)

CONTRABAND OF WAR.

BY M. P. SHIEL.

A new bellicose fantasy by the author of The Yellow Danger. This time Mr. Shiel takes a real war—the Spanish-American—and imagines the mind of the American machine to be that of Richard P. Hocking, a millionaire, and Daniel Lambert. Hocking weighs thirty-two stone, and has boundless resources, both of money and brains. The book has incident enough for several. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

PHAROS THE EGYPTIAN.

BY GUY BOOTHBY.

Mr. Boothby herein out-Boothbies himself. His hero, Pharos, is of the family of the Wandering Jew, Zanon, and She: he lives on and on through the ages, perpetrating mischief. The story is of to-day. Pharos, the servant of the Egyptian gods, is told off by them to avenge desecration of Egyptian tombs. Finding a young artist in possession of the mummy of Ptahmes, the magician who wrought wonders against Moses, Pharos (who in his first incarnation was this identical Ptahmes) sets himself to make life unendurable for him. A work of tremendous but attractive improbability. (Ward, Lock. 5s.)

THE KINGDOM OF HATE.

BY TOM GALLON.

Mr. Gallon has forsaken the quiet groove of Tatterley and Dicky Monteith for a romance of mystery and action. He adopts the device of a vague German kingdom, which is called Labyrinthia; and the action moves swiftly to and fro between it and London. From the outset probability is thrown to the winds, but in its place we have rapid dramatic incident that holds the reader. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

AN OPERA AND LADY GRASMERE.

BY A. KINROSS.

A smartly written novel of the gilt-edged type. The hero is young, rich, and clever, yet has seen nothing of life until his friend Hutchinson, a sailor visiting London, drags him into a whirl of gaiety. Instantly Marceron—that is the hero's name—begins to live and love and have the best of good times. The story turns on an opera, and there is musical criticism in the air. (Arrowsmith. 3s. 6d.)

THE MARBLE KING.

BY LILIAN QUILLER COUGH.

A pleasant, fantastic little story of a voyage which two boys took on the Adriatic, and their arrival at a beautiful town full of stately men and women and the home of a divinely gifted sculptor. The whole point is in the descriptions and in the fact that never in after life could the heroes find again the city of the Marble King. The book is neatly produced at a very low price. (Arrowsmith. 6d.)

THE NAMELESS CASTLE.

BY MAURUS JÓKAI.

Another translation from the indefatigable Hungarian novelist. This time the translator is Mr. S. E. Boggs, whose version has had the advantage of the author's revision. It is a pity the names were not Englished too. There is a Herr Vice-Palatine Bernat Görömbölyi Dravakeresztur, who might so easily have been made Smith. But the romance is full of robustness, colour and excitement, and Jókai's persistent charm. (Jarrold. 6s.)

SHANGHAIED.

BY FRANK NORRIS.

To be Shanghaied is to be drugged, and decoyed as a sailor on board an American ship. Once on board, the mate's fists or revolver instil seamanship. In this story a gilded youth of San Francisco suddenly finds himself on a vessel commanded by a drunken, bullying captain. His adventures form the book, which is of American origin, and incisively written. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

FAME THE FIDDLER.

BY S. J. ADAIR FITZ-GERALD.

This novel of Bohemian life in London is concerned with a set of struggling writers and artists living in or about Bute-street, Tottenham Court-road. We visit some curious haunts, including the Crimson Lily Club. Some of the characters emerge from poverty and single unblestness, and there is a happy ending to a very readable story. (Greening. 2s. 6d.)

THE SWORD OF FATE.

BY HENRY HERMAN.

A story of tin and copper mining interests in Cornwall. "The old mine will yield another fortune," soliloquises one of the characters on the second page. "We'll see if it will come to me this time or to that fool Usselby." (Greening. 3s. 6d.)

FROM THE RANKS TO THE PEERAGE.

BY H. A. BRUCE.

The transition is effected in 559 closely printed pages. The style is crude: a vicar "ensconced in his own home" retires to "concoct" his sermon; another character feels "in the vicinity of the lock for the key"; the heroine's arm is so perfect that "it would have made an artist's heart leap. . . . To attempt to describe its ideal form in words would be vandalism." (Digby & Long. 6s.)

THE FELLOW PASSENGER.

BY RIVINGTON PYKE.

This story is "an attempt to combine a complex plot and plenty of incident with measured realism (or to coin a much-needed word, 'actualism') in the telling; the end being complete verisimilitude with life." A good railway mystery. (Greening. 6d.)

HANDSOME PHIL, AND OTHER STORIES.

BY MRS. J. H. RIDDELL.

Eight short stories by this popular novelist. Mrs. Riddell is fond of unhappy endings. There are several in this book. Here is one: "The years have come and the years have gone since the second Mrs. Keegan lay cold and alone on the floor of that poor house, but she has never once heard from or of Handsome Phil, and her earnest hope and prayer is that she never may." (F. V. White. 3s. 6d.)

THE CRUISE OF THE GOLDEN WAVE.

BY W. N. OSCAR.

"As trim a little vessel as you ever saw. She's a three-masted schooner, sails like a dolphin, and swims like a cork. Did her last trip from Canton to Liverpool in a hundred and thirteen days." (Innes. 6s.)

SCENE.—A Room in the Villa of the Countess des Escas, near Bilbao, in Spain. (W. Telbin.) Period, 1835.

SCENE: A room in the villa of the COUNTESS DES ESCAS.

At back of stage three wide steps leading to a door, over which is a large coat-of-arms; the panels are covered with black velvet and immortelles; another door near this. The two divide, but not evenly, the back of stage. On R. a small altar with light set as a sanctuary lamp. On L., lower down, a casement window. COUNTESS is kneeling on a prie-dieu before the altar. BIANCA, the attendant, is watching at the window. It is clear moon-light without. Trumpet calls are heard from time to time; otherwise all is silent.

Servant enters.

Servant. [Announcing.] Madamo, the Marquis of Monfero.
 [The MARQUIS enters, a man about forty-five, in a long military cloak; he has a slight imperial and side whiskers; a very pronounced Spanish type. The Servant goes out.]

Countess. [A beautiful and young woman dressed in deep widow's mourning. She wears a cross on a chain round her neck. Rising from her knees and giving him her hands.] Ah! At last! What news?

Marquis. [Kissing her hand.] At present all goes well.

Countess. Thank God!

Marquis. Before the sun has twice set we may see the King crowned.

Countess. Don't speak the word. It is too fortunate. I fear to be glad—yet.

Marquis. The signal will be given at twelve to-night, when you hear Sancho and his young men singing under your window—and then—before the morning—we shall gather from every road and march toward the fort. We cannot fail. The fellows there are too well fed and too much bullied to have either stomach or heart for the fight.

* All rights reserved. The acting rights are the property of Mr. George Alexander.

Countess. And have they no suspicions? Have you been careful? The least word—the smallest sign is reported instantly at Madrid, and the clue, once given, has never yet been missed. [With much sorrow and emphasis.] There have been twelve generals shot like dogs.

Marquis. Ah! you are tired from over-long watching, and these prayers you pray. . . . [Sees that she feels hurt.] Nay, we would not be without them, but they make you sad. And then, a fight can never happen so often that the sound of guns will cease to remind you of the most gallant soldier who ever fell in King's cause.

Countess. Ah! do not speak of that.

[She glances up at a portrait which juts out from the wall, near the altar, as though it formed a V with some other picture. The face must be plainly seen by the audience. It represents a man of thirty-five, with a military and rather reckless air.]

Marquis. It was on such a night as this. . . .

Countess. [In a low voice.] Two years ago. . . .

Marquis. [Glancing at sky through window.] With the moon and the stars like those. . . .

Countess. [To herself.] That he said good-bye to me. . . .

Marquis. And went forth at the head of the finest company . . . but I won't speak of that. Still, if we had a few more such men now. . . .

[Sighs and checks herself.]

Countess. I shall never understand why justice should seem to so many people—so hard a thing!

Marquis. Ah, dear Madame, while you live and one remembers what you have lost, who would dare to be a coward? Be of good heart. Did the Count die for nothing? There is the Cause still—there is still the King!

Countess. [Clasping her hands.] It is well said. No great sacrifice was ever made in vain. I always think that—I always tell myself that—when I walk in his room [she points to the room hung with velvet and immortelles] and see his uniform, and his swords hanging on the wall, and all his books—for, although he was a soldier, he loved books. . . . Ah, Marquis, you always make me go back to those memories when my mind should be fixed on other things. It is true that he died, but he still lives. He will be watching you, perhaps, this very night—he will know now that his death was not folly, that his blood was not poured out merely to swell the river—that great, cruel, hungry river that goes out to the sea. [She wipes her eyes.] And when will the attack begin?

Marquis. At twelve. It is now eleven. If you could but sleep. . . .

Countess. Sleep!

Marquis. Ah! pardon me. [He points to the altar where she had been kneeling.] If you will fight the powers of darkness there, we shall vanquish them without.

[Cries are heard from the street, jeers, hoots, and laughter.]

Countess. [In terror.] Hark! what is that?

Bianca. [From the window.] Oh! Madame, Madame! It is too cruel! They are pelting mud and stones at a friar—a poor old friar. The blasphemers! the dogs! the rabble! Oh, Madame, see—I cannot look!

Countess. [To MARQUIS.] Not you—you would be recognised. [She rushes to the window and calls out.] Shame on you! A friar—a holy man! [Shouts of laughter from without.] Are you men . . . human? [To MARQUIS.] How strange they are! I don't know their faces. They must be gipsies. [She calls out again.] Stop, I say! [To the Maid.] Bring him up here to me. Bring him up. He must be protected. [To MONFERO.] This will show you to what our people have been driven by war and usurpation. They have neither religion left, nor honour left, nor the barest charity. But it is not their fault. You know men by their leaders. [To BIANCA, who is still hesitating.] Did you understand me?

Bianca. Not here, Madame! You do not mean to receive him here? I think he is but a poor lay brother. He will be more easy in the kitchen.

Countess. Here, I said.

[BIANCA goes out. COUNTESS watches anxiously, and then closes the window.]

Marquis. You have still great power with these people, Countess; they don't forget your convent and your hospital; but for you that friar would have been old leather by this time.

Countess. Are they not God's poor? Oh, I am not angry—I love them well, but suffering has made them cruel.

Enter BIANCA and two old Maidservants by door at back of stage, conducting the COUNT DES ESCAS wearing a Dominican habit; his robe is torn; he seems much bent; is covered with mud; the upper part of his face is concealed by the hood. He bows very low on entering, and kisses the COUNTESS's hand.

Countess. Alas! poor Brother! Pray be seated. That you should have suffered such humiliation!

Friar. Ah, Madame, for what else was I born? Yet I felt it keenly, and I owe my life to your voice.

Countess. And how came you in such a sad plight, Brother?

Friar. Well, Madame, I was, as usual, begging from house to house, when suddenly I found myself attacked, for no reason, by a party of desperadoes. . . .

Countess. Yes . . . yes. . . .

Friar. Perhaps it is right to say that I first accosted them. They were ill-treating a poor cripple. It was a case of eight against one. I ventured to interfere. The cripple, I am happy to say, escaped, but I think I met with rough handling. I dare say a bone or two is broken.

Countess. Poor soul! What barbarians!

Friar. I will be honest, and I will own that, knowing myself old and feeble, I became terrified. Their looks were death to me. They cursed God. They opened their knives. They forced the mud of the streets down my throat. "Spaniards!" said I, "ye are no Spaniards—you are devils!" One struck me many times in the face, saying, "This is a cur of Don Carlos!"

Countess. Ah, poor Brother, and what did you do?

Friar. [Casting down his eyes.] I prayed, Madame. And then, I . . . I . . . [he seems at a loss] remember little more, Madame; I am dazed, I fear. Those hell-hounds [the MARQUIS looks surprised at the expression—those poor sinners, may God have mercy on their souls—they pursued me, yelling, hooting, blaspheming [shudders], till you rescued me. Phew! that was an escape! But it shows the power of a woman's voice even over the most depraved.

Countess. [Who has seemed puzzled during this speech.] And what was your destination, Brother?

Friar. My destination, Madame, was Portugalete, a distance from here, I know, but I have been on a begging expedition. My Superior is, no doubt, waiting for me, but, as my arms are broken, or, at least, they feel so . . .

Marquis. [Coming forward.] Will you allow me to examine you!

Friar. You are too good.

Marquis. [Feeling him. Speaking drily.] They may be bruised, but there is a good deal of power there yet.

Friar. Ah, yes, sir, in these days the Church needs muscle.

[COUNTESS gives an order to BIANCA, who goes out, and COUNTESS comes down to FRIAR.]

Countess. You must have some food and rest awhile, and then some of my men shall escort you to Portugalete. But must you leave us to-night? Surely you will accept a lodging?

Friar. I am all gratitude, Madame. I place myself in your hands. But when the street is quiet I must go. My Superior will be anxious. In half an hour's time. . . .

[An old Maidservant enters with a tray of provisions, which she places on the table. FRIAR goes over to the table, seats himself before the food, crosses himself before eating, and begins to eat ravenously.]

Countess. [To MARQUIS.] That man is a spy. He has been sent here. We must not let him go. I seem to know him. I have seen him somewhere; I feel certain of it. He is neither so low as he pretends, nor so pious. I cannot believe his story. It is a plot to betray us all. He has been sent here, and, before he can harm us, we must place him under arrest.

Marquis. But we must avoid any disturbance. He can do no mischief if you detain him here till twelve, at all events. . . . Afterwards we can make short work of him.

Countess. I shall trust him with no one, then, except myself. Besides, who knows?—I may find out something from him. He seems a babbler.

Marquis. Yet, on the whole, it would be hard to say what he is—if he is not a friar. He has a fine arm. He may be a gallant—doing penance.

Countess. Did you observe how he avoided our eyes? And how much more youthful his voice is than his back? That's a rascal if I know one. Did you ever hear such a rambling tale?

Marquis. Friars always do tell rambling tales! But, as you say, he can be happy here if he is innocent; and, if he should be a spy, we must not run any risk.

Countess. Do you go and tell Captain Avion to send six men here before twelve.

Marquis. But is it safe to leave you here alone till that time?

Countess. [Pointing to the dagger which hangs at her side.] I fear no one. Besides, he has not the air of a man who would strike a woman. And I am never lonely while I can see the face of Des Escas.

[Points again to portrait. MARQUIS smiles and kisses her hand, glancing again uneasily at FRIAR, who is now drinking.

MARQUIS. How many menservants have you kept?

COUNTESS. I have sent them all to join your company.

MARQUIS. Who is with you, then, to-night?

COUNTESS. There is Bianca and four other maids, and—the whole host of heaven.

MARQUIS. [Laughs again.] I think you are right. The man may be a rascal, but I see no vice in him. He would not hurt you. He is drinking like a fish—in ten minutes he will be snoring on the floor. Good-bye again, dear Madame.

COUNTESS. I cannot say farewell! After all, this man will distract my heart from the thoughts that would be mine if I were alone—waiting for the first sound of the guns.

MARQUIS. And the first note of Sancho's music?

COUNTESS. Oh, yes. What is the tune?

[MARQUIS hums an air from "Don Giovanni," "Andiam, andiam, ma bene, &c.," and goes out.

FRIAR. [Looking up.] I have heard better singing than that!

[COUNTESS goes to the window, waves her handkerchief apparently to MARQUIS, then wipes her eyes. Trumpet call is heard without.

FRIAR. You seem sad, Madame, but these are sad times. What guardian angel brought me to these doors? I have heard much of your charity, your works of devotion, and how, since the death of your husband in battle two years ago, you have been ever faithful to his memory and your own grief.

COUNTESS. He died in a great cause.

FRIAR. Ah! I have often heard so.

COUNTESS. [Pointing to the portrait.] That is his portrait.

FRIAR. [Rising and surveying picture.] Would so sweet a lady have loved a man who was all evil?

COUNTESS. Did you speak?

FRIAR. [Rousing himself.] I see his arms are over that door.

COUNTESS. Yes; that was his room. He was born there.

FRIAR. I have heard that his mother was a saint. No doubt he inherited many of her virtues. [Going back to his chair at the table.] But a soldier's chief duty is to break at least two of the Commandments, if not three. He has to kill and steal, and, for the benefit of his cause, lie, which is not a pretty calling, Madame. But we each have our vocation and our gifts. For myself, I am too clumsy a liar, too tender-hearted, too simple in my wants to feel much sympathy with the martial trade. . . . Pardon me, I forget that I am addressing the widow of a hero.

COUNTESS. You seem a philosopher, Brother. Do you ever think of either King, or Pretender, or Usurper?

FRIAR. Yes, often; it is forced upon me in these times. One day my heart rushes forth to the Carlists; another day to the Christinists. Poor fellows! They are picturesque; their ancestors ruled over my ancestors. They fought for Spain, no doubt. They plotted and lied and loved and fought and stole when mine, perhaps, were doing the same thing, but less conspicuously! Then, I think, what should I say or do if I had been born an aristocrat?

COUNTESS. Well, what would you have done?

FRIAR. Well, say I made my first entry into the world in . . . such a room as that. [Points to door.] I grow up. Three nurses watch me day and night, and, if I fall, a dozen fat footmen pick me up. I ride, I fence, I dance and sing, I play the fool, I dress myself up, I swagger, I brag, I am a dandy, I am a rake, I am a hero, or, in other words, an aristocrat!

COUNTESS. [Sighing.] You must have seen something of life before you went into the monastery, Brother.

FRIAR. I did, Madame, I did. Well, say I reach the age of one-and-twenty. It is quite plain that I must marry—marry a lady with a large dowry. I am lucky if I am given the choice of three. Shall I imagine myself, Madame, as a lucky or an ordinary man? May I suppose that I have the choice of three ladies, or the choice of one lady—and a cousin? We might say, then, that the cousin had a touch of the family temper, and the other lady a strong leaning toward religion. I am advised by my director and my tutors to choose the pious lady. I choose her. She is young, she is beautiful, she is rich, she is charming. She has, in fact, but one shortcoming, or, to be generous, let us say two.

COUNTESS. And those . . . ?

FRIAR. First, she deserves a much better man; and secondly, she is chosen for me—just as my coat and my boots are chosen.

COUNTESS. [Sadly.] Oh! this is a very common history you are telling.

FRIAR. Ah, well, give those conditions, I maintain that a young man must get desperate. He grows up, and is doomed to certain opinions, to a certain way of living, a certain wife, certain principles. There is no opportunity for enthusiasm. If he join the King's cause—if he die for it—it is thought no more than his duty. There is no one for him to meet because he has met everyone worth knowing. There is no court for him to sigh for because he spends his days yawning there. But the people, who know nothing of all this, must win in the end. . . .

COUNTESS. And why?

FRIAR. Because there are more of them, and they hold the purse! They pay good wages too, and any noble who is wise will make haste. Time presses. He is a very old story to his own party, but he comes like a dancing poodle on a fair-day among these Republicans. If I were an aristocrat I would be neither for Carlos nor Christina, but for the people—the trusting, simple, rich, enthusiastic people!

[Drinks.

COUNTESS. And did you gain this knowledge for yourself, Brother?

FRIAR. Oh, no, Madame. I am a poor beggar. I go from house to house seeking crumbs and crusts. I haven't had a supper like this, nor talked with a great lady for many a year. You remind me, Madame, of a young countess I once knew. She was a lovely creature. It was before I was a friar, and, if my memory is a little vivid, you must remember that it is a pre-monastic reminiscence! But she could not laugh, and that was a great drawback. Her husband . . .

Countess. Then she had a husband?

Friar. [Taking more wine.] I could well believe, Madame, that had she been so minded she might have taken fifty. The one she chose was . . . not the one, perhaps, I would have chosen for her. He was brought up in the way I have described. He was no angel—but, he had an eye for beauty—for purity. It is surprising, Madame, how much you resemble that lady. When I come near to you. . . .

Countess. [Calling out.] Oh, God! what is this?

[He throws back his hood and roars with laughter.]

Friar. Marie-Joseph! You were always too serious!

Countess. [In a whisper.] Is it you, Des Escas? You!

[She draws back and looks a long time at his face.]

Des Escas. [Trying to conceal his emotion.] Good heavens! I never thought I should have to console my own widow! Have I changed so much? . . . [COUNTRESS throws herself into his arms. DES ESCAS still trying to conceal his emotion.] Ah! I wonder why I left you!

Countess. [Wiping her eyes.] But I cannot understand. . . . I do not realise. . . . It cannot be true. You are not . . . you . . .

[She looks at him again, and again throws herself into his arms.]

Des Escas. Ah! my poor angel! Men must be men! [COUNTRESS walks across the room, embraces him hurriedly in passing him, drags down the black mourning drapery from over his door, throws it on the ground, also pulls off her own widow's cap, laughing hysterically as she does so. DES ESCAS, with a forced laugh.] What pretty hair to hide! [Takes a tress, kisses it—draws nearer to her.] Oh, I love you better than I knew!

Countess. I knew. Our hearts were one, and all you felt I thought. What need was there for words?

Des Escas. And yet we quarrelled!

Countess. No—but my spirit and yours were as the wind and sky—I was the cloud, you were the breeze. There was agreement even in our storms!

Des Escas. [Taking her hand.] Am I forgiven?

Countess. [Tenderly.] Are you loved? . . . But why do you live? How did you escape?

Des Escas. [Concealing his embarrassment. All through the following scene he must seem to be a man at war with his own better nature.] All that part is simple. I hate death. I had fought well in the fight, and I had a wound or two . . . in the back! [COUNTRESS embraces him again.] Oh, it is quite healed now, but I want you to know that I fought well. We were all driven down to the river—we plunged in—most of us were drowned. I was not. But while I was in the water my enthusiasm cooled. I said to myself, I am perishing for an idea, a foolish idea. Who made the first King? Ten to one if he were not a Pretender. If I escape I shall join the other side. They are the stronger party, and you may argue as you please, but the King, sooner or later, must come from the side that is the more powerful. All my comrades who were merely praying came to grief—I struck the land.

Countess. But I was praying for you. You forget that.

Des Escas. That was very good and wife-like. I owe much to it. But to resume. I got ashore. I looked about me. I saw the enemy's camp in the distance. The wound in my back was very painful. I said to myself, I was not born to die like a rat. I hate death. . . . So I crawled to the enemy. I recanted—I offered the enemy my services. They accepted them and entertained me extremely well. It was better wine than yours, my love! That is very bad wine! Well, as I tell you, I offered the enemy my services and they accepted them, but I did not give them my name. I reserve my name till their victory is established. Then I shall declare myself, and obtain a good post in the Government. These fellows love an aristocrat. They suspect already that I am nothing common.

Countess. Is this the story?

Des Escas. I believe you would rather be weeping now over your dead hero than listening happily to a man of good sense.

Countess. [To herself.] Traitor! Traitor!

Des Escas. And now prepare yourself, my heart, for further news. I have been watching your career for two years now. It is heroic—but you will ruin me. I cannot permit it any longer. I come here to-night. I find that grand fellow in the uniform—Monfero. . . . Oh, of course, in all honour and chivalry and respect, but—my angel—my saint—you are plotting against the Government. I must forbid it.

Countess. [To herself, wringing her hands.] Oh, fool! fool!

Des Escas. When I came here I had no intention of making myself known to you. Why should I spoil your unhappiness? I merely wished to see a little of your home life; but, good God! that black dress—that widow's veil! You look twenty years older. I could not allow a pretty woman to make herself dreary for my sake. No, it was not just. [Going to her.] I have watched the sea change from blue—to grey: I have watched the trees change from green—to grey: I have seen the sky rose-red turn grey—as ashes: I have seen the scarlet fields fade to the hue of dust: all things grow grey—life itself, you, Marie-Joseph, you, but that time has not yet come—not yet. [Kisses her tenderly.] So pale. You're crying! Why? Why? I am here. I am not dead. Why, then, do you cry?

Countess. Yesterday I cried about you: to-day I cry for myself!

Des Escas. Ah well! Women will. . . .

Countess. [Wringing her hands.] Oh, you don't understand . . . You don't understand! You played the spy so ill that they suspected you at once.

Des Escas. They—who are they? Your maidservant and those four doddering old women who brought me upstairs? I'll wring all their necks.

Countess. No, no. I suspected you—I.

Des Escas. You!

Countess. They will be here in ten minutes to arrest you, and they have no pity—none.

Des Escas. [After a pause.] But you won't give me up?

Countess. Not willingly.

Des Escas. Not willingly! That's tender! I thank you.

Countess. There is only one way—to say that you are on our side. Declare yourself.

Des Escas. Not I. A man may change his opinions once, but scarcely twice. I won't do it. Let them come and do what they like.

[The clock chimes.]

Countess. Ah, you don't know the danger as I do. [She draws the curtains across the window, and, in so doing, remembers his former story.] But who were the ruffians who were chasing you when I called from the window?

Des Escas. [Laughing.] Didn't they do it well? It was really inimitable. Those fellows would make their fortune on the stage. We rehearsed it all at the Fort.

Countess. It was a trick!

Des Escas. No, my best life, stratagem! You must learn the language of war.

Countess. Ah, but you are always too light-hearted. You have flown into a death-trap. When they come they will listen to neither of us. They will doubt you—they will doubt me. In these times you can believe no one—trust no one. They will shoot you. . . . They will say that I am your accomplice. I would gladly die for you, but—to die as a traitor with you. . . . Oh, I can think of nothing. . . . But, as you must die, let it be under the true colours.

Des Escas. True colours! Why—I could close my eyes and swear I was listening to another pretty widow on the opposite side! You all say the same things. Both causes cannot be right—one of them must be wrong. God must decide which! But one thing is certain—there are no causes worth dying for.

Countess. [Persistently.] Your soul, Des Escas, is like the sea—as uncertain, as wild, as deep, as shallow, as dangerous, and as strong! Be strong, then, and I will not fear the rest. Your own strength can conquer your own storms. The tempest which uproots trees and desolates the earth does not spoil the least wave of the sea. The sea will leap with the wind, shout with the thunder, lightning but makes it bright. Oh, but be strong then!

[Bell is heard outside.]

Des Escas. Hark!

Countess. Was that a bell?

Des Escas. Who rang it?

Countess. [Placing her hand over his mouth, and glancing at the door in terror.] Oh, hush! [Bell is heard again. Countess flies to the door and bolts it.] Oh! I can think of nothing! But—wait—here is my dagger. Strike me with it—and I will say that you attacked me and escaped by the window.

Des Escas. I would not strike you to save my life ten times over!

Countess. [Bitterly.] Do you think any knife could hurt me so much as the words you have been saying?

Des Escas. A sermon again!

Countess. [Kneeling at his feet.] I implore you to listen. If they see me wounded they will believe me. In the meantime you can hide there. [Points to his room.] Quick! there is not a moment to be lost. Strike!

Des Escas. [Stooping down and kissing her forehead.] You are a good creature, but that is impossible. If they come, they must come.

[The tramp of feet is heard outside.]

Countess. [Still kneeling.] I implore you to go into that room and let me do what I can.

Des Escas. [Sauntering toward the door and stopping at the table to take more wine; hammering is heard at the door.] My life has done nothing for you, Marie-Joseph, why should you wish to save it even a little while longer?

[COUNTESS follows him and half pushes him into the room. COUNTESS noiselessly unbars the door, turns down the light, seizes a dagger, wounds herself on the arm, and falls on the ground by the window, as some men, headed by CAPTAIN AVION, rush in. As they enter, COUNTESS raises herself on her arm.]

Countess. Ah! you are too late. The wretch has escaped. He went by that window. I tried to hold him—the coward struck me. [CAPTAIN AVION lifts her up as she seems half insensible.] Send for my women.

Avion. But where is the devil—the beast? Gone by that window? That's impossible. [Looks round the room.] How long ago did he go? How long?

Countess. I cannot say. It seems long. I must have fainted. It may be five seconds—or ten minutes—or even longer. . . . Send for my women. He went by the window—he kicked me as he passed. I heard him drop to the ground. I should know him anywhere—a brutal face, like a fox. He had red hair. He was not a Spaniard. Oh, the coward!

Avion. [Looking down from the window at the height below.] If he were a young man he might have jumped, but it would be folly to try and catch him now. At this moment a brawl in the streets would be fatal, and any information he may have gained will be quite useless. The attack has begun.

Countess. It has begun. . . . [She stanches the wound with her handkerchief as she speaks.] Tell me what has happened.

Avion. They are now making their way towards the Fort. The attack will be very sudden. If we lose, all will be lost; and if we win, it will mean complete victory.

Countess. They say that if we can but take this Fort, every northern power in Europe will support us. As it is, they only want an excuse.

Avion. But, for me, I think it unwise to throw so much on one venture.

Countess. Ah, have courage! But you will be wanted. Go at once—join Monfero. Every man to-night is worth a kingdom. See, my wound is nothing—it will soon be healed. [Guns heard in the distance and the sound of bugles.] I entreat you to go. I command it. See, there are four bells—I can ring any of them. I think I am more frightened than anything. I assure you it was the terror. [Laughs.] I believe it was a mere scratch. And in any case, our friend has left me, and it is always easier to jump down than to jump up!

Avion. Ah, Madame, you teach us all a lesson in courage.

[COUNTESS goes towards door as though she would bow them out.]

Countess. Lose no time, and God be with you!

Avion. [Gives an order to his men and they march out: he lingers a moment and draws his sword.] To reassure myself, will you allow me to thrust this here and there behind the curtains? [He rushes for the black draperies over the door where DES ESCAS is.] Why, this has been pulled down.

Countess. Yes [Concealing her terror] . . . the nail grew loose. On the whole, it is a good omen. I think it means that we must mourn no longer.

Arion. [Laughing.] Well, I never quarrel with superstition when it tells me pleasant things. You may be right. But, if there's a room here, I think it is certainly possible that the villain has escaped that way.

Countess. [Putting up her hand.] Ah, my good friend, no one ever crosses that threshold except myself. It is the room of Des Escas. I keep the key upon my heart.

Arion. [Bowing very low.] A thousand pardons, Madame.

Countess. Oh, that is nothing. There is no harm in your looking under the altar table, and you might strike out at the curtains there. [Points to window.]

[Arion strikes the curtains. As he approaches the altar, he pauses before the portrait of Des ESCAS and draws a deep sigh.]

Arion. Ah, Madame, if he were alive to-night I should feel more confident of victory. [COUNTRESS hangs her head and says nothing. He strikes under altar with his sword.] No, the devil escaped by the window. You are right. Good-night again.

[Arion goes out. COUNTRESS bolts the door and returns slowly to the portrait, before which she stands with bent head. DES ESCAS at back cautiously opens the door and peeps out. He is dressed in his old Carlist uniform and comes down to COUNTRESS. She does not look round.]

Des Escas. What are you thinking of, Marie-Joseph? This silence has more in it than prayer—more in it than thanksgiving—more in it than peace.

Countess. I do rejoice. . . . I do pray. . . . I do give thanks to heaven. . . .

Des Escas. Ah, but this is all on your lips—perhaps, in your heart also. . . . [He draws her toward him.] . . . Your eyes tell more.

Countess. It may be that I think a little too. I am thinking of something that man said.

Des Escas. And what was that?

Countess. He said: "If the Count des Escas were alive to-night I should feel more confident of victory." . . . [Passionately.] Ah, it is God alone whom we may never fear to love too well—it is God alone who never fails His friends—Who can never disappoint us in His goodness!

Des Escas. [Slowly.] And man alone may disappoint us in his frailty. When we are at our worst, we may still make amends. A man's heart wills all, hopes all, dares all. . . . [Takes her wounded arm.] For me—this . . . and what—for you?

Countess. Grief.

Des Escas. On my account? Because I live? Because I love you? Oh, on my soul, I have loved you. It may have been that I forgot to say so, but there's the truth. [He lifts her face, studies it, and turns away.] . . . I hate death. . . .

Countess. [Slowly.] Death?

[Looks at him with anguish.]

Des Escas. They will come for me.

Countess. Who?

Des Escas. My men.

Countess. Your men.

Des Escas. Yes, they will come for Monfero—that was the plan. They will come for him. They will find me.

Countess. God!

Des Escas. I am going, Marie-Joseph.

Countess. Where?

Des Escas. I am going to fight for my King!

Countess. [Bitterly.] Which King? Which Queen? Which cause?

Des Escas. I will fight for your King—for your cause, for Don Carlos—for you . . . Marie-Joseph!

[He kneels at her feet. Bugle heard outside and men's voices.]

Countess. Hark! What is that?

[A voice outside, "In the Queen's name!"]

Des Escas. [Rising.] They have come for me. Are you brave?

Countess. God!

Des Escas. They come! One kiss. . . .

Countess. God!

Des Escas. Pray for me!

Countess. God!

[A company of soldiers under CAPTAIN SOBRATO rush in. Some of them arrest the COUNTRESS and pinion her arms. DES ESCAS also is seized.]

Sobrato. [Presenting his pistol.] Are you for the Queen or Don Carlos?

Des Escas. [Drawing himself up.] I denied my King once.

Sobrato. [Still pointing the pistol.] My commands are these. If for the Queen—there is promotion. If for Don Carlos—there is this. . . . Are you for the Queen or Don Carlos?

Des Escas. [Looks at his wife, whose lips move: she says "Don Carlos," inaudibly. He looks at SOBRATO and draws himself up.] For Don Carlos!

[SOBRATO takes aim and shoots. MARIE-JOSEPH gives a piercing scream. DES ESCAS falls dead at once.]

Sobrato. [Taking off his cap and bowing low.] Madame, it was my duty—this fellow . . . [Goes to look at the body.]

Countess. [Fiercely.] Stand back! Stand back! I am his wife.

[At this moment men's voices are heard outside singing the air from "Don Giovanni."]

Sobrato. [Rushing to the window.] What is that?

Countess. [With defiance.] A song!

Sobrato. This is some signal—there's treachery abroad.

Countess. I say, a song.

[The men at a signal from SOBRATO release her, and rush out. She staggers forward, takes the cross from her neck, places it in the hand of DES ESCAS. Then she throws herself on the ground before the altar.]

Countess. [As though praying.] The strength! The strength!

A Younger Reputation of 1865.

A good many people have been asking lately: "Who is Dr. Sebastian Evans?" His version of The High History of the Holy Grail is perhaps the most attractive number of that attractive series, "The Temple Classics." And with no less skill, and no less sympathy, the same writer has put into its English dress that remarkable earliest life of St. Francis, the discovery of which, by M. Sabatier, is in itself a justification of critical scholarship at the bar of letters. But these are by no means Dr. Evans's first contributions to literature. A busy life, as barrister, designer of stained glass windows, editor of the People and the Birmingham Daily Gazette, has been more than once punctuated by the writing and the publication of poetry. And in 1865 Brother Fabian's MS., and Other Poems, won the writer something of a reputation. It was in the early days of revived mediævalism, and Dr. Evans's knowledge of chronicle and romance was something quite out of the common then and not perhaps altogether universal now. The legends in his book are conceived in a spirit half of seriousness, half of irony. They remind you on the one hand of the Ingoldsby Legends, on the other of the subtler work of M. Anatole France in his mediæval moods. They are by no means unremunerative reading, though one feels that they are hardly of large enough composition to weather the storms of time or to tempt a resurrection. This may pass as a fair sample:

Well, 't was one Thursday, just on Michaelmas,
At daydawn, Randal starts him off to fish
Down at Saint Wigbald's;—whether he knew no trout
Were in the brook, or whether he hoped for sport
Mere to his mind in the Dame's private pond
Behind the cell—or whether, as I surmise,
Diabolo instigante—God best knows;
But down he walked to the triangular stew
Sacred to poor Dame Aylse's favourite luce.
The Dame—she had some wry whimsies in her skull—
Had wont each morn and even, rain or shine,
To cross the croft to this triangular pool
And ring her silver sanctus on the marge—
The bell, by the way—a gift from Ulverscroft,
Rang oftener far as mass for Sir John Pike
Than for the sisters, and Sir John, who lurked
Plotting his raids among the chestnut roots
That weave a wattled rampart round the bank
Against the lower floodgate—when he heard
Would dart from out his hiding with a swirl,
And shoal on shoal of startled sticklebacks
Leap silver-sided, flash on flash before,
Like sprays of osier when the summer wind
Toys with their upturned leaves, while to and fro,
All proud at heart of argent-damasked mail
And glistening hinges of his golden fuis,
The knightly vassal of the pool glanced by
To claim his sovereign's largess. If to-day
She brought a full-fed frog (she docked the feet Before she gave him frogs), to-morrow came
A brace of gudgeon or a slice of beef;
Except indeed on Fridays, when the fare
Was only rye-bread manchet, soaked in milk.
She had her faults good dame—for who is free?
But none can say she ever gave her fish
Flesh on a Friday.

In 1875 followed In the Studio: a Decade of Poems, which was more or less in the same vein. But two poems on "Arthur's Knighting" and "The Eve of Morte Arthur" are more ambitious, and reveal Dr. Evans's pre-occupation with the Arthurian legends, of which he has made so minute and fruitful a study. Besides the translation already mentioned, he has recently published an essay on the Grail legend, in which he makes a detailed and highly ingenious attempt to interpret the significance of the adventures of Perceval in the castle of King Fisherman. In his eyes the whole legend is a late insertion in the Arthurian cycle, and has reference to the great interdict laid upon England in the reign of King John. King Fisherman is the Pope, Logres is England, Perceval is St. Dominic, and so forth. The early versions of the legend, says Dr. Evans, were written by Dominicans, and hence the prominence of Perceval. The later versions, in which Galahad takes Perceval's place, were written by Franciscans, and Galahad is clearly St. Francis. The Loathly Lady, we suppose, is "Our Lady Poverty." Dr. Evans will have the Celticists down upon him, with their magic cauldron, but it is a suggestive essay, all the same.

A Home of Rest

For Tired Brain-Workers.

LADY MURRAY, concerning whose Home of Rest we wrote last week, has sent us a copy of the prospectus and rules of that establishment, together with an account of its purpose. It will, she hopes, be a Home of Rest for artists in every branch of art and for literary men, whether English or of other nations, enabling them during their stay "to regain power for work." These words correct the impression which some persons entertain, that the Home of Rest is a kind of almshouse for literary men. On the contrary, perpetual residence is not possible there, and only active minds that are suffering from temporary strain or illness are wished for. This is the official prospectus of the Home:

CHATEAU DE L'ESPERANCE.

HON. LADY MURRAY'S HOUSE OF REST, NEAR ANTIBES.

This large house, standing in over ten acres of ground, recently purchased for the purpose of providing a temporary home for artists and authors in search of the rest so necessary to convalescence, is distant about one mile from Antibes Railway Station in a sunny and sheltered situation.

In starting and keeping open "L'Espérance," Lady Murray expects applicants and their friends to arrange for the expenses of the journey out and back, and for the subsequent payment of £1 per week for board and lodging. The six large front rooms with board £1 10s. per week.

Applicants are free to stay for longer or shorter periods, according to the necessities of their cases.

"L'Espérance" will be open this year from February 16 to May 1, and in subsequent years from November 1 to May 1.

No incurable or infectious cases can be admitted. Communications to be sent to Hon. Lady Murray, Villa Victoria, Cannes, France.

N.B.—Six weeks' return tickets via Newhaven and Dieppe, second class, London to Cannes, cost £7 4s. 6d. They are now issued to Antibes, a few miles along the line from Cannes, by Messrs. Cook & Son's obliging arrangements.

RULES.

That the health of the applicant shall be such as to make a winter in a mild climate necessary, or at least advisable.

That he shall be unable to obtain this without such assistance as he will find here.

That his medical advisers shall be able to give a fair hope of his being able to return to his work after the benefit of a winter abroad.

That those admitted shall pay their journey out and back, and £1 per week for board and lodging. Personal washing, extra fires and lights, and wine charged extra. No dogs allowed.

Guests taking meals in the Home must be punctual. No dish will be brought back for late-comers.

That a certain number of candles will be provided per week for each bedroom. Guests requiring more must provide them.

That fires are provided in bedrooms as occasion requires, or on the recommendation of the medical attendant.

That all lights in public rooms shall be put out at eleven p.m.

That in applying for admission to this "Home of Rest," the undersigned engages to conform to the Rules and to leave the "Home" at any time he may be requested to do so by Lady Murray or by the Director, her representative.

And this is the medical certificate :

I hereby certify that _____ has been under my care, or known to me, since _____, 189 , and that he is suffering from _____, which illness is not contagious, infectious, nor incurable, and, in my opinion, a residence of _____ months (or weeks) in the Riviera would be likely to do the patient good, and enable him to resume his profession.

Things Seen.

Spring.

SPRING, yesterday, on Waterloo Bridge. I could see neither flower nor leaf. But the sunshine bathed the town in one warmth, one brightness. All the red things were on duty, so to speak. In particular, the sail of a Rochester barge had been left idly hanging; and its single patch of red seemed to robe the black wharves. Men were shooting unsightly litter into a boat; it mattered not. A trickling stream ran out from the flour mill, winding through fetid banks in the greater mud-bank: it mattered not. A wide warmth and gentleness prevailed; the stones were warm. The breeze was lost and found, and you wondered to see it crinkling the river.

And London? Oh, London was herself! A little red boat lay far off under the Embankment, red like smouldering fire; a thing to be conscious of, not to see. All else seemed white and grey. The City spires—those dear permanent spires that rise up in all the picture-books—showed white and grey by turns as the curtain of smoke swung lazily. Then I saw St. Bride's reflected in the river, and lo!—how had I missed it?—the whole Embankment was double, and the little red boat was glowing like a ruby among pearly shadows. All things were double, and in the wonder of the moment I looked for nothing but saw everything. While I waited, the smoke, the wind, and the river prepared a greater vision. There in the "muddy" stream I saw St. Paul's, the whole inverted temple. Had I needed words, they would surely have been Milton's:

These are thy glorious works, Parent of good,
Almighty; thine this universal frame,
Thus wondrous fair.

Irony.

SHE (no longer young) was walking home, grave and depressed, from an animated Temperance meeting, at which she had pleaded for the example of Total Abstinence among her fellow workers and declaimed against the wickedness of permitting children to fetch and carry from the public-house. As she moved slowly down the village street she came upon a group of excited children, the centre one weeping pitifully and gazing on the fragments of a broken bottle and the wandering pools of beer on the pavement. To inquiries as to the trouble, came the answer: "Mother gave me tuppence for the beer—I dropped it." Here a fresh burst of tears.

"Will mother be angry with you for the accident?" A sad shrug of the shoulders and a nod was all the answer.

There was a long silence, broken only by two sobs from the child. "Well—here—are—two pennies, go and buy some beer, and be more careful, and then mother won't be angry."

"They charges a ha'penny for the bottle," said one of the older children.

The half-penny, too, was produced, tears were lost in smiles, and the Temperance advocate, grave, but light-hearted, pursued her way.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

ONE opens with dismay and surprise, with a feeling of disquietude, a study in fiction of modern Parisian morals and customs by a grave and mystical writer like M. Schuré. Here, indeed, is a proper occasion to echo Molière's cry: "Quo diable allait il faire dans cette galère?" The novel is no less a disappointment than a surprise. Le Double, by reason of its motive, is rescued from the charge of vulgarity, but it is crude and impossible. M. Schuré's sense of style and certain sober charm of expression, so happily rendered in his more important work Sanctuaires d'Orient, here quite forsake him. He writes a modern novel like the gifted amateur whom his friends unwisely press into print by injudicious and unfounded praise. His characterisation is gross and facile, and his colouring is cheap melodrama. But the whole, bad as it is, is saved by the dignity of the moral: salvation through renouement in love. In a modern French novel it is a pleasing change to find any fundamental theory which lifts us above mere sensualism and upholstery and millinery, and so we are moderately thankful for this thin ray of light, though the atmosphere it penetrates is dull and dense enough even when purified, and the hero hardly seems worth the effort of redemption.

Paul Marrias, a popular painter, is a vulgar conqueror among women, called in Society "the Tamer" and "the Torero." He has a Saracen head, superlative beauty, swaggering manners. As a hero he is a little after the manner of our beloved Ouida. He meets his match in a lady—also a tamer of the opposite sex—a lurid, luminous, black angel. The scenes that follow are the customary scenes of the French novel described by an unpractised hand. Paul is a very dull and ill-mannered dog—why is it that these conquerors of women are inevitably so ill-bred and ill-humoured?—the lady is a very cheap sinner, no less disagreeable and insupportable. They have such a very bad time of it together once they elect to stray from the path of virtue (if either from childhood ever can be said to have dallied in that region of peace), that one wonders they came to yield to temptation. M. Schuré's sympathies are with his worthless hero, and he has resolved to save him. His model is a delicate, refined working-girl, engaged to a starving Flemish painter, a symbolist and dreamer. These two figures are imperfectly sketched, but such as they are, they possess a distinct and pathetic charm. Marrias perceives that the little model is beginning to love him, and is tempted to break her lover's heart. He, too, loves her, and renounces her, and departs.

As a study of contemporary Parisian life, M. Léon Daudet's Sebastien Gouvé is a work of more important significance. The moral it preaches is of a hardier and more disputable nature. Filial devotion is an admirable quality in woman; but most old-fashioned persons will hold that there are limits to this virtue, beyond which it takes on quite another aspect. A man of science, at the bidding of a fashionable charlatan, a Jewish physician, comes to Paris to be miserably exploited by the fashionable charlatan, who pays him a modest salary and claims the glory of his discoveries. We know that M. Daudet, an ex-medical student, loathes the medical profession, and ever since he left it holds it to be his instant duty as an honest man to climb up upon the house-tops and shout abroad his unutterable contempt of doctors, surgeons, and the Academy of Medicine. Like his illustrious father, he would abolish academies of every kind, and maintains, with black and mordant emphasis, that every academician, member of an institute, fashionable physician and surgeon, is necessarily a scoundrel, a humbug, and a chartered highwayman. We have all our pet and irrational animosities. M. Quesnay de Beaurepaire detests the magistrature since he left it. Major Esterhazy no longer loves the Army. M. Léon Daudet elects to hold the profession he chose in youth in disesteem. One regrets it, but one takes his consistent and virulent attacks on an admirable profession for what they are worth. Sébastien Gourès is a hard, unpleasing, but very clever, novel. M. Léon Daudet has an unsparing pen; but he possesses none of his father's redeeming sensibility, none of his father's little exquisite touches in his bitterest hour. He has no gaiety, no humour, no lightness, no charm.

M. Henry Houssaye's latest contribution to the vast collection of Napoleonic literature is a most serious and valuable study of Waterloo. "After that," writes M. Larroumet in the Figaro, "we must for ever renounce the legend of an impeccable Napoleon and a Napoleon beneath himself. In 1815 the Emperor had as much genius and activity as in his most fortunate days, but he erred many times, and gravely. We must also renounce the legend of Grouchy responsible for the defeat, as well as that of Grouchy sacrificed before history by imperial egoism. At no moment did Napoleon rely on Grouchy's arrival, and away from Napoleon, Grouchy badly executed orders vitiated by initial error. All Napoleon's lieutenants, Ney as well as Soult, were below their task as all had superb moments." The French point of view, of course, rejects Wellington as the sole hero of Waterloo. For them it was the victory of allied forces against a single hero. M. Larroumet sums up the value of Henry Houssaye's masterly work: "As far as it is given to man, to a single man to reach absolute truth, M. Henry Houssaye has given it to us on Waterloo."

Memoirs of the Moment.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE-RIDLEY was thirty when he made his happy marriage with Miss Majoribanks, a little more than a quarter of a century ago. It was a North Country alliance, and all the more popular on that account, where the Ridleys are a power; for Northumberland still retains that local patriotism which proximity to London does something to destroy. It was less important that in politics the uniting families were divided; and Lord Tweedmouth and Lady Aberdeen, staunchest Liberals of their class, have enjoyed rather than otherwise the perpetual little surprise of a sister as wife of the Conservative Home Secretary. The great grief of Lady Ridley's life was the sudden death of her eldest daughter, Miss Cecilia Ridley, three years ago; and during her last days, before she became unconscious, she missed from her side her eldest son, absent in Egypt on his honeymoon. The decision of the Home Secretary that the burial should be, not at Blagdon, the seat of the Ridleys in Northumberland, but in the great democratic God's acre of London at Kensal Green, is significant of the times, and a curious commentary, too, on the accusation made against him at the time of his appointment, that he was a squire first and everything else afterwards. Far better as a memorial of Lady Ridley than any elaborate tomb or effigy in the north is the full-length portrait of her painted, not very long ago, by Mr. Sargent, R.A., which now hangs in the house in Carlton House-terrace, and which the world will be careful to preserve should the family ever cease to be its custodians.

THE Times on Tuesday morning considered in a leaderette the question of a successor to Lord Herschell as Great Britain's Commissioner at Washington and also in the matter of the Venezuelan boundary. In so doing, it nominated the Lord Chief Justice of England with a confidence that had about it a certain air of authority and inspiration. Yet in the afternoon a member of Parliament, who rose in his place to ask if any appointment had been made, was told by Mr. Balfour that it had not. Nor had it, in the strict sense of the term, for not only must the Government offer, and Lord Russell of Killowen accept, but the Queen must formally approve. Barring this formality, the appointment may be regarded as a fixture, and the Government be congratulated on its exercise of patronage.

THE ways of the Washington Conference are hard to divine; but if there was ever any real doubt about its reassembling in the autumn, the appointment of the Lord Chief Justice as British Commissioner will probably remove it. Lord Russell of Killowen is a singularly popular man in America, as his visit there two or three years ago must have convinced the greatest cynic about the value of popular applause—himself. He commands the respect of the Anglo-American and the pride of the Irish-American—a rare conjunction.

BUT the Venezuelan boundary is the matter of more immediate concern. America, it will be remembered, objected to certain claims on Venezuelan territory put forward by Great Britain, and waved the Monroe manifesto in the face of Lord Salisbury, who replied that we wanted no new territory, and only asserted our rights established of old by the Schomburg line. As there were three so-called Schomburg lines, and as boundary posts, if ever planted, had long ago been obliterated, this did not seem to be a very definite or enlightening reply. Hence the Commission, which will assemble probably in Paris, and probably in the month of May.

OF course the Courts lose the Lord Chief Justice; and, equally of course, the opportunity will be taken to appoint another judge. Little inconvenience or none need result to the English suitor; but any slight domestic drawbacks to the going of Lord Russell of Killowen must count nothing against having the best man as the representative of Great Britain at a council on the issue of which her Imperial interests depend.

AS for the outcry against the temporary absence of the Lord Chief Justice, those who utter it have probably a new grief or grievance in store for them. The Lord Chief Justice may possibly have a colleague at the Venezuelan Conference, and that will be a Lord Justice whom it is premature now to name.

News of the death of Mr. William Charles Kingsbury Wilde reads suddenly enough to those who remember him when he first came to London, fresh from Trinity College, Dublin, where he had shone, and full of ambition to make his light blaze over London. Willie Wilde brought with him to town a copy of Kotabos, the college magazine, containing a sonnet on which he a good deal prided himself, and built some hopes of future poetical honours.

"Salome" was the theme, and she speaks describing her dance before Herod and his men :

And every soul was mine, mine utterly,
And thrice each throat cried out aloud my name.
"Ask what thou wilt," black-bearded Herod said.
"God wot a weird thing do I crave for prize;
Give me I pray thee, presently, the head
Of John the Baptist." "Twixt my hands it lies.
Ah, mother, see the lips, the half-closed eyes,
Dost think he hates us still now he is dead?"

Times are changed. Twenty years ago the young man who wrote as well as that was the exception: now the exception is the man who, if he writes at all, does not write better. But this young sonneteer was a beautiful reader in those days, and so the friends to whom he delivered his lines applauded them, though they seemed to lose some of their virtue when they got into print.

THE end of it was that Mr. William Wilde did nothing to illustrate the name that came to him with a certain echo of renown. His father, Sir William, was a surgeon of Dublin repute; and his mother was a writer of verse which found many readers, and in which the patriotism outstripped the poetry. There was not much home life for the son of Sir William and Lady Wilde, the parents being not wholly in sympathy with each other; and that influence was one which undoubtedly was missed by an impressionable youth. His first dreams as a poet gave way to an ambition to write stories—it had to be "creative work"—and some of the smartest stories in the World early in the eighties were from his pen. That was a vein easily exhausted; and Mr. Wilde, after trying to run a weekly paper, Pan (whose tint set the fashions in green journals), took to daily journalism for his daily bread, becoming a contributor (and for a time a very successful contributor) to the Daily Telegraph. A tour in America resulted, as everyone knows, in a marriage which the lady afterwards annulled; and a second marriage brought to Mr. William Wilde, not only a daughter, but perhaps the greatest peace he had known in his drifting years of life, numbering in all only forty-six.

MR. KIPLING'S poem, "The White Man's Burden," has not escaped the American parodist. Mr. E. H. Crosby has scornfully adapted the title to a very different set of sentiments. His verses begin thus:

Take up the White Man's burden;
Send forth your sturdy sons,
And load them down with whisky
And Testaments and guns.
Throw in a few diseases
To spread in tropic climes,
For there the healthy niggers
Are quite behind the times.

The same strain is maintained throughout.

A DAILY paper makes an allusion to "St. Elihu Vedder"—a misprint he will perhaps pardon. Mr. Elihu Vedder—the Elihu seems to belong to Biblical sanctity—is now an oldish man, whose studio in Rome is a haunt of American visitors on Sunday afternoons, and whose pictures seem to have their inspiration in other worlds than ours. They are mystical, starry, transcendental. He is, too, a painter of tiles, many pilgrims to the studio in the Via Capo le Case carrying away with them these souvenirs—at a price. As an illustrator, moreover, of the inevitable Omar Khayyam, copies of which can also be bought at the studio, Mr. Vedder ought to have a particularly warm welcome in London, whither he proposes to come, with an exhibition, this spring.

A Book Auction.

AN auctioneer is wonderful. This one united the calm of the Sphinx with the quickness of Ariel. He cajoled, he appealed, he commented on books and illustrations ("Pretty book!"—"Pretty illustrations!"), he called for a chair for Mr. Z., he took bids from words that I could not hear, and from nods that I could not see. He was quick as lightning, and as wax receptive. He tore bids from the crowd, picked them up like a conjurer, suggested and fathered them, so that one-and-ninepence became three-and-threepence by a process you could not follow. Yet his leisure was great. A postman brought a letter. He seemed to dally with it, and to be nice in the opening of it, yet he was repeating the bids like a shuttle. He sat calm and rotund, his hands were slow, and he looked down at a deprecatory angle while the booksellers clashed and synchronised, and raised disputes which he waived with a faint corrugation of his brow. No bidder was too distant from him; and he would throw a hint to a customer as an angler drops a fly over an indolent trout. I stood to the front and wished I had been more modest. He raked the room for bids, and it was perilous to meet his eye. To move one's hand or cough might be expensive, for he saw a bid in the motion of an eyelash, and once, when I smiled, he had nearly assigned to me thirty copies of Motley's Dutch Republic. The buyers stood forward or retired as the lots varied, but his was continuous action, eager yet unruffled, mercurial yet sedate. He sat as Cause above confused Effect. The boy beneath him bounded like a marsupial. He was trained to obedience. Did he take a book to Mr. B.? he was lassoed by a demi-word, and handed it to Mr. A. The booksellers, too, were chided when need was—and with what nice tact, with what old and tested blends of bluntness and suavity! When they were slow to bid for a peer's Reminiscences, in two volumes, how reasonably he pointed out that these books were here for them to take at their own price; to-morrow the chance would be gone. Now was the accepted time, they might have them if they liked, but if they would not bid, why then—he dipped his pen and said, with a swift resignation, that then, they might do the other thing. This, perhaps, was less than Olympian—I know not—but the peer's Reminiscences were bought. Just as daintily would he recommend a book to the willing buyer. "One of the prettiest counties in the whole country, sir," he said, as his boy distributed specimens of a work on Hertfordshire. "A rather instructive little book" was his luminous estimate of a history of the Garrick Club. It seemed to me that it was a sale of "remainders," but he defied us to find the word in the Catalogue or on its cover. Many of the books, however, were new copyright works, and some bore this year's date. They went at a third, a fourth, a fifth, and a sixth of their published prices, in batches of 5, 10, 20, 30, and 50. They melted like snow. I thought of the pains of authorship, and as I left the sale-room I heard that smooth, untiring voice. I had not thought that books, which take so long to write, could be so sold, so fast or for so little. Even — takes three weeks to write a book, but this gentleman sells them off at the rate of thirty in four seconds.

LIFE is a game of whist. From unseen sources
The cards are shuffled and the hands are dealt;
Blind are our efforts to control the forces
That, though unseen, are no less strongly felt.

I do not like the way the cards are shuffled;
But still I like the game and want to play.
Thus through the long, long night will I, unruffled,
Play what I get until the break of day.

An Ode to Old Chronicles.

THE door of the editorial office opened and a very thin man with a very bright and cheerful face entered.

He laid a manuscript upon the table, saying: "I have just been reading Walt Whitman's 'Leaves of Grass.' They have made me happy, because I have wanted for years to write a poem, and the rhymes and metres have tangled me. But I see now that rhyme and metre are the fifth and sixth wheels to a waggon. I have therefore thrown them away and cut loose. Here is my poem: "

I sing a song to the old "Chronics," for I am an old "Chronic" myself.

For sixty years I have had the dyspepsia and have had it bad!

I cannot eat pate-de-foie-gras. I cannot eat Welsh rarebit at ten o'clock at night. I cannot eat plum puddings and mince pies and boiled cabbage at all.

And what is worse I cannot even eat beefsteak and potatoes, brown bread and oat meal, without having cramps and swelling up like a balloon.

I cannot sleep well at night, but have to get up and walk around the house even when it is cold and the furnace fire is banked up and the draughts turned off.

Oh, I know what it is, the whole of it, from top to bottom, up and down, and all the way round. But what of it? It can't be helped, and what is the mortal use of going around like a "kill-joy"?

Come now, old "Chronics," wherever you are, in America, in England, in France, in Germany, Austria, Italy, Greece, Africa, Turkey, India, China, Russia, Japan and islands of the sea, cheer up!

Come now, I throw out my big bass voice to you!

I speak to you without regard to age or sex, for all are alike to me, old folks and children, men and women. I care not whether you are black or white or red or yellow or green or blue (the bluer the better for my purpose).

I care not what ails you!

Maybe you are a poor old rheumatic with stiff joints and muscles all drawn up into sailor's knots. Maybe you have got the gout, and not from any fault of your own, but from some roystering old ancestor who thought more of his palate than of his posterity.

Maybe it is the consumption and you are slowly coughing up all your bright red blood and going down to the grave in racking pain while all your young friends—your childhood companions—are sweeping onward in all the ecstasy of life to seize its prizes.

Are you lame, dumb, paralytic, neuralgic, knock-kneed, bow-legged, freckled, near-sighted—do you have to carry a big ear-trumpet or hire a boy or a little dog to lead you?

Are you hump-backed, have you rickets, erysipelas, or are you stupid and dull and unlucky?

Which one of all earth's thousand ills that seize upon men and hang to them and won't let go until the grave loosens their grip—which one, I say, holds you?

No matter.

Be brave. Be cheerful. Look up. Go forward! Grin and bear it! Don't kick!

Show the strong how the weak can bear their burdens! Make cowards and whiners ashamed of themselves when they see you! Show all classes and conditions that the old "Chronics" may die, but will never surrender!

Remember that the great Comrado waits on the shore on the further side of the river of the death—He the Sufferer—and looks for the men who have come up out of great tribulations.

When he had finished, the burly old editor tapped his forehead and winked at his assistant. But when the "copy" was placed in his hands, the old printer smiled and said softly to himself in a harsh asthmatic voice (speaking with great difficulty): "Whoever he is, 'he has been there!'" And he braced up and set type with new courage.

Sydney Smith and the Tortoise.

SIR,—With regard to the tortoise story claimed by Sir Frederick Pollock (the child being, as he says, his brother George [?]) I can only refer you to the account given by my mother, Lady Holland, in her memoir of my grandfather, the Rev. Sydney Smith (p. 320):

We were all assembled to look at a turtle that had been sent to the house of a friend, when a child of the party stooped down and began eagerly stroking the shell.

"Why are you doing that, B—?" said my father.

"Oh! to please the turtle."

"Why, child, you might as well stroke the dome of St. Paul's to please the Dean and Chapter!"

Thus Sydney Smith's daughter acknowledges the authenticity of the story, and seems to have been present in person on the occasion. Only the tortoise appears to have been a turtle, and the child's name began with a B. Possibly, therefore—as history often repeats itself—both turtle and tortoise tale may be true, my grandfather being the author of one, and Sir Frederick of the other.—I am, &c.,

CAROLINE HOLLAND.

72, Brook-street, W.: March 13.

[Miss Holland refers to this passage in Sir M. E. Grant-Duff's Notes from an Indian Diary, quoted in our review: "The Breakfast Club met at Henry Cowper's. [Sir Frederick] Pollock told us that it was he, and not Sydney Smith, who said to the child who was patting the tortoise, 'You might as well stroke the dome of St. Paul's by way of pleasing the Dean and Chapter.' Pollock first put about the story under the name of his father, the Lord Chief Baron; but it was really his own. The child was his brother George."—ED. ACAD. MY.]

Green's "Short History."

SIR,—I was surprised on reading the letter of "T. H. G." to find that anyone should question the accuracy of Green's account of the scene in the death-chamber of Charles II. Your correspondent is himself in error in stating that only two bishops were in attendance on the dying king, for we are told by Evelyn that the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Durham, Ely, and Bath and Wells watched by his bedside in turn.

The "blessing" incident is described very fully by Dr. Lingard, who, as usual, is liberal in his citation of authorities. To my mind the matter is interesting as an illustration of how a statement accepted by general consent may owe its significance to the spirit in which it is reported. Bishop Burnett, with an unmistakable allusion to the frailties of Charles, seems to chuckle at the idea of these bishops and courtiers claiming the king as their "common father"—in the sense that the King of Yvetot was called the father of all his land—and beseeching the paternal blessing.

As described by Lingard, the scene is an impressive one. The Duke of York knelt by the bedside and kissed the king's hand. Not once did Charles mention Monmouth,

"but he sent for his other illegitimate sons, recommended them to James, and drawing each by the hand successively gave them his blessing. At this sight one of the prelates observed that the king, the Lord's anointed, was the common father of all his subjects; everyone present instantly throw himself on his knees, and Charles, being raised up, pronounced a blessing over them."

Dr. Green, while despising the inuendo of Burnett's account, is unmoved by the almost sacred scene pictured by Lingard, and very properly represents the whole thing as a piece of ghastly mummery. As to who were the kneeling persons, the language employed by Dr. Lingard should convince "T. H. G." that there could be no such reservation about the blessing as he conceives. We may assume that, in addition to those mentioned, the Earls of Bath and Feversham were present, besides the bishops, physicians, and attendants who had been readmitted on the departure of Huddleston, the confessor.—I am, &c., Peel and Tennyson.

SIR,—In your issue of March 4 one can read, on p. 273, your contributor's comments upon the "Peel Papers" and his (Peel's) treatment of Tennyson in the matter of a pension. In remarking upon Mr. Gladstone's letter (which was written in answer to one from "Sir Robert" asking for a "character" of Tennyson), your contributor writes: "which came as follows, and which, one must remember, was penned after Tennyson had written what is now generally admitted to be his finest poetry."

As these remarks apply to the year 1845, and Tennyson did not publish "The Princess" until 1847, "In Memoriam," 1850, "Maud," 1855, "Idylls of the King," 1859—unless he had written all these previous to 1845, surely it cannot be a safe assertion to make, "after Tennyson had written what is now generally admitted to be his finest poetry."—I am, &c.,

An Explanation.

SIR,—I have been asked by Mr. Alfred E. T. Watson to explain that a volume of collected pieces published by me last autumn under the title of "Huntingrop Hall, and other Stories," by Alfred E. T. Watson and other Sporting Writers," and lettered outside "Hunting Crop Hall. A. E. T. Watson," was not prepared nor edited by that gentleman, and that he had nothing to do with the publication.

The two stories by Mr. Watson included in the volume were republished from London Society of 1872 by arrangement made by me with Mr. James Hogg, the proprietor of the copyrights, and not by permission of Mr. Watson, the writer of the stories.—I am, &c.,

"The Forest Lovers."

SIR,—In your issue of February 11 we read a note on page 175, in which you say, "It is a little odd that The Forest Lovers seems to have met with no popularity across the Atlantic." As the ACADEMY, deservedly, is read very widely in the United States, we feel sure that you would like to know the facts of the case, which are, that throughout last summer and autumn The Forest Lovers was one of the best selling books of the year, and is still having a large sale. It is now in its seventh large edition.—I am, &c., Epigrams.

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to a review of a work of mine—Short Poems (Kegan Paul)—in your issue of February 18. I have no intention of dealing with your critic's estimate of my book as a whole. I only want to say that he appears to have misconceived my ideas of the epigram as a poetical form. He says that my epigrams are not very epigrammatic. Are all those of Martial or Landor "very epigrammatic"? An epigram may be a perfectly grave poem, devoid of pungency or wit; such, for instance, as that of Landor, beginning "I strove with none, for none was worth my strife." Here, for instance, is a specimen of my own, newly written:

ON MR. KIPLING'S ILLNESS.

Rudyard, we love thee: nay, you must not go;
And more we love thee, since you suffer so;
You that have spells to make us laugh or cry,
Whilst yet you live, we wish that Death would die.

Here there is no pungency; yet I claim that this is an epigram, just as Wolcot's quatrain "To Sleep" is an epigram. If your critic will bear in mind Mr. Watson's "Note on Epigrams," he will better understand my notion of this poetical form.—I am, &c.,

JOHN OTTWEILL.

[There are, of course, epigrams and epigrams. When our reviewer said that Mr. Ottwell's examples were not very epigrammatic, he meant what he said, for though an epigram is a short poem a short poem is not necessarily an epigram. Mr. Ottwell does not prove him wrong by the perfectly accurate statement that an epigram need not be pungent or witty, nor by the not very epigrammatic specimen he here adduces.—ED. ACADEMY.]

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 23.

WE printed last week several columns of publishers' announcements; and on our Prize Competition page we asked our readers to select from those columns the twelve best books. A collation of the ninety-eight lists sent in shows that in the opinion of our readers the following are, in their order of merit, the twelve best books belonging to the spring season, the number of votes each has obtained being placed after it:

The Browning Letters. (Smith, Elder.)	...	66
Omar Khayyam. "Golden Treasury Series." (Macmillan.)	52
The Life of Tennyson. (Macmillan.)	...	48
The Life of Borrow. (Murray.)	...	39
Imitation of Christ. (Kegan Paul.)	...	33
The Life of William Morris. (Longmans.)	...	32
White's Selborne. (Lane.)	...	32
Vanity Fair. (Methuen.)	...	32
The Life of Millais. (Methuen.)	...	29
Pride and Prejudice. (Methuen)	...	27
Mr. Hawlett's Forest Lovers. (Macmillan.)	...	27
Pickwick Papers. (Methuen.)	...	22

And these are the second twelve:

Jowett's Letters. (Murray.)	...	21
The Life of Gladstone. (Cassell.)	...	20
Tennyson's Poems. Sixpenny Edition. (Macmillan.)	20
Carlyle's Past and Present. (Dent.)	...	17
Herford's Shakespeare. (Macmillan.)	...	15
Alfred the Great. (Black.)	...	12
H. G. Wells's When the Sleeper Wakes. (Harpers.)	...	12
Mr. Dooley. (Grant Richards.)	...	10
The Etchingham Letters. (Smith, Elder.)	...	10
Trevelyan's American Revolution. (Longmans.)	...	9
Kinglake's Eothen. (Methuen.)	...	9
Green's Conquest of England. (Macmillan.)	...	7

These figures are very interesting. The absence of new fiction—represented only by The Forest Lovers and When the Sleeper Wakes—is striking, and we have yet another proof of how large an audience an interesting biography will always command. The inclusion of Vanity Fair, Pride and Prejudice, and Past and Present, indicates the affection that people entertain for small editions, all three being in pocket form. The presence of Pickwick is another sign, if another were needed, that Dickens still holds his own. Finally, we would remark that the Life of Danton was many times mentioned in the lists, but the circumstances that two lives of Danton belong to the spring season, and the author was frequently not specified, exclude the book from the first four-and-twenty. Certain competitors included books not to be found in last week's ACADEMY at all.

No one named the first twelve complete, but Mr. Thomas Fleming, care of Mrs. Fraser, 25, Bruntsfield-avenue, Edinburgh, has supplied nine of them, and to him, therefore, a cheque for a guinea has been posted. His remaining three books were Jowett's Letters, which comes thirteenth in the voting, Prof. Herford's edition of Shakespeare, which comes seventeenth, and the Life of Müller.

Competition No. 24.

A publishing firm is just now preparing a new series of literary monographs of English writers. The programme, as at present announced, includes only one woman writer—George Eliot. Mr. W. P. James, in commenting in the St. James's Gazette upon this circumstance, suggests that the readers of the ACADEMY should be called upon to draw up a list of women writers that deserve inclusion, together with the critics best fitted to deal with them. We take the hint, and offer a prize of one guinea to the best list of six monographs on the lines of those in the "English Men of Letters Series," the subject of each being an English woman writer of this century (exclusive of George Eliot, who is already arranged for), and the monographer a living English author, either man or woman. In this instance the decision will be made by the ACADEMY, and not by popular suffrage.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, March 21. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 344, or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION to the PRIVATE LAW OF ROME. By the late JAMES MUIRHEAD, LL.D., Professor of Roman Law in the University of Edinburgh. Second Edition. Revised and Edited by HENRY GOUDY, LL.D., Regius Professor of Civil Law, Oxford. Demy 8vo, cloth, price 21s.

"No better authority could have been found to bring the late Dr. Muirhead's work up to date, and Dr. Goudy has supplemented the author's notes with references to the most recent researches. This elaborate 'Historical Introduction' to the Private Law of Rome' needs no words of commendation to students who will find in it a most exhaustive study."

THE LAST LINK. Our Present Knowledge of the Descent of Man. By ERNST HAECKEL (Jena). With Notes and Biographical Sketches by HANS GADOW, F.R.S., Cambridge. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

"The clearness and simplicity of this little volume and its general freedom from technicalities should at once render it extremely popular. No one interested in the great problem of the descent of man should miss reading it. It is from the pen of a master, and as it is very unlikely that any discovery likely to alter the position of things will be made before 1901, the book has the additional interest of being probably the last work of the century on the subject."
—Aberdeen Journal.

THE MORMON PROPHET. By LILY DOUGALL, Author of "A Dozen Ways of Love," "Beggars All," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

"Miss Dougall may be congratulated both on her choice of a subject for her new book and on her remarkably able and interesting treatment of it.... A fascinating story, which is even more remarkable and more fascinating as a psychological study."
—Scotsman.

"This is a novel of a very superior type. The style is excellent and the characters are full of life. And the figure of Joe Smith, that extraordinary blending of genius and fool, will live in the memory of the reader."
—Aberdeen Free Press.

"The hero is Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism, and the author's aim has been to present him as he is revealed in his own writings, in the writings of his contemporaries, and in the memories of the few who can recall him."
—The Academy.

"A most exhilarating and exciting romance."
—The Spectator.

"A delightfully written story."
—The Outlook.

"There are brightness and movement on every page."

Joint Authors of "Rejected Addresses."

A FAMILY NARRATIVE.

Based upon hitherto unpublished Diaries, Letters, and other Documents.

By ARTHUR H. BEAVAN,

Author of "Marlborough House and Its Occupants," "Popular Royalty," &c.

"Mr. Arthur H. Beavan in his new work as 'James and Horace Smith' deserves our gratitude for sending us back once more to 'Rejected Addresses.' Without doubt this little book is one of the most successful collection of parodies that have ever appeared, not only in English but in literature. Many of the witticisms of this notable pair of brethren are recorded in Mr. Beavan's book."

Mr. L. COURTNEY in the Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Beavan has had at his disposal a good deal of fresh matter in the shape of hitherto unpublished letters by both James and Horace, letters which will be read with interest on account of the incidental light they throw upon the literary history of the first half of the century."

The Literary Week.

THE first message to the outside world given by Mr. Kipling consisted of the word "Yes." It was his reply to a cablegram asking if he would join the committee of the William Black Memorial Fund. Already over a hundred pounds have been subscribed to this object, mainly by personal friends. It is hoped that £2,000 may eventually be raised. Meanwhile, as a glance at our Prize Competition page will show, there is some indecision about the most suitable form the memorial should take. The original project for a lifeboat is the most favoured.

A COMMITTEE has been formed, of which Mr. Sidney Lee and Mr. Thomas Seccombe are joint Honorary Secretaries, for the purpose of presenting Dr. Garnett with his portrait on the occasion of his retirement from the British Museum. Subscriptions will be received by the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. A. H. Huth, Bolney House, Ennismoregardena, S.W. Dr. Garnett may have expressed a wish that the memorial should take the form of a portrait. We do not know. But we cannot but feel that there are better ways of signalling honourable public service.

THE scuffle and competition of sixpenny and threepenny magazines is, as we have already stated, to be relieved by the production of an expensive splendour in the way of magazine literature, under the editorship of Lady Randolph Churchill. It will cost a physician's fee—one guinea, net, quarterly. Each volume of the Anglo-Saxon, as it will be called, will contain 250 pages, in which everything (the prospectus informs us) that is sumptuous in type, paper, and illustration, everything that is learned and exquisite in Science and Art, everything that is exclusive in Politics and Family History, everything that is gay and enviable in Fashions and Amusements, will confront the reader. The very binding will assume varied historical and original designs, each the subject of a "note" by Mr. Cyril Davenport. The names of annual subscribers will be printed in each number.

THE death of Dr. A. B. Grosart removes a most industrious and enthusiastic student of English letters. He was by profession a Presbyterian minister at Blackburn, but his life-work was the editing of a long series of reprints of the neglected sixteenth and seventeenth century writers. The Huth Library, with Greene, Nash, Dekker and Gabriel Harvey; the Fuller's Worthies' Library, with Donne, Herbert, Vaughan, Crashaw and others; and the Chertsey Worthies' Library by no means complete the list. Some of these editions have since been superseded; others, printed by subscription in exceedingly limited numbers, are nearly as difficult to procure as the originals. Unfortunately, for all his zeal and devotion, Dr. Grosart was by no means a model editor. Valuable as his publications are for the biographical and illustrative matter which he spared no pains in hunting up, they are mostly of little use to the scholar. He was extremely inaccurate and very imperfectly equipped as a critic of literature. At the same time his devotion to the chaotic contemporary spelling and punctuation shut off his work from anything like a popular success.

THE last thing that Dr. Grosart wrote was an article in a recent number of Englische Studien, in which he described a number of "literary finds" unearthed from manuscripts at Trinity College, Dublin, and elsewhere. Some years ago he issued proposals for publishing a volume of this material, which was to include the poems of Aurelian Townsend and William Strode of Christ Church. It would be a pity if the scheme should altogether lapse. It is to be feared that his death also leaves his sumptuous library edition of Spenser still shorn of its last volume, for which subscribers have waited many years in vain. Dr. Grosart was a kindly man, ever ready to give and receive literary help. For all the defects of his work, lovers of English poetry owe him much.

DR. KNAPP, in his biography of George Borrow, which we review elsewhere, regrets that, whereas the Bible Society's letters to Borrow exist, Borrow's letters to the Bible Society are lost. This is, however, not the case; for the secretary has now announced that most of them have been found. In the next edition of Dr. Knapp's work they will, we trust, be printed.

MISS FIONA MACLEOD's new book will be published in the spring under the title, The Dominion of Dreams. It will be akin in nature to her Washer of the Ford, and will be divided into three sections: tales, legendary and other, with a modern setting; narratives, mainly psychological; and tales with a pagan or old Celtic setting.

THE second volume of Sir William W. Hunter's History of British India will be published in connexion with the Centenary of the founding of the East India Company in the latter half of 1900.

THE distribution of books through unorthodox channels tends to develop. The merry news vendor whose pitch is at the top of Chancery-lane has added cloth bound sixpenny novels to his pavement display. Soon we shall be called a nation of booksellers.

A copy of the Stevenson Medley lies before us. This volume, which consists of certain literary odds and ends of R. L. S., was first put together as the bonus volume of the Edinburgh edition of Stevenson, and presented to subscribers to that set. It was afterwards republished in an edition of 300 copies and ballotted for, no price being fixed, but ten guineas being required for five copies, the smallest number any one could have. The book contains as frontispiece a photograph of Stevenson taken in 1885 by Mr. Lloyd Osbourne. On the title-page is the printer's mark of the Davos Press. The contents are: A prefatory note by Mr. Colvin, "The Charity Bazaar," "The Light Keeper" (two poems), "On the New Form of Intermittent Light for Lighthouses," "On the Thermal Influence of Forests," "Reflections and Remarks on Human Life," and a number of facsimiles of the Davos Press booklets and leaflets, very cleverly inserted by a binder's device. The volume is issued by Messrs. Chatto & Windus. Some day it will be priceless.

THE story of some of the telegrams which were sent from persons of note to Mr. Kipling, and printed in the papers, is told by C. K. S. in the Illustrated London News. "Now, however," says he, "everything is explained, and the explanation excuses an otherwise jarring note in the sympathy called forth by the illness of one of our most distinguished writers. It was an enterprising New York Sunday paper that rained down prepaid cablegrams upon these numerous ladies and gentlemen. They could scarcely do otherwise than answer them, and one or two may be excused if, in the hurry of answering, they sent messages that were not in the very best taste."

MR. HENLEY's literary causerie has not yet begun in the Pall Mall Magazine; but in the April number Mr. G. S. Street, who is also to supply a monthly dissertation—on men and things—makes his bow. "From a London Attic" is his title; but that is only Mr. Street's amusing way. No one would be less comfortable in an attic than himself. Beginnings are always difficult, and therefore Mr. Street must not be judged too hardly; but his first instalment is truly rather thin. His illustrator is Mr. S. H. Sime, who grows steadily stronger. In these thumbnail drawings there is a remarkable fancy at work; but in illustrations to a story called "The King's Taster," elsewhere in the same number, Mr. Sime proves himself a fine imaginative draughtsman.

THE instructions to critics and spectators, printed on the programme of Mr. Bernard Shaw's new play, "Caesar and Cleopatra," which has just been acted for copyright purposes, are amusing. Thus: "The play follows history as closely as stage exigencies permit. Critics should consult Manetho and the Egyptian Monuments, Herodotus, Diodorus, Strabo (Book 17), Plutarch, Pomponius Mela, Pliny, Tacitus, Appian of Alexandria, and, perhaps, Ammianus Marcellinus. Ordinary spectators, if unfamiliar with the ancient tongues, may refer to Mommsen, Warde-Fowler, Mr. St. George Stock's Introduction to the 1898 Clarendon Press edition of Caesar's Gallie Wars, and Murray's Handbook for Egypt. Many of these authorities have consulted their imaginations, more or less. The author has done the same." In the caste the age of Caesar is given as fifty-four and of Cleopatra sixteen.

A LITTLE while ago we gave a list of some of the English words which are now in constant use in France. The contra account has again been drawn up by the Pall Mall Gazette, after its annual custom, and we find that in 1898 only on 95 days out of the 313 have the Times' leaders been free from French and other alien phrases. Altogether, 255 different foreign expressions have been used by the Times' leader-writers during the year, chose jugée figuring 31 times, dossier 14 times, Ausgleich 18 times, communiqué 6 times, hinterland 23 times, régime 14 times, status 7 times, status quo 9 times, personnel 6 times, borderneau 27 times, and likin 14 times. It will be seen that the Dreyfus Case is much to blame.

MR. RICHARD HARDING DAVIS, who is now in England, recently tried an interesting experiment. He sent letters to America by Boy Messenger instead of by post, in order to—well, to win a bet. The boy engaged was one Jaggars, a sharp lad whom Mr. Davis had reason to trust. When asked, he expressed no surprise—Chiswick or Chicago, Bloomsbury or Boston, it was all one to him—and said he would be ready when Mr. Davis was. He is now on his return journey. In New York Jaggars was fêted, and his printed opinion is that that city is "all right," but there should be better tea in it. Mr. Davis's books, he said, have hitherto been neglected in London, but probably "will be read now." "Now" is good. Jaggars suggests Gallagher, one of Mr. Davis's best characters, not only by name and age, but also by shrewdness.

A LITTLE collection of the Letters of Samuel Rutherford has just been published. To this we shall return again, but here we quote the following testimony of an English merchant to the preachers of St. Andrews two hundred and fifty years ago: "I came to Irvine, and heard a well-favoured, proper old man [David Dickson], with a long beard, and that man showed me all my heart. Then I went to St. Andrews, where I heard a sweet, majestic-looking man [R. Blair], and he showed me the majesty of God. After him I heard a little fair man [Rutherford], and he showed me the loveliness of Christ." English merchants do not write like that now.

THE story of how Mr. Anthony Hope's successful play, "The Adventure of Lady Ursula," came to be staged at all is told in the New York Bookman: "One day during his visit to America over a year ago, Anthony Hope was combating an argument with Mr. R. H. Russell, the New York publisher, that he had a knack for the stage. Mr. Russell was trying to persuade him to dramatise Rupert of Hentzau himself, instead of putting it into the hands of a playwright. Just to convince Mr. Russell that he was mistaken, Anthony Hope said he would hunt up 'a sad little thing,' that he had attempted and in disgust had buried in the bottom of his trunk. 'The Adventure of the Lady Ursula' was put in rehearsal the next day." The rest everyone knows.

UNDER the title Catherine Morland a French translation of Jane Austen's Northanger Abbey has just been published. The translator is M. Félix Fénélon.

IN a recent prize competition originated by La Lecture (Genova), a journal for librarians, the winning list of "thirty-three novels suitable for a boy's library" contained the names of twelve British and American authors. They are represented by Scott (twice), Swift, Miss Yonge, Mrs. Stowe, Dean Farrar, Mrs. Wood, Miss Alcott, Mayne Reid, Fenimore Cooper, Mrs. Burnett, and Miss Montgomery. It seems strange to find Stevenson unrepresented; and, among living authors, Mr. Henty.

THE first chapters of Tolstoy's new novel, Resurrection, will begin to appear next Saturday, the 25th, in French, German, American, and English papers simultaneously. The first rights of publication in this country have been granted to the Clarion.

A YEAR or so ago, our readers will perhaps remember, a firm of photographers, wishing to include Walter Savage Landor in a series of eminent authors, asked us to forward a letter from them to him asking for a sitting. And now the Chronicle states that a well-known firm or London music publishers received a few days ago a letter from the organist of a church in New London, Connecticut preferring the following request: "Would you kindly inform me how a letter will reach Mr. Ben Jonson, author of song words, 'Drink to me only with thine eyes'?"

A NEW series of Mr. Dooley's utterances is in preparation in America. The title will be Mr. Dooley in the Hearts of His Countrymen. Meanwhile, Mr. Dooley in Peace and in War is, in America, in its fortieth thousand.

THE readers of Literature in America have been playing the Academy game, with the result that of the thirty-three Immortals already decided upon Mr. W. D. Howells comes out first, and Prof. Fiske and Mark Twain are bracketed for second place. This is the list, though not perhaps in its final form:

W. D. Howells.	Margaret Deland.
John Fiske.	Paul Leicester Ford.
Mark Twain.	Capt. A. T. Mahan.
Thomas Bailey Aldrich.	James Whitecomb Riley.
Charles Dudley Warner.	Edmund Clarence Stedman.
Bret Harte.	Henry Cabot Lodge.
S. Weir Mitchell.	Richard Watson Gilder.
Henry James.	Henry M. Alden.
George W. Cable.	Elizabeth Stuart Phelps-Ward.
John Burroughs.	Richard Harding Davis.
Henry Van Dyke.	Henry B. Fuller.
Frank R. Stockton.	Mrs. Annie T. Slosson.
Donald G. Mitchell.	Joel Chandler Harris.
Richard Henry Stoddard.	John C. Van Dyck.
Bronson Howard.	Henry E. Krehbiel.
Bliss Carman.	Lafcadio Hearn.

Owen Wister.

There are several notable omissions from the above list which will probably strike readers at once. But that is a peculiarity of the Academy game.

"THE Art of William Morris" will form the subject of the Easter Number of the Art Journal. The monograph will be written by Mr. Lewis F. Day, and illustrated by fifty designs and other works, among them examples of stained glass, tapestries, carpets, silks, curtain fabrics, chintzes, wall-papers, tiles, embroideries, and decorations.

THE dedication of Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler's new novel, A Double Thread, runs thus:

If, in the circle of my friends, there be
One who will take this volume, writ by me,
And not on all its imperfections look,
But rather see the pathos and the wit
Which I have tried, yet failed, to put in it—
To her (or him) I dedicate my book.

It is an odd coincidence that so unusual a name as Mesurier should be found in two novels in one week—Miss Fowler's A Double Thread and Mr. Le Gallienne's Young Lives.

WE said something last week about the case for the writers of introductions to standard books, as against superfine critics who deprecate the practice. In Mr. Austin Dobson's introduction to one of Miss Austen's novels, in Messrs. Macmillan's edition, he states the situation very clearly and well. Thus:

One of the curiosities of modern criticism is a marked impatience of new prefaces to old books. Considered from one side only, the objection is intelligible. To the critic who can do without it, an introduction has no value; and if, in addition, it is inept and uninspired, he is fully justified in complaining that its lifeless bulk should be obtruded between the work and his nobility. But, on the other hand, assuming it to be capable and instructed, it is surely a mistake to conclude because one exceptionally-gifted reader finds it superfluous that it is not required by other people. The theory of its uselessness can only be supported by supposing that everyone comes to a fresh reprint of a classic as well equipped as some particular critic—in other words, that all the world is so familiar with every existing introduction to the masterpiece concerned as to make any additional "preliminary matter" a mere impertinence. This is a palpable error; and it may be doubted whether even critical omniscience would claim so much. The truth is, that such a book—unless bought solely for some accidental difference, as format, illustrations, type, or paper—nearly always comes into the hands of a large percentage of its public for the first time, and any preface which it contains is as new to its new readers as if the volume had never before had its literary gentleman usher.

But the literary gentleman usher must, of course, do his work well—that is understood.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Birmingham Gazette writes, apropos of our article on Dr. Sebastian Evans last week: "Your pleasant notice of Dr. Sebastian Evans and the notice in the ACADEMY mention his literary work as dating from 1865. May I mention that in 1852 a series of twelve sonnets on the Duke of Wellington were published and much admired at Cambridge? In Dr. Hart's Life and

Letters we find: 'A man named Evans has published a more than respectable set of sonnets on the Duke's death.'

Bibliographical.

I WONDER whether the performance at St. George's Hall on Monday evening has caused any special demand for copies of Mr. Swinburne's tragedy, "Loerine"? The work, published originally in 1887, reached a second edition in 1896, after rather a long interval. When will the third come? I am inclined to believe that Mr. Swinburne is a little-bought poet, and that this is so, largely, if not mainly, because his books are issued and maintained at such (comparatively) high prices. People cannot afford such sums nowadays. I would suggest that Mr. Swinburne should sanction the publication of a much cheaper edition of his works, both in prose and in verse. Those works are numerous and make a library in themselves. The verse, I am sure, would (except, perhaps, in the case of the bulkier tragedies, such as "Bothwell") sell much better at a low price than it does now at a high. Why not try the experiment with the lyrical volumes, at any rate?

The claim made by Sir Frederick Pollock (in a passage quoted by Sir M. Grant-Duff in his Notes from a Diary) to the joke about "stroking the dome of St. Paul's by way of pleasing the Dean and Chapter," raises a curious point in chronology. Lady Holland's Life of her father, in which the joke (as we all remember) is ascribed to Sydney Smith, was first published in 1855. Now, as Sir F. Pollock was born (according to Who's Who) in 1845, it is clear that he must have uttered the witticism before he was ten years old, or else how could it have got into Lady Holland's book? Moreover, it must have achieved a wide circulation, or it could not have come to be attributed so soon to Sydney Smith. We can reconcile the two-fold origin of the mot only by assuming that Sydney Smith made it first and Sir F. Pollock (quite independently, of course) afterwards.

Most of us, I think, must have been surprised when, reading of the death of Dr. Grosart, we read also that he was then only a few years over sixty. He had done such an immense amount of solid (though not always fruitful) work that we had thought of him, I fancy, as older than he was. What a typical Dryasdust! yet how enthusiastic, how laborious! The serious student of English literature must needs be grateful to him for his many careful reprints. Yet to how many English people was he known even by name? Mr. Andrew Lang once wrote a ballade with the refrain, "I am not in Men of the Time." It is significant of much that there is no mention of Dr. Grosart in Who's Who.

Permit me to supply a brief supplement to the account of Dr. Sebastian Evans's literary career which appeared in last week's ACADEMY. On at least one occasion Dr. Evans sought fame as a dramatist. That was when he prepared an adaptation of Pailleron's "Le Monde où l'on s'ennuie," and brought it out at first at Bournemouth and afterwards at the Gaiety, London, under the title of "Culture." This was in 1884-85. At the Gaiety, I regret to add, the play (in which Dr. Evans had collaborated with Mr. Frank Evans) was not a success—a result partly due, I have always thought, to the inadequacy of the representation.

The world knows next to nothing of its greatest women. Here is a Miss (or Mrs.) Anna Sewell who has written a book which has been sold by the thousands of thousands; and yet I, who call myself, forsooth, a bookman, have never read, have never even seen, that masterpiece! Is it not monstrous (as Hamlet says) that Black Beauty: the Autobiography of a Horse, should have been sown broadcast over the world ever since 1877 (that seems to have been its date of birth), and that I should be none the better for it! So far as I know, Black Beauty is Miss (or Mrs.) Anna Sewell's single achievement. She has not had the literary fecundity of her not less popular namesake, Elizabeth Missing Sewell, of whom even I have heard.

Talking of Miss E. M. Sewell, who is in her eighty-fifth year, I am led to think of another "grand old lady" of literature—Miss C. M. Yonge. I have on my table, fresh from her still active pen, the ninth series of her well-known Cameos from English History, the first series of which made its appearance just thirty years ago. Miss Sewell possibly regards Miss Yonge as quite a youthful person, for Miss Yonge is only in her seventy-sixth year.

Though Miss Florence Marryat is known to thousands as a very fertile novelist, not many of those thousands, I suspect, are aware that she has for a good many years had associations with the stage. I have a dim recollection of having myself seen and heard her (in the provinces) in one of the Gilbert-Sullivan operas; and now I note that so recently as last week she appeared as an actress in a play of which she is part author. The play was "The Gamekeeper," and the theatre that of Kilburn, N.W. Miss Marryat's daughter Eva was a professional player; she likewise have I seen and heard upon the boards.

Mr. Redway's reference to certain contributions by Mr. Alfred E. T. Watson to the pages of London Society in the early sixties reminds me that Mr. Watson was generally credited with the authorship of some critical essays on contemporary dramatists which figured in that magazine at the same period. They were signed, I fancy, "Peyton Wrey." I do not think Mr. Watson ever published them in book form, and probably they would not now represent the mature opinions of the dramatic critic of the Standard.

It is curious that we should be so badly off for English Lives of Robespierre. That by George Henry Lewes, which is so soon to be re-issued, came out in 1849, just half a century ago! However, its republication at this moment is acceptable, for it will help to correct the popular impression of Robespierre as only a bloodthirsty monster, and will show that M. Sardou has historical justification for the much more engaging portrait of Robespierre which (it is understood) he has drawn for us in the work we are all of us looking forward to.

I find the late Mr. Henry Herman described by a literary paper as "joint author, with Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, of 'The Silver King' and 'Claudian.'" It is true, of course, that Mr. Herman and Mr. Jones joined in the production of "The Silver King," but in the case of "Claudian" Mr. Herman's collaborator was not Mr. Jones, but Mr. W. G. Wills.

Six-Foot-Three.

Life, Writings, and Correspondence of George Borrow. By William I. Knapp, Ph.D., LL.D. Two vols. (Murray. 32s.)

A LAD who twenty tongues can talk,
And sixty miles a day can walk;
Drink at a draught a pint of rum,
And then be neither sick nor dumb;
Can tune a song and make a verse,
And deeds of Northern kings rehearse;
Who never will forsake his friend
While he his bony fist can bend;
And, though averse to brawl and strife,
Will fight a Dutchman with a knife;
O that is just the lad for me,
And such is honest six-foot-three.

Such was the autobiography in little which George Borrow wrote of himself in 1824, when he was twenty-one years of age, and we are sorry to have to say that Dr. Knapp's eight hundred large pages do not add much to it. Of Borrow's writings, their inception and progress, of his travels and vicissitudes, of his friends and enmities, we are told much. But the kernel of the matter, the man himself, eludes us. The work, in fact, is more an exaggerated bibliography than a biography: for the books are in the foreground and the man in the back. It is odd that so keen a partisan as Dr. Knapp, who has literally devoted some of the best years of his life to the preparation of this book, should be so weak on the human side of his hero. But so it is. It is true that Dr. Knapp never saw his hero, and therefore could hardly describe him from life; yet it is the duty of a biographer to attempt to reproduce his man. Dr. Knapp makes no such attempt.

GEORGE BORROW.

From the Picture in the Possession of John Murray.

From a truthful Life of Borrow, Dr. Knapp seems to believe, all mystery must evaporate. Borrow the man, as we see him in Lavengro, was one of whom it is impossible to hear too much. He fascinates at every turn. His mystery, his native freemasonry, his faculty for alighting upon curious incidents and odd people, his indomitable gift of picturesqueness, which never deserted him, his open-air enthusiasm, his passion for hobbies so dissimilar as fisticuffs and philology, his intimacy with gypsies and murderers (he was the close friend of two murderers of renown—Haggart and Thurtell), his love of horses, his strength and majestic height, his delicate white hands, his hatreds and spites, his strange lonelines and stranger companionships, his mysterious absences and meteoric presences—everything about him makes its appeal to the imagination of the reader, especially, perhaps, of the young. English literature does not contain a more attractive figure. Hence the interest which these pages of Dr. Knapp's are certain to excite, but not, perhaps, to satisfy. A judicious blend of Lavengro and Dr. Knapp would have made a book of the highest literary value. Alas! Lavengro is absent, and if we want the blend we must make it ourselves. All the mystical, unreal light has ceased to play upon our hero; and that portion of him which is revealed in these pages is not particularly attractive, and certainly not, however Dr. Knapp would have us believe it, lovable. No biographer, however, could make him that. We will admire Borrow through thick and thin, but to love him is difficult. Nor did he want love.

Of Borrow the man we should have in all these pages no glimpse at all were it not for a scrap or two of reminiscence written by other persons and quoted by Dr. Knapp. Here, for example, is the account of Borrow in 1854 (aged fifty-one), as written by the late Rev. J. R. P. Berkeley, Vicar of St. Cleer in Cornwall, near the Borrow's ancestral home:

He must have been, I should say, full six feet four inches in height—a very well-built man, with somewhat of a military carriage; snow-white hair; dark, strongly marked eyebrows; his countenance pleasing, betokening calm firmness, self-confidence, and a mind under control, though capable of passion. His frame was without heaviness, but evidently very powerful. His hands were small for his size, beautifully formed, and very white. He was very vain of his hands, which he used to say he derived from his mother, who was of Huguenot extraction. He was, when in the vein, a delightful talker. It will give some idea of the effect of his appearance if I recount a circumstance which occurred on his first visit at the Vicarage. My eldest son, then between ten and eleven years of age, having been introduced, stood with eyes fixed on him for some moments, and then without speaking left the apartment. He passed into the room where his mother was engaged with some ladies, and cried out, "Well, mother, that is a man." He could find no other words to express his admiration. The child's enthusiasm evidently delighted Borrow, who, from all I saw of him, I should judge to have been singularly alive to, and grateful for, tokens of affection.

We soon came to delight in his society. He often dropped in of an evening, when he would, after tea, sit in the centre of a group before the fire with his hands on his knees—his favourite position—pouring forth tales of the scenes he had witnessed in his wanderings—sometimes among the gypsies of Spain, sometimes among those of England. Then he would suddenly spring from his seat and walk to and fro the room in silence; anon he would clap his hands and sing a gypsy song, or perchance would chant forth a translation of some Viking poem; after which he would sit down again and chat about his father, whose memory he revered as he did his mother's; and finally he would recount some tale of suffering or sorrow with deep pathos—his voice being capable of expressing triumphant joy or the profoundest sadness.

Without that description of Borrow in later life we should be nowhere, and it is fortunate that Dr. Knapp was able to obtain it. And this passage, in a letter from Hasfeldt, a Danish friend whom Borrow met in St. Petersburg, is also illuminating: "Do you still sing when you are in good humour? Doubtless you are not troubled with many friends to visit you, for you are not of the sort who are easily understood, nor do you care to have everyone understand you; you prefer to have people call you gray and let you gae." That was Borrow to the life: he preferred to have people call him gray and let him gae.

Dr. Knapp's conception of the duties of Borrow's biographer differs from our own. He seems to hold that Borrow having written his own intimate life, principally in Lavengro and The Romany Rye, and elsewhere in his other books, it would be presumptuous to do it again. The following passage explains his view:

No truer books were ever penned than The Bible in Spain and Lavengro—Romany Rye. There is no mystery about them, if you have the key. And what is the key?—only Sympathy! Believe them and read and weep and feel. Believe them and then investigate. Investigate the times in which Borrow lived and wandered and struggled and wrought, as the First Volume of this work will show. Not in the public documents of civil history, but in out-of-the-way pamphlets, obscure handbooks, local almanacs, rural newspapers, and old magazines—all long ago obsolete and now despised, found on the twopenny shelf of country bookstalls on market days. That is where I met Lavengro and Romany Rye and rejoiced to find them true. There I found the author of them to be no banshee, no brownie, no mystery at all. The bréitima—the haze of Galicia—the forerunner of corpse-candles, witches, and all the "fair family" of Celtic mythology—fades into thin air under the microscope of honest inspection, and untiring search in letters, registers, records, newspapers, poll-books, army lists, and all the forgotten dust-heaps of shop and attic.

Yet a man's mind cannot exceed itself. If it produces an effect of mystery, mystery must first belong to it. Borrow is not accounted for by an array of local papers and old memorandum books. The best way, then, to consider these two volumes is as a companion, a handbook, to Lavengro and The Romany Rye. But it is not the best result of so much loving care and patience as Dr. Knapp has bestowed. He should have re-created Borrow for us; have set him four-square to the wind on the heath; incorporating passages from his works where needful to add vivid picturesqueness to his narrative.

Dr. Knapp is the sturdiest, staunchest champion a man could have. He will allow nothing to be said against his hero. Miss Martineau dared to record the fact that when Norwich heard that George Borrow had been appointed an agent of the Bible Society there was one burst of laughter from all who remembered his early days. Probably it was so: human nature is like that; human nature dislikes conversions of any kind, and always looks on ironically when they occur. But Dr. Knapp is furious; he attributes Miss Martineau's remark to the venom of a provincial blue-stocking, and quotes a passage from a letter of Borrow to his mother by way of comment on the incident: "The Russians do not know as much as the English, but they have not their fiendish, spiteful dispositions." If Miss Martineau disliked Borrow, Borrow disliked her brother, the great Unitarian, more. The cause was sufficient for so inflammable and unreasonable a creature. Dr. Martineau, when Borrow's schoolfellow at the Norwich Grammar School—probably his only schoolfellow still living—was once told off to "horse" George while the master administered a thrashing. It was no fault of James Martineau that he was chosen thus to officiate, nor can the experience have been pleasant; but Borrow neither forgave nor forgot. Years afterwards he left a party in a hurry rather than meet this object of his rancour. We hasten to add that we do not for one moment wish to blame Borrow for his feeling in the matter: he was as God made him, and he had all the qualities of his defects. Without these unswerving prejudices, he would have written much tamer books.

Another lady who comes within Dr. Knapp's scorn is Miss Frances Power Cobbe, a neighbour of Borrow at Brompton. In Miss Cobbe's autobiography are descriptions of Borrow's flighty ways in his old age, his contradictory methods of conversation, his little tempers and crotchets. Miss Cobbe's "usual bitterness and injustice" is Dr. Knapp's phrase in referring to these passages; and elsewhere he credits her with "the harmless poignancy of her sex." But, if he doubts them or dislikes to see them in print, why does he reproduce them? To object to Miss Cobbe's narration, and then to give it fresh publicity, is illogical, unless he has means of refutation. But whereas Miss Cobbe knew Borrow, and writes with every sign of veraciousness, Dr. Knapp did not come on the field until Borrow was no more. Either the passage should have been quoted without atrabilious comment, or left out. If Dr. Knapp were less of a partisan and more of a biographer he would recognise the truth of the account. Borrow was often a difficult, wrong-headed man, and there is no need to blink the fact. Indeed, Dr. Knapp quotes a correspondence about a dog which is proof enough that the author of Lavengro was awkward to live with. Many great men are.

Yet, in spite of blemishes and omissions, let it not be thought that Dr. Knapp's volumes are dull. They are not, but compression and concentration would have made them far more interesting. We miss so many of the characteristics of good biography: the temperate, all-round view of the subject, the quiet progress, the occasional pauses for breathing time, the anecdote. Dr. Knapp never attempts to bring his readers into intimacy with Borrow by means of anecdotes of him, of which several are extant, and probably authenticated. None are given here. And of Whewell, who has been alleged to be the original of the Flaming Tinman, there is not a word. Nor is there much correspondence, for Borrow did not mix much with other men of letters or persons of note. He went his own way, head first, little amenable to the wishes of others. Such natures do not receive many letters. The circumstance does not in the least detract from Borrow's character, but it makes his biography somewhat unusual among lives of literary men. He met authors now and then, but they made him unhappy. He was too much a man of action and free thought to care for mere writers. His own literary work was always based upon personal action and privation. Without some foundation in fact he was helpless: his method was to take a real incident and bring to it his power for "toning-up" and his wonderful gift of dramatic force, by which he made it live again and invested it with mystery. Everything he wrote about he had first seen: he did not, as most story-tellers do, evolve it from within. Hence the company of most story-tellers and bookmen was not sought by him, however much they might have desired that of himself. His best literary friend in his prime was Richard Ford, author of The Handbook for Travellers in Spain, and a man of an independence not inferior to Borrow's own. To Ford's advice much of the excellence of Borrow's books may perhaps be attributed. The letters quoted by Dr. Knapp are splendidly direct and sensible. Here is one bearing upon The Bible in Spain:

My advice again and again is to avoid all fine writing, all descriptions of mere scenery and trivial events. What the world wants are racy, real, genuine scenes, and the more out of the way the better. Poetry is utterly to be avoided. If Apollo were to come down from heaven, John Murray would not take his best manuscript as a gift. Stick to yourself, to what you have seen, and the people you have mixed with. The more you give us of odd Jewish people the better. . . . Avoid words, stick to deeds. Never think of how you express yourself; for good matter must tell, and no fine writing will make bad matter good. Don't be afraid that what you may not think good will not be thought so by others. It often happens just the reverse. . . . Give us adventure, wild adventure, journals, thirty language book, sorcery, Jews, Gentiles, rambles, and the interior of Spanish prisons—the way you got in, and the way you got out. No author has yet given us a Spanish prison. Enter into the iniquities, the fees, the slang, &c. It will be a little à la Thurtell, but you see the people like to have it so. Avoid rant and cant. Dialogues always tell; they are dramatic and give an air of reality.

And here is another written to Borrow while Lavengro was on the stocks:

Never mind nimminy-pimminy people thinking subjects low. Things are low in manner of handling. Draw Nature in rags and poverty, yet draw her truly, and how picturesque! I hate your silver fork, kid glove, curly-haired school—one cuckoo note of common-place conventionalities. Hechos! Hechos! Lay about you boldly and manfully, and your good ship will sail over these puddle stones. . . . Lay it on thick; butter the bread on both sides.

This was the best kind of advice Borrow could have. Why does not someone give us the Life and Letters of Richard Ford?

A Soul's Pilgrimage.

My Inner Life: being a Chapter in Personal Evolution and Autobiography. By John Beattie Crozier. (Longmans. 14s.)

THIS most alluring book is a metaphysical Pilgrim's Progress of a unique kind, how unique probably Dr. Crozier himself is not aware. It tells the adventures of a soul among the philosophies, and it is written with the exciting vividness of a realistic romance; you pass from point to point, as you pass from incident to incident in Robinson Crusoe, or Gil Blas, or Lavengro, or Kidnapped. You guiltily turn to the close, long before reaching it, to see whether Dr. Crozier escaped from the dungeons of Mr. Herbert Spencer, whether he succeeded in his quest for the Absolute; in doing so, your eye is caught by the breathless word Hegelianism, and you read a bit to discover his experiences in that bewildering labyrinth or dizzy whirlpool; you read, with an almost indecent laughter, the Remarkable Episode of Carlyle; you follow, with agitated expectancy, all the varied fortunes of Dr. Crozier's candid and valiant soul.

To vary the metaphor, he may call his chapters by what sober names he pleases, but the chapters themselves remind us of the headings in sportsmen's Reminiscences: "How I Took my First Fence," or "Landed my First Salmon," or, going higher, "Bowled Over my First Lion." We all know those titles, and the joy of memory with which the writer recounts his feat. Sometimes it is a record of thrilling peril—"How a Tiger Almost Did for Me"; but Dr. Crozier, telling how in mid-Atlantic the universe collapsed about him by his discovery of a fatal flaw in Mr. Spencer's doctrine is to the full as moving; he describes his state at such and such a time of mental and spiritual penury; how he was reduced to live upon Macaulay, and found him thin diet for the soul; how, for months together, he fed off De Quincey and Hazlitt and other essayists, and felt hungry all the while; and if his poverty had been that of bodily privation, he could not have made his narrative more poignant and arresting. When he comes into his own, and a light breaks upon him, and he becomes, if not rich in philosophic truth, yet possessed of a competency which he can turn into more, we are filled with a delight like that of the galleries when the injured hero of melodrama recovers his rights, and the curtain goes down upon ten thousand a year and "God bless you, my children!"

But there is no need to have recourse to illustrations from without. The first part of this admirable and extraordinary book is an account of the writer's infancy, boyhood, and youth in an obscure Canadian village, and in certain seats of Canadian education, which it is not insulting to the Dominion to describe as mediocre. This fascinating piece of autobiography is given us, just to show what manner of living, what religious and social and personal experiences, what tendencies and influences were Dr. Crozier's in early life: it is all by way of preparation for the story of his maturer years. Having a distinct gift of words and a notable narrative power, he has written a most engrossing set of chapters. But, though he describes with delicious zest his nocturnal raid upon a neighbour's pigeon-house, or the strange case of his fascinating and drunken Uncle James, or the grim humours of Calvinism, or just his ordinary boyish sports and occupations, or his singular enslavement to phrenology; though he describes these and other things with a keen-eyed story-teller's pointedness of phrase, it is undeniable that the rest of the book, dealing with great problems and perplexities of thought, is no less living, exciting, and real. Dr. Crozier, in his Canadian boyhood, stole pigeons; Dr. Crozier, in his English manhood, has pursued the arduous and ardent hunt for truth—that metaphysical chase, in which so many have lost their way, wandered upon a false scent, and found themselves at nightfall beneath starless heavens far from home. The pursuit of the ideal, as chronicled by Dr. Crozier, is a good rival, in point of adventurous interest, to the pursuit of pigeons.

And this in a book of grave moment, of intellectual severity. Our previous phrases may have seemed frivolous; may have seemed to indicate a lack of seriousness, either in the book or in its critic. On the contrary, each is extremely serious. We insist that the book's paramount importance and distinction lie in its marvellously and profoundly human sense of philosophy as a human problem, near to us all: it refuses to isolate metaphysics, as you might—nay, must—isolate the higher mathematics, a speciality or luxury of the few. Few may possess the metaphysical instinct, but all are concerned in the metaphysics. Dr. Crozier most simply and unostentatiously—perhaps "unprofessionally" is the word—reveals himself as one of those to whom existence, if there be existence, is painful, if there be pain, to all minds and souls, if there be any, without some answer, if there be one, to those questions and uncertainties which seem to be the only certainties about our seeming selves and the apparent universe embracing them. He does not write in idle speculation, as one might write of the possibilities of existence in a world of four dimensions; he writes with an immediate concern for this present world and life of ours, with an eager and insatiable craving to find a firm foundation for that ideal which manifests itself by glimpses in the various manifestations of high sanctity, beauty, moral and mental energy. Nothing less or else could content him: not his own science and practice of medicine. The following is surely an almost heroic passage. He received from an eminent physician a certain offer, which opened to him a pleasant and ready way to professional distinction. He was young, unknown, not a man of means. But in spite of my natural love of reality, and the fascination which Nature and her processes had always exercised over my mind, I could not reconcile myself to making any or other of the departments of science or medicine the object of my life's devotion. What with the great Problem of Life, to which I had already dedicated myself, lying still unsolved before me, and with the Spencerian Philosophy pressing on me like a nightmare; what with the limited scope that any special department of science permits for the free exercise of the whole range of mental faculties, and with an exorbitant ideal which would be satisfied with nothing less than the whole interests of Man; what with the fact that I had taken as the basis and groundwork of my thinking the doctrine of Evolution, which was not to be affected in any of its greater implications by any minor scientific discovery; what with all these, and other subordinate considerations, it was impossible that I should give the full allegiance of my mind to Medicine. . . . That it was the parting of the ways, and would decide the entire course of my after years, I was well aware, but in spite of the material and professional advantages that would have accrued to me from my acceptance of the proposal, it was without hesitation or after-thought that I deliberately chose Philosophy as my bride, content to endure with her whatever in the future might befall.

That brief passage gives the spirit of Dr. Beattie Crozier's work, its whole-hearted and single-eyed sincerity. Men are less reluctant, for the most part, to confess their moral than their mental shortcomings; not many would publish the fact that, at a fairly advanced stage of youth, they failed to grasp the meanings, and sound the depths, of Emerson and Carlyle, but that the late A. K. H. B.'s Recreations of a Country Parson afforded them "precisely the grade and stage of platitude" they required. But this frankness invests the book; we are told, clearly and openly, of the writer's progress and halting points and retreats; how he sought, now in the novelists, now in the historians, now in other quarters, for light upon the one problem. In exactly the same way he narrates his often amusing and guileless interviews with great men, or his experience among editors and publishers; and this inspiring and high-souled record is no less frank than are the unedifying confessions of Cellini, Casanova, Rousseau.

And there is no Dichtung mingled with the Wahrheit: no attempt to magnify achievement or to minimise failure: all is candour, almost to a fault. For sheer spiritual and intellectual honesty the record has few rivals; the stories of Bunyan and Mill suggest themselves, each in its very separate way, or Wordsworth's "Prelude." We have endeavoured to make it clear that the work has a strong charm of personality—that charm is Socratic, the charm of sincerity and clarity and impatience of the second-hand or second-rate, which forbids iurare in verba magistri, even though the Master wear the purple robe and deliver his sophistry amid general applause. Intolerance of light answers, of the putting aside of questions, of blindness to other sides of questions, of philosophical jugglery or sciolism, amounts to a passion in this searcher for the hidden treasures of truth. It is noteworthy, that while he is not of those often very superior persons who are agnostics as to the value or even possibility of metaphysical science, Dr. Crozier has found the greatest suggestiveness and flashes of light in the works of "the poetic thinkers," Bacon, Goethe, Emerson, Carlyle, and—tell it not in the Gathes or Ascalons of Calvinism!—Newman. Not, indeed, as definite teachers; but as invincible victors over all or any solutions of the problem upon principles of materialism which deny either the reality of mind or its superiority to matter, so stultifying, or rather rendering impossible, any explanation of all that most imperatively demands to be explained; or, in Dr. Crozier's phrase, bringing "chaos into the World and madness into the Mind."

It is impossible so much as to suggest the various wealth of good and worthy matter in this volume of 550 pages; but even the more strictly metaphysical portion contains much that is of interest to readers, however innocent they may be of metaphysical taste and perception. There are chapters of almost purely social or literary criticism: as those upon Style, Lord Randolph Churchill, Aristocracy, and Democracy. Some readers may prefer the homely accounts of Canadian village life; others, except all Hegelians and the straiter sect of Spencerians, the pure philosophic expositions—Dr. Crozier's setting forth of his "own contribution" to the problem of life; others, again, the story of his literary struggle for recognition, his personal labour and suffering. But they are chiefly to be congratulated who are able to enjoy the whole; they will see in the writer of this winning work, and, inter alia, of The History of Intellectual Development, one who, in Tennyson's words, has "followed The Gleam"; followed it even when clouds and darkness were thickest round about it, and the light of its guidance well-nigh gone.

Tankas and Haikais.

A History of Japanese Literature. By W. G. Aston, C.M.G., D.Litt. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THIS is a timely book on a most interesting subject. It is curious, indeed, that it has never been written before. Japan has influenced our art for years, and our comic stage for more than one season, but hitherto, save for a few experts, Japanese literature has been an unworked field. Mr. Aston proves conclusively that this is not on account of its barrenness, for the poetry at least of this singular folk has qualities which, for all its limitations, are very well deserving of attention. Of course, we cannot profess to follow Mr. Aston critically, but he is a recognised authority on his subject, and we can at any rate bear testimony to the order and lucidity of his presentation, and the gracefulness of his translations. Our only complaint against him is that, a little preoccupied with the failure of Japanese poets to touch the deeper themes or develop the larger manners, he does not lay quite enough stress on the extraordinary merit of the best in what he has to show. However, that is doubtless better than gushing, and the poetry will assuredly make friends for itself. Taken all in all, it is remarkably like what Japanese design would have led us to expect—dainty, finished, decorative; darting with swallow-flights of song over the surface of things. And certainly quite irresponsible, averse to the less ornamental passions, and contenting itself for "fundamental brainwork" with that easiest and most obvious of philosophies, the gentle Horatian lament over the transiency of life. Mr. Aston's summary of its character and subjects is too admirable not to quote:

Japanese poetry is, in short, confined to lyrics, and what, for want of a better word, may be called epigrams. It is primarily an expression of emotion. We have amatory verse, poems of longing for home and absent dear ones, praise of love and wine, elegies on the dead, laments over the uncertainty of life. A chief place is given to the beauties of external nature. The varying aspects of the seasons, the sound of purling streams, the snow on Mount Frijji, waves breaking on the beach, seaweed drifting to the shore, the song of birds, the hum of insects, even the croaking of frogs, the leaping of trout in a mountain stream, the young shoots of the fern in spring, the belling of deer in autumn, the red tints of the maple, moon, flowers, rain, wind, mist, these are among the favourite subjects which the Japanese poet delights to dwell upon. If we add some courtly and patriotic effusions, a vast number of conceits more or less pretty, and a very few poems of a religious cast, the enumeration is tolerably complete. But, as Mr. Chamberlain has observed, there are curious omissions. Sunsets and starry skies, for example, do not appear to have attracted attention. War-songs, strange to say, are almost wholly absent. Fighting and bloodshed are apparently not considered fit themes for poetry.

The great age of Japanese poetry extends from the eighth to the twelfth century. Mr. Aston divides it into a brief introductory and a longer classical period. The elements of rhythm are very simple. There is no quantity, for all the vowels have the same length value, and they are nearly all open; no rhyme, and practically no accent. The two principal metres consist of alternating phrases of five and seven syllables each. In Naga-uta, or "long poetry," these may be continued to any length, and Naga-uta as used by Hitomaro in the eighth century, was the germ of a very decent medium for narrative and elegiac verse; but its development was checked by the extraordinary popularity of the "Tanka," a short poem strictly limited to five phrases or lines of 5, 7, 5, 7, and 7 syllables—31 syllables in all. Tanka writing became an almost universal accomplishment, and by far the larger number of the writers were women. This is, perhaps, a unique literary fact, and is explained by the tendency of educated men in the eighth century to write not in Japanese, but in Chinese. Tankas, however, were sometimes written in series, and then become practically stanzas of a lyrical poem. Here are some Tankas by Akahito, the great rival of Hitomaro, on the Spring :

On the plum blossoms
Thick fell the snow ;
I wished to gather some
To show to thee,
But it melted in my hands.
The plum blossoms
Had already been scattered,
But notwithstanding
The white snow
Has fallen deep in the garden.

Among the hills
The snow still lies—
But the willows
Where the torrents rush together
Are in full bud.

O thou willow
That I see every morn,
Hasten to become a thick grove
Whereto the nightingale
May resort and sing.
Before the wind of spring
Has tangled the fine threads
Of the green willow—
Now I would show it
To my love.

The Tanka continued to be the normal form of poetry throughout the "classical" period ; but when, after an age of decline and darkness, literature revived in the seventeenth century, an even slighter art took its place. The Haikai is a Tanka minus its last two phrases, and must, therefore, be complete within the short compass of seventeen syllables. One of the earliest Haikais is the following :

Thought I, the fallen flowers
Are returning to their branch ;
But, lo ! they were butterflies.

Is it not like a fan ? But the greatest master of this very real art was one Matsura Basho. Of him the following story is told. Travelling in the country he came to a spot where a party of rustics were drinking saké and composing the fashionable Haikais. They had chosen the full moon for their subject ; and taking Basho for a begging Buddhist priest, they urged him, for fun, to contribute. Basho, with feigned reluctance, began :

'Twas the new moon —

"The new moon ! What a fool this priest is !" cried one.
"The poem should be about the full moon." "Let him go on," said another ; "it will be all the more sport."
Basho, undisturbed by the mockery, went on :

'Twas the new moon !
Since then I waited—
And, lo ! to-night !

The rustics were amazed ; and, when Basho revealed his identity, apologised for their rudeness to an eminent man, "whose fragrant name was known to the whole world." Here are some more of Basho's Haikais :

An ancient pond !
With a sound from the water
Of the frog as it plunges in.
I come aweary,
In search of an inn—
Ah ! these wistaria flowers.

'Tis the first snow—
Just enough to bend
The gladiolus leaves !

In prose, the Japanese, strongly under the influence of the voluminous and pedantic Chinese, have done less well. The learned Matoöri, who composed a treatise on Japanese grammar, certainly did not emulate the conciseness of the Tankas and Haikais, for Mr. Aston records that the seven volumes of the work have been compressed into seven pages of English without material loss. The Makuri Zöshi, or "Pillow Sketches," of Sei Shönagon are perhaps the best examples of classical prose. These display a pretty style, and a genuine observation both of nature and of court life.

In spring [the author says] I love to watch the dawn grow gradually whiter and whiter, till a faint rosy tinge crowns the mountain's crest, while slender streaks of purple cloud extend themselves above.

In summer I love the night, not only when the moon is shining, but the dark too, when the fireflies cross each other's paths in their flight, or when the rain is falling.

The Japanese carry the principles of economy and restraint which govern their art into the conduct of life also. The philosophy of doing without finds characteristic expression in the following maxims, from the Tsure-dzure-gusa of Kenkō :

THINGS WHICH ARE IN BAD TASTE.

Too much furniture in one's living room.
Too many pens in a stand.
Too many Buddhas in a private shrine.
Too many rocks, trees, and herbs in a garden.
Too many children in a house.
Too many words when men meet.
Too many books in a book-case there can never be, nor too much litter in a dust-heap.

The value of bare spaces and silence is the real lesson of Japan. Hakuseki records of his father, a gentleman of the old school, that "the room he occupied he kept cleanly swept, had an old picture hung on the wall, and a few flowers which were in season set out in a vase. He would spend the day looking at them." As to the humorist Ikku, the Japanese Dickens, "his house lacked even the scanty furniture which is considered necessary in Japan. He, therefore, hung his walls with pictures of the missing articles." You cannot call them a materialistic folk. On the other hand, they are grossly indecent, and most of their lighter literature, especially in the modern period, is spoilt by this. An exception, however, is Bakin, the most popular novelist of the century, who died in 1848 after completing two hundred and ninety works !

U.S.A.

A Short History of the United States. By Justin Huntly McCarthy. (Hodder & Stoughton. 1898. 6s.)

ENGLISH people are astonishingly ignorant of American history—almost as ignorant as they are of the history of the British Rule in India. And yet the expansion of America and the conquest of India are the two biggest achievements of the Anglo-Saxon race. Anyone, therefore, who writes a book on American history which the British public will read is a benefactor to the English-speaking people on both sides of the Atlantic. Not that such are wanting. Within the last three or four years two short histories of the United States have been published in England—one by a distinguished Englishman, Mr. Goldwin Smith, who, to his country's loss, has now for many years watched American politics from the vantage ground of a Canadian home ; the other by the eminent American historian, Prof. Channing, of Harvard, which has found a place in Prof. Prothero's "Cambridge Historical" series. Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy has traversed the same ground ; and the size of his book challenges a comparison of his work with that of his two recent predecessors. To our thinking his place is third on the list ; he is neither so full as the American writer, nor so fair as the old Oxford Professor of History in his treatment of the English side of questions between the two countries. Printer and binder have both done their part admirably; the paper, type and neat buckram binding leave nothing to be desired in these important particulars. The author, too, is a man of letters, and knows how to distribute his abundant material. He has produced a book which is certainly readable, and in these days of book-making that is no slight praise. But for all that, we are by no means contented either with his style or with his treatment of the subject matter.

Clear and to the point as are the sentences in themselves, page after page is charged with a mannerism whose occasional employment in a public speech might be pointed and effective. Two illustrations taken at random will suffice. "The States of America were free. The States of America had asserted and maintained their independence. The States of America were avowedly united." Again, a few pages further on, of Washington's retirement it is said: "He was growing old. He was growing deaf. He wanted rest. He retired to Mount Vernon to end his days. He issued a farewell address to his fellow-citizens which remains one of the monuments of American wisdom, American statesmanship, and American eloquence."

For English readers the subject-matter of American history falls into four more or less distinct periods—the days of colonisation, the War of Independence, the expansion westwards, and the Civil War. Writing for readers on this side of the Atlantic, Mr. McCarthy, perhaps not unnaturally, devotes the greater part of his space to such events as the War of Independence (pp. 80-168), the second war with England in 1812 (only eight pages, but otherwise out of proportion to the general scale and its own intrinsic importance), and the Civil War (pp. 231-302). The whole history of the years 1783-1860 is dismissed in sixty pages. Rather more than half the book is devoted to the history of the colonies as such. It is a very important piece of our own history, but it is not the history of the United States. It is almost as if Mr. Freeman's five volumes on the Norman Conquest had been labelled "The History of the English People." Moreover, the story has been now so often told, that unless a writer has anything new to tell us, or intends to deal with the War of Independence as an episode in itself, he would do well to cut the matter short, and to devote the greater part of his space to the marvellous development of the American people since they became a nation—a portion of history of which even educated Englishmen know next to nothing. As it is, the sixty pages in which this wonderful development is sketched are far too general and too allusive for the readers who are likely to take up Mr. McCarthy's book. Comparatively little is said about the many crucial financial questions which American politicians had to face in those early years of their national history. The doctrine of "nullification" and "wild cat" banks—to take two important technical points—are introduced into the narrative with little or no explanation of their precise meaning. Daniel Webster is described as "the first of the Federalists so long as the name of Federalist was worn by the new generation—the first of the Whigs when the name shifted to that venerable relic of English political phraseology." He is rightly said to have desired the Presidency, and to have been denied the gratification of his desire. But the glowing eulogium is not spoilt by any allusion to the fact that, in order to attain his end, the hero "ratted" on the all-important question of slavery.

Finally, in our opinion, Mr. McCarthy is grossly unfair to the English side in the three important controversies between Englishmen and Americans. During the state of tension arising out of the Venezuelan imbroglio, many examples were given in the English press of the version of their revolt from the mother-country which is taught in American schools. The Americans would find little to hurt their national pride in Mr. McCarthy's account. "That the bond did not endure was entirely the fault of the mother-country" is his concise opinion; and he talks of the "angry imperialism" of the Government officials. We would rather learn our history from Prof. Seeley. "The final breach," says the late Cambridge professor, "was provoked not so much by the pressure of England upon the colonies as by that of the colonies upon England"; and he points out that the taxes which we imposed were for the object of paying a debt which we had incurred on their behalf; while Mr. Lecky has made it clear that much of the action of the home Government in this and other dealings with the colonies was due to the inter-colonial jealousies which prevented any concerted action in aid of the mother-country among the thirteen settlements themselves. Truly, as Prof. Seeley says, the American grievances "were smaller than ever before or since which led to such mighty consequences." We should have liked to speak of Mr. McCarthy's extremely partial exposition of the English case in the War of 1812, and of his most imperfect account of the English attitude during the Civil War. For a fair statement of the latter we will, at least, refer him to the lucid account in his father's History of Our Own Times. But enough has been said to show that, although the author has produced a very readable book, English readers will not, and should not, be content with his version of American history.

Indian Folk Legends.

Creation Myths of Primitive America. By Jeremiah Curtin. (Williams & Norgate.)

A VERY interesting collection of the Märchen or folk-tales of the Indians of California. The dramatis persone are all taken either from the animal world or from the personifications of natural phenomena usual in tales of this kind, while enough is introduced about the origins of things to justify, at any rate, the first part of Mr. Curtin's title. The stories are stamped, too, with the love of the grotesque, which seems to be instinctive with the American aborigine, and in many cases afford valuable glimpses of Indian manners. Nothing, for instance, can be more fantastic than the story of "Hawt," where the spotted trout gives a musical party to all the flute-players of the universe, and the prize is taken by the lamprey, who converts himself into a flute by drawing in breath through his sucker-like mouth and converting the marks on his sides into keys. During this performance the other guests are the green snake, three kinds of deer, the jackass rabbit, the coyote, the weasel, the yellowhammer and blue jay, and—most incongruously—the Polar Star. Equally amusing, too, is the stately courtesy of the host, who tells his guests at the close that "they are free to stay longer," but that he supposes they are in a hurry, and the tact of the guests who understand that they have stayed long enough, and that the trout only spoke as he did "because he wished to say something nice to us and be friends." We are sorry to find that the poor trout's duty as master of the house led him to eat manzanita berries, lest people should think he was setting before them "bad food," and that these berries caused him to break out for the first time into red, yellow, and black spots in consequence of his "spirit" being "afraid of the berries" and not wishing that he should eat things which were not his food. Evidently the spirit knew nothing of the exigencies of hospitality.

While the stories are in themselves both interesting and amusing, it is plain that their collector would like them to be considered as a serious contribution to the science of religions, or, at the least, of folk-lore. We are afraid that they are hardly likely to be thus taken by instructed persons, because the form in which they are presented to us is the reverse of scientific. We gather from a sort of excursus appended to the book that all the tales appeared in the New York Sun of 1895, having been obtained ad hoc from two tribes of Californian Indians called the Wintus and the Yanas. The latter tribe, once numbering three thousand men, were practically exterminated in 1864 by a most cruel massacre perpetrated by Mr. Curtin's countrymen, of which he gives the details, and for which he shows a proper sense of horror. He seems, therefore, to have gathered his information from the fifty survivors who escaped the massacre or their descendants, and had therefore no large field for investigation. With regard to the Wintus, who seem, from an incidental remark in the notes, to belong to the despised caste of "diggers," he only tells us, though without any evidence for the statement, that they possessed the Sacramento Valley before the coming of the white men. He does not tell us whether he obtained these tales from one or two Indians only, or whether he has any evidence that they form the tradition of the whole tribe, nor what language was used in the narration. Neither does he give us any clue to the racial affinities of the Wintus, whether the Sacramento Valley was supposed by them to be their first seat, nor how long and to what extent they have been in contact with white men. This is the more to be regretted because, while there are many incidents in the tales, such as the magic power attributed to the green snake (compare the Mexican culture-god Quetzalcoatl, or "serpent clothed in green feathers") and the predominant part played by the humming-bird (the favourite form of Huitzilopochtli, the Mexican war-god) which point to their having come from the south, there are yet others, such as death coming on the world as the result of disobedience to the Creator's injunctions, the defeat of an army owing to the gnawing of their bowstrings by mice, and a bridge between earth and heaven made out of a single hair, which seem to point as plainly to an Oriental origin. The vocabulary which is prefixed to each tale is singularly inconsistent, proper names which have a certain meaning assigned to them in one tale being often marked as of "unknown" significance in the next, and might with profit be replaced by a glossary at the end of the book. On the other hand, there is prefixed to the book a rather windy introduction, in which Mr. Curtin makes unsupported assertions as to Aryan, Semitic, and Egyptian "thought," and on the superior antiquity of what he is pleased to call "the American system," which can only excite a smile in the learned. It is a thousand pities that he did not, instead of indulging in "spread-eagleism" of this kind, ask the aid of distinguished American anthropologists like Prof. Cyrus Thomas and Dr. Brinton. Had he done so, and had he—as we have no doubt he would have been able to do—successfully verified the provenance of his tales, he might have produced a book as valuable to the scientific as it should prove amusing to the general reader.

God did not make her very wise,
But carved a strangeness round her mouth;
He put her great sorrow in her eyes,
And softness for men's souls in drouth,
And on her face, for all to see,
The seal of awful tragedy.

God did not make her very fair
But white and lithe and strange and sweet;
A subtle fragrance in her hair,
A slender swiftness in her feet,
And in her hands a slow caress:
God made these for my steadfastness.

God did not give to her a heart,
But there is that within her face
To make men long to muse apart
Until they goodness find and grace,
And think to read and worship there
All good: yet she is scarcely fair.

THE STORY OF ROUEN.

By T. A. COOK.

The historian of Rouen has no lack of material. The city's association with the Duke who was to overthrow Harold and conquer England is almost proof enough of that. William the Conqueror is indeed the dominant figure in the long roll of great men who file through this well-packed, brilliant little book. Some of Mr. Cook's best chapters deal with him. "He rose above the coarse, laughter-loving, brutal, treacherous Norman barons of his time by the force of his own personal genius, and the acuteness of his own strong intellect." The fiery nature of the man and the part played by material fire in his career is brought out in a way we do not remember to have seen before: "A comet flamed across the sky of Europe in the year of the great Duke's conquest. Amid fire and tumult he was crowned at Westminster. Upon the glowing ashes of Nantes he met his death wound. Through burning streets he was borne to his burial." The plan of the "Medieval Towns" series is a most interesting one, combining as it does equal attention to imperial and social history, topography, architecture, and, indeed, whatever is noteworthy. As there is no town of any consequence with a record old enough to qualify it for admission into this series which does not yield bountiful opportunities to an intelligent writer, it follows that these volumes cannot be anything but interesting. The author who made one dull would be a magician. Mr. Cook is not a magician, and his book is a most readable narrative of splendour and squalor, magnificence and turpitude, quaintness and beauty. Among his researches in the town Mr. Cook came upon a charming old madrigal, which has been arranged for the piano by Mr. Fuller Maitland, and adds attraction to the book. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)

A STUDY OF WAGNER.

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

The character of any emotional artist is apt to evade us when we seek to realise its actuality; but few figures are more elusive than that of Wagner. He could crowd his musical scores with an incredible wealth of fascination, and yet would often give to his singers no more than an ugly and difficult sequence of chromatics; he could write criticism glowing with insight, yet has left us volumes of tedious rhapsody, difficult even to understand. But when we get most impatient of him, we have but to hear again one of his master-scores to forgive everything to this man who so had it in his power to exhaust for our delight the resources of beauty. Not only to musicians, but to all who are interested in studying so strange and wayward a character, Mr. Newman's book will certainly appeal. It is patient in its research and lucid in its English; it displays both a fine knowledge of aesthetics and a broad grasp of psychology; its writer can use both the artistic and the scientific method, and neither in vain; but this much can be said (we hope) of many a modern-day critic. The real achievement of Mr. Newman's book is due to something beyond his admirable care and training; it lies in the profound insight with which he unfolds and displays to us the peculiar characteristics of the real Wagner, showing how the apparent vagaries and contradictions of the artist all have their consistent place in the organisation of one of the most singular and attractive personalities who ever fascinated the world of art. Nor was this a work of supererogation. Probably no artist ever provoked so much controversy as Wagner; and this very fact has served to obscure the true characteristics of his genius. Amid a whole library of pamphlets, treatises, and volumes upon the Wagner question, we seek almost in vain for an impartial investigation or a truly critical attitude. Indiscriminate blame has been combated by indiscriminate eulogy, till the truth seemed to be for ever drowned in the clamour. Mr. Newman is to be congratulated upon the fact that by a temperate, scholarly method, combined with a highly sensitive artistic judgment, he has shown us the grandeur of Wagner's art without distorting the picture by excesses of banal praise or fatuous blame. And the extreme Wagnerites will do themselves grave wrong if they carp at Mr. Newman's often unsparing analysis. Far more moving and eloquent than any number of pages of mere adulation is the chapter in which this most sane critic, after rigorously searching out the blemishes in the method, concludes that, despite all faults, "Wagner has made his drama a living thing that can stand unashamed among the finest artistic products of all the ages." (Dobell. 12s.)

CAMEOS FROM ENGLISH HISTORY. BY C. M. YONGE.

The foundation of a scholarship at the Winchester High School in commemoration of her splendid record reminds us that Miss Yonge is one of those who love their work too well to lay it down in the evening of life. Miss Yonge has written nearly forty novels, and many miscellaneous books besides, yet her pen goes on and on. She has just completed the ninth series of her "cameos" from English history, her subject this time being the eighteenth century. Forty "cameos" are selected, the first being "Methodism" (1730). Among the others we notice "Clive and Duplex," "Men of Letters, 1763-1770," "The Boston Tea-Fight," "The Wilkes Prosecutions," "The Gordon Riots," "The Siege of Gibraltar," "The Slave Trade," and various "cameos" illustrating the progress of the French Revolution. Readers of Miss Yonge will know what to expect, and they will not be disappointed. (Macmillan. 5s.)

THE EARLY VALOIS QUEENS. BY CATHERINE BEARNE.

This is a book for the descendants of the readers of Miss Strickland. We do not find much charm of style in Mrs. Bearne's account of the three Valois queens, Jeanne de Bourgogne, Blanche de Navarre, and Jeanne de Auvergne et de Boulogne. The very first sentence of her book is turgid and difficult to read. But Mrs. Bearne improves greatly when a battle or some moving incident is to be described. Then her style warms to its work. Thus, in her account of the Battle of Poitiers we alight on vigorous, clean-cut English like this: "Then the knight went forward and stood before the Prince's division, in the place where the ravine came down to the plain. And with him went four valiant esquires—Dutton of Dutton, Delves of Doddington, Fawlehurst of Crewe, and Hawtrestone of Wainehill—to assist him in the fight, to raise him if he fell, to carry him away if he were wounded, to avenge him if he were slain." (Unwin. 10s. 6d.)

FANTASTIC FABLES. BY AMBROSE BIERCE.

Mr. Bierce is an American writer of genuine if somewhat uncouth power, as readers of his Tales of Soldiers and Civilians will agree. He is, however, over sombre as a satirist. In these cynical fables, direct and forcible as many of them are, his spleen too often gets the better of him. Satire, to be attractive and operative, should be lighter and more playful. Mr. Bierce would also have done better had he made a small selection of his fables. We quote a typical example:

THE TWO POETS..

Two Poets were quarrelling for the Apple of Discord and the Bone of Contention, for they were very hungry.

"My sons," said Apollo, "I will part the prizes between you. You," he said to the First Poet, "excel in Art—take the Apple. And you," he said to the Second Poet, "in Imagination—take the Bone."

"To Art the best prize!" said the First Poet, triumphantly, and endeavouring to devour his award broke all his teeth. The Apple was a work of Art.

"That shows our Master's contempt for mere Art," said the Second Poet, grinning.

Thereupon he attempted to gnaw his Bone, but his teeth passed through it without resistance. It was an imaginary Bone.

(Putnam's. 3s. 6d.)

FUNAFUTI.

BY MRS. EDGEWORTH DAVID.

"To start with, we none of us knew where it was; but my husband said he was going, and politely hinted that I should be an idiot not to go with him." And so they went, and two "University students" and a married invalid couple went with them; and they took six workmen, and a vast store of provisions; and at last they all set foot on Funafuti. "What for? Why, to prove whether the great Darwin's coral atoll theory was true or not." Now Funafuti is a coral atoll in the Ellice group, and the work to be done consisted in boring to a great depth. This proved to be a long battle against difficulties, and the result is not yet known. A core of the reef was obtained, and is in the hands of scientific experts at South Kensington. Mrs. David is properly flippant on the subject, and is quite content to gossip at large about the work, and about the natives, who finally bade the party good-bye with ear-piercing cheers: "Ip, ip, ulla!" While containing little that is new, and not claiming to be a literary production, Mrs. David's book gives a pleasant and slightly harum-scarum account of a coral island in the Pacific. (Murray. 12s.)

EVAGRIUS. EDITED BY G. BIDEZ AND L. PARMENTIER.

The Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius, to give this volume its full title, is one of the new series of Greek texts of the Byzantine age, issued under the general editorship of Prof. G. B. Bury. Evagrius, whose history extends from A.D. 431 to A.D. 593, is one of the least wearisome of ecclesiastical historians, and gives us a lively picture of the amenities of theological controversy in his time. When Dioscuros, Bishop of Alexandria, asserted that the divine and human natures of Christ became after the baptism in Jordan one nature, the Emperor assembled a General Council at Chalcedon to try him. Dioscuros was found guilty of heresy, and one Proterius appointed in his place; but some time after the consecration of Proterius, the mob of Alexandria rose, roasted him, and ate him. Such is the account given by Evagrius of the beginning of the Monophysite controversy, which ultimately led to the cutting off of the Egyptian Church from communion with Rome. But there can be little doubt that the quarrel which began in the time of Charles Kingsley's friend Cyril was really due to the determination of the Egyptian clergy to settle their doctrine without State interference. The present volume is well printed (although we could wish that the fount used for the rubrics could have been used throughout), and excellently edited by the two learned Belgians whose names are given above. (Methuen.)

UNIVERSITY SERMONS.

BY H. MONTAGU BUTLER.

These twenty-six sermons by the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, are historical, biographical, and of a general character. They were preached, some to Harrow School, others before the University; others, again, were delivered on special occasions in St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and other public churches, and, as commenting upon events and persons of public importance, are addressed to a wider circle of hearers. There are panegyrics of Stanley, of Dean Vaughan, and of Gordon; a paean over the "glorious deliverance" of Waterloo, and the appropriate lesson of obedience deduced from the heroic imbecility of Balaclava; and the volume concludes with the sermon preached at Great St. Mary's at the hour when, in Westminster Abbey, the remnant of William Ewart Gladstone was given back to earth. In all of them breathes the spirit most characteristic of the great religious communion of which the preacher is a distinguished son: the spirit of wide tolerance, of ready acceptance of the natural virtues—of courage, of continence, of simplicity. And their language is clear and dignified, and resonant with the music of the English Bible. (Macmillan & Bowes.)

Fiction.

A Daughter of the Vine. By Gertrude Atherton.
(Service & Paton. 6s.)

Mrs. ATHERTON's new story has the merit of being extremely interesting. It falls naturally into two portions—the one gay, bright, fascinating; the other sad, terrible, and incredible. The story purports to be the wretched life history of a dipsomaniac, Nina Randolph, a charming Californian girl, in the days just before the Civil War, her love affair, her illegitimate child, and her ultimate unspeakable degradation that ended only with her death. By turns the tale is delightful, hopeless, horrible, and irritating. Now, the study of a dipsomaniac is a quite permissible theme for fiction, and it is possible to work out the idea delicately and in such tones and half-tones as to be quite convincing to the reader. This was done in the case of Poor Nellie, a dipsomaniac study of considerable power published some years ago. That Mrs. Atherton could do it to our entire satisfaction we have no doubt; but it is sad to think that a writer of such talent, through haste, or impatience, or indifference, should be content with such a series of improbabilities as disfigure the latter portion of the book. As a general rule, the reviewer who says dogmatically, "This is impossible," or "That is contrary to human nature," rushes in where wiser critics fear to tread. But the probabilities of life must be observed, and a writer who chooses to depict the abnormal must make every effort to convince the reader. We cannot believe in Nina's mother—a fiend, if ever there was one—who sets herself to ruin her child, body and soul, from the cradle upwards; or in Nina's attitude of mind towards her baby; or in her marriage to a man whose face she slapped on the day he proposed to her. Here is the passage. After she has accepted him, the happy man says:

"Suppose Mr. Thorpe [lover No. 1] should come out here after you, anyhow, married or not."

"He will do nothing of the sort. One reason, you would be incapable of understanding, should I attempt to explain; the other is, that he will no longer want me after I have been the wife of a person of your sort."

"My word, Nina, you are rather rough on a fellow; but give me a kiss, and I'll overlook it."

She lifted her face, and let him kiss her, then struck him so violent a blow that the little man staggered.

"Now go," she said, "and don't let me see you again until the eleventh. If you have anything to say, you can write it to Molly Shropshire."

When he had gone, she drew her hand across her lips, then looked closely at it as if expecting to see a stain.

Yet, as we have said, the story is extremely interesting. Than the opening chapters, dealing with the joyous life in old California, its flirtations, its fun, its quick life where everybody was young and every girl a princess, we ask nothing better. Mrs. Atherton can do this well, for her power of characterisation is vivid, her narrative agile, and she can give the atmosphere of a place; but we beg to remind her that she has now reached a stage of her career when she must take more pains to construct her story, and check her abundant imagination by a shrewder and more mature observation of the realities of life. Then she may write a really good, possibly a really great, novel.

Young Lives. By Richard Le Gallienne.
(Arrowsmith. 6s.)

THIS is Mr. Le Gallienne's third novel, and, taken with those that preceded it—The Quest of the Golden Girl and The Romance of Zion Chapel—it shows us clearly what are his powers and limitations in fiction. It shows us that for the delineation of a certain type of young man, a product of the past two decades, Mr. Le Gallienne has considerable gifts. The young man is of the Nonconformist middle-classes. His home is strict and pious. His own bent, however, is for poetry and gladness. He is frank, impulsive, enthusiastic, generous, warm-hearted, intolerant of all that is dull and mechanical, and very tolerant of whatever is "done beautifully," however it may conflict with the moral code. He is an agnostic, with leanings towards elaborate ritual; a busy but superficial reader, his gods being Keats and Pater; a dilettante in art, the last word being found in the pictures of Rossetti and Burne-Jones. A sentimentalist, he can adore many young women at once; and in rhyming "love" and "dove" and "bosom" and "blossom" he is expert. If he knew more he would perhaps be more admirable, but far less "lovable"; and to be "lovable" is his end in life. That is the type of young man to which we refer, a type which at this moment is common in London and in all the great towns all over the country; and it is this young man whom Mr. Le Gallienne can set down with precision and literary skill. And as we said last week, in noticing another new novel, every work that accurately reproduces a type is a contribution of real value to fiction.

Mr. Le Gallienne is not a good novelist; he has neither the concentration nor the dramatic power needful. He is always the essayist a-story-telling, glad of an opportunity to digress. But though he has little to tell in the book before us, and though it moves spasmodically and ends anywhere, we can imagine a great many simple people reading it with pleasure. Especially in the provinces will it be enjoyed. The tone is bright and sunny, and the characters are pretty and gay. But the readers will have to be simple, we fear, because, with the exception of the type, who rings true, there is a great deal of chocolate-box unreality about the story. Baptist ministers, for example, on whose shelves is "all the most exquisite literature of doubt," are not really named Chrysostom Trotter. It is largely these wilful little perversions of fact, which Mr. Le Gallienne always indulges in, that keep sophisticated readers from his works. But for their especial benefit, we take it, the author has inserted in this story a chapter d'elef, describing a certain literary set whom his hero meets in the rooms of an enterprising publisher. Mr. Le Gallienne here hits round him with spirit, sparing not even himself. We quote a passage:

Presently there entered a tall young man with a long thin face, curtained on each side with enormous masses of black hair—like a slip of the young moon glimmering through a pine wood.

At the same moment there entered, as if by design, his very antithesis, a short, firmly-built, clerically fellow, with a head like a billiard-ball in need of a shave, a big brown moustache, and enormous spectacles.

"That," said the publisher, referring to the moon-in-the-pine-wood young man, "is our young apostle of sentiment, our new man of feeling, the best-hated man we have; and the other is our young apostle of blood. He is all for muscle and brutality—and he makes all the money. It is one of our many fashions just now to sing 'Britain and Brutality.' But my impression is that our young man of feeling will have his day—though he will have to wait for it. He would hasten it if he would cut his hair; but that, he says, he will never do. His hair is his battle-cry; and hair, too, he says, is a gift. Well, he enjoys himself—and loves a fight, though you mightn't think it to look at him."

In laying Young Lives aside, we cannot honestly say it has interested us; but it is innocent and bright and young, and it is written with care.

Love and Olivia. By Margaret B. Cross.
(Hurst & Blackett.)

To quote the concluding passages of Love and Olivia is to make the book criticise itself.

He is a man of considerable fame, and is credited with spoiling his wife, yet there are acute persons who have observed that Mrs. Joliffe's first glance is for her husband's approbation. Whatever the truth may be, they are a charming and interesting couple, and their house is one of the most agreeable in London. There is only one shadow upon the brightness of Olivia's lot. Sometimes when she meets George and his wife—and Violet enjoys all the happiness her brother could have wished for her—when she meets George, who has grown stout and prosperous and—she cannot but admit it—commonplace, she feels a little twinge of remorse, and wonders if she ought to be so happy. But then she had ever a very tender conscience.

Dealing with the world of cultivated professional single women, and written by one thoroughly familiar with that world, this story fairly represents a large class of modern novels, both as to incident and as to atmosphere. Olivia (lecturer) is betrothed to George (traveller and pioneer). There are also Leslie (critic and scholar), and Violet (a bright and youthful and rather ordinary girl). Olivia marries Leslie, and George marries Violet. As for the atmosphere, it is tepid. There is no single trace of strong feeling throughout the book. The writing is discreetly literary, with a few slips. For instance, "Olivia looked up at George, and said under cover of the noi—music" is quite inexcusable. The construction of the book is weak, and sometimes clumsy. Love and Olivia is pretty: it can scarcely be called successful. Had it contained a little less fancy and a little more imagination, the verdict upon it might have been different.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

A DOUBLE THREAD.

BY ELLEN T. FOWLER.

All who read Concerning Isabel Carnaby, one of the most successful novels published last year, will open Miss Fowler's new story with interest. It is a long and calm book of modern life and manners, with many characters and few incidents. The interest revolves around an heiress, beautiful and cynical, who leads a double life, and is loved in one condition, not in the other. Much of the dialogue tends to the epigrammatic, and the end is peace. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

A DUET.

BY A. CONAN DOYLE.

This is a departure for the author of Micah Clarke and The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes. Faithfully and with much detail Dr. Conan Doyle depicts the first year's married life of a typical middle-class young man and young woman of to-day, from the last month of the courtship to the birth of a son. On the way are certain misunderstandings and troubles, but all is clear in the end. The tone of the book is the tone of actual suburban life. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

SPIES OF THE WIGHT.

BY HEADON HILL.

Another contribution to the new school of political romance. The Wight is the Isle of Wight, whither goes the hero, a young journalist, to track and frustrate the Braggart of Berlin, a German plotter named Von Holtzmann, an enemy of Great Britain. Such adventures follow as were bound to follow, and in the end the journalist triumphs. Incidentally, he wins "the sweetest wife in all the world." (Pearson. 3s. 6d.)

UNHOLY MATRIMONY.

BY JOHN LE BRETON.

A painful, powerful story of a loveless marriage. The Rev. David Collier takes a party of East End children and women helpers into the country, and loses his way in the woods in company with a strapping young woman. The two miss the train back. There is a great scandal, and the curate offers Rose Spenway marriage. The story is concerned with his lifelong ruing of his union with a crafty and low-minded woman. The tragedy is well worked out, and is not unrelieved with humour. (Macquene. 6s.)

A FAIR FRAUD.

BY MRS. LOVETT CAMERON.

This story by the author of In a Grass Country has not so much of the hunting-field in it as some of the author's other novels. Nevertheless it opens with the characteristic sentence: "The horses were eating their heads off in the stables and Marion was eating her heart out in the house." The love-story concerns the attempt of the unscrupulous widow of a convict to get her daughter well married. A well woven, interesting novel. (John Long. 6s.)

PROFESSOR HIERONIMUS.

BY AMALIE SKRAM.

Amalie Skram (née Müller) is a Norwegian novelist of naturalistic tendencies. Indeed, she is bracketted with Zola. But in this story, translated by Alice Stronach and G. B. Jacobi, that which is usually understood by the term naturalism is not evident. The book relates with grim minuteness the experiences of a sane woman kept against her will in a lunatic asylum, and it follows that it is sombre reading. (Lane. 6s.)

THE MIRACLES OF ANTI-CHRIST.

BY SELMA LAGERLÖF.

A new story by the author of Gosta Berling's Saga, translated by Miss Flach. The matter is, however, very different, although the manner remains the same. "Anti-Christ" stands for socialism. By a series of curious, picturesque, and spasmodic circumstances the author makes her meaning clear, but the book is not the easy reading that Gosta Berling offered. (Gay & Bird. 6s.)

BRASS.

BY NELLIE K. BLISSETT.

A satirical novel of the day, with a new kind of villain, or what serves for villain, in the person of an English Cardinal. Cardinals, of course, have plotted in fiction ere this again and again, but Miss Blissett's crafty Uberto is the first we remember in an English novel for a long time. The story is garnished with a more or less caustic commentary on things in general. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

ESPIRITU SANTO.

BY HENRIETTA D. SKINNER.

Once more we have a tenor for a hero. There is also a baritone in the book, a "King of Operatic Song," who wears a hair shirt and scourges himself. The story, which, like the baritone, is a blend of music and religion, has place in Paris, chiefly among the Spanish and Italian residents. It is delicately written. The appeal is neither to those who do their reading running nor to those who cannot be interested in Catholicism. (Harper. 6s.)

THE PRIDE OF THE FAMILY.

BY ETHEL FORSTER HEDDLE.

The plot of this story turns on the familiar theme of a lost family mansion and its recovery by marriage. A pleasant tale. (Bowden. 6s.)

THE GOLDEN SCEPTRE.

BY GERALD H. THORNHILL.

Another novel with a mythical foreign principality. In the opening chapters we learn how Mr. Giles Brittain, special correspondent of the Evening Hooter, was mixed up with the fortunes of Queen Varna of Moritania. There are plenty of exciting improbabilities in the story, which is laid in Derbyshire. An earthquake, in which two foreign ministers perish, is introduced at the end of the book. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE DOOM OF SIVA.

BY T. W. SPEIGHT.

The plot is concerned with the rather familiar subject of the theft of a jewel from a Hindu temple. The thief is a pretended fakir, Chumda Ram by name, but the jewel passes into English hands and the author has had no difficulty in weaving a good story of love and adventure. The scene is England. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

COMRADES OF THE BLACK CROSS.

BY HUME NISBET.

This thoroughgoing story of crime opens with an escape from Dartmoor. Then we learn how the Rev. Apprasius Holt, with his sister, came to Arrowel, and, imposing on the real clergyman of the parish, preached a most elegant sermon while planning a burglary for the same evening. This is only one incident in a narrative compact of crime and Hooliganism. In the end the Rev. Apprasius Holt returns to Dartmoor, where he gives "his silvery voice to the prison choir." (F. V. White & Co. 3s. 6d.)

The Great Oxford Dictionary.

A National Undertaking.

AT a dinner given last year by the Vice-Chancellor in the hall of Queen's College to the chief workers on the new Historical English Dictionary, Dr. Murray declared that he saw no reason why the work should not be finished by the year 1908. The first volume, A and B, was issued in 1888; the most recent instalment, which brings it down to Hod, appeared on the 2nd of January of this year. The mere conception of such an undertaking is enough to impress a man's mind; and that so colossal a work should have been resolutely carried out and be now within sight of completion argues a remarkable diligence and organising power on the part of its projectors.

The story of its projection is by this time an oft-told tale. A resolution of the Philological Society, passed in 1857 at the instigation of Archbishop Trench, provided for the collection on the part of the members of various materials to illustrate the history of words. Among such collectors were Dr. Trench himself, Dr. Furnivall, Mr.

Herbert Coleridge, Dr. Guest, Prof. Dowden and Prof. Skeat. In 1878 upwards of two million quotations had been collected and arranged; and then Dr. Murray, on behalf of the Society, submitted his scheme to the Delegates of the Clarendon Press. It was only fitting that so important an undertaking should be entrusted to one of the greatest printing and publishing agencies in the world. The Oxford Press had been suppressed by Henry VIII. and re-established by Elizabeth. Its first great windfall was the presentation to it of the copyright of Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, from the profits of which the old Clarendon Buildings were erected. It possesses the jealously guarded secret of the Oxford India paper, and it can print works in more than sixty different tongues. It employs over a thousand persons, retains its own binders, builders and engineers, and manufactures its own material. Clearly so great a work as the new Dictionary, and one of which the returns must needs be so long delayed, could not be undertaken by any ordinary publishing house. It is to the eternal honour of the Delegates that they were willing to take the risk. At the present moment the University is over £50,000 out of pocket on what, after all, must be regarded as a great national undertaking.

The work in its present form was commenced in 1879, and at the same time an appeal was made for volunteers to collect instances. The appeal was liberally responded to, and in the course of three years nearly a million additional quotations had been amassed. The aim of the work is, in the words of the editor's preface, to "furnish an adequate account of the meaning, origin, and history of English words now in general use, or known to have been in use at any time during the last seven hundred years." Each use or variant it attempts to illustrate by a quotation. Hence it is not only a dictionary of English words: it is also a very effective dictionary of dialects. It forms a better Scottish dictionary than Jamieson's, and it enters largely into the domain which is to be covered by Dr. Wright's English Dialect Dictionary.

Dr. Murray's method has been to make lavish use of voluntary workers in the British Isles, the United States, and on the Continent. Thousands of unknown scholars, country clergymen, people with leisure and a taste for literature, have helped in supplying the enormous wealth of quotation. Mr. Henry Bradley is the chief of the philological department, and he has many able lieutenants, such as Mr. W. A. Craigie, who is well known as an authority on Scandinavian literature. Dr. Murray himself, while fulfilling the duties of general editor, has especial charge of the quotations. Anyone who has seen his scriptorium at Oxford, the walls lined with little pigeon-holes full of docketed papers, will understand what the genius of method means. But it is hardly possible for a stranger to fully estimate the difficulties of the work. No help was to be got from the work of predecessors, for this was the first attempt to "exhibit a combined logical and historical view of the sense-development of English words." The sole clue to the meaning of a word was often to be found in an obscure allusion, and the highest critical skill was necessary to bring light into the darkness. Again, the mere task of introducing order into the chaos of thousands of quotations involved endless labour. The nice questions, too, between what words are in use and what are obsolete, what words are pure English and what are dialectic or colloquialism, had to be faced and answered daily.

It is incredible [Dr. Murray has written] what labour has had to be expended sometimes to find out the facts for an article which occupies not more than five or six lines; or even to be able to put the words "derivation unknown" as the net outcome of hours of research, and the laborious testing of statements put forth without hesitation in other works.

And, above all, every word had to be defined, and every definition implied, at least, a modicum of knowledge of the class to which the thing denoted by the word belongs. On the matter the greatest authorities on each subject have been consulted; so that the Dictionary is more than a history of words: it is a treasure-house of exact definitions by competent men and women.

When Dr. Johnson wrote his famous preface, it was after the completion of a work which stands to this as a hillock to a mountain. It was the dictionary of a single great man, done by himself without aid from another. "My former dreams," he wrote, "were those of a poet doomed to wake a lexicographer. I soon found that it is too late to look for instruments when the work calls for execution, and that whatever abilities I had brought to my task, with those I must finally perform it. . . . I then contracted my design, determining to confide in myself, and no longer to solicit auxiliaries, which produced more incumbrance than assistance; by this I obtained at least one advantage, that I set limits to my work, which would in time be ended though not completed." The present Dictionary bids fair, when it ends, to be as near completion as mortal man can want. It is a triumph of collective energy and co-operation, of patience and method.

Do you know that the sight of your face
(Though I see you each day of the seven)
Can transfigure the commonest place
Into something that seems to be heaven?

"Wan Legends."

Mr. Swinburne on the Stage.

It was a comfortable audience that I found filling the St. George's Hall last Monday evening, when Mr. Swinburne's tragedy Loerine was presented by the Elizabethan Stage Society. There was smiling and handshaking and running to and fro, and much pretty doubt about seats. People stood, and consulted, and smiled intensely, and ran about to kindle their enthusiasms by the flash of each other's pince-nez glasses; and little groups formed, and some smiled because they were clever, some because they were not, and some were smart, and some were sworn to the higher doddiness. And all the while learned carriage-folk poured in, mothers, daughters, well-dined fathers, young men with long hair, men with opera hats, and men in soft hats—all improbably bent on Loerine. Mr. Swinburne has been writing dramatic poems for years and years; he has written ten. No one had ever dreamed of playing a single one of them. But these Elizabethan folk—on whom I looked, therefore, with amazement—had decreed, by some esoteric feat of exquisite selection, that Mr. Swinburne's tragedy, Loerine, should be played to them this Monday evening.

Well, it was played to them, and I hope they enjoyed it. My own enjoyment was small. An Elizabethan draught raked the stalls. Between the scenes strong men rose and huddled on their overcoats. This was a merely climatic evil. But as the play proceeded a great gulf fixed itself between my book and the stage. In the copy of Loerine with which I had equipped myself I found a poem; on the stage I saw only ladies and gentlemen. In my book I found fine lines; from the stage there came only sound and fury and the tinny rattle of accoutrements. Words were inaudible, or reached me only as a stagey gabble. On and on it went, this contradiction, this queer parallel between a living poem under my eye and an irrelevant spectacle on a level with it. And between my book and the footlights I surveyed ladies' heads swathed in shawls, like rose-bushes wrapped from the cold.

The acting of Loerine was not only poor—of that I do not so much complain—it was wrongly conceived. Here was a drama so poetical in form that two whole scenes are written in sonnet sequences, and the rest in systems of rhyme more or less complex. Now there is only one way in which such a poetical drama can be made acceptable to an audience. It should be recited, not acted. This need not exclude simple costume, and such elementary scenery as were used last Monday night. But the playing should not be more dramatic than the play. For here, as everywhere, the play's the thing; and if the play be no play, but a psychological dramatic poem, discursive and leisured, and as full of the poet's own by-play as of the essential story, why, then simple elocution is the one thing needed. Every word, every rhyme, every rhythmic device, every nuance of feeling and expression should be conveyed to the ear. Shouting and gestures and stage tricks can do nothing to secure this; and the style of acting at St. George's Hall was more appropriate to an Adelphi drama than to the delicate work in hand.

For my part, I should have asked nothing better than to have been able to lean back in my seat and take in Mr. Swinburne's lines, his words, his thoughts. The proportion of these which reached us was miserably small. I should then have heard Sabrina's answer to her mother's question:

Dost thou understand,
Child, what the birds are singing?

SABRINA.

All the land
Knows that: the water tells it to the rushes
Aloud, and lower and softer to the sand:

The flower-fays, lip to lip and hand in hand,
 Laugh and repeat it all till darkness hushes
 Their singing with a word that falls and crushes
 All song to silence down the river-strand
 And where the hawthorns hearken for the thrushes.
 And all the secret sense is sweet and wise
 That sings through all their singing, and replies
 When we would know if heaven be gay or grey,
 And would not open all too soon our eyes
 To look perchance on no such happy skies
 As sleep brings close and waking blows away.

I should have heard the many low speeches of Estrild and Lochrine when that king was being hard pressed by his wife, and all his spirit was swayed and clouded by her threats of war.

LOCRINE.

Estrild,

Estrild!

ESTRILD.

No soft reiteration of my name
 Can sing my sorrow down that comes and goes
 And colours hope with fear and love with shame.
 Rose hast thou called me: were I like the rose,
 Happier were I than woman: she survives
 Not by one hour (like as of longer lives)
 The sun she lives in and the love he gives
 And takes away; but we, when love grows sere,
 Live yet, while trust in love no longer lives,
 Nor drink for comfort with the dying year,
 Death.

Miss Lilian McCarthy's rendering of Guendolen's part was careful, vigorous, talented. And yet—such was the rapidity with which she uttered and stageified the text—it was to my book, not to her, that I owed my appreciation of many fine lines, as these in which Guendolen is addressing Lochrine:

Dost thou know

What day records to day and night to night—
 How he whose wrath was rained as hail or snow
 On Troy's adulterous towers, when treacherous flame
 Devoured them, and our father's roofs lay low,
 And all their praise was turned to fire and shame—
 All-righteous God, who herds the stars of heaven
 As sheep within his sheepfold—God, whose name
 Compels the wandering clouds to service, given
 As surely as even the sun's is—loves or hates Treason?

To do Miss McCarthy justice, she delivered many of her lines well, and none better than the last in the poem. Looking down on her slain husband and the slain woman, her rival, Guendolen soliloquises:

The gods are wise who lead us—now to smite,
 And now to spare; we dwell but in their sight
 And work but what their will is. What hath been
 Is past. But these, that once were king and queen,
 The sun, that feeds on death, shall not consume
 Naked. Not I would sunder tomb from tomb
 Of these twain foes of mine, in death made one—
 I, that when darkness hides me from the sun,
 Shall sleep alone, with none to rest by me.
 But thou—this one time more I look on thee—
 Fair face, brave hand, weak heart that wast not mine—
 Sleep sound—and God be good to thee, Lochrine.
 I was not. She was fair as heaven in spring
 Whom thou didst love indeed. Sleep, queen and king, Forgiven; and if—God knows—being dead, ye live,
 And keep remembrance yet of me—forgive.

The performance overwhelmed the play. Yet it convinced me that these "wan legends" (as Mr. Swinburne calls them) of Geoffrey of Monmouth's mythical Britain could hold an audience if given with just the measure of dramatic art that is necessary for life and variety in the hearing. As it was, not a few people left the hall, and the longest haired Elizabethan present bolted after the second act.

Things Seen.

Italy.

THE doctor who stepped hurriedly into the hall, in response to my application, said: "You're just in time! He's a cheerful, curious little fellow—a Messenger Boy but—" and the doctor shook his head.

"How did the accident happen?" I asked.

"Run over by a van. He stopped to pat a dog that was crossing the road, and the shafts of the van caught him."

Then the doctor led me upstairs, and thence to a bed at the end of the ward. The boy greeted me with a smile, and said apologetically: "It was such a jolly dog, sir."

"And how are you?" I asked.

"Very comfy," he replied. "Ar'n't I lucky, master?"

I followed his eyes, which gazed through the upper panes of the tall window opposite. I thought of his poor broken body, of the pitiful end that was so near, and my eyes said: "Why do you call yourself lucky, little Messenger Boy?"

"Nobody else in the ward has got the sun bang opposite him, 'cept me," he said gleefully.

I looked again, and there, sure enough, high up, at the top of a huge building that abutted upon the hospital wall, was a patch of stray sunlight. He thought a little, then he said: "In Italy the sun always shines, doesn't it, master? I've seen Italy," and his face flamed with pride.

"How did you come to see Italy?" I asked, humoring him, for his strength was far spent. His eyes opened wide: "I was one of the Tourist Club at the Settlement, and they took us to Switzerland. And one day we walked from—from—I forget names—up and up and up, through snow and over rocks, on and on, till we crept round a hill and stood on a ledge of rock, and—and—(his eyes glistened, his breath came quickly)—I saw Italy. There was a great valley and lakes and white roads running by the side; and sunshine—golly, such sunshine! and the water of the lakes was all blue and sparkled; and on the tops of all the mountains was snow, and below them green trees. And there were goats, too, and sheep walking along the white roads in the sunshine. Not many boys have seen Italy, have they, sir?"

A spasm of pain shook him, but his eyes still held the memory of delight. I held his small hand for a moment, and then I left this child of the streets, who was so grateful to the life that had been so unkind to him. But he did not know it. He had a brave spirit, that little Messenger Boy who had seen Italy.

The Horizon.

BEFORE a newly-built villa in countrified Wembley I saw a carrier's cart bearing upon its side the name of a City van-man.

On a meadow by the house was the carrier's boy, running up and down like a mad thing, crying out "Fields, fields; trees, trees!" and stopping ever and again to look at the open view which stretched away to a distant peaceful horizon.

The carrier, seeing me, said with a grin: "'E ain't used to nothing like this, sir; there ain't much of this sort of thing in the Eastinjerdock-road! The Hisle o' Dawgs may be seaside, but it ain't rooral."

He whistled the lad to him. The youngster came up, crying out: "Father, what's that line drawn there?"

"Where, my boy?"

"There! right at the bottom of the sky?"

The man peered a moment and then said: "There ain't no line at all; that's only because you can't see no further." The lad stared, mystified; hitherto his horizon had been brickwork.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE great English love of gravity on all occasions is also American. Undeterred by the fate of Lord Beaconsfield, Lord Rosebery jested himself to doom as a leader; and now Mr. Choate, before he has been with us as American Ambassador for more than a few days, is beginning to realise what a funereal affair office really is. He has been condemned by the Press of New York for conduct unbecoming an ambassador and a statesman, and his guilt is written boldly on the front of his speech at the Associated Chambers of Commerce. The Sun advises him to "keep away from any festive gatherings," and to spend the saved time in "the study of public documents." The New York Times, after protesting against "questions of high policy being made the subject of after-dinner quips," suggests, with all gravity, that "the ideal ambassador to Great Britain would be a deaf mute." One begins to have a hint why the temperance cause makes slow progress: Sir Wilfrid Lawson is sometimes amusing. The dulness of members of Parliament is proverbial; but there are extenuating circumstances: "a laugh" might be seen by a constituent and cost the frivolous senator his seat. English statesmen must be hypocrites indeed in their professed devotion to the British Constitution if it is true that you do not really believe in anything until you are free to laugh at it a little; but that saying, being witty in its own way, has, of course, no credit in Parliamentary circles. The doctors have lately discovered the health-giving virtues of laughter; and as statesmen live long, and then do not die of chest disease, one is driven to the conclusion that they do laugh a little, if only in their sleeves.

THE judges have always tried to redeem the dulness of the Bench with jokes—very bad ones, but still jokes. But Mr. Justice Bucknill, a new hand, may perhaps find that he has presumed too far on the public tolerance. Received with great cordiality by his fellow Devonians in London, at their recent banquet, the judge said:

He would give them a tip. If a man who was not a Devonshire man were to fall in love with a Devonshire girl and were to break his promise, and that young lady wanted justice, just let her try it under the roof of the Law Courts in the Strand. And if she wanted a judge she should not go to Justice Kekewich, because he only dealt with equity, but go to the Common Law side, and only have Justice Bucknill. And whatever the merits of the case, if they did not happen to accord quite with the young lady's statement, justice would be blind.

Already the paragraph has been quoted in an Irish paper with a leer; in Paris it will be given as the set-off against the Dreyfus Case. For in Paris this week dulness has reached a climax in the criticism of the ACADEMY's collection of the man-in-the-street's ideas about Kipling. In France, we are solemnly assured, they submit nice literary questions to an Academician, not to an omnibus conductor. As well, cries the paragraphist, might the Parisian send down to consult the concierge on the merits of Mallarmé!

By the way, at this same Devonian banquet, the name of Mr. Kipling evoked the cheer of the evening. Nor was the allusion to the fact that Devon claims him as a school-boy; it was a chance reference made by Sir Courtney Ilbert to the chairman, Sir William White, as a naval constructor of monsters "which only the genius of Rudyard Kipling could describe."

THE Society of Women Journalists has performed many enterprising things. With its lectures, and what not, it has done its full share to amuse or to edify the public. But women's societies are always very much in earnest; and when the women journalists give entertainments other than informatory ones they give them to raise funds for the disabled and unlucky of their profession. Their kind-heartedness has brought them good luck. They have had a hundred or two pounds to hand over to women writers whose health has failed, or whose opportunities for work have been fitful or have ceased. But there are, it seems, women journalists who object. They are flourishing, and they see in the relief of the necessitous a stigma on their calling. "What does the society mean by invoking the aid of actresses?" asks Miss Frances Low. "The capable journalist," cries the successful Miss Billington, "requires no philanthropic aid, and, indeed, resents it." But if Miss Billington were not capable? or, being capable, had an incapacitating illness? "Every capable journalist can earn three pounds a week," is the testimony of another; but there, again, one has to say there are degrees of capacity. Miss Carpenter thinks a matinée for the sick and wounded woman journalist "most humiliating"; Miss Honor Morten, too, is hostile; and Miss Flora Shaw is hardly less irrelevant to the real issue when she merely says that she does not know that the Society exists. The comment of the mere man can only be that the successful woman journalist is unduly sensitive. It is no discredit to her that some of her colleagues are incompetent or unlucky; and that others who are clever and lucky wish to raise, by common and agreeable devices, a fund for the unfortunate. Artists, actors, musicians, have all of them their sick and wounded funds; and Sir Edward Poynter, Sir Henry Irving, and Sir Arthur Sullivan, instead of proclaiming to the world that they are not paupers, take the chair at dinners given in aid of their benevolent funds. Nobody has ever objected, not even a capable actress who could make three pounds a week and wanted the world to know it. Even if the criticism is one of method and not of principle, and deals with the rival merits of a dinner or a matinée, the procedure of the Society of Women Journalists seems to be very needlessly attacked.

THERE have been a good many consultations during the last few weeks among those responsible for the decoration of St. Paul's, and an official reply will shortly be made to the criticisms lately appearing in the daily press.

MR. LANE-FOX PITT and Lady Edith Douglas have had a sensation denied to most people—they have read the announcement that they are Buddhists. A good many English people have had a vague sort of reputation of having joined the ancient religions of the East; and some with a little more reason than that behind this last rumour. In the case of Byron it was absurd, and in that of Sir Richard Burton it was misinformed. In our day theosophy has been an undeniable link between the East and the West; and the "Light of Asia" has glimmered over London. It is hard to demand of a man, on the eve of his marriage, a profession of faith; but Mr. Lane-Fox Pitt, who has no second-hand knowledge of the East, would probably, if called upon, be quite willing to say that Christianity—and Buddhism too, for that matter—falls short of any true expression of the hearts of their founders. They are still of the world. Their followers do not serve each other all for love and nothing for reward; and the ideal of aloofness from earth is reached in perfection by only a few—some wandering Fakirs among the number. Mr. Lane-Fox Pitt is against the numbering of the people as of this religion or that; he is against nominalism, and he would deny the right of a man to join a religion he did not mean to live by. It is a little irony of fate, therefore, that he should have been himself made the subject of a startling religious census, and should have been announced to all the world as the thing he is not.

What America Reads.

AGAIN the American Bookman discloses to us the book preferences of Transatlantic readers. Its reports are made up to the end of February. Thirty lists in all are given, covering most of the great cities, but unaccountably omitting Boston. These lists show that the six most popular books in the United States and Canada at the present time are:

- The Day's Work. Rudyard Kipling.
- The Battle of the Strong. Gilbert Parker.
- Red Rock. T. N. Page.
- David Harum. E. N. Westcott.
- Aylwin. T. Watts-Dunton.
- Mr. Dooley. F. P. Dunne.

It is interesting to see that Mr. Kipling's Day's Work comes out first in popularity. Mr. Dooley is popular, but its satire has not driven romance into a corner.

The popularity of David Harum, which heads the list in no fewer than seven centres, is very noticeable. This novel is published in England by Messrs. Pearson. It is melancholy to think that its author, Edward Noyes Westcott, died before the public verdict had been pronounced on his work. He lived only long enough to finish the story, which is remarkable for its vigorous portrayal of an original and humorous type of character peculiar to central New York State.

We give below a few lists which seem to be typical or remarkable:

NEW YORK (DOWNTOWN).

1. Mr. Dooley. F. P. Dunne.
2. David Harum. E. N. Westcott.
3. The Day's Work. Rudyard Kipling.
4. The Battle of the Strong. Gilbert Parker.
5. Red Rock. T. N. Page.
6. Adventures of François. Weir Mitchell.

CHICAGO.

1. David Harum. E. N. Westcott.
2. Mr. Dooley. F. P. Dunne.
3. The Day's Work. Rudyard Kipling.
4. Red Rock. T. N. Page.
5. The Battle of the Strong. Gilbert Parker.
6. The Law of Psychic Phenomena. Thomson J. Hudson.

CINCINNATI.

1. Benner's Prophecies of the Ups and Downs of Prices.
2. When Knighthood was in Flower. E. Caskoden.
3. David Harum. E. N. Westcott.
4. Cyrano de Bergerac. E. Rostand.
5. Anglo-Saxon Superiority. E. Demolins.
6. Mr. Dooley. F. P. Dunne.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

1. Old Chester Tales. Margaret Deland.
2. David Harum. E. N. Westcott.
3. Mr. Dooley. F. P. Dunne.
4. Castle Inn. S. Weyman.
5. The Day's Work. Rudyard Kipling.
6. Aylwin. T. Watts-Dunton.

TORONTO, CANADA.

1. With Kitchener to Khartum. G. W. Stevens.
2. Aylwin. T. Watts-Dunton.

6. The Day's Work. Rudyard Kipling.

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 24.

A PUBLISHING firm (we wrote last week) is just now preparing a new series of literary monographs of English writers. The programme, as at present announced, includes only one woman writer—George Eliot. Mr. W. P. James, in commenting in the St. James's Gazette upon this circumstance, suggests that the readers of the ACADEMY should be called upon to draw up a list of women writers that deserve inclusion, together with the critics best fitted to deal with them. We took the hint, and offered a prize of one guinea to the best list of six monographs on the lines of those in the "English Men of Letters" series, the subject of each being an English woman writer of this century (exclusive of George Eliot), and the monographer a living English author, either man or woman.

The response has been full and interesting, and the task of selecting the best lists is not easy. We have, however, decided to give the prize to Mr. S. K. Ratcliffe, The Clapham School, High-street, Clapham, S.W., for the following:

- Emily Brontë. By A. C. Swinburne.
- Charlotte Brontë. By W. E. Henley.
- Mrs. Browning. By Theodore Watts-Dunton.
- Christina Rossetti. By Mrs. Meynell.
- Harriet Martineau. By John Morley.
- Mrs. Gaskell. By Mrs. Humphry Ward.

It is not an ideal list—Miss Austen, for example, is of more importance than either Miss Martineau or Miss Rossetti—but it is good, and the books would be of great interest. Popular opinion, as gathered from the lists before us, is with Mr. Ratcliffe in two of his selections, a large number of competitors wishing Mrs. Meynell to write of Miss Rossetti, and Mr. Swinburne of Emily Brontë. Mrs. Meynell is also bracketed with Mrs. Browning on several lists. But the most recurring association on the papers are Miss Austen and Mr. Dobson, and Charlotte Brontë and Mr. Shorter. Several, however, wish Mr. Lang to write of Miss Austen and several Mr. Birrell, while one competitor suggests very happily that Mr. Howells should do so. Mr. Henry James is also named in this connexion, and truly his book should be a joy. Mr. Birrell is allied by several readers to Mrs. Browning, and there is a pretty general feeling that Mrs. Humphry Ward should make a monograph of someone. Now it is Harriet Martineau, now Mrs. Gaskell, now Charlotte Brontë, while one paper suggests that Mrs. Ward should herself be a subject, and Mr. Bernard Shaw the critic. Among good suggestions are Emily Brontë by Miss Olive Schreiner, Harriet Martineau by Mrs. Fawcett, Miss Rossetti by Mr. Laurence Housman, and Mrs. Gaskell by Mr. George Gissing. In one paper Maria Edgeworth is handed over to Mr. W. B. Yeats, and in another Hannah More to Mr. Henley!

Competition No. 25.

THERE is, as we have already announced, a movement on foot to establish a memorial to the late Mr. William Black, the author of Madcap Violet, and a score or so of other stories which have been read in their thousands all over the world. The suggestion came from Lord Archibald Campbell, and a Committee has now been formed, the constitution of which was explained in the ACADEMY last week, to translate it into fact. It has been proposed that a lifeboat, bearing Mr. Black's name, should be endowed and placed at a station in the western Highlands. Alternative plans are—"a beacon light,"

"a Scholarship for a Highland lad to be held at a Scotch University," "a cot in a Highland hospital," "a cot in a London hospital for the benefit of Scots"; but nothing has yet been decided upon. In the hope of a more suitable practical suggestion resulting, we ask our readers to consider the memorial this week in connexion with our Prize Competition. To the author of what seems to us the most fitting scheme of keeping green Mr. Black's fame, a cheque for a guinea will be sent. It should be borne in mind by all competitors that Mr. Black was a keen optimist, a sportsman, a passionate lover of nature, especially as she is found in Scotland, and one who delighted, in his books, in his power to create beautiful young womanhood and brave men. Briefly, he was an open-air idealist: a fact that should not be lost sight of in considering the form a memorial to him should take. It must also be remembered that a large sum is not likely to be subscribed. Hence if £2,000 is taken as the outside amount of the cost of the memorial (although more may, of course, be received), competitors will be on the safe side.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, March 28. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 368, or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

The Literary Week.

ON our Prize Competition page will be found a number of suggestions concerning the form which the memorial to the late William Black might take.

THE new one-volume edition of the Life of the late Lord Tennyson, which Messrs. Macmillan have just issued, is clad in the familiar green cloth which, although other poets wear it too—Matthew Arnold, for example, and Clough—is associated particularly with Tennyson. The book has been designed to consort with the complete edition of Tennyson's Poems. It contains a great deal for two covers to support—929 pages—but the paper used is very thin. Some day, we suppose, all or some of the numerous new verses scattered about the biography will find their way also into the complete edition of the Poems.

MR. LEWIS MELVILLE, whose biography of Thackeray will be issued in two volumes by Messrs. Hutchinson next month, is not much more than thirty years of age. He has been collecting materials for his book for the last ten years, making the pursuit his hobby, and in this way he has amassed information which would probably escape the eye of an editor to whom time and labour were considerations. Indeed, Mr. Melville's difficulty has been to compress his matter. The work will be illustrated, and it will contain a bibliography which, it is believed, will be the most complete yet constructed.

TAKING his text from Mrs. Atherton's study of a female dipsomaniac, A Daughter of the Vine, a writer in the World conjures up a dismal dream of the abnormal heroines which are likely soon to dominate fiction. Nowadays a fashion has but to be set to be run to death; for there is an increasing body of literary opportunists who are ever ready to supply whatever variety of story the public seems to require. If there is the least inclination for novels of disease, novels of disease will appear. The World critic suggests a few possible titles: The Elephantiasis of Esther Egerton, The Sequale of Irene's Influenza, and Chloe the Chloralid.

A MEMORIAL tablet has now been fixed by the London County Council to mark the abode at Highgate of Andrew Marvell. A plain inscription is all that is engraved thereon, because, as we read in one of the daily papers, to the County Council Committee's appeal for a suitable quotation from Marvell's writings there has been no response. Why do not committees in these difficulties take some trouble to make their requirements known? Many persons could have found them a suitable quotation.

FROM the new Stevenson letters in the April Scribner: "I have a great piece of news. There has been offered for Treasure Island . . . a hundred jingling, tingling, golden, minted quid.—None of it [Prince Otto] is exactly funny, but some of it is smiling.—Here lies the carcase of Robert Louis Stevenson, an active, austere, and not inelegant writer.—My view of life is essentially the comic; and the romantically comic. 'As You Like It' is to me the most bird-haunted spot in letters."

AND this is a little Whitmanesque fragment, belonging probably to the year 1883, and dropped into a letter from Stevenson to Mr. Henley:

Sursum Corda:
Heave ahead:
Here's luck.
Art and Blue Heaven,
April and God's Larks.
Green reeds and the sky-scattering river.
A stately music.
Enter God!

MR. FISHER UNWIN's successor to the Pseudonym Library is the Overseas Library, a series of books depicting foreign and colonial life. Certain works published from time to time by Mr. Unwin have stimulated young writers in the Colonies and Dependencies to set down their own impressions, and these will form some of the volumes. The first, however, which will be issued this month, is by Mr. Cunningham Graham. It will be called The Ipané.

AN interesting commentary on a piece of English slang has just been made by Prof. Skeat. Noticing in the Daily Telegraph the report of a police case wherein two women were said to have thrown "nasty snacks" at each other, Prof. Skeat wrote to that paper thus: "It is one of the numerous instances which show how Scandinavian we are. Turning to the Danish dictionary we find snakke, 'to prate, chatter'; snakke over sig, 'to talk wildly'; snakke-broder, 'a chatterbox'; lit. 'a "snack-brother"'; snaksom, 'talkative.' The Norwegian dictionary tells us that such terms are very common in the west and north of Norway."

THE outspoken bookseller in Cannon-alley, Paternoster-row, has pinned a new set of placards, bearing maxims, to his books. The most direct of his new pensées is this: "One of the last things to dawn on you, but one of the first to dawn on your friends, is that—you are a fool."

MR. SIDNEY LEE is justly alarmed by the way in which First Folios of Shakespeare are being acquired by Americans. In an article on "The Shakespeare First Folio" in the April number of the Cornhill Mr. Lee writes:

It is devoutly to be wished that all English men and women who at the present time own copies of the First Folio—by far the most valuable of the four volumes—will keep a firm grip upon them; for this country is being rapidly drained of its First Folios by the United States of America.

When, in the summer of last year, I found that for purposes of research it was desirable that I should consult two copies of the First Folio which were reported to possess unique features, and were known to have been in libraries in England a very few years ago, my inquiries led me to the embarrassing conclusion that, if I wished to examine the copies in question, it would be necessary for me to take a trip to New York. One of these two copies only crossed the seas in 1897. There was a third copy, which I sought to trace in vain, and I believe, although I have no precise information on the subject, that that copy has also joined its brethren in America. English booksellers make no secret of this fact of the growing practice of exporting rare editions of Shakespeare to America. Mr. Quaritch, the great bookseller in Piccadilly, wrote to me lately in reference to the First Folio: "Perfect copies are usually sold by us dealers to American collectors. They thus get scarcer and dearer every year."

However, the honey of Mr. Lee's article is in the tail of it. He has just discovered a copy of the great folio of 1623, which he is convinced is "almost certainly the first copy of the great Shakespeare folio which came from his [Jaggard's] press." This copy is nearly half an inch taller than any other known copy, and it contains an inscription in the handwriting of Jaggard, who presented it to Mr. Augustine Vincent, of the Herald's College. We trust that this copy will remain in the country that gave it birth.

A LITTLE pamphlet on Shakespeare's Handwriting, extracted from Mr. Sidney Lee's Life of Shakespeare, has been issued by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. It consists of facsimiles of the only extant specimens of Shakespeare's handwriting that are of undisputed authenticity—namely, five autograph signatures. Shakespeare wrote very badly. His own treatment of his name was so careless that every variety of spelling it can find sanction in these five signatures—except, of course, the variety that resorts to B-a-c-o-n.

At last, after long waiting, the Omarians have the Golden Treasury Edition of their Creed according to FitzGerald. The book is a very charming one, but the Golden Treasury practice of decorating the title-page with a fitting design has not in this case been adopted. The information concerning editions of the poem is interesting. We reproduce the figures: First edition (Quaritch) 1859; second edition, 1868; third edition, 1872; fourth edition (with Salámán and Absál), 1879; fifth edition (FitzGerald's Collected Works), Macmillan & Co., 1889; Omar, reprinted separately, July and October, 1890, 1891, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897 (twice), January, March, and November, 1898, 1899; Golden Treasury Edition, 1899.

In the Art Journal for April will be found an article on Mr. Elihu Vedder, the illustrator of FitzGerald's version of Omar Khayyam, whose illustrated edition, however, is not mentioned in the foregoing account of the English history of the poem. With the April number has also been issued the "Easter Art Annual," which takes the form of a review of the late William Morris's life and work by Mr. Lewis F. Day. It is a little hard that in the advertisement pages of this number a firm of booksellers should draw attention to "remainder" copies of Morris's Lectures on Art.

MR. LANG brings his task as editor of the Gadshill Edition of Dickens to a close with a general essay on the novelist's work. It is sound, if somewhat breathless, criticism. Mr. Lang rushes over his ground as though he would give anything to have it done and be back again at something really congenial—a theory of totems or the history of Scotland. And yet there could hardly be more stimulating or thorough praise of Pickwick than this:

Mr. Pickwick ceased to be the amateur suburban savant, and bloomed into the delight of mankind—the cockney Quixote, the soul of gaitered chivalry: the cockney Socrates with his disciples; the obscure Johnson of a newer Fleet-street. This great man, in his benevolence, chivalry, childlike wisdom, and geniality, reminds us alternately of all the three characters mentioned; and surely Mr. Pickwick himself refutes the slander that "Dickens could not draw a gentleman." If Mr. Pickwick is not a gentleman (of course, not in the heraldic sense), who is? Who was ever more courteous, and considerate, and (despite Mrs. Bardell and the lady in yellow curl papers) more blameless in his relations with women? Who more gaily put himself in peril to rescue virtue in distress? Who was more fiery on the point of honour, even if his attitude of self-defence was unscientific? In whom do we mark a hand more open, a heart more tender, or more eager to forgive? Indeed, Mr. Pickwick seems "scarce other than my own ideal knight," though "a knight sin amor," like the good Earl Marischal. His foibles are amiable; his scutcheon is white as the pennon of Brian Tunstal. He did not shun the bowl; nor did Socrates, who, to be sure, like Dr. Johnson, had the stronger head. These excesses of the Pickwickians are to be taken in a Pickwickian sense; they are as symbolical as Maeterlinck, and infinitely more entertaining. As to method or plot, Pickwick has none, and needs none. It is not a novel, but something far better; it is Pickwick, the breviary of kindly men. "Delightful book!" as Thackeray cries when Dugald Dalgetty's name comes into his mind. "To think of it is to want to jump up and take it down from the shelf." It opens to us a world literally crowded with human beings, of whom the least important even are permanent creations, friends whom we do not forget.

AND this is Mr. Lang's summary of the whole matter. "No man," he writes, when the time comes to record Dickens's death, "no man, for forty years, had diffused so much delight, had given so much sterling happiness. How glorious is the record, how far beyond envy the achievement, how frivolous do our deductions and carpings appear, when set beside the undeniable fact! Shakespeare, Fielding, Dr. Johnson, Burns, Scott, and Dickens —these, when we think of authors who have made men glad, who have made life joyful in England, are the names. They are with Homer and Aristophanes, Molière, Rabelais, and Cervantes; they are heroes and benefactors."

In the new edition of Sir Frederick Pollock's Spinoza, to which we shall return in a future number, is printed an old translation, dated 1706, of the Life of Benedict Spinoza, by John Colerus, minister of the Lutheran Church at the Hague. The philosopher's serious thoughts being, as a rule, of so much more interest than his trivial ones, we are tempted to make this quaint extract from the little Life:

When he staid at home, he was troublesome to no Body; he spent the greatest part of his time quietly in his own Chamber. When he happen'd to be tired by having applyed himself too much to his Philosophical Meditations, he went down Stairs to refresh himself, and discoursed with the people of the House about any thing, that might afford Matter for an ordinary Conversation, and even about trifles. He also took Pleasure in smoaking a Pipe of Tobacco; or, when he had a mind to divert himself somewhat longer, he look'd for some Spiders, and made 'em fight together, or he threw some Flies into the Cobweb, and was so well pleased with that Battel, that he wou'd sometimes break into Laughter. He observed also, with a Microscope, the different parts of the smallest Insects, from whence he drew such Consequences as seem'd to him to agree best with his Discoveries.

"WE, the editor, were dressed in black and white, and wore an ermine cape lined with brocade, and a large black picture hat with white feathers." A correspondent sends us the cutting from a Sunday paper of a leading article on the recent Women Journalists' Matinée containing the above marvellous sentence. As our correspondent says, "it is a grand attempt to combine the personal with the anonymous."

THE promise of formidable additions to Sunday journalism is not being received with unmixed gratitude by the British public. A Bill to check such enterprise is to be brought before Parliament by Major Pirie, and many Nonconformist preachers have been deprecating ephemeral reading for the Day of Rest. Competition, however, will mean eventually a diminution of these enterprises.

ONE of the Sunday journals, which will not, we presume, be much affected by the new papers, is about to lose an editor of fifteen years' standing. We refer to the People, from the control of which Captain Carlisle retires in June. Captain Carlisle, who is a well-known journalist, transformed the People from a mere news-sheet to a Conservative organ of considerable weight. Although leaving the People, Captain Carlisle does not mean to abandon journalism altogether.

ADMIRERS of Rodin's work have an opportunity of seeing some very interesting examples of his sculpture at Messrs. Carfax & Co.'s Gallery, 17, Ryder-street, St. James's. Among other works is a sketch for the head of the great Balzac statue.

FROM the Malay Peninsula comes the following letter:

Ipho, Kiuta, Perak,

Feb. 27, 1899.

DEAR SIR,—Your paper comes as a boon and a blessing to several of the exiles out here in the jungle, and we are sorry that distance and the cost of telegrams prevent us from competing in your competitions.

"Things Seen" are very fascinating—so simple and yet so good. Enclosed please find my maiden effort; it may amuse you if it is of no use otherwise.—Yours faithfully,

J. S. KER.

Mr. Ker's "Thing Seen" follows:

A START.

The sun blazing down on a racecourse, far, far east of Suez, and on a field of hot, excited horses and men, waiting till the eccentricities of the starter and an even more eccentric horse combine to get us in line. The patience of the former is at last exhausted. "Bring up that horse! Come up on that beast! You'll get into trouble over this, I tell you," and so forth. The Australian lightweight replies patiently: "I can't help it, Sir. This is a cab horse, this 'orse is. He won't start till the door shuts—and—I haven't got a door!"

It is a little odd that the most notable impression made on the mind of a dweller in the immemorial and gorgeous East should be an incident at a race meeting.

IN one afternoon we have received two educational editions of Lord Macaulay's "Essay on Milton," each supplied with an introduction and copious notes. Whether it was wise to present this essay to schoolboys at all seems doubtful. We notice that both editors quote Lord Macaulay's opinion of the essay, in which he found "scarcely a paragraph such as his matured judgment approves," to say nothing of its "gaudy and ungraceful ornament." At all events, it seems a little unfortunate that two editors should separately toil to edit the same piece and see their books issued on the same day. Comparisons being "odorous," we make only one. In Messrs. Macmillan's edition no note is appended to the mention of Tyburn; in Messrs. Blackie's we are informed that Tyburn was in East London. On the whole, we prefer the sin of omission.

It is often amusing, it is occasionally pathetic, to find financial papers venturing upon literary criticism. A case in point is an appreciation of a poem by Mrs. Jane H. Oakley, whose literary efforts are occasionally published in the advertisement columns of the Times and other newspapers. Here are some extracts from a commercial contemporary's estimate of Mrs. Oakley's works, apropos of an effusion which appears in its own pages:

We have the pleasure of publishing this week another poem from the gifted pen of the authoress named above. . . . In the United States of America, where appreciation is more rapid than in this slow old country (yet sound withal), Mrs. Oakley has been designated "The sweet singer of the Alliance." . . . The Hove poetess, it is needless to say, is overwhelmed with requests to write on many subjects—local and general—and makes frequent contribution to the Service newspapers, as well as consenting to, perhaps, too many private requests for poetical treatment of local subjects. Poesy is particularly a lady's work; it is only very occasionally that we have the strength of diction of a Rudyard Kipling; whilst the sweet flowing ideas of a woman's mind, applied to that love of country that we call patriotism, is welcome to all classes, although it may not be completely understood except by the few. . . .

Who shall say that the art of constructive criticism is no longer practised?

THE April Bookman has as a Portrait Supplement a photogravure of the fine portrait of Mr. Kipling by the Hon. John Collier.

Bibliographical.

A NEW Life of Charles Lamb, embodying all the Letters (worth embodying) in chronological order—by all means! Mr. E. V. Lucas has shown, in his Charles Lamb and the Lloyds, how much he is in sympathy with Lamb; he knows the subject, and he has the necessary literary knack. I hope he will produce the final Life and Letters of Lamb. It is high time we arrived at finality in the matter. We have had, in succession, since 1837, the Life and Final Memorials, by Talfourd; the Life, by Barry Cornwall; the Poems, Letters, and Remains, edited by Mr. Carew Hazlitt; the Life, Letters, and Writings, produced by Mr. Percy Fitzgerald; the monograph, by Canon Ainger, and the Letters, edited by that gentleman. Now, if Mr. Lucas can see his way to bringing together, once for all, everything that is necessary to the comprehension of Lamb as a man and a letter writer—leaving his published works for the moment out of the question—we shall all be indebted to him. Of course an edition of the Works, uniform with the Life and Letters, would be very desirable.

My brother gossip, "W. J.," while applauding my suggestion that Mr. Swinburne should issue his volumes of verse in a cheaper form than that which they now take, proposes that the poet should also give us a book of selections from his work in rhyme and rhythm. As a matter of fact, such a book is in existence. It came out about twelve years ago. I do not know what measure of vogue it had, but I do know that it disappointed at least one reader terribly. It was in no sense representative, and could hardly have done anything to popularize the author's work. I have been told that Mr. Swinburne made the selection himself. If that be the fact, it explains the inadequacy of the book, for no poet knows (so well as an outsider knows) which of his pieces have the greatest attraction for the public. A selection of this sort should be done by someone other than the author. There is, therefore, ample room for another anthology of Mr. Swinburne's lyrics; and I believe that such an anthology, shrewdly made, would be a pecuniary success.

It is pleasant to note that Mr. William Archer is to give us, in the course of the spring, a selection from the essays on theatrical and literary subjects which he published during 1898. This, however, will hardly compensate for the non-appearance of The Theatrical World for last year. The chief utility of The Theatrical World lay less in the reproduction of Mr. Archer's comments upon plays and performances than in the synopsis of playbills by which those comments were supplemented. The synopsis supplied a chronological list of the year's plays, with the names of the characters and players and the date and locale of production. This was a very useful feature, and its disappearance will be regretted by all close students of the stage; for the annual Era Almanac, though it furnishes a list of the year's plays (with date and locale), gives no information about the "casts."

It would seem that the late Francis Adams's Essays in Modernity, announced for imminent publication some years ago, are to appear very shortly. Had they been delayed much longer, they might have seemed ancient rather than modern. And, in truth, thought grows so rapidly nowadays that it is not easy for a writer to keep up with it. The melancholy end of Francis Adams will be remembered. His prose and his verse were alike clever and promising, but he never made a distinct hit. Health or temperament, or both, may have been at the bottom of this, for he had certainly much natural ability. His Essays in Modernity may perhaps show him at his best.

I was saying something the other day about the essay on Dumas which Mr. Andrew Lang reprinted in his Essays in Little. I might have added that in that volume Mr. Lang published for the first time a very appreciative little paper on "Mr. Kipling's Stories." This was at a period (1891) when Mr. Kipling was not so well known and so universally praised as he is now. Mr. Lang's hearty commendation of the young writer is worth noting, for it is not often that he finds himself able to speak with enthusiasm about contemporary productions.

I observe, by the way, that in the new Life of James and Horace Smith Mr. Lang is dubbed "the Universal Provider of the literary world, seeking, like the busy bee, to gather honey from every opening flower." In his Life of Lockhart Mr. Lang has some remarks on Horace Smith against which Horace's biographer protests with vigour. Hence this flight of sarcasm, with its confusion of metaphor. We shall see whether Mr. Lang thinks it worth while to take notice of Mr. Beavan's criticism.

A correspondent writes: "I find in my copy of the memoir of F. T. Palgrave that, in addition to the ordinary 'end-papers,' there are, both at the beginning and at the end of the book, four pages of virgin white admirably adapted for the purposes of annotation. This, of course, may be a mistake in the binding, and peculiar to my copy; but I am none the less grateful for the boon, and could wish that all books were fitted with similar accommodation for the annotator's pen or pencil."

Mrs. Atherton has entitled her study in dipsomania, inherited and otherwise, A Daughter of the Vine. The allusion, of course, is to the last line of stanza 40 in the first edition (stanza 55 in the fifth) of FitzGerald's Omar:

And took the Daughter of the Vine to spouse.

Years ago, I remember, I read a novel called A Semi-Attached Couple. By whom it was written I cannot recollect—can anyone tell me? The title of it has been recalled to me by the announcement of a new novel named A Semi-Detached Marriage.

Danton.

Danton: a Study. By Hilaire Belloc. (Nisbet. 16s.)

Life of Danton. By A. H. Beesly. (Longmans. 12s. 6d.)

THERE was a real need for an account of the great Revolutionary which should be based on the most modern investigations, and, therefore, neither of these books is in itself superfluous. But it must be said that their combination is unfortunate for the reader, as it certainly is for the authors and publishers concerned. The simultaneous appearance of two volumes, covering the same ground, from the same standpoint, with the same aim, relying more or less on the same new investigations, affects us with the sense of too much Danton. Of the two biographers, Mr. Belloc (whom we take to be of French extraction) is the more pictorial, and gives us a clearer coup d'œil. Mr. Beesly, on the other hand, affords us more detail, and, on the whole, more precision of narrative. Both are uncompromising admirers of Danton, and in full sympathy with the Revolution. They have done undoubted good work by clearing away the garbled view of Danton with which Englishmen are familiar. But we must needs say that their advocacy is liable to become special pleading. Mr. Beesly, in particular, indulges in an audacious latitude of hypothesis when he desires to turn the flank of a story adverse to his hero, which can only be paralleled by Macaulay's explaining away of the charge against Addison that he arrested Steele for debt. Nevertheless, in this respect we prefer Mr. Beesly to his rival; for he squarely faces the music, so that we can judge for ourselves the validity of his conclusions. Mr. Belloc is apt to keep the hostile evidence out of court, and state only his results. It must not be understood, however, that there are not numerous cases where he directly proves his defence. He does so in regard to the charge that Danton acquired houses and property in the names of others in order to disguise his unrepudiated wealth. In this and other ways the two books do, for some part, usefully complement each other; however, from a publishing standpoint, their simultaneous explosion upon the public must be adjudged unlucky and ill-considered. And in their common endeavour to overset the traditional conception of Danton they must be pronounced largely successful. "White-washed," perhaps, he is not—except in the eyes of such as accept unshrinkingly the entire revolutionary formule. But no one can read these volumes without feeling it necessary to revise much in his previous ideas of the Sampson who pulled down the walls of the French monarchy.

The strong man of the mid-Revolution was himself no sans-culotte. At this day you may take the odds that a French Republican leader is a lawyer or a journalist. Danton was a lawyer, and—what is more rare—he was a successful lawyer, making a good income. His father was procureur at Arcis-sur-Aube, so that it was in a legal nest the young bird saw the light on October 26, 1759. Candide was born that same year, which was also in labour with the Encyclopædia. Candide, the Encyclopædia, Danton—three portentous births. He was educated at a Jesuit college, and was actually destined for the priesthood. It is not surprising that he cried off. Can you fancy him le Père Danton? The Revolution found him a leader among the reforming young politicians of his district in Paris—the Section of the Cordeliers, whence sprung the famous club. His ascendancy of character, no less than his oratorical gifts, carried him to the front. You can figure him to yourself with the aid of the portrait which precedes both these volumes. The three representative men of the middle and later Revolution are well known by their portraits—Danton, Marat, and Robespierre. With every respect to Danton's admirers, we assert that all three faces belong to criminal anthropology. A student of that science would recognise the types at once. All three, to our thinking, are hideous. Marat shows strong traces of the criminal lunatic. Robespierre—narrow, callous, egotistic—belongs to the type from which one might expect an educated poisoner. Danton alone has the redeeming quality of power. It is a formidable head, in which the criminal streak is introduced by the abnormal brevity of the nose, the tip of which occupies the centre of the broad countenance, leaving a disfiguringly long upper lip. Such was the case with Titus Oates. Everyone remembers the Greek physiognomist who declared Socrates to have the visage of a criminal, and Socrates' defence of the man. That incriminating nose branded the famous Greek, and quite justified the physiognomist. Whether Danton also was saved by philosophy every man must judge for himself. To enhance this deformity his nose was crushed by an accident, and his lip torn by another accident. Add to this countenance of a disfigured bull a voice of immense power, deep and trumpeting; imagine this being, hugo and lowering of form, pouring forth menacing invective with a terrible and truculent regard; and you have the Danton who moved the Cordeliers, dominated the Convention, and left a legend of terror not easy for calm analysis to dissipate.

The legend of terror, in truth, was right; but it is Danton's misfortune that it should be associated with a legend of bloodthirstiness. "Terrible Danton" he was; bloodthirsty he was not. The ferocity of the Revolution was incarnate in Marat, its cold cruelty in Robespierre, in Danton its volcanic energy. To understand this we need only note the circumstances in which he came to the front. At different crises the Revolution put forward different men. It put forward Danton only when there was need of swift daring and organisation. To energise and to organise—those were the two things he could do supremely well.

Consider the crises at which he emerged. During the beginnings of the Revolution, with Leonine Mirabeau over all, none heard of this "Mirabeau of the sans-culottes." He was addressing the daily meetings of his section (that is, district), the Cordeliers; seeing to its drill, and that it was provided with pikes. He had no lead in the taking of the Bastille, which was indeed a rough affair, succeeding only through the complete unpreparedness of the Royalists. That event paved the way for his local power in the Cordeliers, for it taught the sections to organise and constitute themselves an armed force. Suppressed as a section, the Cordeliers revived as a club, and became the centre of the Théâtre Français, the new section in which the old one was merged. Meanwhile had occurred the first direct conflict between Crown and people. The Flanders regiment had sung "O Richard, O mon roi," at Versailles. It was feared that the king would retreat to the provinces and unfurl the standard of civil war. On the walls of Paris appeared a proclamation demanding insurrection—a proclamation issued by the Cordeliers. The tocsin rang, the mob gathered, and filled the road to Versailles. The palace was forced, and the king brought in triumph to Paris. It was the first demonstration that the people would prevent by insurrection the king from opposing the Revolution. That call to insurrection was signed by Danton. Then first Paris learned that whenever swift and unquailing energy was needed by the Revolution it was to be found in a certain big-headed young man belonging to the district of the Cordeliers.

During the time when Lafayette was striving to put the Revolution in swaddling-clothes, Danton again recedes into the background; heard only as a thunder playing round Lafayette's head at the Jacobins. He starts into the streets to prevent the king's journey to St. Cloud, bearding Lafayette, and compelling the king to renounce his project. He attacks the hapless Lafayette again as an accomplice in the king's abortive flight; and has to fly before that General's brief triumph in the Champ-de-Mars. But when the Tenth of August found the allies advancing on Paris, and revolt threatening in the provinces, Danton comes to the front before Europe. He is insurrection incarnate. While the tocsin tolls through the night he is organising, exhorting, bringing the pikes of the sections to the muster. The fall of the Tuileries finds him Minister of Justice, and the inspirer of France against the foreigner. Again, when the fresh successes of the allies, the war in La Vendée, and the revolt of the Girondin Departments menace the republic with downfall, he thunders forth encouragement, establishes the Revolutionary Tribunal, and the Committee of Public Safety, begins the levée en masse, and a second time saves the Revolution. But there his labour ends. In the working of the terror he had no part. Blood for blood's sake he did not love. And he came back at last to combat the terror, and die in the effort to begin the reign of clemency before the passions of men were exhausted enough to suffer it.

For he was no truculent ruffian. His speeches were truculent, because so only could he keep his position with the fierce democracy. But at heart this formidable man hated blood. He would spill it for a purpose, but not for love of victims. He permitted the September massacres, for he dared not oppose them. But ever after he sought to guard against their recurrence by establishing a tribunal, to secure, at any rate, a fair trial before execution. That was his aim in the Revolutionary Tribunal, so terribly abused by his successors. He was the one man among the Revolutionists with an idea of government, an idea of diplomacy; the one man who perceived that the Revolution must end, if the Republic was to be saved. Among that crowd of theorists with their muzzles off, he alone was practical, and cared more for government than doctrines.

But he was not the man to end the Revolution. An immense volcanic force, he lacked perseverance; he must rest and recuperate after his fits of vast exertion. He had no ambition, no desire for rule. So lesser men and weaker men were allowed to capture the powerful engines he created; and when he attempted to cross their sanguinary policy they turned those engines against himself. A man roughly and spontaneously eloquent, undignified and even foul of tongue in private; generous to his private, terrible to public enemies, with a burly magnanimity of nature; after being identified with the crimes of others, such as Marat, he perished in the effort to put an end to crime; and history has merely regarded him as a criminal caught in his own trap. But always he has tried to moderate between the fierce factions of the Convention. Let it be at length known and recorded of this fearless, vast volcano of a man, that he died in the deliberate attempt to end the terror. It was his misfortune that, powerful for destruction, he was impotent to save. But he dared the effort, and let him now have the honour for it. "To dare, and dare, and without end dare," was the advice by which he saved France from the allies. His life was one long daring; and the daring which brought him to the scaffold was the noblest of all.

A Little Master of English.

Letters of Samuel Rutherford. Selected from the Edition edited by the Rev. Andrew A. Bonar. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 2s.)

THIS little book in a blue cover should do much to make the writings of Samuel Rutherford better known to general readers. His works are loved by many; and by a few his Letters are, perhaps, still accounted "the most seraphic book in our literature." That was the praise they received when first published, and they still give out a most sweet savour. More than twenty-five editions of these Letters have appeared since 1664, the best being the one issued five years ago by Dr. Bonar. The slim volume before us is a selection from that edition, and we are tempted to string together a few of the radiant sentences in which it abounds.

For the sake of those who meet him for the first time, it will be well to premise that Samuel Rutherford was a Scottish minister in the age which gave us the Authorised Version of the Bible. He became minister of Anwoth, a small village in Kirkcudbrightshire, in 1627, and was so diligent a shepherd that they said of him: "He is always praying, always preaching, always visiting the sick, always catechising, always writing and studying." The more active of these employments were cut off by his banishment to Aberdeen in 1636. There he was free to move about among the people, but not to preach. The granite city was virtually his prison. One thing he could do: he could write letters to the saints of Anwoth and to his friends generally, and comfort them in the Lord. He could take pen and pour out his spiritual experiences. So he was always writing letters. He spilled his joys and sorrows upon paper; he gave comfort and sought it. Sometimes his joy makes his confinement a positive sweetness. "This prison," he writes, "is my banqueting house; I am handled softly and delicately as a dawted child." Again:

The smell of Christ's wine and apples (which surpass the up-taking of dull sense) bloweth upon my soul. . . . Nay, His cross is the sweetest burden that ever I bare; it is such a burden as wings are to a bird, or sails are to a ship, to carry me forward to my harbour.

From this "banqueting house" he sought to cheer his fellows in the vineyard: "I tell you Christ will make new work out of old, forecasten Scotland, and gather the old broken boards of His tabernacle, and pin them and nail them together." Again, with evangelical fervour: "Oh, if I could make my Lord Jesus market-sweet, lovely, desirable, and fair to all the world, both to Jew and Gentile!" He learns anew the vanity of the world, and would instil it: "Oh, that we had as soon done with this world, and could as quickly despatch the love of it! But as a child cannot hold two apples in his little hand, but the one putteth the other out of its room, so neither can we be masters and lords of two loves."

Stinted of life, he sees the end of it, and is often pointing to the grave:

Remember, when the race is ended, and the play either won or lost, and ye are in the utmost circle and border of time, and shall put your foot within the march of eternity, and all your good things of this short night-dream shall seem to you like the ashes of a bleeze of thorns or straw, and your poor soul shall be crying, "Lodging, lodging, for God's sake!" then shall your soul be more glad at one of your Lord's lovely and homely smiles than if ye had the charters of three worlds for all eternity.

But he can comfort as well as warn. As a comforter Samuel Rutherford must have been accounted great:

Christ was death's Cautioner, who gave His word to come and loose all the clay-pawns, and set them at his own right hand; and our Cautioner, Christ, hath an act of law-surety upon death, to render back his captives. And that Lord Jesus, who knoweth the turnings and windings that are in that black trance of death, hath numbered all the steps of the stair up to heaven. He knoweth how long the turnpike is, or how many pair of stairs high it is; for He ascended that way Himself: "I was dead and am alive." And now He liveth at the right hand of God, and His garments have not so much as a smell of death.

Not always was Samuel Rutherford uplifted. Sometimes his prison was really a prison and his sorrows like load. To conclude: where, in the literature of faith, shall we find the aspirations of the Christian more sweetly and plaintively uttered than in these sentences?

A little of God would make my soul bankfall. Oh that I had but Christ's odd off-fallings; that He would let but the meanest of His love-rays and love-beams fall from Him, so as I might gather and carry them with me! I would not be ill to please with Christ, and veiled vision of Christ; neither would I be dainty in seeing and enjoying of Him: a kiss of Christ blown over His shoulder, the parings and crumbs of glory that fall under His table in heaven, a shower like a thin May-mist of His love, would make me green, and sappy, and joyful, till the summer-sun of an eternal glory break up.

The summer-sun of earthly liberty broke first on Samuel Rutherford. For many years he was a great man in the Scottish Church, and was sent up to the Westminster Assembly in 1643. After the Restoration he was again in disfavour, and was summoned to appear before the Parliament in Edinburgh on a charge of high treason. His enemies were too late. He replied that he had already got a summons to a higher tribunal; and he added, with one of his touches of humour, "ere your day arrive, I will be where few kings and great folks come." Yet there were great folk who had taken knowledge of him that he would soon be with his Master. When the Parliament voted that he should not die in St. Andrews, where his last days had been spent, Lord Burleigh rose and said, "Ye cannot vote him out of heaven." So passed this servant of God, and little master of English.

Dying Egypt.

A History of Egypt under the Ptolemaic Dynasty. By J. P. Mahaffy. (Methuen. 6s.)

In this volume, which forms the fourth of Prof. Flinders Petrie's History of Egypt, the general editor seems to have departed somewhat from his original intention. We need not complain, however, of the result which has led to his entrusting the narrative of one of the most romantic periods of Egyptian history to the capable hands of Prof. Mahaffy. Whatever interest we may feel in the proceedings of the pyramid-building Cheops, or of the heretic king Amenophis IV., we are too far removed by differences of race and period for them ever to be much more to us than names. But the case is entirely altered when we come to the lives of the brilliant line which began with the Greek soldier of fortune, Ptolemy son of Lagos, to end, characteristically enough, with the peerless, but fatal, Cleopatra. Moreover, as Prof. Mahaffy has taught us elsewhere, these Hellenistic kingdoms, of which Egypt was the most successful, were really much nearer to us, both in constitution and in mode of action, than the republics of Greece and Rome, which we have been accustomed to look to for political examples; and in them do we find the earliest and, in some respects, the best type of that monarchical ideal which is now again rising into popularity. A king possessed of sufficient personal wealth to make him the munificent patron of art and literature, surrounded by a court, not of house-slaves and eunuchs, but of nobles and warriors as well-born, though not as wealthy, as himself; a middle class of officials who, so long as their salaries were punctually paid, did their best to administer equal justice between man and man; and a proletariat industrious, frugal, and kept in order by a clergy who were the creatures, rather than the masters, of the Crown—a Spaniard of the time when Spain was a Great Power, or a German, if it may be said without l'ee-majesté, of the present day, would have found himself more at home under such a régime than among the chattering democracies of Athens or Rome.

It is this ideal which Prof. Mahaffy here lays before us with a point and conciseness which have not always distinguished his later works. Especially does he make it clear to us that the cement which really held Ptolemaic Egypt together was the personal wealth of the king. So long as the Ptolemy for the time being could buy the services of enough Greek mercenaries to repel invasion and to quell revolt, could keep on foot enough public works to employ an agricultural population otherwise idle between harvests, and could lavish money like water on shows to amuse the huge and heterogeneous city population, he had nothing to fear except from dynastic quarrels; and to the last Ptolemaic Egypt seemed to be a perfect mine of wealth. The thirteenth and most feeble of all the Ptolemies is said to have had an income of three millions sterling, and certainly managed to spend in one year nearly £110,000 in bribes to Julius Caesar; while it was the desire to possess the treasures of Cleopatra which, according to Prof. Mahaffy, led the "dull, cold-blooded" Augustus to make "some stupid attempts" to lead her to think that he, too, had fallen a victim to her fascinations.

Where all this money came from Prof. Mahaffy is also able to tell us: some of it, no doubt, was due to a system of taxation which the Romans were afterwards to find only too fatally easy. Something, too, must be attributed to the sudden development of trade, mostly by Jews and Greeks, in a country naturally rich, and already destined to be the highway between East and West; but a great part must be assigned to one of the earliest of financial measures—the disendowment of the Church. Ever since their successful struggle against the religious reform of Amenophis IV., the priesthood of Amen had gone on increasing in power until it not only possessed the Crown, but a great part of the soil of Egypt. Yet the earlier Ptolemies, by the deification of themselves and their consorts—a practice which Prof. Mahaffy, fully adopting M. Maspero's latest views on the subject, shows to be perfectly Pharaonic—managed to turn all this vast estate into a source of revenue to themselves. By what peculiarly Greek processes of diplomacy they managed to do this without offending the priests we cannot indeed learn; but it is evident that the scandal of the Daira Saieh and other "cabbagings" of the Khedive Ismail were no new thing in Egypt.

We wish we had space to go more at length into this and other matters which Prof. Mahaffy has contrived to make as readable as a novel. We cannot bestow the same praise upon an appendix in which Mr. Griffith gives transliterations of the throne-names of the Ptolemies in that peculiar dialect of gasp and comma which all German and some English Egyptologists affect. Unlike the hieroglyphics of which it is supposed to be a translation, it successfully conceals from all but the initiated the least idea of what the Egyptian words were like, while even to those trained in the abominable system it makes a difficult task more difficult.

A History of Egypt under Roman Rule. By J. Grafton Milne, M.A. (Methuen. 6s.)

MR. MILNE'S book, which forms the fifth volume of the same series, cannot be said to be as interesting as its predecessor. Some picturesque incidents, such as the institution of monachism and the murder of Hypatia, could hardly have been avoided, but the academic thoroughness which has led the author to give the reign of every Cæsar from Augustus to Heraclonas under a separate rubric renders the narrative as a whole somewhat dreary. The subject, too, is the reverse of inspiring, for under the Cæsars Egypt became a mere milch cow to be drained of its natural products for the maintenance of the Roman lazzaroni, while its own people groaned under exactions all the more crushing because applied by the most perfect masters of the art of government as then understood that the world has yet seen. Into the maze of the hierarchy of Roman officials and the multiplicity of taxes imposed by them Mr. Milne plunges delightedly, and seems to find a clue through the labyrinth. But the question is too academic for ordinary readers, and we confess to a feeling of relief when we reach the last page and find the growing misery of the Egyptian fellahin culminating in the betrayal of the country by the Coptic Church to the invading Mohammedans under Omar. A chapter on Religious Institutions, though it deals more frankly than former histories have done with the defects of primitive Christianity in Egypt, adds but very little to our knowledge of the gods mentioned in such inscriptions as those in Boeckh's Corpus but unknown in Pharaonic times. Perhaps this is to be accounted for by the fact that Egyptologists are quite as much in the dark about them as other students of religions. The volume contains several excellent appendices, in which we seem to see the hand of Prof. J. B. Bury, whose help is duly acknowledged in the Preface. There is also a capital system of references, which go to make the book as thoroughly useful to the student as it is unfitted for the general reader. The cartouches of the Cæsars, though all duly given, are not, like those of the Ptolemies, transliterated.

The Settlements of France in America.

Pioneers of France in the New World; The Jesuits in North America in the Seventeenth Century; La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West. By Francis Parkman. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d.)

THESE are the first three volumes of the new English edition of the works of Francis Parkman, and they have this in common, that they relate to that early phase of the story of Canada in which religion was still the dominant motive for exploration and discovery. In the successive American editions of his works, Mr. Parkman has appropriated and woven into the original text the results which the labours of many workers among the Paris archives have brought to light. Few historians have been more successful in clothing the bones of history in a garment of romance, or rather in repeating in the prose of to-day the romance of an almost forgotten past. A sympathetic imagination has helped him to be just to those in whose failure he reads a triumph for the best interests of mankind. He tells how what might have been the Jesuit empire among the Hurons went down in flame and blood, and then musingly observes that "Liberty may thank the Iroquois," and still without offence to readers of any creed, as witness the wide popularity of his books among all sections of Canadians.

If one had to select one episode rather than another for its vivid interest from what is really a collection of heroic tales, the story of the massacre of the Huguenot colony in Florida and its singular avenging might well be chosen. Fifty-six years before the Puritans landed on the sands of Massachusetts Bay, a little band of French Protestants, helped by the powerful patronage of Coligny, founded a colony at the mouth of the River May in Florida, under the shelter of a fort which their commander, René de Landonnière, in honour of Charles IX. called Fort Caroline. Their story was the story of many others who came hoping for gold, and found only fertile lands. Disillusionment brought discontent, and the colonists were reduced to the utmost distress, when an English vessel commanded by the redoubtable Sir John Hawkins arrived. But Sir John had got a cargo of slaves on board, and was in high good humour, and gave generous succour.

Hardly had the slaver disappeared when reinforcements arrived from France in four ships commanded by Jean Ribaut. But the stores had only just been landed when another big ship was seen approaching and carrying the flag of Spain. France and Spain were at peace, but the Frenchmen remembered they were Huguenots and had settled in the hemisphere which the Pope had reserved for the peoples of the Peninsula. In reply to a challenge as to whence he came the Spanish Admiral proclaimed that he was Pedro Menendez, commissioned of Philip II. "to hang and behead all Lutherans." The French ships were no match for their powerful adversary, but they outsailed him and fled down the coast. The Spaniard pursued until he came to an inlet, which he named San Agustín, where he was joined by four other vessels, and, landing, threw up entrenchments, and so founded St. Augustine, the oldest town in the United States. Meanwhile the French returned to Fort Caroline, and there was hot debate whether to wait the attack of the Spaniards there or to go to sea with the whole garrison and make a surprise assault. The last plan was decided upon. All the fighting men went with Ribaut and the ships, leaving Landonnière with the women and children and sick and a few invalids and civilians within the walls of the Fort. Unfortunately for the Huguenots, Ribaut's ships were scattered by a storm just as their presence had been revealed to the Spaniards. Menendez at once decided to make a forced march back to Fort Caroline and take it by assault in the absence of the garrison. His success was fatally complete. The defenders were either killed on the spot or hanged from the neighbouring trees. Menendez, with some misgivings, spared the women, though in dread "lest the venom of their heresy should infect his men." He had soon another thing to think of. Word was brought that one of the French ships had been driven ashore and that 140 of those on board were encamped on a narrow strip of sand. Menendez was quickly on the spot and knew he had them at his mercy. When reminded that the two countries were at peace, he replied that Spain was at war with all Lutherans, and according to his brother-in-law, who is our authority for what followed, he added: "If you will give up your arms and banners, and place yourselves at my mercy, you may do so, and I will act towards you as God shall give me grace." The French submitted, and the rest may be told in the words used by Menendez himself: "I had their hands tied behind their backs, and themselves put to the knife. It appeared to me that, by thus chastising them, God our Lord and your Majesty were served; whereby in future this evil sect will leave us more free to plant the Gospel in these parts." Twelve Bretons, who said they were Catholics, and four carpenters alone were spared.

But the good fortune of Menendez still continued. News was brought that 350 other Frenchmen had been wrecked. Some 200 of these preferred to take their chance of starvation and the Indian scalper's knife, and fled further into the wilderness; but Ribaut and 150 of his followers preferred to trust to the mercy of a Christian Power. Menendez writes:

I saved the lives of two young gentlemen of about eighteen years of age, as well as of three others—the fifer, the drummer, and the trumpeter; and I caused Juan Ribao (Ribaut), with all the rest, to be put to the knife, judging this to be necessary for the service of God Our Lord and your Majesty.

The remnant of the Huguenots also eventually fell into the hands of the Spaniards, and, surrendering, were spared for the galleys. Philip II. was pleased to express his high approval of Menendez for "the justice he had done upon the Lutheran corsairs." For the story of the avenging expedition, which it was left to the enterprise of a private gentleman to send from France, we must refer our readers to Mr. Parkman's pages.

Some of the accounts of the old chroniclers quoted by our author to describe the effects of firearms among the Indians recall familiar passages in Defoe, and suggest the sources of his inspiration.

The Workers.

The Workers: an Experiment in Reality—The West. By Walter A. Wyckoff. (Heinemann. 3s. net.)

In this dignified volume Mr. Wyckoff continues, and concludes, the record of his adventures as an unskilled labourer in quest of a livelihood. His previous book comprised "the East"; this covers "the West," from Chicago to the Pacific. The predominant feeling in the minds of all who read the narrative will be one of admiration for the enterprise, the courage, and the tenacity which could conceive and carry out this so singular and so valuable "experiment in reality." But, indeed, Mr. Wyckoff must be a strong man; he writes as a strong man—simply, directly, modestly, and, withal, skilfully. His literary technique is remarkable; if he chose he could do the bravura business round about the lurid horrors of Chicago, or the illimitable landscapes of the further West, as well as anyone; but he does not choose. He prefers the methods of austerity; and he is right. The stiff decorum, the perfect reticence of the book, deepen its conviction, and thereby add to its value as a psychological and sociological document.

Of course, Mr. Wyckoff had his depressions, during which he not only fervently desired to abandon his experiment, but saw with painful clearness that that experiment could at best be only partially successful. He nearly succumbed, at one period, to the longing for fellowship that had grown to almost overmastering desire, the sight of a familiar face, the sound of a familiar voice, the healing touch of cultivated speech to feelings all raw under the brutalities of the street vernacular. . . .

And, after all, what real purpose was my experiment to serve? . . . I had discovered much that was new to me, but nothing that was new to science . . . all that I had learned, or could learn, was already set forth, in tabulated statistical accuracy, in blue books and economic treatises. Moreover, it was impossible for me to rightly interpret even the human conditions in which I found myself, for between me and the actual workers was the infinite difference of necessity in relation to any lot in which I was. How could I, who at any moment could change my status if I chose, enter really in the life and feelings of the destitute poor who are bound to their lot by the hardest facts of stern reality?

How, indeed! Yet he contrived, in some measure, to do it; and, in any event, he acquired an immense number of facts of precisely the kind which blue books and economic treatises, in their sublime accuracy, always ignore. No blue book could ever give you the effect, for example, of the Chicago street-walker's charity to two poor homeless and starving wanderers, of whom Mr. Wyckoff was one.

More than two-thirds of the whole book is devoted to Chicago. Mr. Wyckoff entered this city absolutely penniless, in rags—and it was winter. He saw, from the inside, all its various "realities"—its "station-houses," its "sweat-shops," its revolutionary clubs. He learnt that ten cents was wealth, and an old lady with a heavy bag an angel out of heaven. By paths of incredible hardship he rose to be an odd-job man, and subsequently to the proud post of hand-trucksman in an implement factory. He even began to look forward to the time when an ordinary artisan would deign to regard him as an equal. But that hope was not realised in Chicago, for the hand-trucksman went West, and in the agricultural districts found himself positively at a premium. Farmers stopped him on the road and begged him to tarry at a dollar a day and his board. The demand for labour—any sort of labour—outside a few big industrial centres was "amazing," and Mr. Wyckoff was informed that it was practically constant throughout the year.

The last hundred pages of the book do much to take away the painful impression of the first two hundred and fifty; and one is forced to the conclusion that America, despite Chicago, is, indeed, a land of plenty for all.

Often as I look back upon the two thousand miles of country crossed, apart from the splendour of it—the almost overwhelming impression that it leaves of boundless empire wherein a growing, intelligent, industrious, God-fearing people are slowly working out great ends in industrial achievement and personal character and in national life . . . apart from all this, the strongest sense which possesses one in any retrospect of a long, laborious expedition like mine is that of a wide land which teems with opportunities open to energy and patient toil. Awful suffering there is among workers who are in the clutch of illness . . . pitiful degradation there is among many who lack imagination to see a way and the energy to pursue it . . . deep depravity and unutterable misery there are in the great congested labour centres, many of whose conditions are the price we pay for our economic freedom. But the broad fact remains that the sun never shone upon a race of civilised men whose responsibilities were greater and whose problems were more charged with the welfare of mankind, among whom energy and thrift and perseverance and ability were surer of their just rewards, and where there were so many and such various chances of a successful and honourable career.

We will conclude by giving our opinion that these are not the inexpensive vapourings of a facile optimist, but the carefully considered conclusions of a rigidly impartial and thoroughly informed intelligence—an intelligence which more than most has "seen life steadily and seen it whole."

Mr. Palgrave's Life.

Francis Turner Palgrave: His Journals, and Memories of his Life. By Gwenllian F. Palgrave. (Longmans. 10s. 6d.)

We have more than once ventured to protest against certain modern biographies in which details and domesticities, which the public has no business to—and, as a matter of fact, often does not want to—know, are offered to it by precisely the person whose fitness for the task, owing to the natural want of perspective, is least—a near relative. Such a book is Miss Palgrave's life of that kindly and scholarly man, the late Professor of Poetry at Oxford. Far too much is here printed of which the interest, save to the limited circle of Palgrave's own friends, is extremely slight; not a little which is even a trifle ridiculous. That a father should write childish letters to a child is excusable; but to gravely reprint them years after in a serious book is not. This is the kind of thing we mean:

I told a certain wonderful baby what you said about her, and she grunted a little to show that she was pleased.

Her godpapa came all the way from Kensington to see her, but she only pouted at him, naughty girl! Did you have any children going about with flowers and dressed up yesterday? I saw some poor little things going about in horrid London, and was so sorry for them.

Palgrave will, of course, be best remembered as the compiler of the Golden Treasury—the first Golden Treasury—and for that he deserves the gratitude due to a pioneer. Whether its vogue endures or will endure may be doubted. We do not ourselves think it is the best of the many anthologies now available. But there will always be those of the present generation who owe to it their first introduction into the felicities and splendours of English lyric. Miss Palgrave prints an interesting letter of her father's to Tennyson, in which he describes the genesis of the idea in a discussion with the poet in Cornwall, and the careful search through Chalmers' English Poets which formed the basis of the selection. From another letter it appears that Palgrave was glad to find the book "arouse thought and discussion about poetry, which I regard as the causa finalis of such a book much more than mere acquiescence in any one person's selection"; and also that he once had "a fancy to make a collection of English love poems only, of all dates; to include a few omitted from the Golden Treasury as too high-kilted—i.e., such as Spenser's "Epithalamium," some of Sidney's sonnets, Moore, &c.—all to be called 'Under the Rose': the tone being never coarse, but decidedly amorous." Mr. William Watson, by the way, carried out this idea in the Lyric Love, which he compiled for the "Golden Treasury" series.

Of the miscellaneous letters from and to friends which make up the larger portion of this biography, the most interesting is a very characteristic one from Browning, from which this is an extract:

You write the article? No, indeed! Were you minded to review me, you might easily have much to say against the general cut of my coat, but would not—I fancy—go grubbing among my old wardrobe of thirty years' accumulation, and, picking off here a quaint button, there a queer tag and tassel, exhibit them as my daily wear. Bless us! in the course of my musical exercises, and according to the moods of many a year, I may have treated myself to an occasional whistle, cherrup, and guffaw, besides the regular symphonies—and even in these it's not unlikely that "Strafford," written twenty-eight years ago, is far from perfect; whereupon . . . but see the Review and then smash it! I had supposed that the ramshackle old Edinburgh, under a succession of sleepy editors, was cleaned in the crannies; but—body o' me!—here's a bug again!

Palgrave was a man of considerable reading and refined tastes. But he was a sadly mediocre poet, and by no means a first-rate critic either of art or letters. You would hardly gather that from what is said about him in this book, but when you find him preferring Flaxman to Blake, or calling Tennyson "ten times a wider and deeper thinker than Browning," you get a hint.

A Schoolmaster on Education.

A Dialogue on Moral Education. F. H. Matthews, M.A. (Swan Sonnenschein. 3s. 6d.)

This is a well-meant attempt to lure the unsuspecting secondary schoolmaster to a contemplation of the outworks of psychology, a science which, so far, the great majority of practical teachers have treated with utter disregard; or, at best, have viewed with mingled sentiments of aversion, suspicion, and derision. For our own part, we are desirous that the psychologist pure and simple should be allowed every opportunity of exhausting his ethical energies in theorising to his heart's content. All we beg is, that he be carefully excluded from the classroom. One Pestalozzi or one Froebel on the staff of a school would speedily bring either ruin on the institution or a term's notice on himself. Mr. Herbert Spencer as a philosopher we suppose all men revere, but would any head master who had read what Dr. Ridding styled his "brilliant extravaganza" on education appoint him to take a form? Mr. Matthews, however, is not a mere theorist, but a working head master, who, at the same time, is possessed of a taste for generalising on his experience; consequently he gives us plenty of food for thought.

In plan, his book is cast in the shape of a kind of triangular duel, in which the principals are a doctor, who represents faddism; a parson, who represents orthodoxy; and a schoolmaster, who naturally represents common sense. Their respective wives act, on the whole, as seconds, though from time to time, when things get exciting, they cut in and convert the proceedings into a chance-medley, in which everybody knives and gouges everybody else. Still the scimmages bring about collisions of brain, and brain, whereby many excellent notions are hammered out, for which we must refer our readers to the book itself. We should like, though, in passing, to endorse the opinion that a head master harangues his boys from the cathedra, or from the pulpit, with far greater effect if a layman than if a cleric. "He is probably," says Mr. Matthews, "at a disadvantage if he is in orders. Boys are apt to treat the addresses of a clergyman merely as a part of his professional duty, and accordingly to think that, while such laws as he expounds may be good for the clergy, they do not much matter for the rest of mankind. With a layman preaching there can be no such suspicion." The question as to whether the education of the sexes should continue to be conducted separately or not is examined in a temperate and sensible manner. That mixed schools will in time become a recognised element in our educational arrangements there can be little doubt, but at present we should hesitate to say more than that, while as yet clearly outside the range of practical politics, the matter is ripe for academic discussion. Twenty years ago even thus much would hardly have been conceded.

The inter-dependence of morality and health is considered. "The more perfect the body the more easy is it to perfect the moral character. . . . Does it not stand to reason that the man whose bodily functions work with least effort and resistance is likely to have more energy to spare for moral growth, and that the cheerfulness which results from unimpeded health is a most valuable ally to morality?" A quite correctly professional religio medici. But the doctor is not always so sane. We have said that he sustains the rôle of "crank" in the confabulation, a part which sometimes lands him in strange positions. "That all work deserves to be honoured should be one of the primary objects of the educator to impress; the young should be taught that to despise another because his work is more unpleasant than their own is a mark of uncharitableness—of the meanest of vices." This is well enough. But when he proceeds to add, "the more degrading the work, the more should be the honour," weird visions rise before us of his land of charitable logic: of knackers dubbed knights, of scavengers sworn of the Privy Council, of sewermen discharging their philanthropic functions decked out in all the glories of the Garter and the splendours of the Star. In fact, the doctor, the parson, and the ladies are perhaps set up a little too obviously as dummies on which the schoolmaster may display his prowess; the ladies, indeed, are craftily discounted by being made to couch their remarks occasionally in ungrammatical English. This imparts a cruelly life-like touch to the fair combatants.

One of Mr. Matthews's debaters is made to say that "among some wise suggestions these wonderful men [the psychologists] have uttered a vast deal of impossible nonsense." Mr. Matthews's book contains many wise suggestions, some impossible nonsense.

Impressions.

Genius Loci: Notes on Places. By VERNON LEE. (Grant Richards. 5s. net)

THE comparison with Mrs. Meynell's Spirit of Place is inevitable, but it need not be laboured: for, in spite of a common interest in the finer sensations and a common love for Italy, the two ladies garner very different harvests from their peregrinations. Mrs. Meynell's is obviously the more definite personality: whatever she sees and whatever she records is coloured by her personal vision, takes the note of her personal creed. It has passed through the crucible of a temperament. Vernon Lee strikes you as far more dependent on her environment. Like the film of an extraordinary sensitive camera she registers faithfully the most delicate and varied impressions: but she brings far less of her own to the interpretation of these. There is a facility and even felicity of historical comment; a touch of whimsical fancy; a wise epicureanism of sentiment and philosophy. And all this is just enough to put a certain human interest into the landscape. But in the main it is her function just to see and to translate what she sees, her impressions, into the daintiest and most decorative of euphuistic English. Her miniature work is most charming and makes the temptation to quote irresistible. Here, for instance, is a vine-dresser of the Loire:

An old man, rather like a tidy satyr, with a tub of sulphate of copper and a vine syringe; his neat cotton clothes and his own old person all dyed an exquisite bluish verdigris green; a bronze genius loci or prosperous old-world Touraine.

This is Dieppe:

White and black, grey, slate colour; but picked out, of course, with brilliant red and orange of carnations or nasturtiums here and there on the balconies, as the grey dress and grey blond hair of a Velasquez Infanta are relieved by minute scarlet bows, by scarlet little mouth. Down side streets, glimpses of towers and flying buttresses of the cathedral, of porches and steep dormered roofs, and pavilions on some other church. . . . This lovely little flamboyant cathedral, all flowerlike with star and stem, its carved stone further carved and engraved by the centuries, seen thus under the pale, new morning sky, is a thing I shall not easily forget.

And here is Siena:

That mediæval town of Siena as I saw it last, rising with rose-coloured battlements and towers above the still sapless vines, the first green wheat, the cherry blossom of the arid little hills.

And here a Mantuan lake:

The pale blue water, edged with green reeds, the poplars and willows of the green plain beyond; a blue vagueness of Alps, and, connecting it all, the long castle bridge with its towers of pale geranium-coloured bricks.

"She turns it all to favour and to prettiness!" Well, yes, "prettiness": that is precisely the word. It is as pretty as the most delicate confectionery, and, like confectionery when taken in bulk, sooner or later it undeniably cloy. You begin to long for something with a little more of the incisive qualities of style, for the keen dry blade of the intellect, for a page or two of Gibbon, say, or of Voltaire. However, it is not necessary to take it in bulk, and for a Capuan ten minutes or so one of these pretty essays, preferably one of the Italian ones, can be thoroughly recommended.

"As You Like It is to me the most bird-haunted spot in letters. . . . I am no melodramatist, but a Skelt-drunken boy; I am, I know it, the man who went out to find the Eldorado of romantic comedy, and who means to come in sight of it."—From R. L. Stevenson's Letters in "Scribner's."

HOLLAND AND THE HOLLANDERS. BY DAVID S. MELDRUM.

This is not a guide-book. It is a book to read, mark, and inwardly digest before booking a passage to the Hook of Holland. And then you may take it with you. Mr. Meldrum writes no preface, but its dedication to "Many Friends in Holland," and its internal characteristics, show that it is the fruit of many visits. Mr. Meldrum has had time and opportunity to learn Holland, not by its ornaments and fringes only, but in its texture. He knows the lie of the land, and has that eye for physical marks which can be acquired only in time. We cannot better illustrate the quality of Mr. Meldrum's knowledge of Holland than by quoting such a passage as this:

The blue Veluwe. The sandy Veluwe. Here we have the same variety of scenery as in 't Gooi; but there is more water, the hills are higher, and the woods are larger, some of them, like the Beekbergsche and Soerensche Bosch, the largest in the country. A thin population lives on a poor agriculture and the cultivation of wood, and where the mossy sheep-sheds shelter under the trees, we see those shepherds and those sheep to whom the genius of the painter Mauve was dedicated. On the left beyond Meppel is the Land van Vollenhoven, where the cattle meadows roll away into Friesland. On the right is Twente, with many little rivers that rise in the hills in the east; to all appearances another Achterhoek of Gelderland, only that here there are industries of which Gelderland knows nothing, and corn takes the place of rye and buckwheat. To the north are peat lands that stretch away into desolate Drente.

It must not be supposed that Mr. Meldrum keeps to unbeaten tracks. On the contrary, he admits that the "tourist area" of Holland contains all that is most characteristic of the country. To expound Holland by its physical formation, its history, arts, employments, hinterlands, and its government, is Mr. Meldrum's scheme; and we think he carries it out admirably. He has the sense of the typical, and words for it. Mr. Meldrum has illustrated his pages from the paintings of Dutch artists. A good book, and one that stands alone in its scope and method. TENNYSON.

BY STEPHEN GWYNN.

To sit down to Tennyson's works by request and say how they strike one and point out excellences is no unenviable task. It is always pleasant to embroider on a favourite theme. This is practically what Mr. Gwynn has done in this admirable little book, the latest volume in the "Victorian Era" series. Once the opening biographical chapter is out of the way, his enjoyment begins and continues until the end—or, perhaps, not quite to the end, where he is engaged in finding Tennyson's exact place in literature, but nearly to that point. Mr. Gwynn's taste in poetry is good, his knowledge is considerable: he writes with unmistakable clarity, and his temper is just. Tennyson enthusiasts will, perhaps, be disappointed at the infrequency of superlatives, while those limited minds which cannot hold both Browning and Tennyson, and, therefore, let Tennyson go, will be disappointed too, for other reasons. We do not say that Mr. Gwynn is always right; but he is always thoughtful and always himself, which is more interesting. (Blackie. 2s. 6d.)

THE HISTORY OF SCOTLAND. VOL. I. BY P. HUME BROWN.

Mr. Hume Brown claims with justice for his work the title of the first compendious history of Scotland. Scots histories we have indeed had in plenty. The excellent work of Patrick Fraser Tytler has never been wholly superseded. The lengthy history of Hill Burton, just because of its greater detail, is already partly out of date; and the same criticism applies, though less aptly, to Dr.

Skene's Celtic Scotland. The materials collected by the local historian and the societies for the preservation and publication of ancient records await the man who shall marshal them into connected history. Mr. Hume Brown's work is confessedly a mere survey, but it is a well-informed and vigorous sketch—the work of a man who knows his authorities. He is in no sense the picturesque historian, and the most sensational events in one of the most romantic of the world's histories are chronicled with dry fidelity. Nor is he the psychologist in history, for he has no care for subtle motives, though in an awkward and roundabout way he generally succeeds in arriving at a fairly shrewd estimate of his characters. The main virtue of the book is that it is succinct and clear, honestly confessing the fact when means of information are scanty or doubtful, and never shirking a difficulty. It aims also at giving a brief survey of the literature and the social life of each epoch. To us the most valuable part of the work seems to be the constitutional part, for the constitutional history of Scotland still awaits its Stubbs or Palgrave. The early narrative of the strife between Scot, Briton, and Angle, between Celt and Saxon and Norman, is comparatively full, though we may look to Mr. Andrew Lang's forthcoming volume for a more elaborate statement. Perhaps the best chapter is that on the difficult reign of David II., the history of whose last fourteen years differs materially from Tytler and Hill Burton, and is based on Mr. Burnett's Introduction to the second volume of the Exchequer Rolls of Scotland. Many of the old dramatic tales are examined and found wanting; the entertaining Pitscottie is regarded with deep mistrust; and on all crucial points the evidence of Bishop Leslie, Ferrerius, or Buchanan is preferred. Still, we are thankful to find that Mr. Hume Brown is not a consistent iconoclast. The story of James I. is still left to us more or less intact, and we are glad to find him opposing Mr. J. T. Brown's contention against the Royal authorship of The King's Quhair. We had thought that the replies of M. Jusserand and Mr. Rait, of New College, had effectually disposed of the fancy. ADMIRAL SIR W. R. MENDS.

BY B. S. MENDS.

From his house at Alverstoke the late Admiral Mends watched the assembling of the vast fleet which was called together in the Solent to celebrate Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee. He was then in his eighty-fifth year, and had known sixty years of naval life. But before half the vessels had arrived Admiral Mends was failing; and when the royal salute was fired by that stupendous naval armament on June 26, 1897, he was unconscious; before the illumination of the fleet began he had breathed his last. And what need we add, save that this end was worthy of Admiral Mends's career? He was of England's best manhood and brain. We have many such men; their biographies arrive like old Teméraires, and long may they do so! In Admiral Mends we had an ideal organiser of naval transport. Indeed, he was the first head of the Transport Department at the Admiralty, founded by an Order in Council in 1862. In 1864 this Department took over the Indian reliefs, and it was on Mends's requirements that the Chief Constructor of the Navy designed those five grand troopships whose names are household words in so many English homes: the Serapis, the Crocodile, the Euphrates, the Jumna, and the Malabar. No wonder that Admiral Mends looked on these ships with pride, called them his "old babies" when they passed his retreat on Stokes Bay, and held that "the regular passage of these great white ships, laden with troops, to and fro through the Canal, the whole scheme working regularly and without a hitch, year in and year out, did much to enhance the national prestige." Admiral Mends had learned practical transport work in the Crimea, where also he seems to have imbibed—not without reason—that rooted disbelief in our military organisation which led him, in the later years of his life, to predict a breakdown in that Department when a real strain should come upon it. In his final years of rest and retirement his fears on this point were somewhat relieved. This biography of Admiral Mends by his son is of great general interest, and it abounds in points which naval and military readers will value. (Murray. 16s. net.)

POEMS.

BY A. BERNARD MIALL.

Mr. Miall stands out from the ranks of new poets. He has himself well in hand; he controls words, and is not controlled by them; his thoughts are his own, and are worthy. He looks round about him and finds much that is good in man and in nature and daily life, and he expresses the fact well. He is not the poet of the youthful dream—all fire and fury and fine rapture and miraculous combinations of words: we know always just how his work is done. He is a gentleman and scholar expressing himself in verse. We quoted some stanzas of Mr. Miall's last week. Here he is in a more lyrical mood:

WINTER'S JOY.

By wold andholt and valley Scampered the scouring breeze, No flush was on the heather, No leaf was on the trees.	The wind of time was blowing And buffeting my mind; It tore my sad old memories And swept them out behind.
The sea and heaven of winter Met in a steeled embrace; The wind leapt off the Channel And shouted in my face.	And oh! I said, if winter Doth not abash the earth, If being poor as Adam She shows a sturdy mirth,
Far thro' the seething coppice The whispering drift was brown, Asway were all the branches, And every leaf was down.	Take all my thickets harbour, O stately blast of Time! Bare boughs may chaunt the carol Of poverty sublime!
But all the trees were shouting, And all the hills were sweet; The rascal wind was humming A tune to stir my feet.	For if in surly winter My heart shall dare to sing, Fate, thou art all defeated! What will it be in spring?

(Lane.)

POEMS OF EMILE VERHAEREN.

Emile Verhaeren is the young Belgian writer whose play "Les Aubes" ("The Dawn") we reviewed a few weeks ago. In this book Miss Alma Strettell, who is already known by her Lullabies of Many Lands and her excellent versions, in conjunction with Carmen Sylva, of Roumanian folk-songs, offers translations of a selection of Verhaeren's poems drawn from his volumes Les Villages Illusoires, Les Heures Claires, and Les Apparus dans mes Chemins. Verhaeren is both symbolist and similit. Most things that he sees resemble other things, and most things stand for other things, and all is vague and mystical and melancholy. Some of his images seem to us to be unpermissibly unnatural. The first poem, for example, called "Rain," describes the rain tearing at the window-pane with its "nails of grey." Yet the effect of the whole poem is undeniable: one is as depressed and sodden at the end of it as if the rain had really been falling all day. In everything in the book we are conscious of definite thought and the desire to make beauty, but the result falls often below the intention. At any rate, Verhaeren is not easy reading for the Briton. Miss Strettell's efforts are commendable, but we cannot say that she ever suggests that the author's own medium was English—as a translator should. (Lane.)

THE "GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE" LIBRARY. PART XI.

The Gentleman's Magazine Library, as every student knows, is a classified collection of the chief contents of the Gentleman's Magazine from 1731 to 1868, edited by Mr. G. Laurence Gomme. The English topography section, of which this is the eleventh part, is edited by Mr. F. A. Milne. In the new volume we reach Staffordshire and Suffolk, and a mine of curious lore is presented. It is a pity that, in a day of so much activity in periodical literature, there is no one now quite carrying on the excellent work of Sylvanus Urban. For the want of a receptacle for it corresponding to the old Gentleman's Magazine, a vast deal of quaint and valuable information must go unrecorded. (Stock.)

HAUNTS AND HOBBIES OF AN INDIAN OFFICIAL.

BY MARK THORNHILL.

Mr. Thornhill once wrote a book on his experiences as an Indian magistrate during the Mutiny. He now tells us how he employed his leisure when there were no alarms of war and massacre to disturb the routine of duty. Sent to a station on the Ganges, Mr. Thornhill found that his new residence had a garden which had run wild. Not being sure of the length of his stay, he left the garden as it was, and turned to the study of its living inhabitants, especially ants. He could also look down on the dry river bed of the Ganges in the hot season and watch the alligators, otters, reptiles, birds, and other creatures which had their home in or about the stream. Mr. Thornhill's gossip is as interesting as his observation was keen. Here is his account of the issue of a swarm of white ants:

The house I was then occupying was a bungalow, and, as is the case with many bungalows, the inner walls were constructed of merely sun-dried bricks, and in the recesses of one wall a colony of white ants had established a nest. It was evening; I was commencing dinner. I heard behind me a buzzing sound; I turned, and from a hole near the bottom of the wall I beheld a fountain of young white ants ascending. They reached the ceiling, and then the descent commenced. They alighted by thousands on the table, and there shook off their wings. In a few minutes the cloth, the plates, the glasses, even the lamp-shades, were covered with the little white, feeble crawling creatures. The fountain of ants continued to play for at least ten minutes. When next morning the floor was swept, the wings that the ants had shaken off filled a large basket. What became of the ants themselves I cannot say.

Mr. Thornhill varies his observations in natural history with notes on native habits and customs, including the marvellous achievements of native "alchemists" and fakirs. A pleasant book; one to read and keep. (Murray. 6s.)

COMRADES ALL.

BY W. J. MATHAMS.

Mr. Mathams, who has already addressed to sailors a little volume of sound advice, Jack Ahoy! now performs the same office for soldiers. His point is, that Thomas Atkins may as well be a God-fearing and kindly fellow as not; and both in prose and verse Mr. Mathams urges moral courage upon him. At the end we find a calendar of maxim shots, those for the ensuing week being: "April 1. He like a soldier fell—but not when he was drunk. April 2. The awkward squad may be veterans yet. April 3. Havelock's saints were none the worse for knee drill. April 4. A man's spirit should always be on active service. April 5. The longest night will have its réveille. April 6. Never be comrades in crime. April 7. Every inch a soldier, every inch a man. April 8. Go like a cavalry man when you are going to help a comrade." Lord Roberts contributes a cordial little preface. (Chatto & Windus. 2s.)

TRUE TALES OF THE INSECTS.

BY L. N. BADENOCH.

Another contribution to the nursery's natural history library. The tales are not, however, dramatic narratives with insects for heroes, as might be supposed from the title. The book consists of straightforward records of various phases of insect life, set down by a naturalist. The young entomologist who is taking his hobby seriously should be very glad to have this book, the value of which is increased by its illustrations. (Chapman & Hall. 12s.)

Fiction.

Cousin Ivo. By Mrs. Andrew Dean.
(A. & C. Black. 6s.)

IF the name of Anthony Hope had been appended to this story we should not have been surprised. As a rule, a writer cannot excite in his readers a strong reminiscence of a contemporary without, in a literary sense, losing caste. But we feel that Mrs. Dean has the perfect knack of the well-bred romance, the geography whereof is vague but German, the villainy black but associated with prowess, and the chivalry a nicely-groomed edition of Malory's heroes in the person of a nineteenth century English gentleman of splendid physique and good family. Mrs. Dean, perhaps wisely, does not allow a duel to take place in her story, but we have the satisfaction of continually expecting one until we see Cousin Ivo, the Rupert of the narrative, borne away on a litter, the victim of a thunder-bolt.

There is reason to write cynically of such novels as Cousin Ivo, but not unkindly. They award poetic justice, and they stir that ancient pulse of heroism whose throb is now only felt when a sympathetic finger is laid on it. In the novel under notice there is air and action, and an ingenuous pretence that ordinary things are happening in prosy England while Ivoes are drugging goblets and pushing princesses into wells in the delectable Duchy of Züringen. The melodramatic passages are struck off at a white heat. One could clap one's hands like a schoolboy at the reception of the challenge of the base and profligate Ivo. "I refuse," said the Prince, looking him full in the face, "and you know what that means when I say it to you."

Mrs. Dean is, of course, as well equipped for writing the pseudo-German romance as any English writer could be, and the gift for dialogue which she evinced in A Splendid Cousin and other novels stands her here in good stead. We think her general effect would have been neater if she had avoided the use of the diary as a form of narrative. To have done without it would have enhanced the considerable interest she maintains, by leaving the fate of the diarist in suspense. It stands to reason that a person who writes the history of a terrible experience has survived it, and consequently in the recital we miss the thrilling curiosity of those who listened for the doctor's step.

One of the Grenvilles. By Sidney Royse Lysaght.
(Macmillan. 6s.)

MR. LYSAGHT's new novel belongs essentially to the quiet order of fiction. There is one romantic episode, when the hero is made captive in the Soudan and brought into personal contact with the Khalifa. But this is merely a brief incident at the outset of the story; and it is handled, moreover, in a subdued fashion, with as little sensational detail as may be. There is no small skill in the quiet realism by which it is, nevertheless, made interesting. The rest of the novel is purely English and domestic. It is emphatically what one would call a pleasant book. There is no attempt at brilliancy, in dialogue, narrative, or description. The characters are ordinary, without marked features of good or evil; none of them is even strikingly humorous, and there is no great call on the emotions. To maintain a continuous flow of interest in the gentle procession of such a story is not easy; but Mr. Lysaght has accomplished it. The fine old Captain Grenville and his two amiably eccentric naval companions on board his ship, the Pegasus, provide some very pleasant comedy in an entertaining and ably-written book, in which the plot is the least thing. But why did Mr. Lysaght introduce the needless tragedy of Mab—a character having no manner of connexion with the plot?

A Son of Empire. By Morley Roberts.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

MR. MORLEY ROBERTS puts in his characters in strong black and white, with no subtleties of half-tones or psychological flummeries of that sort, and the result is that his serious personages are apt to be melodramatic, and his comic ones to border on the farcical. Farce, certainly, is in the composition of his British matron, mother of the heroine, whose conventionality reaches a point of hysteria, and who rarely meets her daughter in the course of the story without a page or two of Billingsgate. Nor are we in the least convinced by the beau sabreur of a hero, or by the vindictive and blustering old Adjutant-General, who rarely enters or leaves a room without a "damn." Madge Gretton, on the other hand, though a foolish, romantic young woman, and badly smitten with scarlet fever, is not unattractive. She has our reluctant sympathies when she falls in love with Black Blundell at first sight in Switzerland, has lunch with him on the top of a mountain, and allows him to kiss her under her sunshade at the railway station. Afterwards she forges a telegram from the Secretary of State to the authorities in India requesting that her hero may be given a chance of distinguishing himself in a brush with the hill tribes. The man, on the other hand, strikes us as rather a brute. Readers of modern biographies may amuse themselves by tracking portraits in these two characters. Of course Mr. Roberts can tell a story, and the vigour of his narrative, especially when he gets to the fighting, will atone in many eyes for his defects of psychology and art. This is evidently the part of the book which he enjoyed himself, and in writing it he was unable to stop to consider his English. Whence you get such sentences as this: "But he had little time to think of her after that night; what with driving the transport and commissariat chaps into doing the utterly impossible, which under his influence they did, and were quite surprised at themselves." It is slipshod, to say the least of it. When Mr. Morley Roberts used to write of what he had observed he was more brutal, but not so Ouidaesque.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE CONFOUNDING OF CAMELIA.

BY ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK.

Miss Sedgwick's novel, The Dull Miss Archinard, was clever and pleasant and engrossing; her new one opens in a way that suggests that these adjectives will serve again. Camelia is an original, charming, and selfish heroine, whose social successes and love affairs we are called to witness. Quite early Camelia was too much for her mother. But, as Mrs. Jedsley, the last rector's widow, put it: "The very way in which she says 'Oh, Camelia!' is flattering to the girl. Her mother's half-shocked admiration encourages her in the belief that she is very naughty and very clever; and really while Camelia talks Lady Paton looks like a hare under a bramble." . . . The alarmed retirement of Lady Paton's attitude was pictorially apparent forthwith." (Heinemann. 6s.)

ONE POOR SCRUPLE.

BY MRS. WILFRID WARD.

Mrs. Ward calls this "A Seven Weeks' Story." This does not mean that she wrote it in seven weeks, for on the next page we learn that it has occupied her at intervals for seven years. It is a complex story of upper-class family and social life, and is mainly concerned with Roman Catholic circles. (Longmans. 6s.)

THE DRONES MUST DIE.

BY MAX NORDAU.

"His idea of life was founded on the maxim that there was nothing one could not buy for money; it was left for a woman to teach him that the sole remaining thing to which he attached any value was not to be had for money." The plot and the moral of this novel are concentrated in this sentence from p. 393. (Heinemann. 6s.)

MARGUERITE DE ROBERVAL.

BY T. G. MARQUIS.

A romance of the days of Jacques Cartier, the fifteenth century French sailor and explorer. We begin with passion and duelling of the Dumasian type—doublets and hose, plumed hats, rapiers and honour. Later we go to sea and the drama is continued on the Isle of Demons. There is a deal of life and death in the story, which is well written. (Unwin. 6s.)

A MODERN MERCENARY.

BY K. & HESKETH PRICHARD.

We are here introduced to the Duchy of "Maäsau." The hero John Rallywood, has lost his fortune and has obtained a commission in the little army of the Duchy. Just as he is beginning to despair of active service the Duchy begins to go "to the devil," and trouble is indicated by the presence of Stokes of the Times and another "big daily" correspondent. Rallywood concludes to stay: hence these bright pages of love and fighting and conspiracy. There is good dialogue; hear Blivinski, the Russian diplomatist:

"Britain loves to feign the Pharisee. We smile—we others—because we understand that her rule and ours is after all the same—self-interest."

"If that be the case we come back to the law of the Beast," said Counsellor.

The Russian put his gloved hand upon the open door and looked back over his shoulder at Counsellor.

"Always, my dear friend, by very many turnings—but always." (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

AN EARTHLY FULFILMENT.

BY JOHN REAY WATSON.

A love drama with several leading characters. Intrigues and complicated relationships. Nemesis. And for background a mining colony in Australia, where "little evidence of leisure of life, or love of it, is presented. Yet children are born here, and men die; life opens and closes on tones of grey." And this story opens and closes on tones of grey. (Unwin. 6s.)

NORTHERN LIGHTS.

BY E. D'ESPÉRANCE.

By one who has studied spiritualistic beliefs in Scandinavia, Bavaria, the Tyrol, and elsewhere, together with faith-healing, water-finding, and other mysteries. The seven "psychic stories" related in the book were picked up by the author in Saxony, and he vouches for their truth. Even names, where they are given, are correct, and in most cases the stories have been checked by the actors therein. (Redway. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE DEIL'S GRANNIE.

BY J. PARRINGTON-POOLE.

"The male portion of the fishing populace of Lynne baptized each other anew, and young and old abode by the names thus bestowed upon them." Hence the characters in this story go by such names as "The Moon," "The Walrus," "The Bullphunt," and "The Deil." The story is melodramatic, and ends with stiletto work: "John Erskine was lying dead on the fire-rug. Blood oozed from a wound in the heart." The dedication is to Mr. Hall Caine. (Digby, Long & Co. 3s. 6d.)

WILD HUMPHREY KYNASTON.

BY HENRY HUDSON.

A romance of the "Robin Hood of Shropshire in the Reign of Henry the Seventh." The author explains that the story is founded on stories of Wild Humphrey imparted to him by his mother, whose ancestor he was. Mr. Hudson has built up his story with great care from information discovered in the Record Office and the British Museum; but such an origin is not very inspiring to the reader, who may also fight shy of nearly forty pages of Appendix, containing a will in Latin and passages from the Transactions of the Shropshire Archaeological and Natural History Society. The illustrations are photographs. (Kegan Paul. 6s. net.)

SHUEY PINGSIN.

BY AN ENGLISHMAN.

This is a boiling down of the Chinese romance Haoukeuchuen—once translated by Bishop Percy, and also by Sir John Davis under the title of The Fortunate Union. The present translation is an attempt to convey some idea of a Chinese novel in the form of an English short story. (Kegan Paul. 3s. 6d.)

“The Stress of the Uns.”

THIS expression of Mr. Swinburne's came back to me with a significance unintended by its author as I was reading Mrs. Meynell's last volume of essays, The Spirit of Place. Line after line, paragraph after paragraph, the inconsiderable prefix “un”—“untransferable gravity,” “unfaded life,” “unclothed earth”—sent its low hammer of emphasis along the pages, and lighted them with the glamour of its inevitable contrast—the very shine and shadow of reality.

“Un”—Has the place of this primitive-looking particle ever fully been determined in literature? It is evident at the outset that in word-combinations where affirmative is placed in close juxtaposition with negative the mere antipathy in meaning must lend force of suggestion. The affirmative stands up in rich colour as a foil to the negative; the negative sweeps its night over the vivid picture of day. Even unskilful artificers may produce their shock of the unexpected by instinctive feeling for the prefix “un”; its effects are almost unsurpassable in the hands of a master. Take this curious parallel in idea, afforded by a verse from “In Memoriam,” and one from the “Elegy.” Tennyson recognises the value of his negative by giving it importance of stress and place:

Unlov'd, the sunflower shining fair
Ray round with flames her disk of seed,
And many a rose-carnation feed
With summer spice the humming air.

In the better-known lines of Gray, the negative is hidden away in corners, with proportionate loss of emphasis:

Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The dark, unfathom'd caves of ocean bear;
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

Then, how the solemn shadow of the negative burdens with tragedy those lines of the poor Ghost in “Hamlet”:

Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin,
Unhousel'd, disappointed, unaneled . . .

And not only does the “un” achieve intensity by the mechanical combination of affirmative and negative; it fuses these sometimes into a chemical combination wherein each loses its original qualities in the unity of a new product. Such, for instance, is “uneffectual” in these lines:

The glow-worm shows the matin to be near,
And 'gins to pale his uneffectual fire . . .

Such is “unsunned” in this couplet from “The Prince's Quest”:

Hoarding the cool and leafy silcutness
In many an unsunned hollow and hid recess.

Such is the splendid negative in “Adonais,” not to be equalled by any single epithet:

And the green lizard, and the golden snake,
Like unimprison'd flames, out of their trance awake.

Truly, to paraphrase Touchstone, “much virtue in an un.”

The beauty and force of “un” combinations finds ample illustration in Mrs. Meynell's volume, The Spirit of Place. It is from the root of the “uns” that this whole passage springs and flowers: “Of all unfamiliar bells, those which seem to hold the memory most surely after but one hearing are bells of an unseen cathedral of France, when one has arrived by night. . . . They mingle with the sound of feet in unknown streets, they are the voices of an unknown tower.” Again, note the crescendo of emphasis that swells in the following sentence from simple to compound: “We ought to leave blank, unvexed, and unencumbered with paper patterns the ceilings and walls of a simple house.” What note-suggestions the “un” words strike. That unvexed, how pregnant! Or read of the modern foot, “undone, unspecialised, sent back to lower forms of indiscriminate life.” The negation holds within its arms all the pathos of the might-have-been. The stress of place is even more forcibly used in the following from “Solitude”: “Their share in the enormous solitude which is the common, unbounded, and virtually illimitable possession of all mankind has lapsed, unclaimed.” Note, too, in the following extract, the effect of inevitable pause on the word “unready,” as contrasted with the swiftness of rain: “There is nothing in nature that so outstrips our unready eyes as the familiar rain.”

But beyond these rhetorical “un” effects—these arrangements of pause and position—Mrs. Meynell uses the prefix “un” in the creation of epithets that flash, many-faceted, with new significance. How one may brood over that expression, “the unfettered madman,” “the visible, flitting figure of the unfettered madman,” and yet leave unextracted the full essence of its meaning. It carries light into the very darkest places of the human soul. “The unrelapsing day.” Is not this the very keynote to “Habits and Consciousness”? Does not the “untravelling spirit of place” give us the first essay in little?

This inchoate little syllable holds within it the possibilities of exquisite music. Listen to this from “The Horizon”: “Not here or there, but with definite continuity the unseen unfolds.” Listen to this from “July”: “Not unbeloved is this serious tree, the elm, with its leaf sitting close, unthrill'd.” How delicate and clear is the rhythm of the “un” footsteps!

Finally, here is a beautiful passage wherein the stress of the “uns” gives not only emphasis, not only flashing meaning, not only music, but all these combined:

As for the poets, there is but one among so many of their bells that seems to toll with a spiritual music so loud as to be unforgotten when the mind goes up a little higher than the earth, to listen in thought to earth's untethered sounds. This is Milton's curfew, that sways across one of the greatest of all seashores of poetry—“the wide-watered.”

E. W.

Landor and Dickens.

IT is admitted that Landor's newly published letters to his young friend “Rose” (Lady Graves-Sawle) are so chosen and so edited as to exhibit the gentler side of a nature in which wildness and gentleness were strangely mixed. After reading them, the present writer has reverted to Boythorn, that delightful portrait of Landor in Bleak House. There the wildness and the gentleness have each their play, and each quality puts us in love with the other. Yet the letters to Lady Graves-Sawle bring their own little confirmations of the justness of that sportive portrait. “I could not fix the hour,” Landor writes in one of these letters, “for I never disappointed a lady.” In Bleak House Boythorn disappoints a whole family, who wait dinner for him. Who does not remember his magnificent entry?

“We have been misdirected, Jarndyce, by a most abandoned ruffian, who told us to take the road to the right instead of to the left. He is the most intolerable scoundrel on the face of the earth. His father must have been a most consummate villain ever to have such a son. I would have had that fellow shot without the least remorse!”

"Did he do it on purpose?" Mr. Jarndyce inquired.

"I have not the slightest doubt that the scoundrel has passed his whole existence in misdirecting travellers!" returned the other. "By my soul, I thought him the worst-looking dog I had ever beheld, when he was telling me to take the turning to the right. And yet I stood before that fellow face to face, and didn't knock his brains out!"

Dickens had a good foundation for this late arrival and these thunders. Charles Landor used to tell how his brother once lost his road to a friend's house where a party were waiting dinner for him, and startled a country bumpkin by the peremptory demand that he should either at once show him the way or have his throat cut on the spot. At Bleak House Landor's self-reproach exhausted itself in the declaration:

"By my soul, Jarndyce, if you had been married, I would have turned back at the garden gate and gone away to the remotest summits of the Himalaya Mountains sooner than I would have presented myself at this unreasonable hour. . . . By my life and honour, yes! I wouldn't be guilty of the audacious insolence of keeping a lady of the house waiting all this time for any earthly consideration. I would infinitely rather destroy myself—infinitely rather!"

Landor outdid the noblest Roman in his familiar invocation of suicide. Dickens himself used to tell this story:

At a friendly dinner at Gore House, when it was the most delightful of houses, his dress—say, his cravat or shirt collar—had become slightly disarranged on a hot evening, and Count d'Orsay laughingly called his attention to the circumstance as we rose from table. Landor became flushed and greatly agitated. "My dear Count d'Orsay, I thank you! My dear Count d'Orsay, I thank you from my soul for pointing out to me the abominable condition to which I am reduced! If I had entered the drawing-room and presented myself before Lady Blessington in so absurd a light, I would instantly have gone home, put a pistol to my head, and blown my brains out."

It will be remembered that Mr. Boythorn delighted the young people at Bleak House by producing a pet canary which perched on his forehead, even while that forehead was purple with wrath, and while, with voice and fist, the fiery guest was espousing Jarndyce's cause:

"There never was such an infernal cauldron as that Chancery on the face of the earth!" said Mr. Boythorn [the canary eating out of his hand]. "Nothing but a mine below it on a busy day in term time, with all its records, rules, and precedents collected in it, and every functionary belonging to it also, high and low, upward and downward, from its son, the Accountant-General to its father, the Devil, and the whole blown to atoms with ten thousand hundredweight of gunpowder, would reform it in the least!"

Dickens may have heard of Landor's affection for the two dormice given to him by his wife's relatives, of which he wrote: "These are great blessings."

It appears from Forster's Lives of Landor and Dickens—for they had the same biographer—that Dickens first saw Landor at Bath in 1840. Landor was then living at 35, St. James's-square in that city. It was under Landor's roof, and in his tropical presence, that the idea of Little Nell presented itself to Dickens. Landor used to claim this honour against all comers. Forster once put the question to him—was it so?

With tremendous emphasis he confirmed the fact . . . and added that he had never in his life regretted anything so much as his having failed to carry out an intention that he had formed respecting it; for he meant to have purchased that house, 35, St. James's-square, and then and there to have burnt it to the ground, to the end that no meaner association should ever desecrate the birthplace of Nell. Then he would pause a little, become conscious of our sense of his absurdity, and break out into a thundering peal of laughter.

It is also most interesting to remember that it was after one of his evenings with Dickens that Landor wrote the quatrain which has been called the moral of his life, a quatrain which Prof. Huxley quoted with solemn conviction in one of his last writings.

I strove with none, for none was worth my strife;
Nature I loved, and, next to nature, art;
I warmed both hands before the fire of life;
It sinks, and I am ready to depart.

The letters to Lady Graves-Sawle do but emphasise Landor's veneration for the author of David Copperfield, a book over which he shed many tears. "I hope you have enjoyed his Chimes. Wonderful man! Everything he writes is in the service of humanity. His genius was sent from Heaven to scatter good and wisdom upon the earth."

Stepping-tones.

TOM FOOL (according to the old diversion), agreeing to have his horse shod with twenty-four nails at the rate of a farthing for the first nail, a halfpenny for the second, a penny for the third, twopenny for the next, and so on, must pay in the result £17,476 5s. 3½d. for the shoeing of his horse. This was severe enough; but, if he had bargained that each of the twenty-four nails should be of a pattern different from its neighbours, and that he would provide horses sufficient in number to accommodate all the changes possible to the disposition of the twenty-four nails, to what sphere but the moon (which is, maybe, a sphere exhausted of all its own changes, and driven in despite to influence ours) would Tom Fool have sought to convey himself, away from an absurdly impossible task?

Now, there are not twenty-four, but twenty-six (no inconsiderable joint to the tail) letters in the English alphabet, and the changes rung upon these—or combinations from these—are called words; and there are, say, 70,000 or so words in the English vocabulary—a list that by no means exhausts the possible changes upon the letters. Indeed, any fool—even Tom himself—may coin a dozen new changes during any given minute; but, when it comes to the changes possible to be rung upon the 70,000 words! Cela ne se fait pas du jour au lendemain. It exceedeth the understanding; as likewise does it (man being a fanciful creature after all) that any fragmentary formal dispositions (alias phrases) of such among these words as are colloquial should ever have become so prescriptive as that to deviate from them could be pronounced a discomforting schism. Yet it is so; it is so, and it is a fact that a writer who endeavours to put an old thing in a new way (the intellect of man not being in a condition of steady relapse) shall seldom escape the accusation that he is obscure, or that he is artificial, or that he straineth after effect; most commonly, that he "deriveth" crankily from another.

Now it would appear that, out of all this limitless mass of possible combinations, a very wee proportion is appropriated to our colloquialisms, and that, according to the manner in which any one of us elects to present these colloquialisms, so is he credited or not with "style." In short, a good style, we must believe, is that arrangement of prescriptive words in prescriptive sentences that most satisfies the conservatism of the prescriptive understanding. It is an arbitrary restriction, sometimes rebelled against by those who are moved to the exploratory spirit—by those who quicken with the periodic consciousness that the conservative and the classical are not necessarily adequate to the expression of intricate modern moods.

Language, these may insist, is an imperfect vehicle for thought. It expresses the half, but not the demi-semi-tones. It is the piano out of which we strive to play our emotions; and the piano, as we know, is an incomplete instrument. How, then, to express, not the steps, but the shuffles of transition—all that soul that lies between, say, C sharp and D flat? It is not to be gathered from the text-books of harmony; neither are classical phrases meet for an expression of the inmost stepping-tones of the soul. To convey some shadowy sense of the inexpressible, we can only essay the use of what the laws of harmony pronounce to be discords—marriages, or combinations, of sounds hitherto kept apart, the significance of which we feel, though we cannot analyse our motives in applying them.

Great men—popular writers—have been moved to the schism before now, though it was not the schism that made them popular. Take a single illustration—from Tennyson:

. . . with a common will
Here, in this roaring moon of daffodil
And crocus, to put forth and brave the blast.

The italicised words are, in their context, neological—impressionistic. They subscribe to no law of plain-speaking. Submitted to the analysis of common (which is vulgar) sense, they acknowledge themselves ridiculous. What moon was ever built up of daffodil and crocus? What moon ever roared? Yet the daring phrase (who shall have the daring to deny it?) makes real in two words what descriptive classicism could not have compassed in fifty. A storm-blown spring! and yet that is not all. We see the scudding films of cloud, the wastes swept by warm drifts of eclipse, the dim yellow flowers bowing and shrugging. We see the brilliant globe anchored up there in the flood—stemming it—rocking on it; and through all the wide rush of the wind we marvel only at the motionlessness of the black shadows on the moor beneath. An impression has been given expression, in fact, by means of a discord.

Some day, no doubt, the schismatics who feel for, instead of subscribing to, modes of expression, will be allotted their high standing among the creeds.

Things Seen.

Contrast.

SPRING had come. The air blew warm on the cheek, like a caress, and a tender green glistened on the trees. To be abroad on that new morning, to be alive—that was enough. Such loveliness, such magic, was there in the new birth of spring, that the Iron Duke's iron horse in the great space that ranges about Hyde-park Corner seemed a live thing sniffing the herald scents of the world's recurring miracle. As I swung out of the park gates and crossed the roadway, my eye fell upon one who concentrated in himself the very spirit of that joyous hour. He was young; his figure was tall and straight, his complexion clear—oh, he was good to look upon: spring-time made flesh. He stood upon the curb in front of St. George's Hospital, smiling, tapping his stick upon the stone smiling at his own irresolute happiness. He neither wanted to go forward nor to go back. It was enough to be, and, as he stood there smiling, and tapping his stick upon the stone, the thought, surely, in this happy, healthy creature's mind was: "The spring has come again, again, and I am young." I smiled too, to think there should be such joy in the world.

Then a closed vehicle with drawn blinds drew up in front of the hospital; and as it obstructed his view, he stepped from the curb and sauntered across the road, smiling still. The driver descended. The hall-porter ran down the steps of the hospital. He opened the door of the vehicle. Together they lifted out a long board, very tenderly—which, as far as I could see, carried no other burden than a rug or two tossed disorderly upon the board. Then was I glad, for I had feared that chance had brought some awful reality into the procession of that happy morning. I turned to go, but in the act of turning I saw a livid hand protruding from beneath the rug.

The Simile.

THE little square of Staple Inn is a quiet spot at any time—an instant retreat from Holborn and the world. At sunset there is the added quiet of the sparrows' vespers. The birds come to sleep on the twigs of the plane-trees in the square. The trees fill the sky-space, and the sparrows fill the trees. You look up, and each sparrow is set against the sky, plump and black. I have counted one hundred and thirty, all chirping happily and passing, by their own formal gradations, from song to sleep. When the last chirps have descended on the square the sight is solemn and curious. The gloom has deepened below, but the sky above is white or apple-green; and against it in silhouette are the long quadrangular roofs, the little belfry of the Inn, the tracery of many boughs and feathery twigs, and the sparrows—little balls of blackness and sleep. Never are the sparrows more exposed, never more safe from harms. It is a touching sight in its way, and I felt no surprise when I turned from it, one night this week, and saw an uplifted face and wide eyes, and heard devotional tones. I think the man was mentally searching the Scriptures, delving for a simile. As I passed him his sighs and hesitations ceased, and, with a joyful stare at the sparrows aloft, he muttered—"The cattle on a thousand hills!"

Memoirs of the Moment.

Nobody knows, until the doors of the Royal Academy open, whether the exhibition is to be a good or a bad one; and that, perhaps, is why there is always talk of its being up to, or below, or above "the average"—the average being, in this case, the least ascertainable standard in the world. A few things, however, may already be certainly known. To begin with, there is larger acreage of canvas to select from, a keener competition for hanging space, than ever before. The artist may not be the popular hero he once was in current fiction; studio gossip may not be as of old a staple of talk; nor is Studio-Sunday now a field-day of fashion; but, all the same, the number of intending exhibitors' labels applied for at Burlington House this month is far in excess of that ever recorded before.

THERE will be no canvas to represent Mr. J. M. Swan in this year's Academy exhibition. That conspicuous absence is all the more to be deplored because it is caused by the illness of Mr. Swan—an abscess in the face—which has left him in the mood of a man who feels that he has lost a year.

MR. SARGENT, whose eight canvases last year almost reconciled the outsider to the space privileges of the Royal Academician, will not be so numerous represented in the coming exhibition. Happily this is not because Mr. Sargent has achieved less than usual in his studio, or rather his two studios, during the past twelve months. A good deal of time lately spent by him at his large work-room in the Avenue, Fulham-road, has been dedicated to his decorations for the Boston Public Library; while some of the portrait work done in Tite-street is not eligible for exhibition here and now. The truth is, that there is a one-man exhibition of Mr. Sargent's works now open in New York, and thither has gone, among other and older canvases, the portrait of Mrs. Hunter, recently completed. The statement generally made that the portrait of the Lord Chief Justice—for which Mr. Sargent has had a longish series of Sunday sittings—will be on view this year, is not correct. The portrait, which shows Lord Russell of Killowen standing in his robes and wearing his wig, is complete; but a second portrait, this time without a wig, is about to be painted by Mr. Sargent, who in this case, as in that of his portraits of Mr. Coventry Patmore, with their varying yet characteristic aspects, prefers that the two portraits shall be seen together. They remain, therefore, as a reserve fund to be drawn upon by Mr. Sargent for the show of 1900.

THE latest reports from Mr. Stanhope Forbes in the Pyrenees are the best he has sent home; but, what with illness and the Fire of London cartoon, he will be hardly at all represented this year in Piccadilly; neither will Mrs. Stanhope Forbes. Most cosmopolitan of men, in name a Scot, born in Dublin, French in maternity, and of the English Academy—painting the Salvation Army in Cornwall with the methods of Paris—Mr. Stanhope Forbes is now adding to his experiences in a new country (the country of Cobalt may remind him of the appeal often made to him to brighten his schemes of colour), and as he has pitched his tent, and taken to his brushes, we may hope to have some lasting records of his impressions. Meanwhile, it may be mentioned as a consolation for the temporary partial absence of Mr. Stanhope Forbes that Mr. Frank Bramley has somewhat abandoned the experimental manner of last year, and is a Newlyn once more in a delightful picture—"Gossip"—of three old women and a girl seated in a cottage in the mingling lights of the day and the fire; also that, in their several ways, three other artists of the old Cornish group, Mr. Adrian Stokes, Mr. Gotch, and Mr. Chevallier Taylor, are in their best form this year.

PRESENTMENTS of men of letters are not very abundant this year; but Mr. Glazebrook has made a success with his portrait of Mr. Anthony Hope.

ONLY a languid interest was taken, along Piccadilly or at the approaches to the Park for Church Parade, last Sunday morning, in the posters announcing the sale of the Sunday Telegraph. All the same, most people thought that it came from Fleet-street, not all the way from Sheffield. The competition between the metropolis and the provinces seems to be a little unfortunate, especially if it enforces on Fleet-street the use of such a title as the "Sunday Daily Telegraph." The founder of that paper, and of the Lawson family, had one favourite formula constantly dinned into the ears of its early contributors: "We can't have tautology in the Daily Telegraph." What, then, would he say to the title of the paper's new offspring? The simple title, the Daily Telegraph Sunday edition, would surely have served all purposes; indeed, it would have made the Daily a really truthful adjective for the first time in the paper's career—a completeness which might have fired, one would think, any proprietor of a so-called daily paper hitherto appearing on only six days of the week. One noticeable thing about the growth of the Sunday Press is the absence of any protest from Sunday Observance Societies, such, for instance, as that which William Wilberforce made just a century ago in the House of Commons, to the annoyance of William Pitt. Three quarters of a century ago there were sixteen Sunday papers in London; and that is a number which is scarce reached now, even with the addition of these latest comers.

Is history really so absorbing in itself that one has to falsify it in order to make it dull? That is Sir George Trevelyan's latest aphorism, anyway—a variation, at best, on the for ever popular axiom that truth is stranger than fiction. Yet it must be owned that the historians who are most entertaining are not always the most accurate, as the nephew of Macaulay, the admirer of Mr. Froude, hardly need to be told. Moreover, if the aphorism were really profound, as somebody has hastened to call this one, the occupation of the writer of novels would be gone. As a matter of fact, does Sir George Trevelyan really believe that history, as historians tell it, or biographies, as biographers write them, are really true? The longer and the more intimate a man's experience of his fellow-creatures is, the less does he accept the presentments made of them to the public. Of a man's deeds the records may be made public; but only the novelist can deal with motive, and that is why, if Sir George Trevelyan were candid, and could forget he had an uncle, he would be the first to admit that fiction is really truer than truth.

THE death of Birket Foster at seventy-four surprises us with the fact that he was no older. He must have been a very young man when he illustrated, in fine, fine work for wood-engraving, with the utmost of delicate pictorial detail, fully half the gift-books, the éditions de luxe (as they were understood at that time, with their smooth, deeply cream-coloured paper, modern type, and gilded cloth covers), the collections and selections, and the poets who had country and cottage for their theme. His was very beautiful work of its kind; and, granting that wood-engraving should aim at this outlineless kind of picture-making, Birket Foster's work in black and white was perfect. His beginnings reach back almost to the beginning of wood-engraving; but in his own career he hurried that art through all its stages into what we cannot but consider a decadence—a decadence of theory, that is; for in execution the engraving for which he drew was wonderful. To say, as we have already said, that it was pictorial in intention is to say all that is to be said against it. His water-colours also were pictorial. One likes them less than his black and white. They helped on the change of water-colour theory—did much to lead water-colour away from the theory of drawing to the theory of painting, from wash to stipple, and assuredly from its own limitations, and therefore its own life, to trespass across boundaries and to make a show of a borrowed vitality. But if the thing done was essentially wrong, it was done as a good-faith experiment. It had to be done, given the English character, which is not inclined to respect technical divisions; and by him it was done with all refinement and honesty. He was exceedingly popular, needless to say; he was admired for his errors, no doubt, but he was admired also greatly for his sweet and delicate rendering of what English people happily love—the edges of the little garden-forests, the glades, the streams and wild flowers, the cottages and the cottage girls in speckled pinafores. He never tired of these, nor shall any of us tire of them.

BUT what a strange love of speckles he had! Dark things were speckled with white (body-colour, of course; he was essentially a body-colour man), and white things were speckled with colour. It was almost an obsession.

A Practical Demonstration.

SIR,—Allow me first to thank you for your notice of my son's pamphlet, On the Use of Classical Metres in English, in the last number of the ACADEMY, and also to enclose a specimen of elegiacs done almost entirely after his rules. There are two or three false quantities; but though he detects them, I hope they may pass muster, if you think it worth while to follow up your article by a practical demonstration that the metre, though difficult, is not, in my opinion, wholly unmanageable.—I am, &c.

E. D. STONE.

Ho! jolly old parsons, who smoked long pipes of an evening—

Smoked long churchwardens, sipped at a beady rummer;
Jack - booted, stout - cobbled, at a meet seen oft on a Monday.

Or gaitered for a tramp through stubble after a bird;

Just, and known to be just, yet prone to be merciful also,
 Sifting a grain of wheat out of a bushel o' chaff;
 Friendly to all, sharing port wine with needy retainers,
 Welcome in all cottages, welcome alike to the Hall.
 Of neighbours shrewd, kindly critics, shrewd judges of horseflesh;
 Worldly, perhaps, but not guiltily slaves to the world.
 (He made it very good, 'tis an ingrate's trick to abuse
 it:
 Using aright His gift, worthily praise the Giver.)
 What's to be said? Their place is a blank; is none to regret them?
 Were they merely rubbish, fit to be carted away?
 Twice in a week preaching set sermons, decked in a black gown;
 Droning an old, old tale, sleepily accredited.
 Say, is it all to the good that a priest stalks, trimly
 birotted,
 Down the village main street frocked in a seedy cassock?
 Choir boys, vested aright, now chant where once was a chorus
 Of loud-lunged voices led by a wheezy fiddle.
 No difference of sex—young men with fresh, pretty maidens;
 Old men with children, rustical antiphones.
 'Tis better, O, doubtless, this Church of a new generation,
 Red-tiled, smartly bannered, made to a tidy pattern;
 Yet there is one who loves old pews and homely he-longings—
 Not restored, redolent of many ages ago—
 Who sometimes, as a voice, high-pitched, intones, for a moment
 Longs for an old parson, peacefully droning above,
 Three-deckers in a line with Nelson's Victory ranges,
 Wonders men reckon it seemly to wear petticoats.

Mrs. Hemans and George Borrow.

SIR,—Having read your excellent review of Dr. Knapp's Life, Writings, and Correspondence of George Borrow, and numbering myself among the warmest of Borrow's admirers, it has occurred to me that the following description of Borrow, which I copied some time ago from Chorley's Life and Correspondence of Mrs. Felicia Hemans, the poetess, might prove acceptable to your readers, particularly as you point out that there are so few reminiscences of Borrow available, and also give one by the late Rev. J. R. P. Berkeley. Though Mrs. Hemans does not give Borrow's name, his readers will have no difficulty in discovering to whom she alludes. Unfortunately I omitted to copy the date of Mrs. Hemans's letter, which was written sixty years ago, and have not the book at hand for reference. The letter is as follows:

Since I last wrote to you I have received a visit from a remarkable person with whom I should like to make you acquainted. His mind is full even to overflowing of intelligence and original thought. It is the distinguished linguist of whom I shall speak. Besides his calling upon me I also passed an evening in his society and he talked to me the whole time. I do not know when I have heard such a varying flow of conversation—odd, brilliant, animating—any and everyone of these epithets might be applied to it. It is like having a flood of mind poured out upon you, and that, too, evidently from the strong necessity of setting the current free, not from any design to shine or overpower. I think I was most interested in his descriptions of Spain, a country where he has lived much and to which he is strongly attached. He spoke of the songs which seemed to fill the airs of the South from the constant improvisation of the people at their work. He described as a remarkable feature of the scenery the little rills and watercourses which were led through the fields and gardens, and even over every low wall, by the Moors of Andalusia, and which yet remain, making the whole country vocal with pleasant sounds of waters. He told me also several striking anecdotes of a bandit chief in Murcia, a sort of Spanish Rob Roy, who has carried on his predatory warfare there for many years, and is so adored by the peasantry, for whose sake he plunders the rich, that it is impossible for the Governments ever to seize upon him. Some expression of the old Biscayan language—the Basque, he called it, which he translated for me—I thought beautifully poetical. The sun is called in that language “that which pours the day,” and the moon “the light of the dead.” Well, from Spain he travelled, or, rather, shot off like Robin Goodfellow, who could put a girdle round the earth in forty minutes, away to Iceland, and told me of having seen there a MS. recording the visit of an Icelandic prince to the Court of our old Saxon King Athelstan; then he hurried off to Paris, Brussels, Warsaw, with a sort of open sesame for the panorama of each Court and kingdom. All I had to complain of was that being used to a sort of steamboat rapidity, both in bodily and mental movements—while gallantly handing me from one room to another, rushed into a sort of gallopade which nearly took my breath away. On mentioning this afterwards to a gentleman who had been of the party, he said: “What could you expect from a man who has been handing armed Croats, instead of ladies, from one tent to another? for I believe it is not very long since my ubiquitous friend visited Hungary.”

B. V.'s Poems.

SIR,—In a paragraph of your issue of March 18 it is stated that the volume of selections from James Thomson's poems which I have just issued is not the first of its kind, inasmuch as a previous selection was issued in 1888. This is not quite accurate. The volume which was issued in 1888 was not a selection from Thomson's poems, but a second edition of his first published volume of verse. No selection from Thomson's whole poetical works has hitherto been published, unless the volume issued by Mr. Mosher, the enterprising American publisher of Portland, Maine, U.S.A., can be so considered. That volume, however, contained only three of Thomson's poems—viz., “The City of Dreadful Night,” “To Our Ladies of Death,” and “Insomnia,” a selection which represents very well one side of “B. V.'s” genius, but only one side. I may fairly claim that the volume which I have just issued is the first selection which gives anything like an adequate idea of the versatility and extent of Thomson's poetical powers.—I am, &c.,

Sydney Smith and the Tortoise.

SIR,—Will your “Bookworm” kindly afford explanation of the second paragraph of his interesting article of March 25? The fact that the present Sir Frederick Pollock, who succeeded to the title in 1888, was not born till 1845 has little apparent connexion with a statement made at the “Breakfast Club” in 1879 by the Sir Frederick Pollock of that time, who was born in 1815. The latter mentioned that he first put about the story under the name of his father, the Lord Chief Baron and first baronet, not under that of his son, afterwards third baronet.

But the authorship of the saying about the tortoise or turtle rests between Sydney Smith and Sir Frederick Pollock, second baronet—the former on the authority of Lady Holland's personal memoir, the latter on that of Sir Frederick's statement as recorded by Sir M. E. Grant-Duff.—I am, &c.,

"The Vampire."

SIR,—It may have escaped your notice that in the New York Bookman a new version of Mr. Kipling's poem "The Vampire" is printed, written from a woman's point of view. The parody, or retort, is tardy but good. Perhaps your readers would like to compare the parody and the original, in which case you may see your way to print them side by side.

THE VAMPIRE.

*Oh, the years we waste and the tears we waste
And the work of our head and hand
Belong to the woman who did not know
(And now we know she never could know)
And did not understand!*

A fool there was and his goods
he spent
(Even as you and I!)
Honour and faith and a sure intent
(And it wasn't the least what the lady meant)
But a fool must follow his natural bent
(Even as you and I!)

*Oh, the toil we lost and the spoil
we lost
And the excellent things we planned
Belong to the woman who didn't know why
(And now we know that she never knew why)
And did not understand!*

The fool was stripped to his foolish hide
(Even as you and I!)
Which she might have seen when she threw him aside—
(But it isn't on record the lady tried)
So some of him lived but the most of him died—
(Even as you and I!)

*And it isn't the shame and it isn't the blame
That stings like a white hot brand—
It's coming to know that she never knew why (Seeing at last she could never know why)
And never could understand!*

A fool there was and he made his prayer
(Even as you and I!)
To a rag and a bone and a hank of hair
(We called her the woman who did not care)
But the fool he called her his lady fair—
(Even as you and I!)

THE VAMPIRE.

(From a woman's point of view. With apologies to Rudyard Kipling.)

A woman there was who heard a prayer,
(Even as you and I!)
From flesh and bones and a lock of hair
(He called her the woman beyond compare),
But he only used her to lighten his care,
(Even as you and I!)

Oh, the walks we had and the talks we had,
And the best of our heart and
hand,
Were sought by the man who pretended to care,
He didn't—but why he pretended to care,
We cannot understand.

A woman received the flowers
he sent,
(Even as you and I!)
Honour and faith she thought his intent,
(But God only knows what the gentleman meant),
Yet a man must follow his natural bent,
(Even as you and I!)

Oh, the vows we spoke and the vows we broke,
And the various things we planned,
Belong to the man who said
he was true,
(But now we know that he never was true)
And we cannot understand.

One favour she asked—but it
was denied,
(Even as you and I!)
In some way or other he might have replied,
(But it isn't on record the gentleman tried),
Her faith in him faltered and finally died,
(Even as you and I!)

And it isn't the shame and it
isn't the blame,
That stings like a white hot
brand,
It's coming to know he would never say why,
Seeing at last she could never know why,
And never could understand.

The William Black Memorial.

Our Prize Competitions.

RESULT OF No. 25.

WITH the idea of perhaps being useful to the Committee of the William Black Memorial Fund, we asked our readers last week to make suggestions as to the best form this memorial should take: that is to say, the form most in accordance with Mr. Black's character as reflected by his books, and most likely by its usefulness to give him pleasure, could he know of it. We reminded our readers at the same time that the sum which will be at the Committee's disposal is estimated to be £2,000.

Many replies have been received, the best of which seems to us that of Mr. W. Macdonald Mackay, 12, Ashbrook Terrace, Lower Bebington, Cheshire, who writes thus:

I would suggest that no more fitting memorial to the memory of the late William Black could be desired than "A Fishermen's Shelter" at some convenient centre of the fishing industry in the Highlands—say, at Stornoway, or Wick.

Stornoway has been immortalised by a Princess of Thule, and might be the most convenient centre, as it is the rendezvous of the herring fishermen from all parts of the Highlands in the summer.

Such a "shelter" could be built very economically, and would serve as a meeting-place for the fishermen, where they would have refreshments served cheaply, games of various sorts could be indulged in, and newspapers seen and read, as well as a small library attached. The building to be under the management of the Burgh Commissioners and the Committee who have charge of the Memorial. Once the "shelter" was built and started, it would, we believe, be self-supporting, and would be a great boon to these hardy sons of the sea who pursue their arduous calling in all sorts of weather.

We give Mr. Mackay the prize for several reasons. A shelter for fishermen has certain advantages over a lifeboat, the proposed form of memorial. It is of permanent and continual use. A lifeboat might be destroyed in the first storm that made its services necessary, or two or three years might pass without its services being required at all. A shelter, on the other hand, would always be open and operative. When the fishing season is over it would still be a meeting-place and resort, and during the season it might be also the greatest comfort. It would be inexpensive to build and inexpensive to keep up, and it would be a landmark.

Turning to the other replies, we find the following:

The suggestions which have emanated from various sources for a memorial to the late William Black are all of them excellent in their way; yet the ideal one, or the one which will prove most attractive to sympathisers, has yet to be suggested. Like the ACADEMY, I consider that Black was an open-air idealist, a nature-lover, and a recorder of men and their ideas, altogether apart from their toil and labour; and on that account I would suggest as a fitting memorial, and one which will best keep his memory green, a home for literary workers—a rest-place, a shelter if you will—somewhere in the West Highlands, in one of the "Edens" that he loved so well to picture. With £2,000 this could be easily managed, and the home or holiday house might easily be made self-supporting. Literary men and women—and journalists are, of course, included in the term—will appreciate my suggestion. I do not say that literary folk are in the condition of needing assistance when on a holiday; but I do say that the average literary person would be glad to go to the shores of Loch Etive, or the sands of Iona, or the rock-bound coast of Mull, and spend a fortnight amid the perfect harmony of Nature, and in a house built in memorial of one who loved Nature with all his heart and soul. [H. P. B., Glasgow.]

Other competitors—E. M. H., Hampstead; I. H., Cheltenham; G. E. M., London; S. R., Moffat; and C. L. H., Harrogate—make a similar suggestion; but it is not, we think, very practicable. A Home of Rest would be expensive to build or acquire, and very difficult to manage so that it became as beneficial in effect as its controllers would desire. A variant of the same idea is a "Holiday Home in the Highlands for men and women of gentle birth who are engaged in the mechanical work of our great printing firms." This is suggested by M. E. T., London. Still another variant is this:

For the William Black Memorial I would suggest the founding of a Home in the Highlands for waifs and strays of Scottish cities.

I recognise the fact that it would be impossible to maintain as well as found a Home for the sum of £2,000; but for maintenance, the practical interest of corporate governing bodies in the boroughs affected, and of philanthropic societies, could doubtless be enlisted in such a scheme.

The purpose of the Home might well be the reclaiming, to something more nearly approaching human nature, of the offspring of life's misfortunes as obtruded so painfully upon society in overgrown towns.

Should the available funds prove insufficient to maintain an appreciable number of youthful inmates for a lengthened period, then the object of the Home might be restricted to providing a glimpse of God's earth, pure country air, and healthy surroundings for a part of the year only—say, April to November. It would open up a new world, a "heaven," to many a pallid prisoner of the streets. [E. M. T., Crook.]

And here we have still another:

Apply the Fund to giving holiday to town-bound Highlanders. If not enough to take an occasional exile to the Hebrides, then a day or two among Berkshire or Surrey heather. The definite form of memorial a tablet to his memory, with explanation of the wider application suggested above of the funds subscribed by his admirers and friends. [C. A. K., Glasgow.]

The objections to these schemes do not need pointing out. The same idea is given a turn more characteristic of the author of White Wings in the following letter:

Purchase a small yacht (if possible the schooner Oriana, upon which he wrote White Wings) with a small crew of three or four men (Scotchmen certainly, his own crew if to be found). Let the yacht be used among other things as a means for carrying newspapers and books to the men in all the British lighthouses and lightships. The yacht could also be used—as she is, I believe, very roomy—for giving invalid and needy pressmen or printers—in fact, anyone connected with the profession—a healthy sea-voyage. She could also convey letters, papers, and books to the numerous fishing fleets who are unable to return to their ports when on the fishing grounds. [F. P. E., London.]

We have also a proposal to endow village libraries all over the Western Highlands and Islands. Thus:

The management of the scheme to be entrusted to some library in Edinburgh or Glasgow. No buildings should be erected; the books should be sent to the village schoolmaster or minister, and should be changed, say, once a year.

£1,500 to be invested, and the income derived (say £60) to be spent annually in buying new books, repairs, and salary of manager and other expenses. The central library would have very little to do for the greater part of the year, therefore the assistant who did the work would be paid by a fee, say, of £20 or £30.

£500 to be spent now in starting the scheme and buying books.

In this way the memory of William Black would be kept green for ever in that country that he loved so well, and in a most acceptable way to the people whom he loved to depict.

[J. B. N., York.]

The following is a more practicable scheme, and perhaps the Committee will consider it:

I would suggest—if the funds collected are enough—that one or more almshouses should be erected in his native village, or town, so that one or more deserving country men, or women, shall be cared for, and go down to their last home blessing and keeping green the memory of William Black.

[E. J., Ipswich.]

And this has the merit of being in all probability such a charity as Mr. Black himself might have contemplated. But it lacks some of the essentials of a public memorial:

Invest £2,000 at 4 per cent. Result £80 per annum. Grant four annuities of £20 each to old and meritorious gillies who are past work, have not saved money, and are not insured. Election to rest with properly constituted authorities—say equivalent of local Board of Guardians or the like.

[F. S., London.]

A few competitors are in favour of public parks or gardens. G. R., Aberdeen, suggests Oban as the site, and would have a natural history museum in the midst. But £2,000 will not buy public parks and museums, nor are open spaces a Highland want. S. B., Great Malvern, and A. C., Edinburgh, make similar suggestions; while J. S. L., Newcastle, advocates a natural history museum in the Trossachs and a fund to assist "research, literary, historical, or otherwise, relating to the Highlands and the Highland people." Among other plans of more or less feasibility, we mention the erection of a hospital or the supply of medical attendance on an island of the Hebrides (T. C., Buxted); the maintenance of the Ben Nevis Observatory (J. P., Glasgow); the acquisition of salmon and trout fishing for literary men (A. W., Edinburgh); and the planting of an avenue of Scotch firs on the road from Brighton, where Mr. Black lived, to Rottingdean, where he is buried (W. P., St. Albans).

Finally, let us quote this, which is good, but open to destructive criticism: "I would suggest as a fitting memorial of the late Mr. Black and his work the purchase of a tract of wild land in the Highlands, to be reserved for ever as a sanctuary for the fauna and flora of the district" (T. B. D., Bridgwater).

Competition No. 26.

To the author of the best verse translation of the following poem by Paul Verlaine a prize of a guinea will be given:—

Paul Verlaine's Chanson.

Le ciel par-dessus le toit,
Si bleu, si calme!
Un arbre par-dessus le toit
Berce sa palme.
La cloche dans le ciel qu'on voit
Doucement tinte,
Un oiseau sur l'arbre qu'on voit
Chante sa plainte.

Mon Dieu, mon Dieu, la vie est là,
Simple et tranquille,
Cette paisible ruine-là
Vient de la vie.

Qu'as-tu fait, ô toi que voilà,
Pleurant sans cesse,
Dis, qu'as-tu fait que voilà
De ta jeunesse?

THE MORMON PROPHET.

"A striking treatment of a subject in itself almost stranger than fiction, and constitutes a notable addition to the literary achievements of one of the ablest of Canadian novelists."—Glasgow Herald.

"Miss Dougall has handled a difficult theme with conspicuous delicacy; the most sordid details of the narrative are redeemed by the glamour of her style; her analysis of the strangely mixed character of the prophet is remarkable for its detachment and impartiality; while in Susannah Halsey she has given us a really beautiful study of nobly compassionate womanhood. We certainly know of no more illuminative commentary on the rise of this extraordinary sect than is furnished by Miss Dougall's novel." Spectator.

The Literary Week.

WE are glad to observe the sound and eloquent letter which Mr. Alfred Austin, the Poet Laureate, has addressed to Mr. John Hay, the American Secretary of State, on the subject of international copyright. Whether it will bear fruit remains to be seen, but such temperate and courteous pleas for the necessity of a better understanding are the best form of attack.

MR. J. F. NISBET, who died the other day, after a long and wasting illness, at the age of forty-nine, was a man the little world of letters could ill afford to lose. A hard-headed, shrewd, kindly Scotsman, of powerful physique and brilliant parts, he was yet the most modest of men. He had few enthusiasms, his life was devoted to work, the work of daily and weekly journalism (he was a valued member of the ACADEMY staff), and it left him scant leisure for authorship. No book stands to his name the matter of which had not first served journalistic purposes. His fame rests on The Insanity of Genius. But he wielded a power, personal and direct, which is not given to many journalists: we refer to the philosophical and sociological article that he wrote each week in the Referee called "Our Handbook." Appealing to a wide public, whose occupations and pleasures do not leave them much time for reading, these lay sermons by a man who had lived and thought, and remained, by choice, in the crowd, had an influence in moulding thought and encouraging a right and sane view of the problems of the day that entitled him to be indeed well proud of his life's work. He wrote that article for many years. Strange as it may sound, his weekly sermon seemed to fall naturally into its place in the columns of a Sunday sporting paper, even such a sentence as this: "Death is but the transition from material existence to the first grade of spirit life," which occurred in a "Handbook" article some years ago, and formed the present writer's introduction to J. F. N. He lived till lately high up in Staple Inn. That small green place is lonelier without him.

MR. NISBET left a work in manuscript which Mr. Grant Richards will shortly publish under the title of The Human Machine: an Inquiry into the Divinity of Human Faculty in its Bearings upon Social Life, Religion, Education, and Politics.

MR. SWINBURNE is not, and probably never will be, a poet of the people, however Republican his sentiments may once have been. During the present week, however, which has seen the celebration of his sixty-second birthday, Mr. Swinburne's description of the Casket Rocks has been quoted in many papers in connexion with the unhappy foundering of the Stella. The Telegraph's paragraph apropos his birthday cannot be considered particularly happy. "Some of his smart epigrammatic utterances on famous contemporaries have delighted London with their biting wit," says our contemporary. We doubt if delight is quite the emotion that has been aroused, or if smart is quite a suitable epithet.

THE Sunday Daily Telegraph, which begins on April 9, promises reading not only for the million, but also for the connoisseur, for among the contributors of regular series will be Mr. H. D. Traill, under the heading, "Visitors from the Shades." The news is good. Any return to the manner of The New Lucian will be welcome. Mr. W. L. Courtney is down for an antithetical series, "Dialogues of the Day."

THE article on "Stepping-Tones" which we printed last week has excited comment near and far, the author's confusion of the words moon and month having been corrected by a score and more of critics. We cannot, however, regret having let it stand, for it has produced an excellent article on schismatic words and Tennyson's genius, by "A .M.," in the Pall Mall Gazette.

WE had some doubts last week, in setting the prize competition, whether it was wise to expect our readers to give up any time at Easter to translating a French song into English. But our fears were quite groundless. It was evidently no hardship whatever, for no fewer than seventy-seven replies have reached us. Professional literary men and women form a strong numerical body; but the amateurs run them very hard, not only in numbers, but in quality.

THE Prize Winner this week, it will be observed, is Miss Nora Hopper. Miss Hopper may be said to belong rather to the ranks of the professional than the amateur poets. Her sweet and simple lyrics are well known, especially by those readers of modern poetry who also love the open air. Miss Hopper is just now contributing a charming series of poems on the months to the Westminster Gazette, and her hand is often to be detected in the Pall Mall Gazette.

ON the 14th will be published the first number of The London Letter, a sixpenny weekly paper devoted to British interests at home and abroad. Thus Greater Britain is to have its organ. Mr. Algernon Locker, the late editor of the Morning Post, and Mr. Stafford Ransome will be associated in the production of the paper, to which we look forward with great interest.

TUESDAY was the anniversary of the death of Oliver Goldsmith. Someone with kindly and touching thoughtfulness visited the grave in the precincts of the Temple Church and laid upon it a bunch of white flowers and laurel leaves, attached to which was the following inscription: "To the immortal memory of one of Ireland's most gifted sons, Oliver Goldsmith, 'who wrote like an angel.' From an old admirer of 'She Stoops to Conquer' and The Vicar of Wakefield. Temple, April 4, 1899."

THE attitude of the devotee who performed this graceful act is a pleasant antidote to the view of The Vicar of Wakefield taken by a recent contributor to the ACADEMY, who, it may be remembered, was eloquent in the classic's dispraise. He was not, however, the first to make the attack. Mark Twain, whose literary tastes are sometimes bewildering, once exposed Goldsmith's idyll to a withering fire from his iron batteries. The end of his indictment was this sentence: "There is not a sincere line in it—not a character that invites respect." Such declarations of independence are interesting and in some cases salutary, for they may cause others to examine the genuineness of their own literary tastes; but Goldsmith can withstand them.

M. ZOLA's friends and the friends of justice and courage have behaved admirably over his expulsion from the French Cycling Tourists' Club. Owing to the loss by resignation of influential members who declined to be associated in any way with the champion of Dreyfus, the authorities of the Club struck M. Zola's name from the roll. At first nothing happened, and it seemed as if their end were gained. And then came a great shoal of resignations, which is being augmented every day, from other members who wish to protest against this treatment of a courageous man. It looks now as if the Club might cease to be.

M. ZOLA's new novel, Fécondité—or Fruitfulness, as it will be called in England—is now finished. May 10 is the date fixed for its opening in the Paris Aurore, and October 1 for its appearance in volume form simultaneously in French, English, German, Danish, Norwegian, Italian, and Spanish. The novel is the first of a new series, which will continue with "Work," "Truth," and "Justice. M. Zola's aim in Fécondité is to bring before French parents, who need the lesson, the benefit of larger families.

IF, when Mr. Kipling resumes active work again (for we do not count the revision of his travel letters, on which he is now engaged, active work), he takes half the hints as to his development that have been thrown out, he will have no time for anything but writing for many years. He is to write for the stage; he is to set about his great novel; he is to study this phase of life and that. The latest suggestion is contained in a letter to the Times on British industry and foreign competition. Says the writer (Mr. Pilditch): "The last generation of middle-class Englishmen who read and thought were brought up on the creed of Carlyle and Kingsley, and many of them saw dignity in the hard work and strict performance of duties taught by those writers, to whose influence some of our commercial prosperity was due. To-day Mr. Kipling is teaching us the lesson of strenuousness. His illustrations, however, are drawn from the career of the soldier and sailor and the administrator of subject races, and hardly bear a direct message to the man of manufactures and commerce. Perhaps, when he has recovered from his present illness, he will discover for us that the administrators of our manufacturing and commercial firms and the commercial traveller are not necessarily condemned to a barren materialism, but that there is a fertile world of ideas in which they may live their lives not without advantage to themselves, and with decided advantage to the race of which they form so large a part."

MR. G. S. LAYARD, who is authorised by the family of the late Mrs. Lynn Linton to write her biography, will deem it a great favour if owners of letters, newspaper cuttings, portraits, and any other documents or illustrations germane to the subject, will forward them to him at Lorraine Cottage, Malvern. Every care will be taken of them, and they will be returned as soon as they are done with. It need hardly be added that he will also welcome any personal reminiscences that may suggest themselves to our readers.

IF it is cause for pride in an author to figure as a model of style in a work on grammar, then Mr. J. H. A. Günther is the means of making many English writers proud. In the Manual of English Pronunciation and Grammar for the Use of Dutch Students, which he has just produced (Groningen: Z. B. Walters, 1899), he cites examples from the writings of many contemporary authors who are in their own country read as a rule more for their matter than their manner. Yet just as M. Jourdain achieved prose without knowing it, so may the most rapid deviser of sentences achieve sufficient accuracy whereby to teach the aspiring youth of Holland. Dr. Conan Doyle is Mr. Günther's favourite English author; and next comes, perhaps, R. L. Stevenson. Here, for example, is proof sufficient that several verbs may be used in a reflexive sense without having the reflexive pronoun expressed:

He surrendered himself in a blind sort of fashion.

Black.

Thurstan surrendered and went into banishment.

Freeman.

I moved from hiding-place to hiding-place.—Stevenson.

Her eyes filled with tears.—G. Moore.

Augusta sprang up and turned to hide her tears.

R. Haggard.

After the defeat of Culloden Lord Pitsligo hid among the mountains.—A. Lang.

By the time you have washed and dressed breakfast will be ready.—Sweet.

His compliment so delighted her that she dressed and prepared to descend to breakfast with a light heart.

Mrs. Ward.

I hope his mother will never have reason to be ashamed of him.—Norris.

The curious reader may try his hand at locating the passages. We trust that the prospect of being of so much use in Holland will not dash the spirits of any of our novelists.

"POETS," says Mr. Lang in Longman's, "keep sending me poetry, and asking me whether they have 'wasted their time' in composition. How can I tell the value of their time? It is not wasted if they have amused themselves; but if they wrote in hope of fame and gold, of course they have wasted their time. Let me repeat that I decline to act as literary adviser to the British and Colonial public. I have already pointed out the propriety of sending MSS. to A.B.C.D., care of Messrs. Blackwood. He knows that I am a fallen literary dictator (as I have already remarked), and I am most anxious that he should enjoy the MSS. of the public, which have been my only reward, as a dictator. I utterly refuse to read either prose or verse, for total strangers, whatever A.B.C.D. may do."

MR. LANG also refers again to the quatrain on Poe, which we printed some time ago. It was first credited to Mr. Dobson by the American magazine which gave it publicity, and then to Mr. Lang. Mr. Lang had forgotten everything about it, but he now remembers having been asked to write levities on the fly-leaves of some books to be sold at a bazaar in New York. The Poe quatrain was one of them. Mr. Lang refers to it as nonsense; but it was really rather good criticism. Poe is better than Boker, Bryant, Longfellow, and Father Tabb.

AN amusing and very natural "howler," gathered at a viva voce examination, has been made public by the Chronicle. The examinee was reciting a passage from "King Lear," where Lear banishes Kent:

Five days we do allot thee for provision
To shield thee from diseases of the world;
And on the sixth to turn thy hated back
Upon our kingdom: if on the tenth day following
Thy banished trunk be found in our dominions,
The moment is thy death.

The examiner here interrupted: "You see the meaning of 'banished trunk'?" Student: "Oh, yes, sir, his luggage—six days for himself, and four days extra for the luggage."

IN the current Blackwood the serial Autobiography of a Child is brought to an end, and it will be published before long in book form. The author, as we have already stated, is Miss Hannah Lynch. Mr. Conrad's three-part story, "The Heart of Darkness," is also concluded in this number, and a "trivial romance," by Mr. G. S. Street, begins. Elsewhere Dr. Knapp's treatment of Borrow is severely criticised.

MESSRS. CHAMBERS are now reissuing serially their excellent English Dictionary and Biographical Dictionary: the English Dictionary, edited by Mr. Thomas Davidson, to be completed in twenty-two parts, and the Biographical Dictionary, edited by Dr. Patrick and Mr. Francis Hindes Groome, to be completed in eighteen parts. The first number of the Biographical Dictionary covers the ground between Ali Pasha and Henry Balnaves. This, probably, is the first time their names were ever mentioned together.

We find in the Boston Literary World the following dexterous definition of a quatrain:

A quatrain is from one rare flower of thought,
The booty brought by Fancy like a bee,
And in her secret cell most deftly wrought
To one clear drop of purest poesy.

APROPPOS the review of the Letters of Samuel Rutherford, in last week's ACADEMY, a correspondent cites an interesting pronouncement of the late C. H. Spurgeon's concerning the Letters of the minister of Anwoth. Reviewing a new edition of Rutherford in the "book-notices" of his magazine, a few months before his death, Mr. Spurgeon wrote: "When we are dead and gone let the world know that Spurgeon held Rutherford's Letters to be the nearest thing to inspiration which can be found in all the writings of mere men."

St. Martin's-le-Grand, the magazine of the General Post Office, regrets to hear that Mr. W. W. Jacobs, of the Savings Bank Department, the author of Many Cargoes, has been compelled to retire from the service on the grounds of ill-health. Mr. Jacobs has been a martyr to insomnia, and has, doubtless, found out that the attempt to combine a literary career with a clerkship in so hard-worked a department as the Savings Bank is a physical impossibility. We hope that a complete recovery will result. For Mr. Jacobs more than most men must an equable life be wished. Humorists can ill be spared.

DR. FURNIVALL has given the following account of the original detachment of the chapter of "The Nature of Gothic" from The Stones of Venice, since reprinted by the Kelmscott Press, and now again issued separately by Messrs. Longmans. Writing to the Daily News, Dr. Furnivall says:

The first reprint of this grand chapter of The Stones of Venice, and its sub-title "And Herein of the True Functions of the Workman in Art," were due, not to the "Master" himself, but to his humble disciple and friend—myself. Through my sending him a prospectus of our Working Men's College, Ruskin kindly offered to help us, and take the art classes. We were to hold our opening meeting in Hullah's Hall, in Long Acre, at the corner of Eudell-street, where the big coach factory now is. I felt that we wanted some printed thing to introduce us to the working-men of London, as we knew only the few we had come across in our co-operative movement, and all our associations had failed. F. D. Maurice had written nothing good enough for this purpose; but Ruskin had. So I got leave from him and his publisher, Mr. George Smith, to reprint this grand chapter "On the Nature of Gothic"; and I had to add to it the sub-title, "And Herein of the True Functions of the Workman in Art," to show working-men how it touches them. I had "Price Fourpence" put on the title; but we gave a copy to everybody who came to our first meeting—over 400—and the tract well served its purpose. Afterwards an orange wrapper and a folding woodcut from the Stones were added to the reprint, and it was sold at 6d., for the benefit of the college. Copies have since fetched 7s. 6d. and 10s.

Bibliographical.

THE writer of the ACADEMY's review, last week, of the late F. T. Palgrave's Memoir made allusion to the fact that Palgrave had at one time entertained the idea of making an anthology of English love-poetry. This naturally suggested a reference to Mr. William Watson's collection of love-verse, to which was given the happy title (taken, of course, from Browning) of Lyric Love. It may, however, be recorded that a similar collection, with a very similar title, had been made and published nearly two decades before Mr. Watson's. It was, I think, in the autumn or winter of 1873 that Messrs. H. S. King & Co. published a pretty little book of English love-poetry, from Shakespeare to Tennyson, entitled Lyrics of Love. This anthology (dedicated, by permission, to Tennyson) was especially rich in examples of that poet's work, and in examples also of the work of many of his contemporaries, such as Mr. Swinburne, William Morris, the Brownings, the Rossettis, and Matthew Arnold.

Moreover, Mr. Watson's volume had yet another predecessor, his Lyric Love being preceded, I fancy—though only by a few months—by a volume called Love Songs of the English Poets. This was the production of Mr. Ralph Hall Caine, brother of the novelist, and since engaged in editorial work in London. Mr. Caine's volume, however, differed both from Lyrics of Love (1873) and Lyric Love (1892), in beginning with the year 1500 and ending with the year 1800, thus ignoring love-verse of the nineteenth century. The arrangement he adopted, too, was chronological, while in the other two instances it is according to arbitrary notions of the compilers. It is rather curious that both Love Songs and Lyric Love should have come out in the same year.

In addition to the two books on Mr. Kipling threatened by English writers, advertisement is made of one from an American hand—that of a Mr. W. M. Clemens, who will sketch Mr. Kipling's career, provide an "appreciation" of his writings, and discourse in particular on his religious views as revealed in his publications. To this somewhat elaborate performance Mr. Clemens proposes, it appears, to give the name of A Ken of Kipling—a not too intelligible title.

The announcement of Mr. Barton Baker's Stories of the Streets of London reminds me that a book on the historical and other associations of London Streets was published so recently as 1891. The subject is, however, at once so big and so interesting that many volumes might well be devoted to it—the more the better, so long as they are well done.

Personally I cannot "enthuse" over the fact that "Lord Tennyson has left behind him valuable material in elucidation of In Memoriam." A poem that requires "elucidation" is, in my humble opinion, in a parlous condition. Besides, look at the amount of "elucidation" that In Memoriam has already had. First came the Analysis, by Robertson of Brighton, in 1862. Then we had the Key, by Dr. Alfred Gatty, in 1881. Next came Elizabeth R. Chapman's Companion, in 1888; followed by T. Davidson's Prolegomena and Index, in 1889. Surely these ought to suffice? Meanwhile, it is pleasant to note that the poem is to be included in the half-crown "Golden Treasury" series.

"Who was it that wrote the story called The Semi-Attached Couple?" I have to thank several correspondents—notably Mr. J. F. Burgoyne, of the Tate Central Library, Brixton, and Mr. F. L. Mawdesley, of Delwood Croft, York, and Mrs. Copeland Jones, of County Wicklow—for answering my query of last week. The tale was the work of the Hon. Emily Eden, who, as my correspondents remind me, was the author also of a story called The Semi-Detached House. The latter came out in 1859; The Semi-Attached Couple belongs to 1860. Miss Eden also wrote Letters from India and Up the Country.

The death of Mme. Jules Michelet has a special interest for the English public, because the good lady once wrote a book intended for our particular delectation. That book, of course, was written in French, but it was first published in English, having been translated by a well-known English littérateur direct from the original MS. The title, if I remember rightly, was Nature; or, the Poetry of Earth and Sea, and the publishers were Messrs. Nelson, of Edinburgh, who, in the late sixties and the early seventies, were remarkable for the spirit and enterprise they displayed.

I note in a list of "latest publications" the Epicurean of Tom Moore. Is it possible that that seventy-year-old romance has readers nowadays? Messrs. Downey issued an edition in 1897, and seven years earlier we had one from Messrs. Chatto & Windus. Now we have yet another.

A Court Poet.

The Poems of Thomas Carew. Edited by Arthur Vincent.
Muses' Library. (Lawrence & Bullen. 5s. net.)

SAID Carew of Donne—

Here lies a king that ruled, as he thought fit,
The universal monarchy of wit.

And indeed the praise could hardly be less, were it only as recompense for the wholesale filching of idea and phrase from the great poet by the little one. Mr. Vincent puts it somewhat ingenuously when he says that "Donne, as incumbent of St. Dunstan's-in-the-West, was for a time Carew's parish priest, and exercised a notable influence on his writings"; for Carew's ribald life may be taken to have dispensed with the ministrations of a parish priest, and the Donne of his inspiration was not the grave divine, but the witty and wanton writer whose career had ended while his disciple to be was yet a lad. But about the influence there is no doubt; Mr. Vincent's notes will trace it for you, if necessary, in almost every poem, and in such lines as these it is difficult not to believe that Donne himself speaks:

When thou, poor Excommunicate
From all the joys of love, shalt see
The full reward and glorious fate
Which my strong faith shall purchase me,
Then curse thine own inconstancy!

A fairer hand than thine shall cure
That heart, which thy false oaths did wound;
And to my soul a soul more pure
Than thine shall by Love's hand be bound,
And both with equal glory crown'd.

Then shalt thou weep, entreat, complain
To Love, as I did once to thee;
When all thy tears shall be as vain
As mine were then: for thou shalt be Damn'd for thy false apostacy.

Carew is cut out of a corner of Donne, but unfortunately it is the wrong corner. He catches the love of paradox, the intoxication of conceits, the occasional flagrant indecency; but the melancholy imagination, the keen intellectual force, the bursts of contorted music, the rebellious underlying passion, that make the verse of Donne so individual and unique a matter, find no echo in the younger man. The curious thing, indeed, about Carew is the extraordinary impersonality of all that he wrote. It is all as finished and polished as a diamond ring, and as hard. From cover to cover of the volume you will hardly come upon a touch of pathos or of natural sentiment. This is doubtless the piece by which the admirers of Carew would elect to try him:

Ask me no more where Jove bestows,
When June is past, the fading rose;
For in your beauty's orient deep,
These flowers, as in their causes, sleep.

Ask me no more whither do stray
The golden atoms of the day;
For in pure love heaven did prepare
Those powders to enrich your hair.

Ask me no more whither dost haste
The nightingale when May is past;
For in your sweet dividing throat
She winters, and keeps warm her note.

Ask me no more where those stars light
That downwards fall in dead of night;
For in your eyes they sit, and there
Fixed become as in their sphere.

Ask me no more if east or west
The Phoenix builds her spicy nest;
For unto you at last she flies,
And in your fragrant bosom dies.

Such verses would be a delicate compliment to any woman from any stranger, but the most sentimental of country damsels would hardly be able to persuade herself that they are felt. And this is Carew all over. Like Waller after him, he was a most delicate and accomplished writer of vers d'occasion, and nothing more. However, Carew and Waller are not the only poets in the world, or even in the seventeenth century; and one may gladly be content for a while to accept the artificiality, and to read them for the art, which is real and great. You will, of course, skip him when he spoils a good copy of verses by telling you that

Through those crystals our souls flitting,
Shall a pure wreath of eyebeams twine;

or when he launches upon a course of amorous geography. Then he is intolerable; and unfortunately Carew did a good deal to popularise the convention among the minor Caroline poetlings. But when he can be content to be simple, he has a neatness and a gift of working his productions into complete wholes which are gratifying and by no means invariable in his contemporaries. Like all the most artificial writers, he is perhaps at his best in the pastoral mood. This is not common with him; here, however, is an example, which opens and, indeed, gives an unfair expectation of his book:

Now that the winter's gone, the earth has lost
Her snow-white robes: and now no more the frost
Candies the grass, or casts an icy cream
Upon the silver lake or crystal stream:
But the warm sun thaws the benumbed earth
And makes it tender; gives a sacred birth
To the dead swallow; wakes in hollow tree
The drowsy cuckoo and the humble bee.
Now do a choir of chirping Minstrels bring,
In triumph to the world, the youthful Spring;
The valleys, hills, and woods, in rich array,
Welcome the coming of the longed-for May.
Now all things smile—only my love doth lower:
Nor hath the scalding noon-day sun the power

To melt that marble ice which still doth hold
Her heart congealed, and makes her pity cold.
The ox which lately did for shelter fly
Into the stall, doth now securely lie
In open fields; and love no more is made
By the fireside; but in the cooler shade
Amyntas now doth with his Chloris sleep
Under a sycamore, and all things keep
Time with the season—only she doth carry
June in her eyes, in her heart January.

Obviously one cannot be expected to take much interest in Carew's life, or to trouble one's head as to whether the Celia, to whom he lays his rhymes, was Mrs. Cecilia Crofts or not. The name is so pretty in itself that probably any poet of Carew's stamp would have turned it into Celia. Fortunately but little is known of Carew, who is somewhat inextricably mixed up with one Thomas Carey, also a poet. That little is discreditable. His father's letters regret his debauched life. His amorous misadventures were the sport of Suckling and other jesters, and at the age of twenty-one he was kicked out of a house where he was secretary for slandering his employer's wife. He wormed his way, however, into an appointment in the privy chamber at Court, and so ended his days. The nature of his duties is suggested by the following anecdote which we owe to a Court gossip of the time:

According to this authority, Thomas Carew, gentleman of the privy chamber, was going to take King Charles into the Queen's chamber, when he saw Jermyn, Lord St. Albans, with his arm round her neck. He stumbled and put out the light. Jermyn escaped. Carew never told the King, and the King never knew it. The Queen heaped favours on Carew.

We trust that Mr. Vincent speaks in irony when he calls this "a pleasing insight into royal life at Whitehall and Carew's courtly manners." The spectacle of a poet—yes, after all, a poet—performing the office of a laquay for a royal adulteress is to us distinctly a displeasing one.

There is no particular reason for supposing that the "Pastoral Dialogue," in which the following lines occur, is not Carew's, though they read more like Marvell, and Carew's Poems of 1640 is not an impeccable edition. But if they are his, once and once only he found a greater model than Donne in the author of "Romeo and Juliet" and a "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Shep. This mossy bank they pressed. Nym. That aged oak

Did canopy the happy pair
All night from the damp air.

Cho. Here let us sit, and sing the words they spoke,
Till the day breaking their embraces broke.

Shep. See, Love, the blushes of the morn appear,
And now she hangs her pearly store
Robbed from the eastern shore,
I' th' cowslip bell and roses rare;
Sweet, I must stay no longer here!

Nym. Those streaks of doubtful light usher not day,
But show my sun must set; no morn
Shall shine till thou return;
The yellow planets and the grey
Dawn shall attend thee on thy way.

There is, we suppose, no doubt as to the reading "roses rare" in the 1640 text. In any case, it obviously requires emending into "roses' ear." The rhyme and the parallelism with Puck's "I'll hang a pear in every cowslip's ear" sufficiently prove this.

In the way of editing, Mr. Vincent has done all that can be done, by notes and introduction, for Carew. Nevertheless, we could have done for some time longer with the edition, not so good but not bad, published only a very few years ago by Mr. Ebsworth, if that would have induced Mr. Vincent to prepare a Drayton or a Ben Jonson or a Crashaw, or something that is really wanted, in the dainty format of the "Muses' Library."

An Historian at Need.

History of British India. By Sir W. W. Hunter, Vice-President of the Royal Asiatic Society. Vol. I. (Longmans & Co. 18s.)

NEXT to England itself, the greatest fact in British history is England's Indian empire; and it might have been supposed that ambitious historians would eagerly invade this great and magnificent region awaiting their conquest, where virgin laurels were to be won, where the richest, the most enthralling material was accumulated for the exercise of the historian's art. Yet so it has not been. Seemingly the very magnitude of the opportunity, the very novelty of the region, daunted those who galled each other's heels in their eagerness to exploit the mapped-out fields of English history. Mill has been suffered to remain the standard historian of British India. Yet the very poor standard of Mill is generally recognised. He could not hold his own for a moment in any field where competitors were found. Setting aside all other inadequacy, he is tedious, he is dull, he is lumbering as a compiler of Blue-Books—the worst kind of Blue-Book. For there are Blue-Books positively fascinating compared to Mill. His style, his method, are respectable—most tolerable and not to be endured. Bourgeois history is only less insufferable than bourgeois poetry. Modern India is full of able men steeped to their fingers in knowledge of the country and its history under British rule. At last one of them has taken heart of grace, and determined to face the full labours of an historian, as history is understood nowadays. Sir William Hunter has, he tells us, during a great portion of his life been accumulating materials for this history. He has investigated the State archives of India itself, and of other countries which have been concerned with the making of Indian history; and the result of these researches, this preparation, has come to be the work of which this is the first volume.

We welcome it with that gratitude which is said to be the anticipation of favours to come. For we have good hopes that at last our national reproach is to be taken away in this matter; that at last we are to have a history of British India to which we can point as sound and adequate work, which will respect the demands made upon the historian by modern ideals of history. Sir William Hunter's style is perspicuous and succinct, with none of the Dogberry historian's disposition to bestow all his tediousness upon us, were it more than it is. He has gripped his subject, and the result is that he marshals his facts with orderliness—with a comprehensive view and a sense of perspective. He has gone to the original sources for a large proportion of his materials; he enables us to follow his authorities, to check his statements and inferences, as is the duty of the modern historian. And he exhibits that clear judiciality of mind, that impartial temper, which is the honourable distinction of the British official in India, but is rarely carried into historical statement.

His admirable preface insists upon the fact that historians of India have neglected the slow processes, the arduous inconspicuous years of struggle, which laid the foundations of empire there. Taking a spaciouly logical view, he regards the English conquest as the last act in the drama of struggle between East and West in Eastern waters which was begun by the Portuguese conquest of the ocean roadways in the East. He reviews the splendidly gallant history of that conquest, when little Portugal, seizing strategical positions on the vast coast-line from Ormuz to Malacca, made herself sole mistress of the Eastern seas. It is a tale full of ruined names belonging to antique maps, which have become parcel of old romance—names which must be sought in the quaint atlas of Mercator, and enrich the verse of Milton. In "the spacious times of great Elizabeth" Dutch and English burst upon those long-sealed waters, and the Portuguese ocean empire is a breaking cloud before the Northern cannon. Then Dutch and English are set by the ears over the rich prize of the Spice Islands, from which they have scared the Portuguese. The Dutch triumphed in a few swift years, and the beaten English fell back upon the shores of India. The Dutch keep the Spice Islands to this day; but the English defeat thrust England upon her mighty Indian destiny. With that defeat Sir William Hunter's present volume ends. The climax of it is the tragedy of Ambeyna, skilfully told from the records of the time. Here you may read it in all its horribly picturesque details. You may shudder as the "poor, condemned English" are led one by one to the Dutch torture chamber, and emerge weeping very piteously, "all wet" and "grievously burned in divers places," having been anguished with "that extremity of torture by fire and water that flesh and blood was not able to bear it." And, finally, they pass to their most touching and unjust doom. Such were the possible haps of national enmity then. Sir William Hunter reads one memorable lesson in his preface. In the struggle for the Indies that people has always conquered which made the Eastern supremacy a national matter. Not whether the nation was great or small, strong or weak, but whether its national heart was in the struggle—that has been the decisive thing. Portugal won the Indies when her government threw all its energy into the enterprise; lost them when her Spanish rulers became half-hearted in the thing. The Dutch beat the English because King James gave no full support to the East India Company. The English drove the French from India because Dupleix was not supported by the French at home. Let us take the lesson to heart now, when there is again a European nation menacing us in India, "lest we forget."

Mombasa and Quiloa and Melind—

The Two Mr. Smiths of the City.

James and Horace Smith. By Arthur H. Beavan. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

In one of her letters, Jane Austen, who confessed to a few tender literary passions—the most considerable of which was, of course, for the Reverend Mr. Crabbe—mentions that she is in love with the two Mr. Smiths of the City. The two Mr. Smiths of the City were James and Horace, astute business men and accomplished satirical rhymers, who had just set the town laughing by their little volume of parodies called Rejected Addresses. James was a lawyer, the assistant solicitor to the Board of Ordnance; Horace was a stockbroker, and they both lived in Austin Friars. It is the story of their lives which Mr. Arthur H. Beavan narrates in the volume before us.

There is not much to tell; for, with the exception of their one famous book, neither brother did anything of first-class merit; nor were they men of any particular influence. Very many persons whose lives offer far more of interest escape the biographer. Indeed, to our mind the real figure of this book is not James and not Horace, but Robert Smith, their intelligent and indefatigable father. Robert Smith was born in 1747, and he lived until 1832—that is to say, he was thirteen when George II. died; he survived both George III. and George IV., and survived to see the passing of the Reform Bill; and all the time he kept a full and admirably clear diary, from which Mr. Beavan has been wise enough to make copious extracts. Among the notable scenes of which Robert Smith was an eye-witness were the Gordon Riots, and he has left a vivid description of the lawlessness then prevailing. He also wrote good verses, and was a man of wide reading and cultivated mind. The early pages of Mr. Beavan's volume are distinguished by this worthy gentleman's presence. James, the eldest son, was born in 1775, and Horace in 1779. Horace began to write novels when only just out of his teens, and was more or less a literary man all his life; James preferred a wise passiveness, writing only when much stimulated. The idea of Rejected Addresses was suggested to them by C. W. Ward, the general secretary of Drury-lane Theatre. That was in August, 1812, just six weeks before the reopening of the new theatre. To have any effect, the parodies had to be in the hands of the public before that night. In such tasks high-pressure is no disadvantage; the brothers worked with spirit; the book was done, a publisher found—a difficult task—and printing and binding were completed in the time. The book was thus not only a poetical tour de force, but also very creditable journalism. Its success was instantaneous and remarkable. Both brothers seem to have belonged to the order of authors who do much better work when they adopt a dramatic standpoint and write as another, than when they set down their own opinions in their own person. Horace's novels are forgotten, James's essays are dead; but the little sheaf of parodies is still alive, and will remain so for many years yet. While he was about it Mr. Beavan might very well have added the Rejected Addresses, by way of appendix, to this volume. They would occupy not many pages, and we should then have between two covers the lives of the brothers and their best work complete.

Of the two, James was the better wit. It was he who wrote the parodies of Cobbett and Crabbe, the drollest of the whole series; and it was he who did not write certain of Horace's books. "The Theatre, by the Rev. G. C.," is a delight, taken apart from the scheme of the book altogether, and not the least admirable part of it is the preface of apologies. "The line of handkerchiefs formed to enable him [Jennings] to recover his loss is purposely so crossed in texture and materials as to mislead the reader in respect of the real owner of any one of them. For, in the satirical view of life and manners which I occasionally present, my clerical profession has taught me how extremely improper it would be by any allusion, however slight, to give any uneasiness, however trivial, to any individual, however foolish or wicked." That is perfect. And Crabbe's sententiousness was as deftly and genially perverted:

Say, why those Babel strains from Babel tongues?
Who's that calls "Silence" with such leathern lungs?
He who, in quest of quiet, "silence" hoots,
Is apt to make the hubbub he imputes.

In the Hampshire Farmer's oration we have the master hand again. "When persons address an audience from the stage, it is usual, either in words or gesture, to say: 'Ladies and gentlemen, your servant.' If I were base enough, mean enough, paltry enough, and brute beast enough to follow that fashion, I should tell two lies in a breath. In the first place, you are not ladies and gentlemen, but, I hope, something better—that is to say, honest men and women; and, in the next place, if you were ever so much ladies and ever so much gentlemen, I am not, nor ever will be, your humble servant." Thus it begins, in true Cobbett style, and just a little like our own Mr. Ruskin. "Apropos, as the French valets say, who cut their masters' throats," is another true touch. For these things we have to thank James Smith. Horace had more ingenuity and glitter, but less humour. Some of his parodies were, in truth, imitations, and are not in themselves funny at all. To which hand "The Baby's Debüt" is due Mr. Beavan does not say; but, although it has merits of its own as a parody of Wordsworth, it is poor. Miss Fanshawe's fragmentary effort in the manner of "Peter Bell" has a hundred times more of the mock Wordsworth spirit. Take them altogether, however, the Rejected Addresses make one of the best jeux d'esprit in the language, and they rise occasionally to the highest level of travesty.

Subsequently James cultivated the gout and passed ponderously from club to club, saying good things. He died in 1839. Horace was more active. He married twice, and a daughter still survives him. The friend of many literary men, he seems to have been of real service to Shelley. All unite in speaking well of him; except, perhaps, Lord Houghton, who found conversation at his table unendurably artificial. Lord Houghton was then, however, very young. Horace Smith in later life took to historical novels, the best of which is Brambletye House; but that is not good. He died at Brighton, where his home had been for several years, in 1849.

Jowett the Preacher.

Sermons Biographical and Miscellaneous. By the late Benjamin Jowett, M.A. Edited by the Very Rev. the Hon. W. H. Fremantle, M.A., Dean of Ripon. (John Murray. 7s. 6d.)

THERE are many to whom these sermons will be welcome for the sake of the man who preached them—before whose mental vision they will bring the silvery hair, and the sharp, restless sparkle of the eyes so strangely joined with the most benevolent of smiles. But even apart from any personal relations, they are excellent reading. They are lucid; their style is simple and free from all suggestion of pulpit bombast; free from pious sensationalism and from hackneyed imagery; free also from the bitterness, evil-speaking, and clamour which often disfigure the rhetoric of theological polemics.

With wide eyes calm upon the whole of things, the pure and simple soul knows by an unfailing instinct how to refuse the evil and to choose the good, by tests that are surer than the touchstones of decrees and definitions—to select it with a cordiality of respectful greeting, and a readiness, as it were, to bask in the radiance of natural nobility. So that there is no need to draw a moral, save by the way and half in jest. Thus Jowett pauses in the midst of a glowing appreciation of Wesley to lament that he suffered his hair to grow long, and to warn his audience—he was preaching in Balliol chapel—that eccentricity is a great mistake—in most cases, a fatal and incurable mistake—which sets the world against a man (and the world is too many for most of us) and creates within him a fixed idea or mode of thinking, pervading his whole life. Beware [he concludes] of eccentricity. It has been the ruin of many, and is the more dangerous for this very reason, that no moral guilt attaches to it.

So, again, in the panegyric of Arthur Stanley—if so formal a word may fairly be applied to the homely sketch of his life—he interrupts himself upon the mention of Stanley's shyness, conquered in his mature years, to explain:

I think his example worth mentioning, because, probably, there are many here present who are similarly afflicted, and they may learn from him that this ridiculous malady is far from being incurable, but passes away in most persons when they come to be engaged in the real business of life.

This same panegyric contains an apology for the liberalising school of the national establishment, which is, of course, no less applicable to the preacher than to him of whom he was speaking. But for the quieting of his own conscience Jowett needed none of the casuistry that he held at the disposal of his friends. The National Church is to him just the National Church; and he mourns, as "the greatest misfortune that has ever befallen this country," the Act of Uniformity of 1662, by which half the nation was excluded from its preserves. The controversies which agitated the Oxford of his day seem to him of ludicrous insignificance. He quotes the author of The Saints' Everlasting Rest:

While we wrangle here in the dark we are dying and passing to the world which will decide all our controversies, and the safest passage is by a peaceable holiness.

That is in the sermon on Baxter, the appropriate scene of which was Westminster Abbey. Bunyan ("one of the greatest Englishmen, not only of his own age, but of any time") and Spinoza (of whom "it is impossible to resist the conviction that he was one of the best men that ever lived") together form the subject of a sermon preached at Edinburgh, in a Presbyterian church: and it is with a kind of rapturous appreciation of the irony that pervades the dispensations of Providence that this "minister of another denomination" points out how that, of the pair whom, for the nonce, it has pleased him fantastically to link, "one would have devoted the other to eternal flames, and that other would have regarded him as an ignorant fellow and a madman." There is salt in the text which introduces this discourse: "Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge." Wycliffe, Ignatius Loyola, Pascal, Gambetta, Archbishop Tait, Prof. Henry Smith, Canon Hugh Pearson, and T. H. Green are the subjects of the remaining biographical studies.

At the head of the section "Miscellaneous" is printed the remarkable sermon on "Statistics and Faith," preached before the University, in which the preacher seems, by a rare self-indulgence, to have yielded to the impulse to explore his own fundamental conception of the relations of man as a moral being to the supreme Moral Force. It merely states the problem, but states it in a characteristically daring form:

Faith tells us that in a thousand ways God's watchful care is about our bed and about our path, that our life itself is a miracle of so many years' standing, that He hears our prayers and provides for our wants. Experience presents us with the other side of the truth, which, whether we will or no, takes us by force and compels us to admit that never in any case have the laws of Nature been interfered with for our sake, or the slightest appearance been discernible of any variation of the order of the world.

Among the last three sermons is one of those which, on the first Sunday of each vacation, Jowett was accustomed to preach to the collegio scouts and their wives. Dean Fremantle, in a note to his Introduction, tells how that Browning, who had long desired to hear Jowett preach, was staying with him at one such time. Jowett, with his usual reticence, said nothing about the service, but slipped out for an hour or so after breakfast. When Browning knew that he had missed the occasion he had desired, "I am perfectly indignant with him," he said, half in jest, half in earnest; "he does not treat me as a Christian. He will walk with me, talk with me, eat with me, and drink with me; but he won't pray with me."

It is proposed shortly to produce a volume of Doctrinal Sermons, in which Jowett's singular attitude towards received beliefs will be exemplified. In the meanwhile the present collection, like its predecessor, the volume of College Sermons, throws a fascinating light upon the character and mental attitude of a man who in his generation was a great educative influence, and makes powerfully for that tender tolerance and gentle forbearance towards the infirmity of human speculation of which the Greek, his Master, was the prime apostle.

The Modern Mariner.

Idylls of the Sea. By F. T. Bullen. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

MR. BULLEN's preface to his new volume is too modest. He has tried, he says, to reproduce "with 'prentice hand" some of the things the sea has told him. "If I were to stop and consider what other men, freeholders upon the upper slopes of the literary Olympus, have done in the same direction, I should not dare to put forth this little book." It will not do. With a first effort such exercises in humility and self-depreciation are permissible, but the author of The Cruise of the "Cachalot" should exert more self-restraint. A man who can write as well as that might well spare us apologies for his 'prentice hand. Moreover, the fact that he can refer to stopping to consider the work of other authors is proof enough that he has considered it; hence the sentence means nothing, particularly as the principal value of such a book lies, not in fine writing, but in accuracy of description. No amount of meditation upon the work of the freeholders of the upper slopes of the literary Olympus should prevent a man with new facts of his own from setting them down. We wish to assure Mr. Bullen of this, in case his modesty should some day make good its threats and really get the better of him; for he writes too well and too interestingly to be spared.

This book is truly fascinating reading, for the sea, after all, is the place. Nothing can interfere with its wonderfulness and mystery. With all his sophistications and machinery man to-day has no more power over the sea than ever he had. He may descend into it in an air-tight costume, he may race over it at the rate of thirty knots an hour, he may build breakwaters, he may kill whales; but the sea still holds its own, is still supreme, romantic, and untameable. This is an age of law and order, of the protection of the citizen's rights, and the safeguarding of life, yet once a ship leaves port anything is possible upon it. At this moment—in 1899—there are vessels at sea on which the barbarities of the middle ages are being practised. No emperor of Rome at its worst was more tyrannically autocratic than a nineteenth century captain can be, once away from land. The sea's sanctions are unlimited. More and more, we fancy, as the conditions of ordinary existence become tamer, will romancists resort to the sea.

Mr. Bullen, however, is not concerned with the relations of man to man on shipboard—he leaves that to other writers, of whom, in the present fashion for strange stories of violence and adventure, there are already many—his eyes are for the beauty and wonder of the deep. He describes a tropical sunrise from the mast-head, a lunar terror, a submarine earthquake, the habits of sharks and whales, the death of an old sailor and its apparent link with the elements, great birds, curious fishes, and a score of other phenomena of the ocean, particularly in tropical regions. And to everything he brings enthusiasm, a passion for accuracy, and the good writing that comes of knowledge and sincerity. Our quotation is from a fine paper on "Running the Easting Down," a piece of rich and enkindling prose:

By four bells the summits of the climbing cumuli forming the immeasurable arch in the west were right overhead, while the sky within its radius was now overspread with a filmy veil that hid the stars from view. Suddenly a chill breath touched his ear, sensitive as a hound's, and immediately his fretful lassitude was gone. He stood erect, alert, every nerve tense, ready for action. "Stand by, the watch!" he roared, and in response a few dark figures slouched into sight from the shadowy corners where they had been dozing away the leaden-footed hours. Then a cool stream of air came steadily flowing from the mysterious centre of the gloom abaft. "Square the main-yard!" shouted the mate again; and with eerie, wailing cries the great steel tubes were trimmed to the coming breeze. The order was hardly executed before, with a rush and a scream, out leapt the west wind from its lair, while with many a sharp report and grinding of gear being drawn into its grooves the huge fabric obeyed the compelling impulse and began her three thousand league stretch to the eastward. . . . "Fine breeze, sir," chuckled the mate, rubbing his hands with delight. "Only hope it'll hold," replied the skipper, peering keenly aft into the eye of the wind. There, to a landsman, the sight was ominous, almost appalling. Dense masses of distorted nimbus came hurtling out of the deep gloom, which seemed to grow blacker and more menacing every hour. So through the howling day the big ship fled onward like a frightened thing, steady and straight as an ice-yacht over Lake Michigan, although at times an incipient sea smote her broadside, and, baffled, cast its crest aloft, where the shrieking blast caught it and whirled it in needle-like particles as high as the upper topsails. . . . Running upon the arc of a great circle, she gradually worsened the weather as she reached higher latitudes. Stinging snow squalls came yelling after her, hiding everything behind a bitter veil. Past gigantic table-topped icebergs, floating mountains against whose gaunt sides the awful billows broke with deafening clangour, flinging their hissing fragments hundreds of feet into the gloomy sky. At last so fierce grew the following storm that the task of reducing sail became absolutely necessary. All hands were called and sped aloft to the unequal conflict. Scourged by the merciless blast, battered by the threshing sails, they strove for dear life through two terrible hours of that stern night. A feeble cry was heard—a faint splash. Only a man dropped from the main top-gallant yard—through one hundred and twenty feet of darkness into the yeasty smother beneath, and ere the news reached the deck, calm and peaceful below the tumult, more than a mile astern, swallowed by the ever-unsatisfied maw of the ravaging sea. And onward like a meteor sped the flying ship, "running her Easting down."

Mr. Bullen's essays are not all of the same merit. But he is always in earnest and always informing. Mr. St. Loe Strachey contributes a discriminating and appreciative introduction to the volume.

A Whist Encyclopædia.

The Whist Reference Book. By William Mill Butler.
(Philadelphia: John C. Yarrston Publishing Co.)

THIS is whist written out in full. It is the whole game, its essence, its accidents, its history, its biography, its poetry, its anecdote, in encyclopædic form. You pass (in the alphabetical arrangement of the articles) from nightmare problems to the lightest ana and curiosities. You are awed and regaled by quick turns, and in the end you have but one word for Mr. Butler's work: tremendous!

Fortunately, whist is not the antique game that chess is. Its history can be told without references to Troy and the Ptolemies, and without quoting the elder Pliny. Whist is English, and modern. Shakespeare lived too early to play it. "Whisk," an early form of the word and game, is first mentioned in our literature by John Taylor, the Water Poet, in verses published four years after Shakespeare's death. Therefore the card-playing terms in the plays have no real connexion with whist. "Nine trumps, two aces—'tis a good hand," "force a play," and "we must speak by the card," were terms probably taken from the game of Triumph, a word of which trump is the corruption. Other expressions quoted by Mr. Butler are merely wrested to the uses of whist, as "In God's name, lead"; "Thou meagre lead which rather threat'nest than dost promise ought"; "Do you call, sir?" and "He echoes me." The production of such a sentence as "All the men and women merely players" only shows the poverty of Shakespeare's card lore. "Whisk" first becomes "whist" in Mudibras; and the first description of the game under its present name occurs in the 1680 edition of Charles Cotton's Complete Gamester. Cotton says the game is similar to "ruff and honours," "only they put out the deuces and take in no stock, and it is called whist from the silence to be observed in the play." Dr. Johnson, Nares, and Mr. Skeat all accept this simple etymology of "whist." With grief Mr. Butler complains that some later authorities are beginning to falter, and inquire whether the earlier form "whisk" does not point to some other origin: "lexicographers who perhaps have never played a game of whist in their lives," he scornfully designates these seekers after supererogatory truth.

Whist, then, is an English eighteenth century game in its origin. Its earliest headquarters were in Bedford-row. Here Hoyle and Lord Folkestone played at the Crown Coffee-House, while the Court continued to play ombre, quadrille, and basset. Indeed, whist was of tavern birth, and its accoucheurs were gamblers and sharpers. Edmond Hoyle perceived the seeds of greatness in the disreputable bantling, and nursed and chastened it into a royal game. In 1741 he was living in Queen-square, teaching whist at a guinea a lesson. Next year appeared his Short Treatise, his "Hoyle." This book set whist on its legs once for all. Its baptism of satire was severe. The World said in 1753 that while the science of whist had been "rendered systematic by the philosophic pen of Mr. Hoyle, the art still requires treatment, and a gentleman now in the Old Bailey prison, at his leisure hours, has nearly completed a work which will make the art clear to the meanest capacity." Following quickly on Hoyle's book came the skit "The Humours of Whist, a Dramatic Satire, as noted every day at White's and other Coffee-Houses and Assemblies." The chief characters were Professor Whiston, representing Hoyle, and Sir Calculation Puzzle. The popularity of Hoyle's work is made clear even in this satire. Says Sir Calculation Puzzle: "I pronounce it the gospel of whist players"; and Lord Slim remarks: "I have joined twelve companies in the Mall, and eleven of them were talking about it. It's the subject of all conversation, and has had the honour to be introduced into the Cabinet. Why, thou't be laughed intolerably unless you can tell how many hundred and odd it is for or against one that your partner has or has not such a card or such a card." The book and the game (the Hoyle game, as it is now called) flourished together, and Byron wrote with truth: "Troy owes to Homer what whist owes to Hoyle." Already whist had been "received at Court," and in 1791 it had assumed such a national character as to inspire an epic in twelve cantos. The author, Alexander Thomson, is unknown to fame outside of learned whist circles; but the spirit of his poem may be judged by the following lines. The suggestion they contain might be added to the agenda paper of the forthcoming conference on disarmament:

Nor do I yet despair to see the day
When hostile armies, rang'd in neat array,
Instead of fighting, shall engage in play.
When peaceful whist the quarrel shall decide,
And Christian blood be spilt on neither side,
Then pleas no more shall wait the tardy laws,
But one odd trick at once conclude the cause . . .
Then Britain still, to all the world's surprise,
In this great science shall progressive rise,
Till ages hence, when all of each degree
Shall play a game as well as Hoyle or me!

The new, scientific period in the history of whist dawned about 1850, when the "Little Whist School"—a coterie of Cambridge men—took up the game as an intellectual study. To this school belonged Henry Jones ("Cavendish"), James Clay, and Dr. William Pole. The technical writings of these men have had an extraordinary vogue in America, where whist now enjoys an importance not assigned to it in any other country—a fact of which this book is the proof and monument. It is not possible to indicate the variety of matters dealt with by Mr. Butler. Here are a few at random: American leads, celebrated people who played whist, character by whist, cheating, conventional signals, Cavendish, chances at whist, duplicate whist, fads, Graham's Coffee-House, humours of whist, ignorant players, illustrative hands, jumping a suit, Low's signal, "Mort," "Mixers," the odd trick, "Post-mortem," "Reverse Discard," self-playing cards, semi-honours, "Singleton," whist as an educator, "whist in novels," &c., &c. Many of the terms used in whist or by whist players are highly curious. There is one which will go to the consciences of many—"bumblepuppy." Bumblepuppy is bad whist play; a bad whist player is a bumblepuppist; while old and hardened sinners are, of course, bumbledogs. The wide range and workmanlike execution of this reference book are its conspicuous merits; its science we leave to experts, to bumblepuppists its teaching.

An Idealist.

Fields, Factories, and Workshops. By P. Kropotkin.
(Hutchinson & Co. 12s.)

PRINCE KROPOTKIN is a stimulating apostle of the petite culture and the petty trade. Uncompromising in his condemnation of division of labour as practised in modern industry, he holds up the ideal of an associated, integrated, harmonised labour. "Each nation her own agriculturist and manufacturer; each individual working in the field and in some industrial art; each individual combining scientific knowledge with the knowledge of a handicraft—such is, we affirm, the present tendency of civilised nations"—they are his words. But the idealist with the eye of faith reaches conclusions very different from those which inference from experience seems to justify.

With regard to territorial division of labour it is shown with considerable force that the specialisation of nations in manufactures or in agriculture tends to disappear as the more backward nations enter one after another upon the stage of the "great industry." Hence England's pre-eminence in manufactures may pass away, and, having nothing wherewith to buy food, she may be forced to raise more agricultural produce from her own soil. But this decentralisation of industries, we are told, will be a blessing, for our long-neglected soil may then be thoroughly cultivated, with results as yet hardly dreamed of.

In demonstrating the possibilities of agriculture as revealed in experimental farms and in the market-gardens of Jersey, Flanders, and the environs of Paris, the author is handling a congenial topic. In his praise of intensive culture he rises to the height of a prose Georgic. But in singing tilth and vineyard he fails to consider the practical question what outlay of capital is necessary to produce the enormous crops he describes. Moreover, it is important to note that the heavy outlay which must needs be required in the cases he details can only be recouped because London or Paris offers a convenient market for the sale of early produce to wealthy consumers. It may pay to create a rich artificial soil for such produce, but we look in vain for evidence that equally prolific crops of cereals or vegetables can be profitably raised in large quantities and sold at low prices. Until the alleged capabilities of the horticultural treatment of corn and other crops have been more fully proved, we must rest content with the relatively modest results of the Rothamsted experiments. Perhaps, however, it is not expected that our country will become such a literal paradise until it has got rid of "the obstacles in our institutions, in our inheritances and survivals from the past—in the ghosts which oppress us." But, alas! this time is not yet.

In turning to the chapters on small industries and industrial villages, we felt keen expectancy, for the subject of the extent and distribution of the petty trades in Western Europe has never been adequately worked out. But Prince Kropotkin, though he has a broad outlook over modern industry, makes no important addition to our stock of knowledge. He is too eager to trace an increasing tendency for small industries to combine with agriculture. Yet he has to admit that many of the petty trades are in a precarious condition, and he cannot escape the fact that many of the most flourishing are inseparably bound up with the centralised industry which his anarchist soul abhors.

Whether the combination of industrial pursuits with intensive agriculture, and of brain work with manual work, is a probable or even a desirable synthesis, we are inclined to doubt, but the contemplation of this ideal arouses in the author a genuine enthusiasm which colours and vivifies his style and wins the attention of the most sceptical.

Ostrovsky's "The Storm."

The Storm. By Ostrovsky. Translated by Constance Garnett. "Modern Plays" Series. (Duckworth. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE series of "Modern Plays," edited by R. Brimley Johnson and R. Erichsen, opened inauspiciously with Mr. Arthur Symonds's translation of "Les Aubes," by Emile Verhaeren. The success of the venture depended to a great extent upon the second volume, and it is with real satisfaction that we can write of "The Storm" as a most interesting and satisfactory piece of work. Mrs. Garnett has given us an admirable translation of a remarkable play. Her translations, as all know who have read her edition of Turgenev, are accurate and faithful renderings of the original, written in strong and graceful English. In reading them one almost forgets that they are translations, for in her hands a book loses only the absolutely inevitable in the dangerous process of transplantation. No higher praise could be offered to any translator.

And "The Storm" was worth translating. It is a fine piece of dramatic workmanship, strong in human interest and picturesque; but the story is not its chief attraction. It is a striking picture of a life about which we are strangely ignorant. It is a perfect revelation of old-fashioned Muscovite temperament and character. It is written from the inside, written by one who was only unconsciously a psychological analyst. In this respect it is almost unique. Turgenev and Tolstoi, Gontcharov and Gogol, write as cosmopolitans. They have probed deeply into the Russian character, but for the most part they write from the outside, from the point of view of the enlightened Russian whose eyes have been opened by Western education. "The Storm" is evidently a political tract, a liberal or progressive manifesto. To the Russian it may probably have been nothing more. To us it comes, as Mr. Garnett says in his excellent preface, as a revelation and a striking criticism of national life.

"The Storm" is a counterblast to Tolstoi's doctrine of non-resistance. It preaches revolt against the tyranny of the Russian patriarchal system. To appreciate the crushing strength of that tyranny is to understand much that is otherwise inexplicable in the Russian character. It is the secret of Russian fatalism, of nihilism. From birth neither man nor woman is free. Personal rights are unrecognised; oppression, despotism, and the horrors of anarchy are fostered by it. Such women as Mme. Kabanova, the tyrannical mother; such creations as Dikoy, the bully; or Kabanov, the man who submits, are national types. Such women as Katerina, who revolts, are quite exceptional.

We have said enough to indicate wherein lies the supreme interest of the play, and there is no need to discuss the plot, which, apart from the fact that it is concerned with Russian character, would be considered hopelessly out of date. Mr. Edward Garnett's preface makes clear the general meaning and the significance of the piece, and is invaluable. But we should have been even more in his debt if he had supplied some biographical details of Ostrovsky, whose history and work are to all intents and purposes unknown in this country.

Other New Books.

THE COST OF SPORT.

EDITED BY F. G. AFLALO.

This should prove a very useful reference book for sportsmen and intending sportsmen. No such collection of facts has hitherto existed, and Mr. Aflalo tells us that "the extraordinary difficulty which has, in the preparation of this little book, been experienced in obtaining and reconciling trustworthy information at first hand from correspondents of undoubted experience, may go far to explain the cause of this omission in sporting books." Well, this is an heroic attempt to supply the need. Mr. Aflalo makes no claim to have covered the whole range of sport; but he has compiled a book which may be consulted by all who wish to form some idea of the cost of various kinds of shooting and fishing in the British Islands, in Scandinavia, India, Morocco, and elsewhere; the cost of dogs, keepers and horses, and ferrets, and kennels, and clothes, and licences; the cost of hunting, racing, trotting, boating, yachting; the cost of games like curling, golf, and polo; the cost of archery, coursing, and falconry. The general effect of the book is chastening, and this despite the fact that the authors who deal with the various departments address themselves to the average man. For when the cost of sport is stated at its lowest it is usually "stiff," and one cannot but receive from these pages a new impression of the wealth of that country in which men are found willing to spend fortunes on special methods of enjoying sunshine. It would not be useful to quote any figures; it is enough to state that the various kinds of sporting finance are dealt with by such experts as the Earl of Coventry, Major Ricardo, Mr. Edward Whympster, Mr. Walter Winans, Mr. W. H. Grenfell, and others. (Murray. 6s.)

SOUTH COUNTRY TROUT STREAMS. BY G. A. B. DEWAR.

This is a good addition to the "Anglers' Library." Mr. Dewar holds a brief for the trout streams of the south as against the much advertised streams of the north, and a very pretty and effective case he makes for them. He takes us along the banks of the Kent and Hampshire and Berkshire streams, adventuring as far as Gloucestershire, Wiltshire, and Dorset; and he has this for the Londoner:

I do not hesitate to assert that a good deal of the finest trout fishing in the United Kingdom is actually in or hard by the counties or shires of the southern seaboard. Some of it is within three hours of the heart of London—by which I mean that a man, if he has the right to fish and the time and desire, may leave his home within a mile or two of one of the great London railway stations, after a moderately early breakfast, and, before midday, be angling in the purest and sweetest of genuine trout streams. He can accomplish the feat in two hours inclusive in a certain number of cases, and, in a very few, perhaps well within that space of time.

In his succeeding chapters Mr. Dewar expatiates with all the knowledge of an angler, and all the rapture of a lover of nature, on southern streams which yield trout in plenty. Of these the Test in Hampshire is the queen. "It flows, a limpid stream, abounding with splendid trout, and, in some cases, with grayling of great size, through a land, indeed, of milk and honey in the literal sense." The names of the southern trout streams are quaint and musical, as: the Cray, the Darenth, the Mole, the Tillingbourne, the Rib, the Ver, the Kennet, the Shreen, the Ebbles, the Nadder, the Bovey, the Dart. Decidedly, Mr. Dewar has written a book attractive to many besides anglers. The photographic illustrations are delightful, likewise the frontispiece from a drawing by Mr. Percy Buckman. (Lawrence & Bullen.)

STUDIES IN SOME FAMOUS LETTERS. BY J. C. BAILEY.

Mr. Bailey's idea was good: "to piece together, as far as may be, the scattered fragments of self-portraiture" which are to be found in the letters of Cowper, Gray, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Swift, Johnson, Gibbon, Lamb, and FitzGerald. We only wish that Mr. Bailey had stuck to his plan more closely: there is sometimes in his book an intolerable deal of cement to a few bricks. We mean that he does not quote enough. Of the forty pages devoted to Edward FitzGerald thirteen only contain extended quotations from his letters; in the thirty-seven pages given to Swift, quotations of any length appear in only ten. These proportions are not liberal enough; the piecing-together method is hardly fulfilled. For the rest Mr. Bailey is in love with his subject, is often discriminating, and is on the whole a good and competent guide to the pleasant land of the letter-writers. On p. 57 we find this curious account of the opening of the British Museum in one of Gray's letters to Wharton. Gray describes the company assembled in the reading-room:

We were, first, a man that writes for Lord Royston; secondly, a man that writes for Dr. Burton, of York; thirdly, a man that writes for the Emperor of Germany, or Dr. Pocock, for he speaks the worst English I ever heard; fourthly, Dr. Stukely, who writes for himself, the very worst person he could write for; and, lastly, I, who only read to know if there be anything worth writing, and that not without some difficulty. I find that they printed one thousand copies of the Harleian Catalogue, and have only sold fourscore; that they have £900 a year income, and spend £1,300, and are building apartments for the under-keepers; so I expect in winter to see the collection advertised and set to auction.

Interesting as this passage is, its citation by Mr. Bailey is defective, for it cries for annotation and receives none. The "British Museum" (then Montagu House), the "reading-room," the authors named and their peculiar literary occupations, the finances of the new institution—all these points require brief footnotes, the more so if Mr. Bailey be correct (but surely he is not) in supposing that Gray's is "the only contemporary account of the opening of the British Museum." (Burleigh.)

THE CYCLOPÆDIA OF HOME ARTS.

This book should be a "real boon" to the ingenious family. It has come at the wrong time: the beginning of winter, not the beginning of spring, is the psychological moment for the publication of a manual on employments for long evenings and Saturday afternoons; but that is of no consequence. The fact remains that there now exists between two covers a complete guide to most, if not all, of what are called the home arts. The editor of this compendious volume is Mr. Montague Marks, who, with the aid of many diagrams, presents his case with perfect clearness. Among the home arts we find one somewhat repellently styled "Boiled Leather Work." (Pearson. 7s. 6d. net.)

HISTORY OF DOGMA.

BY DR. ADOLPH HARNACK.

This sixth volume of the English version of Dr. Harnack's great work, translated by Mr. McGilchrist, comprises chapters vii. and viii. of Part II., Book II., in the original German edition. It starts from the end of the tenth century. It includes, that is to say, that revival of piety of which the monastery of Cluny was the centre; the final vindication by the Roman See of its independence of all temporal authority; and the growth of scholasticism—that is, the reconciliation of dogma with Aristotle. The second chapter brings the narrative down to the beginning of the sixteenth century, and sees the sacramental system and the mystery of transubstantiation finally lifted out of the controversies of the schools on to the plane of dogmas which must be accepted fide divina. The period is an extremely interesting one. Those were the days in which events imparted the last quiver to the kaleidoscope, and when the pieces fell together into the pattern after which the Council of Trent was to combine the enduring mosaic of its Decrees. (Williams & Norgate. 10s. 6d.)

THE ASCENT THROUGH CHRIST. BY E. GRIFFITH-JONES.

The development of the human species by an extremely gradual progression from lower forms of life may, perhaps, be taken as established. Mr. Griffith-Jones's purpose is to find for the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation a place in the orderly history of man. He enters upon his work handicapped, indeed, by a position that presupposes orthodoxy, but with the attitude, at least, of a free inquisitor; and he arrives at conclusions that promise helpful suggestion to upholders of the Catholic faith. His notions of the Hypostatic Union are loose, with the looseness characteristic of the Lux Mundi school; but nevertheless his book may be welcomed as a serious contribution to the task of restating the dogmas of the Christian religion in the new form demanded by an age that is rather excited by its discoveries in the field of natural science. The book is readable. (James Bowden. 7s. 6d.)

HOW TO GET ON THE STAGE.

BY LEOPOLD WAGNER.

Aspirants for the stage are so many, and their chances of fame and fortune are so few (to say nothing of pitfalls), that we are doubtful whether we do not need a manual entitled "How to Succeed Off the Stage." But it would be unfair to expect Mr. Leopold Wagner to write it. He is all for helping the dramatic aspirant and the talented amateur. His advice is sound and various and entertaining. He includes the Bogus Manager in his scorn, and the Theatre Cat in his approval. (Chatto & Windus. 2s. 6d.)

Fiction.

A Duet, with an Occasional Chorus. By A. Conan Doyle.
(Grant Richards. 6s.)

To say that this book is a surprise is to speak mildly: it is a complete mystification. One might call it a literary phenomenon of the highest curiosity. Dr. Conan Doyle holds a reputation for sound work, and he has fairly earned it by conscientious and ingenious labour in various fields. He has done well the mere novel of incident. Among historical fiction, his Micah Clarke is remembered with pleasure. And in still another vein, his Sherlock Holmes has been enjoyed by more people than are willing to confess the fact. And now, in A Duet, he casts off all his former selves, and appears as—as what? At this point we hesitate. The obvious thing would be to say that he appears as an amiable but feeble humorist, his theme being the most domestic domesticity. But from certain indications we surmise that Dr. Doyle has aspired to be a realist; that he has said to himself: "There is 'serious' work to be done; after all this unfettered romance of mine, I will confine myself within the strict bounds of truth to modern life." We are the more convinced that Dr. Doyle has sought after "realism" in that the book contains one chapter (warningly entitled "A Thunder-cloud") which would not be out of place in the feuilleton of the Echo de Paris, and which will certainly come as a sad shock to the majority of the Doctor's readers.

A Duet is the story of the early married life of Frank and Maude Crosse. Frank was an insurance clerk, and lived at Woking. The events recorded are: a visit to Westminster Abbey and the Houses of Parliament ("the most stately of ancient English buildings was contrasted with the most beautiful of modern ones"!); the wedding, a fortunate speculation, a difficulty about a fidelity guarantee, an attempt to study Browning, the "thunder-cloud" incident, a visit to Carlyle's house, and the birth of a child.

Here is a fair specimen of the philosophy and the style:

The little two-oared craft who put out upon that voyage have to lay their own course, each for itself; and all round them, as they go, they see the floating timbers and broken keels of other little boats, which had once started out full of hope and confidence. There are currents and eddies, low sand-banks and sunken reefs, and happy the crews who see them ahead, and trim their course to avoid them.

And here is another from the last chapter:

Our young married couples may feel that two is company and three is none, but there comes a little noisy intruder to break into their sweet intimacy. The coming of the third is the beginning of a new life for them as well as for it—a life which is more useful and more permanent, but never so concentrated as before. That little pink thing with the blinking eyes will divert some of the love and some of the attention, and the very trouble which its coming has caused will set its mother's heart yearning over it.

Several of the chapters, especially the first one, and "The Browning Society," would serve, exactly as they stand, as light sketches for evening journalism; but no part of the book possesses higher merit than this. Needless to say, Dr. Doyle has not been realistic, for realism is not his métier. The book bears no resemblance to life, of which it is a very conventional idealisation. It is sometimes wrong in elementary facts. Further, it has no sort of conviction. The charitable will regard it as an experiment. Dr. Doyle is perfectly justified in making experiments, for only by experiments can the artist be assured that no portion of his talent is lying idle. Not all experiments are successful; and this—let us say it clearly—is a failure.

Pharos the Egyptian. By Guy Boothby.
(Ward, Lock & Co. 6s.)

This is a cosmopolitan tale of mystery and horror, the scenes of which pass in London, Prague, Hamburg, Port Said, Cairo, the Great Pyramid, and the ruins of the temple of Ammon-Ra. Mr. Boothby is one of the most skilled traffickers in sensation known to the magazines, and we should be inclined to say that Pharos the Egyptian is second only to the best of his efforts. There is not a chapter without its lurid incident, not a page which does not titillate the jaded curiosity. And the means employed are so simple, so childlike:

"You know it is not that," she answered quickly and with a little stamp of her foot. "It is for your own sake I am imploring you to go. If you knew as much of this house as I do, you would not remain in it another minute."

"My dear madam," I said, "if you would only be more explicit I should be the better able to understand you."

"I cannot be more explicit," she answered; "such a thing is out of my power. But remember, if anything happens, I have warned you, and your fate will be upon your own head."

"But——" I cried, half rising from my seat.

"Hush!" she answered. "There is not time for more. He is coming."

A moment later Pharos entered the room.

Surely we have here a trick of narrative as old and as crude as the earliest and least artful newspaper serial (whatever that was). Yet Mr. Boothby employs it and similar dodges with a result which is truly surprising. He has indeed acquired and profited by the knowledge that in the manufacture of sensation one cannot use the obvious too freely. It is always the obvious which succeeds.

The central idea of the story—namely, that the old gods of Egypt revenge themselves by means of a great plague for the sacrilege which European nations, under the plea of "exploration," have committed upon their sacred haunts—is a good one for Mr. Boothby's purposes. In the hands of Victor Hugo, even of Maurus Jokai, such a theme might have been made sublime; Mr. Boothby does better than that—he makes it effective. His chief characters are Pharos, a gentleman some three thousand years old; a beautiful Hungarian violinist, ward of Pharos; and an English artist named Cyril Forrester, whose father had been an "explorer." The link between England of to-day and Egypt of the Pharaohs is, of course, a mummy. Given these data and an acquaintance with Mr. Boothby's methods, you should be able to imagine the rest. The book is clever, the work of one skilled at his own trade, carefully concocted (though the end seems a trifle rosier than is warranted by the introduction), and possessing a quite sufficiently plausible air of realism. One need scarcely say that its connexion with literature is a little slender.

The Kingdom of Hate. By Tom Gallon.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

It appears that Mr. Tom Gallon has forsaken the romance of sentiment in order to follow in the wake of Mr. Anthony Hope—that particular Mr. Anthony Hope who wrote The Prisoner of Zenda. We have here the three ingredients necessary to the kind of novel which Mr. Hope invented: (a) an adventurous Englishman, (b) an obscure foreign throne, (c) an unscrupulous pretender to that throne.

"When I make up my mind to a thing, I like to see it carried through; and in the way of the successful carrying out of my ambitions stood a woman. You may, perhaps, guess who that woman was?"

"The Princess Viviana?"

"Precisely. She is, or was, in the direct line of succession to this kingdom. I am her guardian; her father died, leaving her practically in my charge; he had great faith in me—simple old man! You understand the situation? I—I—a man of full powers and great ambitions; a man who cannot brook interference in the smallest details of his life—I was to play second fiddle to this slip of a girl—to dance as it pleased her to pipe. Was it likely? was it the sort of thing I should do?"

There, in the words of the wicked Count Chaillavia, is the basis of the matter. Let us admit at once that Mr. Gallon has contrived a very agreeable system of excitations, thus proving that he can do more than one thing well. The book has indeed several good qualities; but these good qualities serve the sinister purpose of accentuating its defect; and the defect lies in its construction. The author of a story of stirring intrigue is entitled by established custom to the use of a certain amount of coincidence; he should, however, be careful not to exceed his allowance. Unfortunately Mr. Gallon has in this respect sinned, and he has suffered the penalty of his sin: the first part of the tale carries no conviction. In a hundred pages are three amazing coincidences, any one of which should have sufficed for the entire novel. If the reader is invited to believe that a young gentleman, who for a drunken wager knocks haphazard at the door of a London mansion, is at once taken in and married to a lady awaiting a husband at a private altar (cf. Stevenson), the reader will probably exert his credulity: it is a duty which he owes to the author; but, when the young man having been torn from his bride seeks distraction in Paris, and there meets by pure accident the prime mover in the original mystery of the marriage, then the reader will revolt, and cry out upon the author for trespassing on his good-nature. Mr. Gallon seems to have forgotten that readers are, after all, but human, with sharp limitations. It is a pity, for The Kingdom of Hate is all enveloped in the proper atmosphere of romance.

Swallow. By H. Rider Haggard.
(Longmans. 6s.)

IN this book Mr. Haggard's foot is on his native heath. He has returned to South Africa and the Kaffirs, with whom he has always been at his best. The hero is an English lad adopted by a Boer family, and the subordinate title is "A Tale of the Great Trek"; but, in truth, the novelty is not so great as it looks. The Great Trek merely furnishes a setting for the dénoûment, and the main theme of the book is a succession of bush fights and adventure after Mr. Haggard's familiar manner.

We quote the account of the death of the villain:

Round and round the rock chair they swung, Van Vooren still holding fast to the arm of the dead woman, who was lashed to it. Yes, even from where I stood, five hundred feet below, I could see the flash of spear and knife as they struck and struck again. At length a blow went home; the Zulu assegai sank deep into Van Vooren's chest and he hung backwards over the edge of the abyss, supported only by his grip of the dead arm—from below it looked as if he were drawing the corpse to him against its will. . . . Ralph looked at him and laughed, and crying "That curse of God you mocked at falls at last," with a sudden stroke he drew the sharp edge of the spear across the lashing that held the body to the seat. The rimpri parted, and with a swift and awful rush, like that of a swooping bird, the dead woman and the living man plunged headlong into space.

On the whole, this is the best romance Mr. Haggard has written for some years, if we cannot rank it with King Solomon's Mines.

"I SAW whatever thou hast seen,
Encountered all that troubles thee;
I was whatever thou hast been,
I am what thou shalt be."

WELL, AFTER ALL —.

BY F. FRANKFORT MOORE.

Mr. Moore gives us another racy novel, opening with a spirited account of a run on the bank of Westwood, Westwood, Barwell, & Westwood. Mr. Westwood controls the panic with great skill, and observes that women behave much more crudely on such occasions than men. "Isn't it wonderful," he remarks, "that a woman—a lady—can change her natural expression of calm—the repose that stamps the caste of Vere de Vere—to that of a Harpy in a moment? It makes one thoughtful, doesn't it? Which is the real woman, Cyril—the one who smiles pleasantly on you and insists on your taking another hot buttered muffin as you loll in one of her easy chairs in front of her drawing-room fire, or the one who rushes trembling into your office and stretches out a lean, talon-like, gloveless hand, glaring at you all the time, with a cry—some shrill, others hoarse—of 'My money! Give me my money!'—which is the real woman?" (Hutchinson. 6s.)

A MILLIONAIRE'S DAUGHTER.

BY PERCY WHITE.

How Margaret Blythe, the pretty and clever daughter of a millionaire, is wooed by various men, and won by her father's private secretary, is the simple plot of this engaging story. Margaret has a pretty humour. Throwing bread to the sea-gulls from her father's yacht, she says: "In gull-land they don't like bread, but it's a point of honour to catch it." (C. A. Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

GREY WEATHER.

BY JOHN BUCHAN.

Fifteen short stories, or sketches, of Scottish moorland life, preceded by a "Ballad for Grey Weather." This ballad is referred to in one of the stories as "a song so old that Adam heard it in the Garden before Eve came to comfort him, so young that from it still flows the whole joy and sorrow of earth." The dangers, humours, and superstitions of moorland life are set forth in the stories. (John Lane. 6s.)

SAMUEL BOYD.

BY B. L. FARJEON.

The full title is Samuel Boyd of Catchpole-square: a Mystery. Samuel is a money-lender of exaggerated cruelty, and has a clerk named Abel Death. There is a murder, of course. "At no great distance from the Square stood Saint Michael's Church, its clock proclaiming the hour. Ten! Eleven! Twelve! How long these hours took to strike! . . . A shot rings out! Another! . . . Silence reigns." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE GUARDIANS OF PANZY.

BY DOLF WYLLARDE.

"A story of a Man, a Woman, and a Child." The child plays in the man's garden, while he and the woman talk over the palings. The fortunes of the three are developed rather crudely, and the talk of the child hardly shows observation:

"'Mr. Seymour,' Panzy remarked solemnly, 'is a very clever percentage.'

'Personage, Panzy.'

'Isn't it all the same, Mummy?'"

We imagine that the number of children who say percentage, or mean to say personage, is zero. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE BROTHERHOOD OF THE SEVEN KINGS.

BY L. T. MEADE AND ROBERT EUSTACE.

A story of the machinations of a secret society of which the ruling spirit is Mme. Kalouchy, a woman of charm and diabolical intentions. (Ward, Lock. 5s.)

The Case of Henry Lawson.

THE most representative and, to our mind, the best writer that Australia has yet produced is Mr. Henry Lawson. In prose he is often very good indeed, as in our review of While the Billy Boils, his volume of stories and sketches, a year or so ago, we tried to prove; and his verse, although technically it has been surpassed by other Australian writers, has yet a character of its own, and a note of sincerity peculiar to itself. In this country Mr. Lawson's volume of poems, In the Days when the World was Wide, has many readers: in Australia seven thousand copies have been sold in the three or four years since the book was published, and While the Billy Boils is in its eighth thousand.

Yet in spite of this seeming prosperity, with Mr. Lawson himself all is not well, and he has recently told the story of his struggles in the pages of the Sydney Bulletin for the benefit of young men who, like himself, may be proposing to try to live by writing in a land where writing comes far down on the list of necessities. The autobiography is a very interesting document. Mr. Lawson began life on a selection in New South Wales. As a boy he had no schooling, but helped his father, who was a carpenter, and did every kind of job that was needed. In the teens he moved into the city, and taught himself house painting and listened to Socialist orators. Not till 1887, however, did he begin to write, although he had been wishing to do so for years. That was the time of the Republican Riots, when disloyalty came to a head in Sydney, and crowds cheered for the Republic of Australia. Mr. Lawson did more than cheer: he wrote a "Song of the Republic" and sent it to the Bulletin, and they told him to try again. He also helped to edit, print, and produce a "fly blister," called the Republican. One night, in the autumn of 1887, he carried a little bundle of verses to the Bulletin office and left them in the hands of a charwoman. They were all printed. Says Mr. Lawson:

In Dec. '87, I was coach-painting at Windsor, [Melb., for 6s. a day, when I got my first Xmas Bulletin. I tore it open, tremblingly; glanced through it, to make sure I was there; and hid it in a hearse I was "rubbing down"—for the boss was a fierce Wesleyan. I rubbed hard with the pumice-stone till my heart didn't thump so much, and I felt calmer. I stole glances, behind the hearse, at "Golden Gully" and "The Wreck of the Derry Castle," and the kindly editorial note to the effect that I was a mere lad (age 19), earning a living, under difficulties, at house-painting, and that my education was as yet unfinished (N.B.—I couldn't spell), and that my talent spoke for itself in the following poem. I was in print, and in the Xmas number of a journal I had worshipped, and devoured every inch of, for years. I felt strong and proud enough to clean pigstyes, if need be, for a living for the rest of my natural life—provided the Bulletin went on publishing the poetry. Varnish on old hearses is hard as flint; but I made a good job of that one, and a quick job—for I "rubbed down" on air if I didn't walk on it. It was the shortest eight hours' graft I ever did.

This was the real beginning. But Australia is a hard country for a poet, and a Republican poet at that. It is true that vigorous verse is read there with avidity, but the rates of payment for it are wretchedly low. Mr. Lawson, who became an irregular contributor, chiefly of verse, to several papers, was paid very poorly or not at all. He therefore returned to house painting "up country," but being offered two pounds a week as general utility man on the Brisbane Boomerang, accepted it. The Boomerang lacked the sinews of war, and died, and Mr. Lawson's ballad of "The Cambaroora Star" tells its story. He returned to Sydney by sea, steerage, and took to painting again. In 1892 he went to Bourke and "swagged" it for six months, "picking up" in a shearing shed and so forth, finally returning to Sydney in charge of five trucks of cattle. All these experiences have since had their literary uses, although they cannot be called profitable. Most of the matter in While the Billy Boils, for example, which is the result of these wanderings, was paid for at the rate of twelve shillings and sixpence a column. In 1893 Mr. Lawson crossed to New Zealand, where he "did a three months' unemployed perish," tried tree felling, and was not paid, house painting again, then joined a telegraph line gang for six months, and would have stayed longer but for the offer of a place on the staff of the Sydney Daily Worker. He arrived in Sydney three days after the paper had ceased, and was given instead a place on the Weekly Worker for awhile. Then, on being asked to leave, he tried West Australia and house painting again, married and taught school. He is "now in Sydney once more," and the family has been augmented by a baby.

Such is Mr. Lawson's history. In his twelve years of writing he has made £700, £200 of which are the profits on his two books, of which he has sold the entire rights. He ends thus:

A last word for myself. I don't know about the merit or value of my work; all I know is, that I started a shy, ignorant lad from the Bush, under every disadvantage arising from poverty and lack of education, and with the extra disadvantage of partial deafness thrown in. I started with implicit faith in human nature, and a heart full of love for Australia, and hatred for wrong and injustice. I taught myself a trade—the first years in Sydney I rose at five o'clock in the morning to go to work with a rough crowd in the factory of a hard taskmaster; and learnt the little I did at a night-school; and I worked even then, before I could write, for a cause I believed in. I sought out my characters and studied them; I wrote of nothing that I had not myself seen or experienced; I wrote and re-wrote painfully, and believed that every line was true and for the right. I kept steady and worked hard for seven years, and that work met with appreciation in Australia and a warm welcome in London. When desperately hard up and with a wife to provide for, I at last was forced to apply to the Govt. for temporary work. I was kept hanging about the office for weeks; and when, as a last resource, I applied for a railway-pass for a month to enable me to find work in the country and gather new material for literary work, I did not receive a reply. I was obliged to seek the means of earning bread and butter from the Govt. of a province (M.L.) in whose people's interests I had never written a line.

My advice to any young Australian writer whose talents have been recognised would be to go steerage, stow away, swim, and seek London, Yaukeeland, or Timbuctoo, rather than stay in Australia till his genius turned to gall or beer. Or, failing this—and still in the interests of human nature and literature—to study elementary anatomy, especially as applies to the cranium, and then shoot himself carefully with the aid of a looking-glass.

No new moral is to be drawn. Mr. Lawson is yet another example of the unlucky man of unfortunate temperament. It is clear enough from his story that he has not played his cards too well. He is a good writer, a shrewd and humorous observer, and his sympathies are all with the weak and the noble; but he has failed altogether to measure his fellow man and act accordingly. So much the worse for Mr. Lawson and so much the less to the honour of his fellow man.

How Tolstoy Works.

"How does Count Tolstoy work?" is the question which Mr. Charles Johnston asks and answers in the Arena. His article is the third in a very interesting series on "Workers at Work," and the information it contains is derived from an account of Tolstoy's literary methods printed in the Russian Review. From Mr. Johnston's translation we learn that there is nothing of rapidity or slickness about the writing habits of the great novelist and controversialist. Nor is Tolstoy one of those writers who take up the pen merely to express thoughts already found and determined; rather, he uses the pen in order to discover his own mind. "Gold is found by persistent washing," is his favourite motto; and it is clear that the endless processes of revision and correction to which Tolstoy subjects his writings are undertaken in the interests of the subject rather than of the style.

The Count's general habits of work are outlined as follows:

In his technical method, says the Russian writer whose words I translate, Count Tolstoy is like one of the great painters of old. After forming the plan of his work, and gathering a great number of studies, he begins with a charcoal sketch, so to speak, and writes rapidly, not thinking of details. What he writes in this way he gives to Countess Sophia Andreïvna to copy out, or to one of his daughters, or to one of his intimate friends, to whom this task may give pleasure. Lyof Nicolaievitch, Count Tolstoy, generally writes on quarto paper, of rather poor quality, in a big, rope-like handwriting, writing about twenty pages a day, amounting to some four or five thousand words. He has no special habits with regard to pens and paper. And when a firm in Moscow conceived the idea of giving to the world a "Tolstoyan pen" it was discovered that on the subject of pens "Count Tolstoy had no opinion." He works mostly in the morning, and considers this the best time of the day for work.

When the clean copy of his manuscript makes its appearance on the writing-table, Count Tolstoy begins at once to work it all over again. But it still remains very much of a charcoal sketch. The manuscript is quickly dotted over with corrections, alterations, interlinear additions: at both sides, above and below, appear new thoughts and phrases, with inversions and transferences of sentences from one page to another. The whole is copied out again, and once more subjected to exactly the same process. A third time exactly the same thing happens. Some chapters Count Tolstoy has written more than ten times. At the same time, he pays almost no attention to details of wording, and even feels something like repugnance to everything closely clipped in art.

"All that often dries up the thought, and blunts the impression," he says.

Like most writers, Tolstoy sometimes comes to a dead stop; then he plays a game of solitaire until his brain clears. When persistent "gold-washing" has yielded a certain brightness, Tolstoy adopts the tactics of Molière and other writers: he reads his production to his friends or sometimes to a few peasants. Thus, after finishing The Powers of Darkness, he read this play to the peasants, not, however, with very useful results, for "at the most affecting places in the drama, which Lyof Nicolaievitch himself cannot read without tears, some of his peasant listeners began to laugh, and chilled the writer completely." The severest critic with whom Tolstoy has to deal is his wife, who "expresses her opinion without the slightest softening or circumlocution." He is sometimes influenced by her, sometimes not. Meanwhile specialists among his friends are allowed to supervise some portion of the new work. And all this brings the matter only to the printer's door. There remain all the opportunities of correction and alteration, of excision and addition, which are afforded by proofs. And the very sight of proofs brings an eager light into Tolstoy's eyes. New ideas now crowd in upon him; more gold-washing seems imperative and is joyously begun; the result is that the first proofs are sent back covered to blackness with the innumerable tracks of the Count's afterthoughts. "Exactly the same thing happens with the second proof, and it may be said without the slightest exaggeration that if ninety and nine proofs of one of his works were submitted to him, the same thing would happen nine and ninety times. In this he seemed to labour under the same difficulty that made Balzac the despair of his printers, for he runs up bills for charges on proofs that often entirely consume his share of the profits."

Tolstoy's repugnance to "everything closely clipped in art" must not be misunderstood. His attitude was more fully explained by himself in a discussion as to strenuous work in artistic productions. He said:

It will not do to neglect the slightest detail in art; because sometimes some half-torn off button may light up a whole side of the character of a given person; and that button must be faithfully represented. But all efforts, including the half-torn-off button, must be directed exclusively to the inner reality, and must by no means draw away attention from what is of first importance to details and secondary facts.

Which, being interpreted, means more gold-washing.

Things Seen.

An Impromptu.

FOUR nigger minstrels were making music one afternoon in an unfrequented street off the Strand. Their performance left the world fairly tranquil. A few people leant against area railings listening; a wholesome, ugly boy watched the tambourine minstrel with open mouth; a costermonger, conscious of a new market, wheeled his barrow alongside the boy. The tune they played was a minuet popular many years ago, and the air, as airs will, recalled old days. Suddenly my attention was arrested by the sight of an elderly gentleman, an Important in the City, well nourished, well groomed, holding his head high, the shiniest of silk hats on his head, and a florid, chairman-of-the-board face beaming beneath it. The day had been successful, no doubt, like all the other days of his life. And now he was on his way to the Temple Station, to an orderly home, and a leisurely dinner. When he observed the ridiculous minstrels, and the delaying crowd, he frowned—and then the odd thing, some would say the impossible thing, happened. The music caught him, conquered him, and, as it were, stripped him of the garment that his tailor, his valet, the obsequiousness of generations of clerks, and the habit of success had given to him. His white-gaitered feet began to dance to the music—yes, to dance. The first movements were almost imperceptible, little more than a rhythmic addition to his steps; but the inclination grew, and by the time he reached the costermonger's barrow he was dancing—gravely, pompously—but dancing, quite unconscious of the indecorum of such a procedure. There he stood, this admirable type of all that is respectable and orthodox, dancing in a quiet street off the Strand, in the pink of a spring afternoon, to the gay music of a troupe of nigger minstrels. We stood staring, but the tambourine player—oh, how I envied his swift intuition!—seized the opportunity. He did not smile, his round black face showed not a flicker of surprise as he advanced and made a courteous obeisance. Then he arched his right hand over his head, the old gentleman grasped the inviting fingers, the other minstrels played their gayest, and the two with infinite gravity went through the small steps of the minuet. The crowd increased; they jeered; the wholesome, ugly boy bent himself double in spasms of hilarity; but the old gentleman, unconscious of everything, continued to dance till the music stopped. Then he started, dropped his umbrella, gazed wildly around as a fox might stare at encompassing hounds, throw up his hands, and ran—ran down the street and doubled round the corner.

Did the music awake some dormant memory, some dominant experience that the crust of years had thick o'erlaid, but not stilled—some dormant memory that needed only the touch at the right moment and in the right way to be revived? I leave the problem to those who are learned in such matters. I report merely that he danced.

The Optimist.

ON Good Friday, near the Thames Embankment, I came across a little tattered man preaching the gospel of hope. He was standing beneath Charing Cross railway bridge, in the middle of the inner roadway. Nobody paid any attention to him. The policeman at the corner had turned his back. The little knot of cabmen treated him with the indifference cabmen regard hailing umbrellas when they already have a fare. Yet the little man was worth attention. He was not an ordinary rhetorician, he had peeped a little into books, and could snatch a passage to illumine his own rhetoric. "Now what did Mr. R. H. Utton say on this point?" he cried, as I strolled past. "What did Mr. Utton say in his essay on 'The Modern Poetry of Doubt'?" why this: 'Either we are on the eve of a long and uncertain era of spiritual suspense—scepticism qualified by a yearning 'ope—or the way is preparing for a day of clearer and more solid trust than the world has yet known.'

The little man paused, fixed me with a shining eye. "I'm an optimist," he shouted. "Mark me, my friend, the way is preparing for a day of clearer and more solid trust. We're improving inch by inch. No! mile by mile, sir. And, as we improve, we forgive each other oftener, we bear with each other more, we try to understand the awful thirst and loneliness of the dumb animals. I'd forgive the Jews. Yes, even on Good Friday, my friend. What did Mr. Browning say in his poem called 'Holy-Cross Day'?"

'The Lord will have mercy on Jacob yet,
And again in his border see Israel set.'

Yes, my friend, I'm an optimist. Holes in my boots, an empty stomach, and a wife who carries on, but I'm an optimist. I'm on Mr. Browning's side. Why am I an optimist? Because the world's growing better. I can see it growing better. Look at the Times newspaper with its columns of letters from Churchmen, and, and—"He swept his eye round the landscape in search of another illustration. It fell upon the placards outside the Avenue Theatre. Triumph lit his face. "Be honest, my friend, and tell me," he said, in a whisper, "would that have been possible ten—five—years ago?" I followed the direction of his eye, and read: "There will be no performance of The Cuckoo during Holy Week."

To master Destiny by force of will,—

This is the steadfast purpose of my life :—
To wrest success from failure, good from ill,
Gladness from desolation, peace from strife;
To pierce like spring through winter's shroud of white
To harden hope with stern despair's alloy;
To see God's lamps resplendent in the night;
To build up happiness from ruined joy :—
This is my purpose. In so dire a fray
He cannot lose whose loss is tenfold gain.
Summoned by love, to love I'll win my way,
Through failure, disappointment, sorrow, pain.
For Fate, whose fetters bind the Gods above,
Bows to the lordship of the star of love.

From "The Silence of Love," by Edmond Holmes.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. ROBERT DE SOUZA has published an essay on popular poetry, which is always a fascinating theme. He writes of the poetical renaissance in France as the Celts in London write of their renaissance. This is a puerility. In every art, in all times, renaissance and decadence are the continual swing in motion. The impulsion which sends the swing up we call renaissance, as if it were a revolution instead of a normal movement, and, when the swing descends, the pessimists prophesy the end of things, instead of reflecting that a fresh impulsion will very soon send it up again. Since the world goes round, there is no reason why art should stand still, and it is nonsense to decorate with fine words each indefinite phase temperament and taste compel it to undergo. M. de Souza is more sensible when he attacks the habit of certain carping critics who, exasperated by the dead level of talent, continually cry: "When will the poet appear? Where, then, is the masterpiece?" He justly contends that at no time has the poet existed, and that poetry has never found its wide and complex expression in a single genius. "Never has a single poet been able to fill the humblest soul there breathed," he protests. The value of poetry consists of the very diversity of the poets. One completes the other, and by their union exists the kingdom of poetry. And he aptly remarks, the dominating masterpiece of a century is the discovery of posterity. Contemporary taste is not permanent judgment. If these works that mark the centuries removed from us are rare, it is no proof of a past scarcity, and Solomon assures us that even in his days books were as abundant as in ours.

The list of geniuses engaged upon the vast work of recreating the poetry of France is a long one. Few of the names are known in England, or indeed outside the cénacles where the work of recreation goes on. The enigmatic and singular Paul Verlaine is, of course, the arresting figure of the group. M. de Souza traces the direct influence of Arthur Rimbaud, poet turned tramp and bagman and colonial tradesman, and the remoter influence of Mme. Desbordes Valmore, in the mingling of childlike simplicity of expression and rare poignancy which the best of Verlaine's work reveals. He quotes in full a charming, sad little poem of Mme. Desbordes Valmore which might have been written by Verlaine. I open Rimbaud and light upon a quatrain which strikingly suggests Verlaine:

Oisive jeunesse,
A tout asservie,
Par délicatesse,
J'ai perdu ma vie.

But Rimbaud had a robust humour than Verlaine. While sinning as vigorously, he was less preoccupied with the need of repentance, and was far less sentimental. He hymns with popular lucidity and humour their drinking bouts when he and Verlaine undertook to shock their fellows on a foreign tour:

L'âme au septième ciel ravie
Le corps, plus humble, sous les tables.

Nous dinions du blâme public,
Et soupions du même fricot.

He could never have written such a lovely, soft little sigh of a child's soul as those celebrated verses of Verlaine's which I have very imperfectly transposed into English. If any reader will offer a better translation, I shall be delighted, [The translation of the verses has been attempted by many readers in our prize competition. See p. 414.] May I suggest as a pendant an equally delicate and mournful song by Maeterlinck, which M. de

Souza adds to his collection of popular French songs and sentimental lyrics :

The sky up there above the roof
So blue and calm !
A tree up there above the roof,
Rocks its palm.
The bell that shows against the skies
Softly rings,
A bird round yonder tree that flies
Sadly sings.
My God ! how sweet a thing is life !
Clear as a gleam.
From yonder town a hum of strife
Comes as a dream.
And thou, in tears, what hast thou done
Done, without ruth.
Say what thou, in tears, hast done
With thy youth ?

This companion little poem by Maurice Maeterlinck is more complete and poignant :

Et s'il revenait un jour
Que faut-il lui dire ?
Dites-lui qu'on s'attendit
Jusqu'à s'en mourir . . .
Et s'il m'interroge encore
Sans me reconnaître ?
Parlez-lui comme une sœur,
Il souffre peut-être . . .
Et s'il demande où vous êtes,
Que faut-il répondre ?
Donnez-lui mon anneau d'or
Sans rien lui répondre . . .
Et s'il veut savoir pourquoi
La salle est déserte ?
Montrez-lui la lampe éteinte
Et la porte ouverte . . .
Et s'il m'interroge alors
Sur la dernière heure ?
Dites-lui que j'ai souri
De peur qu'il ne pleure . . .

Here is the bald English meaning, which I should like to see in a pretty robe of singing English verse, if some ACADEMY reader likes to devote leisure to it :

And if he returned one day
What should I tell him ?—
Tell him he was waited for
Till I died of the waiting.
And if he questions me further
Without recognising me ?—
Speak to him like a sister.
He suffers perhaps.
And if he asks where you are
What must I reply ?—
Give him my golden ring
Without making any reply.
And if he wants to know why
The hall is deserted ?—
Show him the quenched lamp
And the open door.
And if he questions me then
About the last hour ?—
Tell him I smiled
Lest he should weep.

M. de Souza claims for Verlaine the gift of condensation in a degree possessed by no other French poet. What more finished than these four lines ?—

Un grand sommeil noir
Tombe sur ma vie :
Dormez tout espoir,
Dormez toute envie.

These are lines one would like to hear accompanied by a sombre and sobbing music, music as complete a triumph of despair and the silence of death as Verlaine's quiet, fainting verses, as dark as night, as chill as the grave.

Memoirs of the Moment.

MRS. BLOOMFIELD MOORE, by her will, has left her fortune almost wholly to the children of her daughter, Ella von Rosen—a name endeared to readers of Prince Otto. To these grand-children will, no doubt, descend the pictures and statues of Mr. Robert Barrett Browning, which Mrs. Bloomfield Moore bought from him—works of art with nothing paltry about them, but perhaps primarily interesting as mementos of the devotion of a friend. Mrs. Bloomfield Moore, whose first home was in Philadelphia, made her ultimate dwelling in Great Stanhope-street, Mayfair; but London became a very different place for her when Mr. Browning was no longer there. When she died last January, at the age of seventy-four, she had not read the love-letters that preceded the eternal union between Miss Barrett and the poet-friend she knew only in long days of his widowerhood.

THE silence of Dean Gregory ! There is really nothing like it in fiction. St. Paul's, from a purely strategic point of view, is held by military authority to be the strongest and most important post in London in case of a rising ; and there, behind its ramparts, Dean Gregory sits entrenched while the people who are in mutiny against Sir William Richmond's scheme of decoration keep up their fusillade of letters to the newspaper press, or wander within the very precincts of the Cathedral, discontent brooding on their brows. The silence of Dean Gregory, unbroken before the pressing thrusts of the foe, has even held fast against the defence of friends. There is the artist who writes—anonously—to say that the decoration is bad, but that really, in the name of good comradeship, there must be a rally round Sir William Richmond ; and there is the gentleman, who does sign his name, and a very respectable name too, and who protests that, bad as the decoration may be, it ought to be completed before anyone dares to criticise it—even these voices provoke no disclaiming cry from the venerable Dean. Day by day the work proceeds : the oil saturates the stone ; and when the end comes, and we really are allowed, by the pleader for delay, to say our say, we shall be told that only chisels can cut off the surface that seems so unworthy of Wren's dome. True, the correspondent who counsels patience in ill-doing does not love that dome—he will have you know that he cannot defend St. Paul's. Had the Dean's English been fluent and strong in pleading for defence from his friends, no one would have been disedified ; but, under this provocation even, there is silence from the Dean ; and so it seems likely to be till the end of the Chapter.

THE Dean was eighty years of age a few weeks ago, and Sir William Richmond painted his portrait. Nobody should ignore the delicacies of the Dean's position—that of a sitter to Sir William, and a sitter of fourscore years. And, then, these difficulties have been perhaps aggravated by a fin-de-siècle sort of flattery. To compare an Anglican Dean with a Pope of Rome would, once upon a time, have been a doubtful compliment. But now it is quite otherwise ; and Canon Holland, as senior member of the Chapter, in offering the Dean their congratulations on his birthday, told Dean Gregory that he was their Pope Julius II., who had fought battles, but had succeeded in associating a great artist with him in the decoration of St. Paul's. It is language like this that adds to the difficulty of the Dean's climb-down from the dome of St. Paul's ; and we can promise the Dean an entirely sympathetic public in view of the difficult descent.

At Mr. Sargent's private view in his Tite-street studio on Sunday afternoon a note of the picturesque was given to the crowd by the presence of red-capped Cardinal Vaughan and violet-capped Bishop Brindle, both wearing their chains of office. With them was a young American cleric, who, on facing the portrait of Mrs. Hunter, said to the painter: "I saw that ten days ago in Boston." Mr. Sargent smiled, for so it was. He had recalled his portrait of Mrs. Hunter for exhibition in the Academy, and the canvas had arrived the night before. Everybody else smiled too, because—the Lord Russell of Killowen canvas being withheld till 1900—this particular portrait is without doubt Mr. Sargent's picture of the year.

SOME needless stir has been made about the entirely private finances of Lord and Lady Warwick. It is not really so very unusual a thing for people of large expenditure to find their means somewhat too small; and the raising of money by loans secured on life-interests in property and on heavy life insurance policies is an everyday device. Equally ordinary is the difficulty of meeting high yearly premiums, the consequent surrender of the policies to the highest bidder, or some similar arrangement varying in form as circumstances vary. All this is routine. But one man is generally the capitalist who comes to the rescue; and nobody cares. In the case of the manipulation of the Warwick estates and policies, a syndicate or company has taken the control; and all the world wonders. There is virtue in numbers, says the proverb; but it is one that Lord and Lady Warwick for the moment may be disposed to doubt.

MAJOR HAMILTON, newly appointed to the command of the 14th King's Hussars, began his military career as a Life Guardsman with five years' experience in the ranks. Then he was a corporal, and then he got his commission in the King's: after which he went to India with a staff appointment, and later he had a hand in the Boer War, where he served as aide-de-camp to his brother-in-law, General Colley, and would, in the ordinary course of things, have shared that general's fate. But young Hamilton, as it happened, was obliged by illness to lie down in his tent, and he was asleep on the Saturday night that saw Colley's march to the summit of the Majuba mountain. "Take care there is no noise round young Hamilton's tent," Colley whispered to the chaplain. "I don't mean to take him to-night. If anything were to happen to him it would kill his sister." That sister was Colley's wife, who, a few hours later, was to lose a husband but, by that husband's solicitude, to retain a brother.

Correspondence.

Tennyson's "Roaring Moon."

SIR,—Is Mr. Bernard Capes poking fun at us, or is it not true that "moon" is simply the poetical way of spelling "month"? If Tennyson really meant the satellite, I for one would not hesitate to say he wrote nonsense.—I am, &c.,

Riviera Palace, Cimiez.

F. B. MONEY COUTTS.

An Easter Critic.

SIR,—I expect London will be very full of naturalists next week, and to save you from annoyance I would advise you to put up a notice giving the latitude and longitude of Staple Inn. The sparrows and scripturally minded people seem to be unique there. Perhaps you would warn the author of "The Simile" (in last issue of ACADEMY) so that he might not happen to be about. Poor little sparrows! (I mean of Staple Inn); "little balls of blackness and sleep" on the twigs of the plane-trees! If there is a clever, man-of-the-world little bird who knows what is what, and how to make himself comfortable, it is a sparrow; and if one wants to find the senior wrangler, one should come to London to look for him. "Seen in silhouette against an apple-green sky"! No; nor pea-green or any other coloured sky. That he would come in to have a talk before he went to bed—just as you and I might go into the smoking-room of the club—is right enough; but to sleep on a twig in the open is not in his line at all, any more than the homeless wanderers would be to sleep in the middle of the street. I fancy what the "uplifted-eyes" man really said was, "The chatter of a thousand bills."

However, those two "Things Seen" are treasures to be added to my collection. I like the young man tapping his stick against the stonework in indecision because the weather was warmer, and the author swinging out of the Park and failing to see the dog and the string of the blind man!

I am sorry to think Mr. Bernard Capes is very ill. He has seen "a yellow globe anchored up there [up where?] in the flood—stemming it [at anchor]—rocking on it," and all because Tennyson wrote "roaring moon of daffodil and crocus," instead of "blustery month of daffodil and crocus." If Mr. Capes had ever seen Tennyson hieing after his dirty old felt hat in Yarmouth (I.W.) he might have gathered that the poet did not use demi-semi-tones. Also it might be observed that a great portion of the said moon, or month, is pitch dark at night.

I am glad that the "cab-horse" chestnut (not chestnut cab-horse) has got out to the Malay Peninsula.—I am, &c., Bromesborough, Ledbury.

EYRE HUSSEY.

[Mr. Eyre Hussey is diligent and merry, but he is wrong about the sparrows. They remain on the plane-trees in Staple Inn-square the night through. I saw them there, asleep against the sky, at 10.15 p.m. last night, when, by the way, a drizzle was falling. I could have covered a cluster of twenty sparrows with my overcoat. Scores more were distributed in twos and threes on the bare, swaying twigs. On this occasion, I grant, the sparrows did not appear as "little balls of blackness and sleep." For blackness read greyness—the sky being dark, and the light thrown up from the gaslamps. The caretaker of the Inn likes the sparrows; and he tells me that in wild weather they are sometimes blown from their exposed perches, and fall, lame and bewildered, to the ground. In such cases he has often caught the unfortunates and shut them in the Inn hall for safety against cats, releasing them in the morning. While, therefore, I repel Mr. Hussey's assault on my accuracy, I thank him for the occasion he has given me to make an inquiry interesting, I trust, to Londoners and naturalists.—THE WRITER OF "THE SIMILE."]

Snacks.

SIR,—Prof. Skeat's Danish snakke, "to chatter," may do very well for "nasty snacks," but it scarcely disposes of "snacks of fish"—I am, &c., GOURMET.

The "Golden Treasury" Omar.

SIR,—With respect to your remarks on the format of this edition (p. 372) I have nothing to add. But I am surprised to see that the name of FitzGerald is conspicuous by its absence, both on the title-page and after the prefatory biography of the Astronomer Poet of Persia. Place this edition in the hands of a young bibliographer, and ask him to catalogue it and write a brief bibliographical note on its author, &c., and presuming he knew nothing of FitzGerald, what account would he give of it?

I should note that the only place where the name of FitzGerald appears is in the note by the editor [is he W. A. W., p. 18?] on p. 111.

It seems to me a pity that the opportunity in this edition of giving a brief biography of FitzGerald, a brief bibliography of other editions of the Omar, and the name of the editor of this edition, has been missed.—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 26.

WE asked last week for a translation of Paul Verlaine's chanson :

La ciel par-dessus le toit,
Si bline, si calme !
Un arbre par-dessus le toit
Berce sa palme.
La cloche dans le ciel qu'on voit
Doucement tinte,
Un oiseau sur l'arbre qu'on voit
Chante sa plainte.
Mon Dieu, mon Dieu, la vie est là,
Simple et tranquille,
Cette paisible rumeur-là
Vient de la ville.
Qu'as-tu fait, ô toi que voilà,
Pleurant sans cesse,
Dis, qu'as-tu fait que voilà
De ta jeunesse ?

In response, we have received seventy-seven versions, the best of which is written by Miss Nora Hopper, 36, Royal-crescent, W., to whom a cheque for a guinea has been sent. This is her rendering :

Above the roof a quiet sky
Leans, softly blue.
A tree leans lower, cradling nigh
Its leaves and dew.
A bell keeps up eternally
Soft monotone :
A bird that's perched upon the tree
Makes tender moan.
Ah God, to think that life can be
So simply sweet :
No noise to hear, no stir to see,
Save from the street.
Lift up thine eyes, thou weeping one
And tell me sooth.
Answer and say what thou hast done
With thy fair youth.

W. G. F. (Fowey), who contributes the following version, would have won the prize but for the weakness of his last stanza.

The cloudless heavens overhead
Brood quiet and deep ;
A tree its branches overhead
Rocks into sleep.
The bell within the blue half hid
Drowsily swings ;
A bird upon the bough half hid
Its love-plaint sings.
Dear God, how full and tranquil there
Life glides and steals ;
How peaceful falls the murmur there
Of distant wheels.
What hast thou done, that makest there
Such bitter moan ?
What, that the youth thou mournest there
Was—and is gone ?

The majority of the remaining translations are very close. The last stanza, however, has been a good deal distorted, and for the word "berce" only a very small proportion of translators have found its true equivalent. The greater number resort to "away" or "swing."

So blue, so calm above the roof
The sky outspread !
A tree sways high above the roof
Its palm-like head.
The bell in yonder sky aloof
Low-tolling swings,
A bird in yonder tree aloof
Lamenting sings.
My God ! my God ! what sounds one hears
Of tranquil life !
The town's faint murmur that one hears
Tells not of strife.
What hast thou done O thou whose tears
Fall there so fast ?
What hast thou done, bowed there in tears,
With youth gone past ?

[W. W. T., Newcastle.]

The sky above the roof
So blue and so serene !
A tree above the roof
Waving its leafy screen :
A bell of sound so sweet
From heaven it seems to float :
A bird which singeth sweet
Its tender, artless note.
O gracious God, life here
Doth simply, calmly flow ;
The city's tumult here
Is but a murmur low.
Wherefore shouldst thou behold
This scene with streaming eyes ?
Say, with it dost behold
Thy happy youth arise ?

Competition No. 27.

This week we ask for Haikais. A Haikai is a Japanese form of verse consisting of three unrhymed lines of five, seven, and five syllables respectively, or seventeen syllables in all. Hitherto they have not, we believe, been written in English; the translated specimens which are given in Mr. W. G. Aston's work on Japanese Literature being loose in construction, and not conforming to the rules just laid down as to syllables. We reproduce, however, a passage from our review of this book a week or so ago to illustrate the nature of the Haikai more clearly.—The greatest master of this very real art was one Matsura Basho. Of him the following story is told. Travelling in the country, he came to a spot where a party of rustics were drinking saké, and composing the fashionable Haikais. They had chosen the full moon for their subject; and taking Basho for a begging Buddhist priest, they urged him, for fun, to contribute. Basho, with feigned reluctance, began :

'Twas the new moon —

'The new moon ! What a fool this priest is !' cried one. 'The poem should be about the full moon.' 'Let him go on,' said another ; 'it will be all the more sport.' Basho, undisturbed by the mockery, went on :

'Twas the new moon !
Since then I waited—
And, lo ! to-night !

The rustics were amazed ; and when Basho revealed his identity, apologised for their rudeness to an eminent man, 'whose fragrant name was known to the whole world.' Here are two more of Basho's Haikais :

I come aweary,
In search of an inn—
Ah ! these wistaria flowers.

'Tis the first snow—
Just enough to bend
The gladiolus leaves !

And here is a Haikai by an earlier practitioner :

Thought I, the fallen flowers
Are returning to their branch ;
But, lo ! they were butterflies.

To the author of the best Haikai, strictly conforming to the rules as to syllables, and reproducing as much Japanese lightness and grace as is possible, a prize of a guinea will be given.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

FAVOURITE FLOWERS OF GARDEN AND GREENHOUSE.

The Athenaeum of April 9th, 1898, says:—"We have here a useful book of reference, and not a mere pretty book which conveys little or no information.
... We do not hesitate to commend it strongly to the notice of the amateur and lover of flowers."

The Times says:—"Everyone is interested in garden and greenhouse flowers, and the four handsome volumes entitled 'Favourite Flowers of Garden and Greenhouse' will find many patrons."

The Standard says:—"The volumes are all alike in their interest. The pictures awaken many a pleasant memory of old times to those who have drifted into cities; they will be coveted by all and purchased by many."

The Daily Telegraph says:—"The book, as a whole, is worthy of very high commendation."

The Daily News says:—"Forms a most valuable addition to the library of florists' literature."

The Daily Chronicle says:—"We wish that everybody who takes pride in his garden could afford a copy of this beautiful work. So much disappointment would be avoided, so much labour saved, and so much greater in proportion would be the results."

The Literary Week.

LAST week we commented on the readiness of our readers to translate poetry from the French. Their eagerness to acclimatise the Haikai, a Japanese form of verse, as will be seen from our Competition page, is still more striking. Possibly Haikai-writing may become generally popular, and supply the now neglected ballades, rondeaux and triolets, with a successor. But we fancy not.

The following were the seven most popular books in America during March :

1. David Harum. By E. N. Westcott.
2. The Day's Work. By Rudyard Kipling.
3. The Battle of the Strong. By Gilbert Parker.
4. Aylwin. By Theodore Watts-Dunton.
5. { When Knighthood was in Flower. By E. Caskoden.
 Red Rock. By T. N. Page.
6. Mr. Dooley. By F. P. Dunno.

MR. STEPHEN CRANE's next book will be not prose but poetry—a successor to his Black Riders. The title is War is Kind. Meanwhile Mr. Crane is hard at work on a new long novel.

OUR paragraph last week about Mr. Günther's Manual of English Pronunciation and Grammar for the Use of Dutch Students, wherein he illustrates the use of words by brief extracts from popular novelists, has had an effect we neither expected nor wished. It has made Mr. Günther cross. He has favoured us with a letter of tremendous sarcasm, to which there seems to be no reply. And all the while we really admire the patience and instructive skill displayed in his Manual, and were essaying merely to be humorous. But in matters of humour the fault of the Dutch is taking too little and asking too much.

ONE disadvantage of the publication of the "Golden Treasury" edition of Omar Khayyam, which is having almost as large a sale as In His Steps, is the destruction of the tidy little business done for many years past by an old scribe living in Leicester, who made with his own hands laborious copies of the Rubaiyat, and sold them at a shilling a piece to budding Radicals.

MR. MAX BEERBOHM is just finishing a novel which he is thinking of calling Zuleika Hobson. The manner is more or less that of The Happy Hypocrite, and its length will be less than half that of The Christian. There are probably two reasons for keeping it short: one is that Mr.

Beerbohm is in favour of brevity; the other, that his new book More will precede it, and people might be tempted to label Zuleika "Too Much."

IN his new novel, Mr. James Lane Allen, the author of The Choir Invisible, will again depict life in Kentucky. He has entitled it The Mettle of the Pasture, taking the phrase from "Henry V.":

And you, good yeomen,
Whose limbs were made in England, show us here
The mettle of your pasture: let us swear
That you are worth your breeding; which I doubt not;
For there is none of you so mean and base,
That hath not noble lustre in your eyes.

Mr. Allen thinks his new story his best.

WHATEVER our wishes may be we cannot feel any hope that the project for erecting a statue of Sir Thomas Browne at Norwich will be carried to completion. The English people are too slow to subscribe for such a purpose even when the subject is a popular writer with a household name, so that we cannot believe the learned and cloistral author of Religio Medici to have a chance with them. But possibly Sir Peter Eade and his fellow-committeemen feel this, and hope that by asking for much they may get a little, a little being better than nothing. As a local memorial of the great writer, a window in St. Peter's would answer the purpose, and would cost only a tithe of a statue. We should like to know that Norwich had a statue of its great citizen; but we fear that private enterprise alone will supply it.

IN commenting upon the scheme, the Times suggests that a new Religio Medici, a true product of our time, would be interesting. It would indeed. Few books mentioned by our contributors, in reply to a recent request for the names of needed works, were so much to the point.

THE reported loss of a chapter of the History of Scotland, on which Mr. Lang is now engaged, impelled a contributor of the Westminster Gazette to rhyme. The verses, in their turn, have impelled Mr. Lang to explain the situation. He writes: "To allay public anxiety, so touchingly expressed by your poet, I may say that only a fragment of a chapter of my History—a chapter which cried aloud to be rewritten—was missing. It dealt with the virtues of that sorely misjudged hero of Scottish independence, the revered Cardinal Beaton. Friends at a distance will kindly accept this intimation."

AT Sotheby's, on April 27, will be sold by auction a number of articles of the greatest possible interest to collectors of Stevensoniana—namely, fifty-six lots, consisting of gifts of the early writings of R. L. S. to his mother, and fourteen copies of The Pentland Rising, the extremely rare pamphlet with which Stevenson began his serious career. Many of the little books given to his mother have quaint inscriptions. Here is one entry in the catalogue:

Stevenson (R. L.) "The Surprise, vol. I., Saturday, June. San Francisco, Alameda County, no. 3. The Surprise is edited and published semi-monthly by S. L. Osbourne and Co." 4 pp., rudely printed with small cuts, EXTREMELY RARE. sm. 8vo. (after 1875)

* * A very interesting Stevenson leaflet. It contains an advertisement of the works of Stevenson, which includes "The Amateur Emigrant," of which only a few copies were printed and then rigorously suppressed. (See Athenæum, Oct. 24, 1880.) There is also an advertisement headed "Helth (sic) to the Sickly!!! Professor Stevenson, with the aid of God's Sun and Mankind's refined Olive Oil will PLUCK the Sufferer from the JAWS of DEATH."

On the first day of the sale, April 24, will be sold a number of Stevenson first editions.

STEVENSONIANS will learn with interest that Swanston, that "least considerable of hamlets" on the slope of the Pentland Hills, is yearly attracting an increasing company of pilgrims. Adam Ritchie, one of the villagers who knew Stevenson well when the "lang-haired, idle-set laddie," as he was wont to term R. L. S., was a visitor in the old manse, and who had many reminiscences of the boy who accompanied him when ploughing the fields, has just passed away. It was here, doubtless, that "Louis" received the impressions which he articulated long years after in some of his songs of exile. Old Adam delighted to tell how "mony a time Stevenson would gang up the rig when I was ploughin', but he wadna gang very far without takin' oot his notebook and bit pencil, and there he would be writin' doon—Guidness kens what! He was never," the old ploughman continued, "what ye could call communicative, but he was a deevil to think, and he wasna sweir to speir what he didna ken."

A NEW poem by Sir Walter Scott has been published by the Daily News. The subject is Killiecrankie, and the verses, which have spirit, are a free translation of the Latin poem beginning Gramius notabilis collegerat montanos:

The glorious Graham, of deathless fame,
Brought down his mountain band.

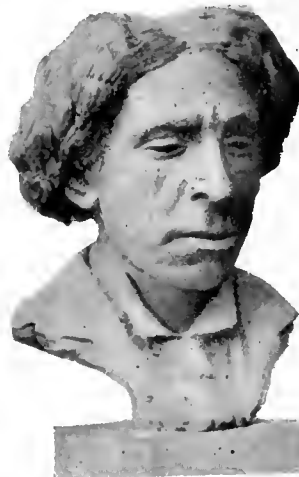

Scott made the verses in 1805 for Mr. Hunter, of the firm of Constable, and the reason of their lying dormant so long may be sought in the difference which subsequently occurred between the two men. Here are three of the best stanzas:

Maclean, the bold, fought as of old,
Amid his martial clan;
From foemen such the tardy Dutch
With speed unwonted ran.
The stout Lochiel with dirk of steel,
And many a Cameron there,
The Southron fell, dispatched to hell,
And bore their spoils to Blair.

Glenmorristen from wood and glen,
A huntsman warrior came;
His carbine true, to earth he threw,
And drew his sword of flame.
He left the doe and bounding roe,
He left the stag at bay,
The whiggish race, like deer to chase,
And course the false Mackay.
While Tummel's wave, by rock and cave,
From Blair to Tay shall run,
Claymore and targe, in Highland charge,
Shall rout the pike and gun.
And you, ye true, your blades who drew,
For Scotland's laws and King,
In storied lays, your deathless praise,
Immortal bards shall sing.

Mr. Hunter's original purpose was to print the poem as an accompaniment to an engraving of the portrait of Lord Dundee, belonging to the Duke of Montrose, as a gift to his Grace.

MR. ZANGWILL when in America gave sittings to a Boston sculptor, Mr. Leo Mielziner, whose bust of the author we reproduce. Apropos of Mr. Zangwill's visit, the New York Bookman tells this characteristic story: "At a luncheon given him by some people who were strangers to him, he was treated as the Great Man, and his most indifferent or flippant remark was received with grave interest and tossed about the table to the death of any general conversation. After the luncheon his hostess asked him to write something in her little boy's diary so that the Little Man might always remember the day when he saw the great writer. Mr. Zangwill turned over the leaves of the diary, reading here and there under their respective dates: 'Got a reward of merit,' 'Had a birthday party,' 'Tonsillitis,' and so forth, and then he wrote: 'December—, Zangwillitis.'" over the leaves of the diary, reading here and there under their respective dates: 'Got a reward of merit,' 'Had a birthday party,' 'Tonsillitis,' and so forth, and then he wrote: 'December—, Zangwillitis.'"

THE series of signed articles promised by the editor of the Morning Post some time ago is now in progress. One day this week Mr. Eden Phillpotts, who is known rather as novelist and humorist, contributed a very pretty piece of natural history called "Green Flowers," wherein he described a spring walk, presumably in Devonshire. Mr. Phillpotts has been called Mr. Blackmore's successor, and in this essay another proof of his kinship was offered in the deep reverence for nature which permeated it. But Mr. Phillpotts is a little too fond of fine writing: he has not the simple Saxon eloquence of the author of Lorna Doone.

THE acting rights of John Oliver Hobbes' play, "A Repentance," for France, Germany, Austro-Hungary, and Russia, have been arranged for, and the little drama will be produced in those countries during the next six months.

THE new play by Dr. Conan Doyle, founded on the late James Payn's novel, Halves, and called by the same name, which was produced at Aberdeen this week, is another proof of his versatility. Dr. Doyle's career as a dramatist is really only just beginning. His first venture—the comic opera "Jane Annie," in which he collaborated with Mr. Barrie—was a mere trifle; and "The Story of Waterloo," though excellent, was practically a monologue. With "Halves," which is domestic drama, and the Sherlock Holmes play, and another about to be produced, Dr. Conan Doyle enters the ranks of serious writers for the stage. If, as is stated, he intends also to contest a seat in Parliament, novel-readers may, indeed, feel apprehensive.

FOUR of the numbers in Dr. Conan Doyle's Songs of Action have been set to music by Prof. Stanford for use in schools. They will be issued immediately by Messrs. Curwen.

A TRANSLATION of the little song by Maurice Maeterlinck, the text of which was printed in our "Paris Letter" last week, has been attempted by several readers. The best version is, we think, that by Mr. W. G. Fulford, which we print below, together with one other:

And if he should yet return,	Ah, if he come back one day!
What then shall I say?	Should I find the word to say?
Tell him that I watched for	Tell him of the waiting drear, him,	Till Death clutch'd me in his
Dying day by day. . . .	fear. . . .

And if he, not knowing me,	What if he be wholly blind,
Question me of you?	To the face he used to find
Speak him soft, it may be he	Often nigh? . . . Speak low,
Has known sorrow too. . . .	smile yet,
	In his heart may burn regret. . . .

And if he should seek for	Say the answer I must make,
you,	If he ask once for thy sake,
What shall I reply?	In his hand my golden ring,
Give him then my golden	Speak not any other thing. . . .
ring,

. Making no reply. . .

If he ask why never a step	If the reason he would know
Wakes the silent floor?	The dim lone house, how can
Show him the extinguished	I show?
lamp	Point but to the lamp once
And the open door. . . .	bright,
	The door flung wide unto the night. . . .

And if he should question	Can I tell him of the last still	Late swift hour, ere yet thou
Of the closing sleep?	pass'd?
Tell him, tell him, that I	Only say my smiles so gay smiled—	Flashed to keep his tears
Smiled—lest he should	away. . . .
weep. . . .

THERE is a certain fascination in any bird's-eye view of other people's business. We feel it as we turn the pages of The Legitimist Kalendar for the Year of Our Lord 1899, just issued, in its third year, by Messrs. Innes. It is curious to think that these expert and well-packed pages have a real meaning for people whom one may pass in the street. And yet, on the whole, we wonder that there are not more Legitimists. The man who finds life prosaic and narrow and material may splash his life with colour by believing that the rightful monarch of these islands is Princess Louis of Bavaria, née Mary Theresia Henrietta Dorothea, Archduchess of Austria-Este-Modena. Believing that, yet retaining his respect for Queen Victoria, a man ought never to have a dull moment. He can go and see a brother Legitimist and "put in" a couple of hours' treason. He can shed tears for the murder of Charles the First, and what an exclusive luxury such tears must be! At the worst, he can pore over these intricate pages, and, unlike ourselves, take them seriously. Happy Legitimist!

crowned king of American authors, which we reproduce, is not, like Mr. Zangwill's, from life, but from a caricature in the New York Bookman. Mr. Howells's criticisms are too well known in this country and his novels too little. A new story from his very busy pen—The Ragged Lady—has just been

A CORRESPONDENT describes in picturesque terms the effect of a sudden darkening of the British Museum reading-room last Saturday by a passing snow storm: "The darkness fell suddenly and intensely like a blanket, and all work was stopped. Then the hundreds of incandescent lamps attached to the reading desks and the surrounding shelves bloomed forth. The effect was a fairyland of rosy and mysterious lights. For about three minutes the great lamps in the dome remained dark. The opportunity thus given to watch a scene of singular beauty was apparently taken by very few readers. A few minutes later the large lamps destroyed the less, and then the prosaic grey daylight extinguished both."

SAYS Mr. W. P. James, in the St. James's Gazette, writing of the numerous editions and versions of Omar Khayyam and the Omar cult generally: "The contrast between this stress of fashion and Old Fitz's secret and fastidious seclusion makes a kind of comic converse to the situation in the famous stanza :

They say the Lion and the Lizard keep
The Courts where Jamskyd gloried and drank deep.

Though perhaps FitzGerald might think the final lines suited the situation well enough :

the Wild Ass
Stamps o'er his Head, but cannot break his sleep."

This is neat and timely, but oh, so old! The jest was first uttered, and with best effect of all, on the occasion when a number of the faithful met at FitzGerald's grave to plant thereon a rose from Nishaipur. "The wild ass," murmured one of the company, suddenly awakened to the significance of the proceeding, "stamps o'er his head, but cannot break his sleep."

Bibliographical.

WE are told, on the excellent authority of "C. K. S.," to look out for a monograph on Leigh Hunt which shall show that pleasant writer in a new light. It is to be proved, I gather, that Hunt was not the careless handler of money depicted by certain of the commentators. Well, it is always nice to see character rehabilitated, and doubtless something still needs to be done before the reading public can be persuaded that the Harold Skimpole of Dickens was not a true picture of poor Hunt. Meanwhile, Hunt's Autobiography has been extant for nearly half a century; his Correspondence has been before the world since 1862; his Life has been written very sympathetically by Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse (1893); and there are numerous glimpses of him in the letters or memoirs of Carlyle, the Cowden Clarkes, S. C. Hall, Hawthorne, Miss Mitford, Tom Moore, P. G. Patmore, Barry Cornwall, and others. Out of all this material, I think, it is possible to construct a tolerably trustworthy figure of the man as well as the writer—though anything absolutely new which his latest biographer may have to tell us will, of course, be welcome.

"C. K. S." further promises us an account by Sir Arthur Sullivan of his Musical Life. Well, that will be acceptable too. Sir Arthur has already written his autobiography, in brief, in the columns of M. A. P.; he has also submitted to the pressure of the interviewer more frequently than his less complaisant fellow-worker, Mr. Gilbert. Still, he must have very much more to tell. Meanwhile, those interested in the subject may be reminded that a very informing and readable narrative of Sir Arthur's public life is to be found in Mr. Charles Willeby's Masters of Contemporary English Music, published half a dozen years ago.

We have had a series of Masters of Medicine as well as of Masters of Music, and now, it seems, we are to receive from the late Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson a couple of volumes entitled Disciples of Æsculapius, and consisting of studies of famous physicians and surgeons. This ought to be a very useful and, no doubt, readable work, being the product of an expert. I remember reading some years ago—about the middle of the "eighties"—an anonymou work, also in two volumes, called The Healing Art, and dealing in a very instructive though, of course, "popular" way with the history of medicine in all times and places. This work, probably, covered considerably more ground than Sir B. W. Richardson has taken up in the book we are now looking for.

Very interesting is the statement that the Elizabethan Stage Society will shortly give a performance of Omar FitzGerald's adaptation from Calderon, Life's a Dream. As a matter of fact, FitzGerald's work, which came out just twenty-two years ago, was entitled by him Such Stuff as Dreams are Made Of. A translation of Calderon's drama, made by D. F. McCarthy, and called Life is a Dream, appeared in 1873; a version of a part of it, called Life's a Dream, had been published in 1856. It is not generally known, I find, that FitzGerald "freely translated" as many as eight plays of Calderon.

Talking of plays, I read in a contemporary that "a Polish lady, Marie Zapolska, has tried the experiment of writing a drama without a single male character in it." This, I should fancy, would be a little monotonous. Even the late Mr. Savile Clarke did not attempt so much as this when he wrote his "Adamless Eden" (included in his volume called A Little Flutter), for he permitted the Eden to be invaded by three men in the disguise of pilgrims, and by a "special correspondent" in command of an army. The nearest approach in England to the Polish lady's achievement will be, I should say, the little piece by Mr. Farren Souttar which is to be performed in London at Miss Lydia Thompson's forthcoming benefit. In that all the personæ will be female except one.

Mr. Layard's appeal for letters from the pen of the late Mrs. Lynn Linton ought to have the effect of bringing him an abundance of material. So far as my knowledge goes, Mrs. Linton was a very fertile correspondent, finding time to write long epistles even to comparative strangers. The form taken by her handwriting suggests that she was a very rapid penwoman—a character in which Mrs. Oliphant was probably one of her rivals. Mrs. Linton's various publishers probably have a fairly large collection of communications from her—or, if they have not, they ought to have. Publishers should preserve the letters of authors; they usually have literary interest—except when they are discoursing about money!

New editions galore! Dr. William Robertson's History of the Reign of the Emperor Charles V., with a View of the Progress of Society in Europe, from the Subversion of the Roman Empire to the Beginning of the Sixteenth Century—that, which came out originally a hundred and thirty years ago, must needs want editing, and will get it. Then, Cary's translation of Dante's Divina Commedia—that dates from 1814, and oh! how oft hath it been re-printed! Scarcely two years have passed since it was re-issued by Messrs. Warne in their handy "Albion" series. Nevertheless, I should imagine that its popularity has of late years been impaired somewhat by the vogue of Longfellow's translation, which is not so readable, but nevertheless has been issued in half-a-dozen or more guises during the past decade. Is it not one of the Best Books of St. Lubbock?

A Well-Head of Song.

The High History of the Holy Graal. Translated from the French by Sebastian Evans. "Temple Classics." 2 vols. (Dent. 1s. 6d. each.)

THERE are many points of view possible and desirable in the consideration of a national epic: for example, one may approach it as a student of folk-lore, as a grammarian, as a comparative critic; but the inevitable and final attitude is that of the plain hearer of a story. Homer is seldom best known by the profound Grecian; when he is, the human heart and not the humane learning of the scholar takes hold of the heroic song. The dismal army of commentators rises like a fog-bank to attest the truth of our dictum. But the Arthurian cycle of legends comes down to us quick with auroral joy and brave with the flash of brands; instinct with high endeavour, and ringing with the "glory of generosity"; crying with a far strong voice out of the springs of English time to us in the main current of our national days. It is impossible for one early conversant with that strenuous and august tongue to coolly parse its sentences, or root for its derivations, or expound its meanings under ranged heads. We refuse to dissect our Lancelot or to number the stones of Tintagel. And as we listen to the latest story that has reached us from those dim years we become again as little children, open-eyed and open-eyed, drinking in a marvellous tale in the twilight. The Holy Graal unfolds the high history of its mysterious emprise only to senses exalted into a rapt simplicity of apprehension.

But although we do not propose to discourse of matters that are of interest to none save the pedant in his colder moods, it is fit that the reader should know on the word of its translator from the old French that the "High History" can justly claim an antiquity coeval with our greyest cathedrals, and that it is very probably "the original story of Sir Perceval and the Holy Graal, whole and incorrupt as it left the hands of its first author." Who this happy man may have been is more than doubtful. Dr. Evans makes out an ingenious and closely argued case for assigning the beginning of the thirteenth century as the date of his work. But in spite of the probability of its French origin, we cannot help casting a glance in the direction of Walter Map, and secretly trusting that the Frenchman drew his inspiration from that great man, whom we may call our own, and who, dying about 1216, left the story of Arthur ennobled and spiritualised. We stoutly claim the King and his Knights through all their alien transformations, as of our soil, and we would fain believe that their histories, too, are essentially of this "royme of England." What though the Norman touched them to brighter issues? "Saxon, and Dane, and Norman are we."

But passing over the origin of this century of sacred wonders, let us sit down and turn its pages. As we look over them in the delicious first tasting of a book that every reader loves so well, our blood prickles to the authentic thrill of Faery and Chivalry, and the eye again and again alights upon passages of piercing sweetness or of the trumpet's "high disdain." The recital begins with solitary flutings as of the notes of an organ: "Hear ye the history of the most holy vessel that is called Graal, wherein the precious blood of the Saviour was received on the day that He was put on reod." And here, and there, and everywhere such sentences as these lure us to the Quest. "In the midst was an ancient tower that was compassed round of great waters and broad meadowlands." "And he entereth into a great forest adventurous." "They hurtle against each other so grimly that their eyes sparkle as it were of stars in their heads." When we settle to the orderly reading of the book we find ourselves, although on ground to which we are not strangers, in an atmosphere more rarified than that of the Mort d'Arthur. There is less of mystery in it and more of awe: objects stand out clean and sharp; but what we lose in vague wonder and shadowy splendour we gain in a frank and pregnant solemnity as of a spring-dawn, austere and cloudless. The conduct of the story, too, is poles apart from Malory's method. In his book all is inconclusive and visionary: the web of events is dissolved like gossamer at a touch of capricious destiny. Knights and damsels come and go like notes in the sun, or waver into forgetfulness like snow-flakes in the wind. But in the High History of the Graal causes march forward to an ordained effect. When a knight crosses the reader's path, let him cunningly note the knightly blazon, for he will meet the shield and its bearer again.

But, notwithstanding this comparative clearness and precision, he who should set forth the argument of the romance through all its "branches" and "master-branches" would undertake a tangled and a barren task. It is neither plot nor individual character that here charms our attention, though both in an archaic sense are sufficiently defined. It is that the fortunate reader, while following the lives of men and women, follows them only upon the heroic plane, and upon an heroic plane so far removed, and yet so familiar to his own feet, that he stands like a man who, tramping the autumn stubble in his native fields, should see by intimate miracle his own boy face among the unyellowed wheat, dabbled with fragrant showers, and transfigured with the glory of the rainbow. As we read, our single sight returns, and for the nonce truth and honour, valour and chastity, worship and reverence, and wonder and delight, are matters that import us greatly. The dross and impediments of our soiled spirits fall away, and we walk upon morning mountains.

It is to be gratefully acknowledged that not a little of the magic of this magical book flows from the pen of the translator. Upon almost every occasion he is master of his English, the English of Sir Thomas Malory, with a not discreditable difference. Justice cannot be done to its qualities in scanty extracts, yet it would be unjust not to quote. We must premise that we have chosen these passages almost at random, and that there are many as good:

Thereupon, Lancelot departeth from the hermitage and rideth on until he cometh forth of the forest, and findeth a waste land, a country broad and long wherein wonned neither beast nor bird, for the land was so poor and parched that no victual was to be found therein. Lancelot looketh before him, and seeth a city appear far away. Thither rideth he full speed and seeth that the city is so great that it seemeth him to encompass a whole country. He seeth the walls that are falling all around, and the gates ruined with age. He entereth within, and findeth the city all void of folk, and seeth the great palaces fallen down and waste, and the great graveyards full of sepulchres, and the tall churches all lying waste, and the markets and exchanges all empty.

The King seeth the chapel of St. Augustine and the right fair hermitage. Thitherward goeth he and alighteth, and it seemeth him that the hermit is appalled to sing the mass. He reineth up his horse to the bough of a tree by the side of the chapel and thinketh to enter thereinto, but had it been to conquer all the kingdoms of the world, thereinto might he not enter, albeit there was none made him denial thereof, for the door was open and none saw he that might forbid him. Sore ashamed is the King thereof. Howbeit, he beholdeth an image of our Lord that was there within and crieth Him of Mercy right sweetly and looketh toward the altar. And he looketh at the Holy Hermit that was robbed to sing mass and said his Confiteor, and seeth at his right hand the fairest Child that ever he had seen, and He was clad in an alb, and had a golden crown on his head, loaded with precious stones that gave out a full great brightness of light. On the left-hand side was a Lady so fair that all the beauties of the World might not compare them with her beauty. When the holy hermit had said his Confiteor and went to the altar, the Lady also took her Son, and went to sit upon the right-hand side towards the altar upon a right rich chair and set her Son upon her knees and began to kiss Him full sweetly and saith: "Sir," saith she, "you are my Father, and my Son, and my Lord, and guardian of me and of all the world." King Arthur heareth the words and seeth the beauty of the Lady and of the Child, and marvelleth much of this that She should call Him her Father and her Son. He looketh at a window behind the altar and seeth a flame come through at the very instant that mass was begun, clearer than any ray of sun nor moon nor star, and evermore it threw forth a brightness of light such that and all the lights in the world had been together it would not have been the like. And it is come down upon the altar. King Arthur seeth it, who marvelleth him much thereof. But sore it irketh him of this that he may not enter therewithin, and he heareth, there where the holy hermit was singing the mass, right fair responses, and they seem him to be the responses of angels.

But we must take leave of old Romance and descend to earth again. And having touched it, may we raise a solitary voice, as of one crying in the wilderness, against what many readers may cherish as a fit embellishment of the book? We acknowledge the literary value and the artistic curiosity of the work of the late Sir Edward Burne-Jones, but we would protest, amid the chorus of praise, against his realisation of the actors in the Arthurian legend. His Knights are not the Knights of the Table Round, and scarce one of them could "back a steed" or "shake a spear." When the King mounts his charger, "he planteth himself so stiffly in the stirrups that he maketh the saddle-bows creak again, and the destrier stagger under him that was right stout and swift." And Sir Perceval, "the chaste knight of most holy lineage, hath a head of gold, the look of a lion, a heart of steel, and the body of an elephant." These are the true heroes of chivalric story; and to get at the essence of the chivalry he illustrated we must forget a great deal of Sir E. Burne-Jones, unless, indeed, we prefer him to the truth, which in this, as in so many cases, is the sheer poetry of the matter.

The Quaker Poet.

The Poetical Works of John Greenleaf Whittier. Edited by W. Garrett Horder. (Frowde. 2s. 6d. net.)

THIS is the first complete edition of John Greenleaf Whittier's poetical works issued in this country. It is a reprint of the "Cambridge" edition issued in America in 1894. That edition comprised the large "Riverside" collection of the poet's works, and also the poems gathered in the small posthumous volume At Sundown, and certain poems printed by Mr. S. T. Pickard (not "Packard," as printed in Mr. Horder's preface). We have, therefore, in a handy volume, the whole body of Whittier's verse. Mr. Horder has appended a number of useful, unobtrusive notes, all of which are necessary to English readers. The result is a volume for which many will feel profoundly grateful.

The poetry of John Greenleaf Whittier is not great poetry, but it has the merit of being personal in every line. Whittier wrote as he lived: his poetry is himself. You see his Quaker ancestors shaping his thoughts: they had suffered in the wicked persecutions of Endicott, and each wrong which he saw done under the sun reminded him of his fathers' days of bitterness. A Quaker and a lover of peace, he was yet a fighter at heart. The energy of his Anti-Slavery verse is that of a man who was hardly withheld by conscience from taking up the sword. He confessed, indeed, that "something of the grim Berserker spirit" was in him. Note how, in one of his national songs, "Massachusetts to Virginia," the Quaker poet disclaims war and states a cause for war in one hot breath:

Look to it well, Virginians! In calmness we have borne,
In answer to our faith and trust, your insult and your scorn;
You've spurned our kindest counsels, you've hunted for our lives;
And shaken round our hearths and homes your manacles and gyves!

We wage no war, we lift no arm, we fling no torch within
The fire-damps of the quaking mine beneath your soil of sin;

We leave ye with your bondmen to wrestle, while ye can,
With the strong upward tendencies and godlike soul of man!

But for us and for our children, the vow which we have given

For freedom and humanity is registered in heaven;
No slave-hunt in our borders—no pirate on our strand!
No fetters in the Bay State—no slave upon our land!

But this was only one—the most positive—side of Whittier's character. He was also a home-loving man, and was rooted in the soil of New England. Growing up in an old farmhouse in the valley of the Merrimac, his imagination was awakened by his father's stories, and was fed by the visits of humpbacks and gypsies, and by the traditions and village terrors which in after years he loved to stir up and play with. Moreover, the piety of his parents and the knowledge that he came of a clean, God-fearing race sank into his heart and made him a good man. In his beautiful poem, "Snow-bound," Whittier has enshrined these influences. We call this poem beautiful, not because it is technically so, or, indeed, poetically remarkable, but because it renders the sanctities of home life and the impressions of childhood with a force and felicity which we may seek in vain among similar attempts. Take these lines out of many:

We piled, with care, our nightly stack
Of wood against the chimney-back—
The oaken log, green, huge, and thick,
And on its top the stout back-stick;
The knotty forestick laid apart,
And filled between with curious art
The ragged brush; then, hovering near,
We watched the first red blaze appear,
Heard the sharp crackle, caught the gleam
On whitewashed wall and sagging beam,
Until the old, rude-furnished room
Burst, flower-like, into rosy bloom.

We sped the time with stories old,
Wrought puzzles out, and riddles told,
Or stammered from our school-book lore
"The Chief of Gambia's Golden Shore."

Our father rode again his ride
On Memphremagog's wooded side;
Sat down again to moose and samp
In trapper's hut and Indian camp;
Lived o'er the old idyllic ease
Beneath St. François' hemlock-trees;
Again for him the moonlight shone
On Norman cap and bodiced zone;
Again he heard the violin play
Which led the village dance away,
And mingled in its merry whirl
The grandam and the laughing girl.

Whittier's choice would have been to live quietly and write verse. But there could be no peace for him when once his sympathies had been enlisted for the negro slaves. He went into the fight, and for many years lent his pen, not primarily to the Muse, but to Liberty. It was of himself that he wrote:

And one there was, a dreamer born,
Who, with a mission to fulfil,
Had left the Muse's haunts to turn
The crank of an opinion-mill.

Having turned his crank, and won a laurel crown which will not wither just yet, Whittier returned to the plan that had pleased his boyish thought. He gave himself to Nature and to Poetry. The bright Merrimac, the salt sea meadows of Hampton, the wet levels encircling Salisbury, the hills of Newbury rising out of farm lands, and the nestling hamlets of New England, called him and were answered. Here is one of his realised landscapes :

I see, far southward, this quiet day,
The hills of Newbury rolling away.

Inland, as far as the eye can go,
The hills curve round like a bended bow ;
A silver arrow from out them sprung,
I see the shine of the Quasycung ;
And, round and round, over valley and hill,
Old roads winding, as old roads will,
Here to a ferry, and there to a mill ;
And glimpses of chimneys, and gabled eaves,
Through green elm arches and maple leaves—
Old homesteads sacred to all that can Gladden or sadden the heart of man.

Whittier's latter years were idyllic. He had fame and friends. He was an honoured figure in that fair New England band of writers which included Emerson, Lowell, and Holmes. Few poems of Whittier's are better known than his address "To Oliver Wendell Holmes," in which not a little of the poet's life is gathered up. We quote a few verses :

Thy hand, old friend ! the service of our days,
In differing moods and ways
May prove to those who follow in our train
Not valueless or vain.
Far off, and faint as echoes of a dream,
The songs of boyhood seem,
Yet on our autumn boughs, unflown with spring,
The evening thrushes sing.
The hour draws near, how'er delayed or late,
When at the Eternal Gate
We leave the words and works we call our own,
And lift void hands alone
For love to fill. Our nakedness of soul
Brings to that Gate no toll ;
Giftless we come to Him, who all things gives,
And live because He lives.

No man grew old more gracefully than Whittier, but that is a poor way of describing the long, calm sun-down of the poet's life. Of his poetry as a whole it may be said that its charm is never insufficient. It is for ever reinforced by the man behind it—"an Israelite indeed, in whom there was no guile." In such cases criticism lays aside its pen. For the warm, firm pressure of a good man's hand is felt in Whittier's verse, and when he speaks of his faith, and discloses his inmost thoughts, we are silent and grateful. Thus in his "Eternal Goodness" Whittier speaks to all world-weary men and women as few poets have done—for he speaks as poet and saint. We conclude by quoting a few of those unforgettable lines :

I know not what the future hath
Of marvel or surprise,
Assured alone that life and death
His mercy underlies.

And if my heart and flesh are weak
To bear an untried pain,
The bruised reed He will not break,
But strengthen and sustain.

No offering of my own I have,
Nor works my faith to prove ;
I can but give the gifts He gave,
And plead His love for love.

And so beside the Silent Sea
I wait the muffled oar ;
No harm from Him can come to me
On ocean or on shore,

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air ;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care.

O brothers ! if my faith is vain,
If hopes like these betray,
Pray for me that my feet may gain
The sure and safer way.

And Thou, O Lord ! by whom are seen
Thy creatures as they be,
Forgive me if too close I lean
My human heart on Thee !

A Translator-General.

Suetonius' History of the Twelve Cæsars. Translated into English by Philemon Holland. With an Introduction by Charles Whibley. 2 vols. "Tudor Translations." (Nutt. 24s.)

MR. WHIBLEY is ominently a fighting man ; but we imagine that we are by no means the only readers who prefer him in his less combative moods. And to our thinking he is quite at his best in such interpretative essays as he is called upon to contribute to the present number of the "Tudor Translations." The great writers of "insolent Greece and haughty Rome" have long ago laid their spell upon his admiration, and of all modernity the brocaded homespun of the Elizabethan translators seems to be nearest to his heart. His present study, which summarises the essential to be said both upon Philemon Holland and Suetonius, is quite felicitous. Mr. Whibley wears his erudition lightly, and he is a past-master in the art of presenting the kernel of a biography and the soul of a criticism in a dozen fascinating pages. It is our only complaint that in dealing with Philemon Holland excess of sympathy has led him into a pitfall of sentimentalism where we should have thought he, of all men, would have found himself supremely uncomfortable. "Was he not," says he of Philemon at Coventry, "the kindly physician, who healed not for money, but for healing's sake? So he tended the sick in charity and grew poor. Wherever the pestilence raged, or fever burned, there went Holland, bringing with him the comfort of medicine and good counsel." Now read Holland himself in the preface to Suetonius, written, of course, in 1606, before he exchanged the occupation of a physician for that of a schoolmaster :

Madame, the late pestilence in Coventrie, which occasioned my translation, &c, of this Historie, moved me also, in part, to addresse the same unto your Honour.

For being altogether restrained then, from free practise of my profession abroad, and no lesse impatient of idleness at home, I could not readily think of a better course to spend that vacation than in an Argument having a reference to mine old Grammaticall Muses, and according, in some sort, with my later studies in Physick. What houres, therefore, either the doubtful or diseased estate of my neighbours, together with the meditations of mine own mortalitie, would afford, I employed gladly in the said subject.

The last sentence is somewhat ambiguous ; but it is clearly an odd sort of "kindly physician" that finds a time of pestilence a "vacation" ; and "meditations of mine own mortalitie" are dangerous companions in such a crisis.

Nevertheless, both Philemon Holland and Suetonius are well worthy of Mr. Whibley's art. Fuller proclaimed Holland "the Translator-Generall in his age" ; and though posterity may, perhaps, elect to prefer the racy subject-matter of Florio, or the unparalleled splendour of the style of North, still, the thorough excellence of Holland's workmanship, and the row of noble folios—Livy, Plutarch, Pliny, Suetonius, Camden's Britannia, Ammianus Marcellinus, the Cyropædia—which testify to his untiring industry, entitle him to every respect from a less tough-brained modern. Mr. Whibley paints the old usher for us from his engraved portrait:

White hair and beard frame an oval face, and a large ruff encircles the scholar's neck. Small eyes, a fat nose, a lofty brow, an air of gravity—these are the outward characteristics of Philemon Holland. A quill-pen, held in his right hand, is a proper symbol of his devotion to letters. And as his portrait shows him, so we know him to have ambled through life. . . . His godson, after the gossiping fashion of the time, confided to Anthony à Wood a sketch of manifest truth. "His intellectuals and his senses," wrote Philemon Angel, "remained perfect until the eighty-fourth year of his age; and more especially his sight so good, that he never used spectacles in all his life; he was always of a spare and temperate diet, and seldom drank between meals. And was always of a peaceable and quiet spirit; and his life so innocent that he was never in all his days either plaintiff or defendant in any suit at law in any court (though he suffered sometimes by it). As a scholar he was a most reserved man, most indefatigable in his study, saying often that there was no greater burden than idleness." He drank not between meals, and never wore spectacles—these are the details, so well understood in the heyday of biography, which mark off a man from all his fellows.

Mr. Whibley dedicates his volumes to Mr. Rhodes, who, by the way, once informed an interviewer that he has already a complete collection of specially executed type-written translations of the classics in the library of his palace at the Cape. And the propriety of the dedication becomes manifest when you reflect on the character of Suetonius' work. For a Suetonius, with his remorseless exposure of the follies and weaknesses of the great, is the avenging angel who awaits those that make for empire. He has not, as Mr. Whibley points out, the supreme tragic sense of Tacitus; but his biographies vignette the seamy side of the Roman court in a fashion far more convincing than that of Juvenal, simply because they are dictated not by sæva indignatio, but by a very human and very commonplace love of prying into corners and raking to light that which had better remain hidden. For the real greatness of the Roman Empire, for its slow dissemination of peace and justice within wide frontiers, he has no eye. He writes history as a valet—from the vantage-ground of the ante-chamber. It is a prurient and grovelling realism. And therefore, for all his extraordinary power of portraiture, it is but a grudging gratitude, in the end, that he extorts from us. Nevertheless, he has the power. He, too, like Philemon Angel, knew what are the details which mark off a man from his fellows. He never omits the wart. Of Augustus he tells us that "in his old age he saw not very well with his left eye. His teeth grew thin in his head and the same were small and ragged." And again: "Hee delighted most in Rhetian wine; and seldome dranke hee in the day time. In steede of drinke hee tooke a sop of bread soaked in colde water; or a peece of coucumber, or a young leetuce head, or else some new gathered apple, sharpe and tart, standing much upon a winish liquour within it."

The Suetonius type of mind is anything but extinct, and Mr. Rhodes must beware lest some budding Dutch realist may not have an unsparing eye upon his down-sitting and uprising for a similar purpose.

Scots "Makaris."

Scottish Vernacular Literature. By T. F. Henderson. (Nutt. 6s.)

Vagabond Songs and Ballads of Scotland. By Robert Ford. (Gardner. 5s. net.)

MR. HENDERSON, as the coadjutor of Mr. Henley in the Centenary Burns, has shared the rancour of the "common Burnsité," and has commended himself, by patient industry and critical accuracy, to the attention of scholars. The "succinct history" of Scottish vernacular literature, which he has now given us, is another excellent piece of work. To it he has brought a learning without pedantry, an appreciation which avoids the pitfall of sentimentalism, and a morality which never forgets to be humane. We do not know where to look for a fuller, a more well-informed, or a more racy account of the "makaris," or for a juster estimate of their qualities and defects, and of the place which, historically and critically, they hold in literature. We have girded somewhat of late at the multiplication of literary summaries and handbooks. But this particular volume is no superfluous one. So far as we are aware, it is without serious rivals on its own ground, and the material which it embraces admits of adequate treatment within its limits, without undue compression. Moreover, within the last few years, at least three vexed questions concerning Scottish vernacular literature have arisen, each of which has given rise to a considerable controversy, which naturally falls to be summed up in Mr. Henderson's pages. We propose briefly to follow him through each of these. The first is the doubt raised by Mr. J. T. T. Brown as to the authenticity of the Kingis Quair, traditionally ascribed to King James the First. Here, like almost every scholar who has approached the question, other than Mr. Brown, Mr. Henderson gives his allegiance to the conservative view; and where so much depends on a nice sense of opposing probabilities, it must be admitted that numbers tell. Prof. Skeat, M. Jussérand, Prof. Saintsbury, Mr. Rait—whose admirable pamphlet on the subject Mr. Henderson might have referred to—and now Mr. Henderson himself: that makes a redoubtable array for even so well-equipped a controversialist as Mr. Brown to contend against. Mr. Henderson, however, seems to us to weaken his case by attributing also to James the First At Bellayne and Christ's Kirk on the Green, ascriptions in which we fancy he stands, amongst competent critics, alone.

The second point of interest is in the diverging theories as to the origin of that considerable mass of ballad literature which fills so large a space in Prof. Child's magnificent English and Scottish Popular Ballads, and is to many minds, after Burns, the most characteristic expression of the Scottish Muse. The view of Motherwell that some, at least, of the ballads are of immemorial antiquity, and in some cases almost contemporary with the historical events which they profess to relate, may perhaps be neglected. And the majority of scholars would probably agree with the theory of Prof. Courthope, that the ballads, as we have them, are derived from antecedent romances; are, in fact, the détritus of romance, composed and hawked about the country by wandering singers in the decay of minstrelsy. Mr. Henderson himself accepts this theory with certain modifications, and runs a tilt at the opposing theory of Mr. Andrew Lang and one or two others, who hold that the ballads are folk-literature rather than minstrel-literature; that they "spring from the very heart of the people, and flit from age to age, from life to life, of shepherds, peasants, nurses, of all the class that continues nearest to the natural state of man"; that they "make music with the flash of the fisherman's oar, with the hum of the spinning-wheel, and keep time with step of the ploughman as he drives his team." Mr. Lang puts his case as prettily as possible, but we own to agreeing with Prof. Courthope and Mr. Henderson that it is not really a well-founded one. It seems to rest on an imperfect appreciation of the difference between primitive and merely degraded types of poetry, and of the low vitality of all folk-song in the presence of a minstrel class. Everywhere, we suppose, the folk in the morning of its days, has composed the words and melodies of its own festal carols and rude heroic lays; but everywhere, surely, it has practically ceased to do so, as soon as it had someone else—a professional minstrel, in fact—to do the thing for it, Thirdly, we look with natural interest for Mr. Henderson's last word on the clangorous subject of Burns. Without going deeply into controversial issues, he maintains the chief positions already occupied by his colleague in the famous essay. He scoffs at the "blind encomium" of the village enthusiast and dwells on an "exuberant vitality" as the determining force in Burns's career for good and for bad.

But this noble faculty, this exuberant physical and mental vitality, was to spend itself very largely in beating against the walls of its prison-house. At the outset it was to be all but fatally injured by the iron drudgery of Mount Oliphant—a drudgery which, as he said, combined the "cheerless gloom of a hermit with the ceaseless toil of a galley slave"; and which left behind debilities and tendencies that were bound to evince themselves in some form, and do much to explain his restless craving for excitement, and for those "violent delights" which "have violent ends,

And in their triumph die."

Nor, apart from its undue straining in his earlier years, was he ever in circumstances where it did not suffer, more or less, from the tedium and harm of repression; and thus it acted too much as a mere fever in the blood, and never became the fully beneficent influence either to himself or the world that it might have been amid more congenial surroundings, and with free scope for its employment and full expansion.

On the question, again, of Burns's relations to his predecessors, Mr. Henderson has little to do but to reiterate conclusions already formed and formulated. That Burns modelled himself on the old "makaris," and on such modern reproducers of their spirit as Sempill, Ramsay, and Ferguson; that much of his success in the vernacular was due to the inheritance of traditional peasant lyric into which by industrious research and affinity of spirit he had entered: these things the Centenary Burns has taught us, in spite of the Burnsites, and it is largely owing to Mr. Henderson's pains that we take them now for gospel.

There are other points in Mr. Henderson's pages over which we would gladly dwell: his full and sympathetic treatment, for instance, of such masters as Dunbar, Henderson, and Alexander Scott, or his general picture of that glorious fifteenth century in which, while England was stifled and throttled in the toils of civil war, it was left for the Scottish disciples of Chaucer to carry on most faithfully, and yet with most originality, the traditions of the master. With James the Sixth and First, the exodus to England, and the fully established authority of the Kirk, the great period of Scottish vernacular literature, the age of the "makaris," comes to an end. Of the derivative eighteenth century reaction, which Ramsay began and Burns illustrated, Mr. Henderson, with a true sense of the proportion of things, treats but briefly.

Those who find the matter worth pursuing may supplement his chapters with the collection of popular ballads and songs made by Mr. Robert Ford. These are such as "have been the familiar entertainment of the country people of Scotland during three-quarters of the nineteenth century." Some of these are already to be found in standard collections of songs, but the larger number now appear in book form for the first time. Mr. Ford has gathered them with patient research from obscure publications, the kindness of correspondents, and the lips of the peasantry themselves. To each he has added such historical and bibliographical data as he could get together, and in some cases he has been able to print the melodies which traditionally accompany the words. There is picking in the collection, both of humour and sentiment; but, on the whole, it confirms us in the opinion that the best of this kind has been gathered together long ago. Nor can many of the songs boast any great antiquity. Where Mr. Ford is able to give the date of composition, it generally falls within the last hundred years.

The Green Window. By Vincent O'Sullivan. (Leonard Smithers. 3s. 6d.)

This book has an air about it. It is slim and tall, and its title and appearance are oracular. But why the green window? The window we can understand, because Mr. O'Sullivan surveys life, and speaks his mind on it. Greenness suggests youth, and we hope that this book is a youthful effort; other fitness there seems to be none. The table of contents next excites our wonder. It presents a long, perpendicular ribbon of monosyllables, as "Sob," "Same," "White," "Vah," "Crave," "Have," "Glide": such being the titles of some of the essays (twenty-five in all) of which the book is composed. However, these are small matters; a sage may be allowed his cabalistic signs and dried alligators. The book's the thing.

The book is a hurtling fragment of pessimism. Its keynote is struck in these lines from the opening essay:

In this struggle things are not noble or base; they are merely expedient. Every man, however fair-spoken, has in mind some secret advantage: he is for himself, and therefore against you. You must cross /'s with him. Your part is to have your I out of the scabbard before he can get his well in hand. Sweet words and actions are but brilliant parries; affection is a snare; and you will be wise to regard all protests of sincerity with suspicion, since humanity tends to the vile.

Well, well! many an optimist and cheery liver has said as much; for life will stand a vast amount of battering and abuse and still seem worth living. In one of his most beautiful poems Matthew Arnold sees life as a darkling plain "where ignorant armies clash by night"; wherefore "Let us cling together, love." Alas! our new mentor tells us:

The moment you love you become a slave. . . . What- ever it may be that you love, it becomes the black care that rides behind your saddle. So if you would be free, it were well to come early to the late conclusion of the soured King worn with pleasure, that every affection is vanity.

It will be seen that, to use a vulgarism, Mr. O'Sullivan has it pretty bad. But that remark about the soured king exposes the weakness of his oracles. He does not see that the knowledge of the vanity of all things is an individual matter. Solomon had to go through a life of opportunity and experiment to learn it, and then he discovered it only for himself, and by no means for the young satrap at his side. It is not possible to come early to a conclusion which is the accompaniment of physical decay and is then commonly transmuted into a comfort. Still less is it possible for Mr. O'Sullivan to impart it to healthy minds.

Books like this are idle things. To tell a youth not to trust men or love women is merely to tell him not to go on living. For to live is to do both. The depth of Mr. O'Sullivan's philosophy may be judged by the following passage:

If you have ambitions or a plan, you may do any task however dulling and still respect yourself, since it will not last for always; but to sweat at some mean work, to be the scourge of a master, merely for trivial comforts, such as maintaining a suburban cottage, or a seat in church, or a broadcloth coat, is the most servile of degradations. Better be the pariah-dog who wanders where he listeth, or the gypsy to whom none can say, "I order you." I have often looked at old third or fourth clerks in the counting-houses of the city merchants, and wondered how, when they were young and their blood was still hot, they had been content to help somebody else to grow rich and powerful, while they saw nothing for themselves beyond the place of third or fourth clerk, and death. Now they are silly and obsequious, or weakly arrogant; their faces are the white flags of their unwholesome surrender.

A third or fourth clerk who in the beginning of his career had seen nothing but that goal would not be even a third or fourth clerk. But life is not so lived or weighted down. And the suburban cottage and broadcloth coat are, after all, the necessary things, and far better than that feckless liberty of ferocious pessimism which Mr. O'Sullivan would apparently have preferred that the budding clerk should embrace.

In conclusion, Mr. O'Sullivan gives his readers these alternatives: "Either you hate me because I have shown you the bodkin truth so nakedly that the blood has tingled in your cheek, or you applaud me for not throwing over the figure of truth the gaudy veil of hypocrisy." We neither hate Mr. O'Sullivan nor applaud him. We smile.

The Drama in Three Volumes.

A History of English Dramatic Literature to the Death of Queen Anne. By Adolphus William Ward, Litt. D., Hon. LL.D. New Edition. 3 vols. (Macmillan. 36s.)

DR. WARD's treatise first appeared almost a quarter of a century ago, and it at once took rank as a standard authority. Since then a generation of vigorous studies in England, America, and the Continent upon the English drama had left it somewhat in the rearguard of research, and Dr. Ward's announcement of his intention to bring it thoroughly up to date was a welcome one. The revision has been a very searching one; the quantity of new matter to be added was considerable; and, though Dr. Ward has left "the plan of the whole unaltered," and has abstained "from recasting either general or particular conclusions, except when they have been modified by maturer consideration," yet the opening up of fresh sources of information has necessarily resulted in the rewriting of whole chapters or large portions of chapters. The total outcome is a work precisely half as large again in bulk—three volumes for two—as its predecessor, and the disappearance of the more theoretical summary of the whole subject, with which Dr. Ward formerly prefaced his chronicle.

Taken for all in all, then, the substantial qualities of the new book are those of the old book when it first appeared: mutatis mutandis, its merits and demerits in relation to the study of the English drama as a whole are materially unaltered. Those qualities and merits are of solidity rather than brilliance. Dr. Ward is a patient and conscientious scholar; he grinds through and digests all the literature that comes in his way; his facts are accurate and clearly stated; his analyses are laborious and complete; his theories and criticisms not fantastic. He gives you an excellent common-sense history, an invaluable work of reference; but it is not a great book. It would not, we think, be possible to read it through from beginning to end, for it lacks the saving grace of style; and it would hardly be desirable, for the wealth of detailed narrative and comment is imperfectly subordinate to that expression of dominant, of master ideas, which, apart from style, alone renders a book of the kind imperishable.

So far as practical value goes, the most useful part of the history is probably that which deals with Jonson, Beaumont, and Fletcher, and the seventeenth century dramatists, down to Shirley, and then again with the Restoration dramatists down to Queen Anne; for here Dr. Ward is covering ground which is adequately covered by no other writer known to us. But the biography of Shakespeare is good, even beside Mr. Lee's, and in the detailed studies of the individual Shakespeare plays, their sources and their literature, Dr. Ward gives something which falls outside Mr. Lee's scope. The chapters on the earlier Elizabethan dramatists are good too, though, except for a little later information, they do not quite come up to John Addington Symonds' Shakespeare's Predecessors. On the other hand, in dealing with the origines, with the possible secular drama of minstrelsy, with the germ of religious drama in the liturgy play, and its development into the full-blown miracle-play, Dr. Ward is at his worst. We should conjecture that questions of origines do not much interest him, and that he has not taken the trouble to master the very considerable literature—mostly, of course, French or German—which the last decade or so has produced on the subject. This section of his book is very distinctly inferior, even as a discussion of the distinctively English data is markedly inferior to Creizenach's volume on the mediæval and early Renaissance drama, a work which, though it was published as long ago as 1893, Dr. Ward does not appear to have used. For the matter of that he seems to have made no use of Petit de Julleville's several important works, or of Lange's collection of Easter plays, or of Wirth's work on the same subject, or of Cloetta's interesting study on the history of the notion's "Comedy" and "Tragedy" in the Middle Ages. The nature of a trope and its importance as the starting-point of the religious drama has dawned upon him, late and imperfectly, in an appendix, while of the Benedictine Winchester office of the Sepulchre or of the Dublin Resurrection play he knows nothing. And he innocently reproduces some good old crusted errors, of which we vainly hoped to have seen the last. We have not space to go into these in detail: let it stand for an example that he is beguiled by the authority of an ignorant antiquary into translating sacrae paginæ professor not "professor of holy scripture," which of course is its real significance, but "professor of holy pageantry." However, the most learned scholar cannot be omniscient, and we excuse Dr. Ward's weakness on the mediæval part of his subject for the sake of the really sound work which he has put into the bulk of his book.

Ten Years of History.

England in the Age of Wycliffe. By George Macaulay Trevelyan. (Longmans. 15s.)

APPARENTLY it takes two of his sons to sustain Sir George Trevelyan's double achievement in politics and history, for almost simultaneously Mr. C. P. Trevelyan is elected to Parliament and Mr. G. M. Trevelyan—who has indeed fulfilled another of his father's ideals by becoming a Fellow of Trinity, Cambridge—presents his first treatise. England in the Age of Wycliffe is true to the traditions of the house, alike in its sustained and excellent literary quality and in the spirit of Protestant Whiggism which informs it. We do not mean that Mr. Trevelyan, dealing with one of the great transition periods, is unfair or prejudiced against mediævalism, for, indeed, mediævalism was on its last legs when Wycliffe came, and perhaps it would not be easy to speak too hardly of it. What we mean is that Mr. Trevelyan's instinct is to look forward, and not back. His eye is on the new spirit which was abroad at the end of the fourteenth century, and which, though the strong hand of Henry V. kept it in abeyance for a while, was ultimately to blossom forth in Reformation and Revolution. Upon the glories of the great system crumbling to decay he hardly pauses to throw a sympathetic glance of retrospect. The book deals with the statics of history rather than its progress. The actual period covered by the narrative is very short, about ten years—from the beginning of the Good Parliament to the final disappearance of John of Gaunt. The chief events dealt with are the career of that unscrupulous and self-seeking statesman, the Peasants' Rising, and the appearance of one of the great personalities of English history in John Wycliffe. Around these three points of interest Mr. Trevelyan builds up a quite admirable picture of the whole civilisation of the day in its threefold aspects—political, social, and religious. He has thoroughly succeeded in indicating the volcanic nature of the forces at work in the endless task of unmaking and remaking society and the somewhat complex cross-currents of their interaction. The account of the Peasants' Rising is particularly interesting. Mr. Trevelyan has had the advantage of using the detailed studies of the matter by M. André Réville and Mr. Edgar Powell, and has also been able, with Mr. Powell's help, to unearth a good deal of hitherto unutilised material in the Record Office. His narrative is at once the fullest and the most intelligible with which we are acquainted, and is moreover written with singular vigour and picturesqueness. The treatment of Wycliffe is also very full and discriminating, and his unique position as at once mediæval schoolman and precursor of the Reformation is well brought out. In studying the effects of Wycliffe's teaching Mr. Trevelyan does not confine himself to the strict limits of his period, but traces the growth and influence of Lollardry down to the sixteenth century itself. The book is one which seems to us equally meritorious from the point of view of the professed student and that of the general reader.

Other New Books.

CROMWELL TO WELLINGTON. ED. BY SPENSER WILKINSON.

This is a big book of big interest: a kind of solemn roll-call of our greatest soldiers. And there is more unity in the work than appears at first sight. These twelve lives of soldiers, written by as many different hands, are edited under the leading idea that they shall present "a picture of the British army at work during the century and a half in which the Army helped the Navy to make Great and Greater Britain what they have been since men now living can remember." The lives chosen are those of Cromwell, Marlborough, Peterborough, Wolfe, Clive, Coote, Heathfield, Abercromby, Lake, Baird, Moore, Wellington. A portrait of each soldier is given, and there are many plans of battles and sieges, military sketches, &c., to assist the reader. A notable feature of the book is the Introduction by Lord Roberts. It is interesting, for instance, to find Lord Roberts assigning to Marlborough "the foremost place in the roll of British commanders." He says of the victor of Blenheim:

His splendid military genius was united with an almost unparalleled evenness of temper, and a regard for, and sympathy with, his troops, which earned for him a devotion scarcely less than that which the Tenth Legion felt for Cæsar, or the Old Guard for Napoleon. From a moralist's point of view, Marlborough's character was not faultless, but as a General he had few equals and no superior. He never fought a battle which he did not win, never besieged a city which he did not take, and, in spite of obstructive allies and jealous Continental rivals, he curbed the aggression of France, and restored the balance of power in Europe.

The lives lend themselves with varying fitness to the short treatment they receive (say forty pages each) in this volume. Where the interest of a man's career centres in a single incident or campaign, as in the cases of Wolfe, Lord Heathfield, and Sir John Moore, the literary result is finer than where a long and complicated career has to be surveyed. But the book admirably fulfils its purpose, and there is hardly a biography in it which does not bring into relief the importance of sea-power, and the vital bond which makes our Army and Navy not only sister services in name, but the indispensable complements of each other. Certainly in no book with which we are acquainted is so much military genius discussed with so much military knowledge. (Lawrence & Bullen. 10s. 6d.)

THE PARSON'S HANDBOOK. BY THE REV. PERCY DEARMER.

This book is clearly born of the times. Its express object, indeed, is "to help, in however humble a way, towards remedying the lamentable confusion, lawlessness, and vulgarity which are conspicuous in the Church at this time." Mr. Dearmer does not use the words confusion, lawlessness, and vulgarity without meaning them. He proceeds to account for the presence of these evils seriatim, and to argue that the cure for them is to be found in a more loyal obedience to the Prayer Book. With great force and earnestness Mr. Dearmer sets himself to show that the Ornaments Rubric, which orders that the ornaments which were in use in 1548 are to be retained, is to be taken to mean exactly what it says, and to be obeyed accordingly. Its application is another matter; and here Mr. Dearmer sees great merit in the recommendation of the present Archbishop of York, that questions of ceremonial should be settled by a committee of experts to which all loyal Churchmen could look for guidance. We can but refer those whom it concerns to this very sound little book. And those who are repelled by the intricacy of the subject may do well to consider the following neat anticipation of their mood:

Ceremonial directions often appear, at first sight, to be over-minute. But all the manners of our everyday life are governed by rules quite as elaborate; only, being instructed in them from our earliest childhood, we do not notice them. Let anyone write out a paper of directions for the conduct of a South Sea Islander at a London dinner-party, and he will find that the most meticulous ceremonies ever held in a church are far outdistanced. And yet a person who simplifies the ceremonial of the dinner-table over-much becomes obviously disgusting in his behaviour.

Having discussed the subject of ritual in relation to present disputes and conditions, Mr. Dearmer proceeds to expound the proper character of the Choir, the Nave, the Altar, Vestments, Ornaments, the various services, and the administration of Holy Communion. Mr. Dearmer has probably rendered a real service to the Church by this cogent and temperate little work. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

TUSCAN ARTISTS.

BY HOPE REA.

These notes, by a very competent student of Italian art, are addressed to the traveller who desires to appreciate intelligently the masterpieces among which, for a few brief holiday weeks, his lot is cast. They are not exhaustive, but take up and elucidate by careful comparison and sympathetic criticism some half-dozen of the innumerable points to which attention might profitably be directed. Thus in one chapter Miss Rea traces the influence first of architecture, then of the goldsmith's work, in determining the character of Tuscan painting, and especially of Botticelli; in the next, Fra Angelico, as an idealist, is compared with Luca Signorelli, as a realist, and the significance of either in the realm of art considered. Then follows an account of the manner in which the two tendencies ultimately became fused—on the one hand, in Raphael; on the other, in the great Venetians. A study of the mediæval artist as a story-teller is illustrated from the narrative frescoes of Giotto, Duccio, Carpaccio, and Raphael. Some examples are given of the gradual development, along traditional lines, of such traditional subjects as the Creation of Man, the Crucifixion, the Cenacolo. And, finally, a closing chapter contains a careful study of the great tabernacle which Orcagna made for Daddi's Madonna in Or San Michele. On the whole, an unassuming but thoughtful and suggestive little book, which should be particularly useful to those who desire to approach Italian art from the side of idea, as well as that of technique. SHAKESPEARE'S KING RICHARD II. ED. BY A. W. VERITY.

This is one of the best of Mr. Verity's excellent little editions of plays of Shakespeare. The Introduction is full and pleasantly written, and should help the student to arrive at a genuine critical sense of the value and beauty of the play, as well as of its position in literary history. The only fault we have to find with Mr. Verity's critical exposition is that perhaps more stress might have been laid upon the shifting of the spectator's sympathy in the course of the play, until in the end it becomes as markedly for Richard as it was originally against him. In one or two points of fact he seems to us a little unsound. Surely there cannot be any serious doubt that Shakespeare's play was the one which figured in Essex's abortive revolution of 1601. And has Mr. Verity quite grasped the nature of the argument to be derived from Daniel's Civil Wars in favour of 1595 as the date at which the play was produced? It is that of two editions of the Civil Wars, both published in that year, the later has passages bearing close resemblances to passages in "Richard II." which are not found in the former. The glossary and brief notes are all that could be desired; and the plan of putting the relative extracts from Holinshed in an appendix is good. The more that in such editions can be eliminated from the main indigesta moles of notes the better. We wish that Mr. Verity could have seen his way to put his metrical comment into another appendix. For a brief statement of the chief laws of Shakespearean rhythm is really a boon to the young student. (Pitt Press)

THE TALE OF ARCHAIS.

BY A GENTLEMAN OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

This is not a very pretty story. The passions and adventures of Charicles and Archaïs are in a sickly, sensuous vein which does not strike us as particularly Hellenic; or if Hellenic, it is Hellenic of the decadence. And when Zeus and Aphrodite intervene, it is in a fashion characteristic enough of their disreputable duties, but barely edifying. However, the "Gentleman of Cambridge," though he has not good taste, has a certain command of facile rhythm. This is a fair sample:

ARCHAIS.

Cold is the kiss of the stars to the sea,
The kiss of the earth to the orient grey
That heralds the day;
Warmer the kiss of a love that is free
As the wind of the sea,
Quick and resurgent and splendid.

CHARICLES.

Night her bright bow-string has bended:
Fast flies her arrow unsparing
Through the beech-leaves,
Æther it cleaves
Rapid and daring.
Ah! how it strikes as with silver! how the suns laughter is ended!

But the best thing in the book is the last quatrain of its epilogue:

Now a stream to ford and a stile to clamber;
Last the inn, a book, and a quiet corner . . .
Fresh as Spring, there kisses me on the forehead
Sleep, like a sister.

SOME PORTRAITS OF WOMEN.

BY PAUL BOURGET.

These "human silhouettes" are typical of Paul Bourget at his best, unhampered by the exigencies of plot or by the stress of a romance of great passions. They are the work of a specialist in feminine psychology, an accepted authority on the mind and manners of the aristocrat. Though cast in the mould of fiction, they are veritable études de psychologie contemporaine.

It is a common complaint among French critics that Paul Bourget's characters are not typically French. The author of Cosmopolis is, indeed, a cosmopolitan. The most lifelike of these portraits of women were sketched in America and Ireland. Never has an American written a more poignant study of the tragedy of the American man of business than is contained in "Two Married Couples"; never has an Irishman given us a better picture of Irish peasantry than is to be found in "Neptune Vale." In reading these brief sketches, one feels that wherever Paul Bourget finds himself he is enabled immediately to watch life from the inside, and, watching, to understand.

Mr. William Marchant's translation is marred by several very ungainly renderings; and it was hardly fair to leave unaltered Paul Bourget's imitations of the Irish accent: "Good marning, sair." (Downey & Co.)

NEGLECTED FACTORS.

BY REV. JAMES ORR, D.D.

The thesis maintained in these lectures, entitled Neglected Factors in the Early History of the Church, is that the study of the early development of the Church has gone unduly to the tracing of the profound influence which its pagan environment had upon Christianity, and that the reaction of Christianity upon paganism itself has consequently been somewhat neglected. Prof. Orr endeavours to show, firstly, that the mere numbers of the Christians in the Roman Empire were greater than has usually been supposed; secondly, that though, on the whole, it remains true that "not many rich, not many mighty," were called, yet the extension of Christianity in the wealthier and more educated classes of Roman society was not inconsiderable; and, thirdly, that the actual influence of Christian teaching and example upon professedly pagan thought and practice has been underestimated. These points he treats with a lucidity of manner and a learning which, if not profound, is at least respectable. In his two first lectures he makes large use of the evidence afforded by the recent excavations of Prof. Lanciani and others in the catacombs of Rome, and he calculates that, instead of the number of Christians in Rome about the middle of the third century being, as Gibbon thought, about a twentieth part of the whole population, it was really, "unless the testimony of the Catacombs has been totally misread, anything between one-third and one-half." In the same way, he dwells on the evidence which several of the crypts yield as to their connexion with members of famous Roman families—with Urania, daughter of Herodes Atticus, for instance, or the illustrious Pomponia Graecina, of whom Tacitus records that she was accused before the Senate on a charge of "foreign superstition." The most interesting, however, of the three lectures is the third, in which Prof. Orr discusses the slow permeation of pagan ethics and literature by Christian influences, and in particular the curious parallelisms between Mithraism, with its Taurobolium, or baptism of blood, and the victorious creed which was destined to outstrip it in the race for the regeneration of humanity. MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS, 1542-1587.

BY R. S. RAIT.

This is the second volume in the interesting series devoted to "Scottish History from Contemporary Writers." In treating of Mary, Queen of Scots, Mr. Rait has wisely restricted his view to the six dramatic years between Mary's arrival in Scotland in 1561 and her execution. He has also aimed chiefly to place before the reader the evidence for the very divergent views of Mary's character. The book is pleasingly illustrated with views of Linlithgow Palace, Holyrood, Loch Leven Castle, &c. (Nutt. 2s.)

Spring.

THE dead are raised, blind things behold the sun,
The sick are healed, joy wakes the slumbering wing,
Waters of life thro' dreaming valleys run,
Dumb woods of winter sing.

The spirit of the infinite doth sweep
Round the wide world of souls—a mighty sea—
Wave whispers wave, deep calleth unto deep
Of immortality.

Fiction.

The Victim. Translated from the Italian of Gabriele d'Annunzio by Georgina Harding. (Heinemann.)

WE have before stated our objection to the work of Gabriele d'Annunzio considered as a whole: it is morbidly erotic. Let it be understood that we do not use the term "morbid" lightly—after the manner of those who by temperament oppose all progress in art—as a mere epithet of unreasoned vituperation. We naturally admit that just as physical love and sentimental love form part of life, so they are fit material for literary art; also, that serious and sincere fiction must, in a certain superficial sense and to a certain limited extent, be unpleasant. Many, if not most, of the great novels, even the great English novels, are "unpleasant"; but we cannot find any good reason why d'Annunzio should confine himself—as he does, for example, in the series of novels styled for some weird reason "The Romances of the Rose"—to the narrow and noisome field of sexual-sentimental phenomena.

To assume that his artistic faculty is thus limited would be absurd; his purview is contracted not because he cannot see, but because he will not look. He is a genius, the genius perhaps of a whole continent; his insight is unerring, his vision absolute, and his technical skill unsurpassed. He might write a second Comédie Humaine—one which would have style, and a technique of which Balzac never dreamed; instead, he writes thousands of pages about fornication.

The hero of The Victim is an adulterer and a cuckold. Even the heroine (exquisite and noble creature though she is) has fallen. The "victim" is the offspring of adultery. And the book is a masterpiece: there can be no blinking of that fact. The reader may writhe, but he is gripped. Given the subject, the treatment is flawless and superb.

D'Annunzio is a young man—we believe considerably under thirty. It is possible, in spite of the apparent maturity of his powers, that his development is yet far from complete; if so, we may hope, not for better, but for different things.

Miss Harding's translation is brilliant.

A Double Thread. By Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

IN reading this book one is impelled to ask the question whether the author intends it as a serious presentment of modern manners, or whether the story is merely used as a peg upon which to hang festoons of epigrammatic dialogue.

Here is the story: Jack Le Mesurier is poor, but a rich uncle will bequeath to him vast wealth on the condition that he marries a rich wife. Jack is acquainted with Elfrida Harland, young, beautiful, clever, and worth £15,000 a year. He likes her. But Elfrida's history is a strange one. The granddaughter of a lord, she had a humble father, who died leaving twins, Elfrida and Ethel. The lord consented to adopt one of the twins, provided that her father's family relinquished absolutely all claim upon and connexion with her. This was done. So it happened that the sisters had never seen each other since infancy, and that while Elfrida lived in luxury, Ethel was a poor governess. Now Jack also came to know Ethel, and he preferred Ethel to her sister, and, scorning his uncle's wealth, proposed to the penniless girl and was accepted. The curious thing is that there was no such person as Ethel. The other twin had died at an early age, and Elfrida had impersonated an imaginary poor sister, and lived a double life, in order to make sure that she was not being wooed for her wealth. Hence Jack, noble fellow, got his uncle's riches after all.

It will be discerned that the plot has elements of the improbable, even of the incredible. Miss Fowler makes no attempt whatever to cope with its difficulties, and the result is that the story carries no conviction. Not even an exceptionally good-natured and lenient reader could believe it.

Leaving out the characterisation, which is of a rather crude "sheep and goats" description, there remains the epigrammatic dialogue—that dialogue which has made Miss Fowler's reputation. There is an immense quantity of it in A Double Thread, considerably more than in Concerning Isabel Carnaby. Some of it is good, much of it is mediocre, almost none of it is relevant; the characters talk for the sake of talking, and their gossip, though it is sometimes entertaining, is a matter entirely apart from the story; moreover, it is scrappy, the topics not being developed. Here is a fair sample:

"Affection is a recreation, not a profession."

"Of course it is. But how many people seem to think that disliking them is on a par with receiving stolen goods or breaking the Sabbath! Now Evelyn never asks anything of her friends except that they shall laugh at her jokes. She says she doesn't even mind if they don't listen, provided that they laugh in the right places."

"She is certainly the least exacting woman I ever met."

"Exacting women are a terrible nuisance," remarked Elfrida; "they expect the impossible, and are in consequence disappointed every time that the inevitable occurs; and the inevitable has a habit of occurring pretty often."

"It would be terrible to marry an exacting woman, don't you think?—one of those exhausting creatures who expect a man to forego his very dinner for the sake of talking to them," said Lord Stonebridge. . . .

"Then don't you believe in the old-fashioned sort of love that one reads about in story-books?"

A Double Thread is, of course, a different thing from the average novel. We do not, however, consider it worthy of Miss Fowler's talent. Wit, if only it is good enough, will excuse a thousand shortcomings; but it must be good enough.

Lone Pine. By R. B. Townshend. (Methuen. 6s.)

WE own a weakness for invincible heroes when they eschew autobiography and inspire the love of not more than one beautiful woman. In the American of this story of New Mexico we have a hero of just the right stuff. He hungers chronically for silver, yet he deals nobly by the "pard" who ruins him. He is a dead shot, but he kills his eleventh Indian in a hand-to-hand grapple. He talks the jargon of conscious bathos by which his countrymen vainly protect themselves from soft emotions, but his innate reverence, the poetry which is in him, remains unimpaired. During the best years of his youth he has thought not at all of women, yet is he capable of chivalry's finest frenzies. There is a "lone pine" in the story, hard by a silver mine of proportions more Klondikely than likely, if the phrase be permitted us. But he who, after braving splendid peril with amazing luck, becomes the inheritor of this treasure is the true lone pine; he it is who "dreams of a lonely palm-tree." Manuelita is her name, and when the treacherous Navajoes abduct her, one is very glad that she has the terror of Whailahay's reputation to preserve her from harm—Whailahay the wonderful old woman, watchful of the treatment of her human sisters, and without whose help no Navajo can cross the dark river. Mr. Townshend evidently knows his Indians, of whom he gives us more pleasant specimens than the Navajoes. The cacique, or head-man, of the Indian pueblo of Santiago enforces the fifth commandment with the stick in the case of an intractable daughter; but he possesses, despite his impiety towards Whailahay, distinct charm. Describing to the American, who is descanting on the beauty of a certain valley, how his party killed six Navajoes one by one as they emerged from a sweating bath, he observes: "Crack, crack, crack . . . they could not escape. And we took their scalps . . . and brought them home. It was a great triumph. Yos, I do love this valley." And he adds: "We always scored against the Navajoes whenever we had fair play." As we said at the beginning, the hero is of just the right stuff. We like him none the worse because at first it seems as if he were a mere deus ex machina to oblige another hero.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE BLACK DOUGLAS.

By S. R. CROCKETT.

Mr. Crockett's new story is a long, thorough-going romance opening in the year 1439, "in the fairest and heartiest spot in all the Scottish southland." That "Mesopotamian" trick of language is very much in evidence throughout the story. Costume and armoury and local colour are here, and the telling words of eld. It is a stirring story of fighting and loving and vengeance. When Sholto comes to raise Lanark in aid of the Douglasses he finds the watchman sleepy: "Open, varlet of a watchman, or by Saint Bride I will have you swinging in half an hour from the bars of your own portcullis. I who speak am Sholto MacKim, captain of the Earl's guard. Every liegeman in the town must arm, mount, and ride this instant to Edinburgh. I give you fair warning. You hear my words; I will not enter your rascal town. And if so much as one be wanting at the muster, I swear in the name of my master that his house shall be burned with fire and razed to the ground, and his wife be a widow or ever the cock crow on another Sabbath morn!" That will serve, and we ken brawly there's mair o' the like complexion. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

MADAME IZAN.

By MRS. CAMPBELL PRAED.

Mrs. Praed calls her latest novel a "tourist story." We meet the tourists in a big hotel at Hong Kong, and our curiosity to know more about Madame Izan is at once aroused. Her marital history is peculiar, and a situation is evolved in which the hero, John Windeatt, says to Shirazaka Izan, a Japanese gentleman: "If you don't mind, I think I would prefer not to shake hands. You see, I mean to take your wife from you, if by her own will and any legal possibility I can get hold of her. Though we are rough-and-ready out West, we do things on the square." A bright, bizarre novel, suffused by Eastern colour. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

THE GARDEN OF SWORDS.

By MAX PEMBERTON.

A romantic and well-written story of the Franco-German War, by an author whose skill in devising exciting incidents is well known. It is a mixture of straightforward fighting, and the complex nature of beautiful Beatrix Lefort, who contrives to love two men at once. One is her husband, a French officer, the other an Englishman and a Hessian dragoon. (Cassell. 6s.)

THE SCARLET CITY.

By "POT" AND "SWEARS."

"Pot" and "Swears" are London journalists, whose popularity has won them these endearing sobriquets. "Pot" is Mr. Pottinger Stephens, "Swears" is Mr. Ernest

Wells. Herein, combining their sportive fancies, they offer a slapdash but not unamusing story of gay London life—the life of gilded youth and stage doors, of race meetings and midnight excitements, of sharps and flats. The book takes the form of the autobiography of John Franklyn, and details, to quote the title, his adventures with Anthony Fuller "in and out and round about the Wicked World in the Second Half of the Nineteenth Century." It is, in fact, Tom and Jerry to date. (Sands. 6s.)

THE MATERNITY OF HARRIOTT WICKEN.

By MRS. HENRY E. DUDENEY.

This story, by the author of A Man with a Maid, is a study in heredity. Opening with a scene of death and drunkenness, it is gloomy and unpleasant throughout, yet it grips the reader, and he is fascinated by the character of the tortured Harriott Wicken. The action is laid almost entirely in London, and the author has drawn Brixton society in no flattering way. (Heinemann. 6s.)

GOD'S GREETING.

By JOHN GARRETT LEIGH.

An earnestly written story of life in a Northern mining and iron-working district. The author's wish is to indicate how the conditions of certain classes of toilers may be raised, and to point out how Nature and human welfare are strangled "with the gold nets of our own weaving." (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THE GREEN FIELD.

By NEIL WYNN WILLIAMS.

A story, to some extent in dialect, of a Midland parish. In matter melodramatic, but written with terseness and force. In the first chapters the village church is burned out, and the chained Bible rescued by a tramp. Subsequently the tramp becomes the vicar's under gardener, and of the upper gardener makes an enemy for life. Later comes murder. An interesting, if somewhat conventional, tale. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

SUNNINGHAM AND THE CURATE.

By EDITH A. BARNETT.

A quiet and well-observed story of English provincial life. Sunningham is a typical village, and the author (who is known by her Champion in the Seventies) has subjected the conversation and characters of the little set of persons who form its society to close examination. To some extent the novel is a revival of the Jane Austen method. It should please leisurely readers in the country. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

MORALS AND MISTAKES.

By C. GORDON WINTER.

The mistakes are rather more evident than the morals. The preface, which is a sort of theorem, tells us that "Man is a puppet in the hands of Fate; by Fate is often meant woman. . . . Woman never does anything without an object; that object is to further her own ends. She occasionally obeys the voice of conscience," &c., &c. The story appears to have emanated originally from the Roxburghe Press, the title-page being a substitution. (Simpkin, Marshall. 3s. 6d.)

MY INVISIBLE PARTNER.

By T. S. DENISON.

An earnest, purposeful story, with a strong leaning to the supernatural. The scene is New Mexico, and there is no end of adventure and mining camp passions. The invisible partner plays an important part in the clearing up of a murder. The reader must be prepared for incidental pages of fairly stiff reading about mind, and will, and telepathy. (Gay & Bird. 6s.)

MAUREEN MOORE.

By RUPERT ALEXANDER.

Another romance of '98. "Me bould boy!" (Burleigh. 6s.)

The Real Robespierre.

A POOR sea-green atrabilia formula of a man—without head, without heart, or any grace, or gift, or even vice, beyond the common, if it were not diseased rigour as of a cramp—meant by nature for a Methodist parson of the stricter sort to doom men who departed from the written confession, to chop fruitless shrill logic, to contend and suspect, and ineffectually wrestle and wriggle.

This is Carlyle's last word on the incorruptible revolutionary, and although, with similar passages, it has been attacked, all historical evidence—making the customary allowance for Carlyle's exaggerated expression—bears it out. We are told that M. Sardou has taken quite a different line in the play about to be produced at the Lyceum, and that in Sir Henry Irving's Robespierre we shall see a handsome, spiritual-looking young advocate, inspired by patriotic dreams, a man who was forced to associate with assassins because assassination at that time was a necessary element in statesmanship, but a man who suffered horrible remorse for the crimes committed in the name of Liberty—we are promised, in fact, a whitewashed Robespierre, clear of all monstrous offences, even of that complexion on which Carlyle insisted with such irritating monotony. M. Sardou's experiment would seem to show that the disease of the new historian—a passion for fining down and smoothing away the excrescences of villainy—is infectious and is spreading to the playwrights.

It has been well said that the Revolution was too great to produce great men. When a ship is caught in a tornado, and whirled round and round like a toy boat, the helmsman has little chance of making a mark. And of all the men at the wheel of the ship of state in the France of 1789-95 only one was a statesman, Gabriel Honore Riquetti, Comte de Mirabeau. Robespierre fought his way to the rudder with admirable persistency; he had those small gifts which can double and twist in a crowd of rivals. When he had finished the dirty work and attained power, he could not use it. He could only take offence at slights which hurt his vanity, make long speeches at the Jacobin Club, and strut and swell for the edification of the populace in honour of a Supreme Being.

Born in 1758, Robespierre was thirty-three when he first began to make his mark in the Constituent Assembly. Before the Revolution he had achieved a great reputation at the provincial bar, he had also written pamphlets of tame philosophy and stanzas of cold and affected poetry. While Mirabeau lived he could not gain the ear of the Assembly. He once had the hardihood to mount the tribune immediately after Mirabeau had electrified friends and enemies alike with his magnificent speech on the right of declaring war. He tried to stammer out a few frigid platitudes, but he was derisively howled down. This incident is worth noting as characteristic of the blind political vanity of the man. With the death of Mirabeau he quickly came to the front, and avenged in the Convention the days when the Assembly would not hear him by many long speeches which, so far as one can judge from reading them, have every quality of oratory except poetic beauty. It would take too long to enumerate the chief acts of his political career. They are well given in Lewes's monograph, in Mr. Morley's essay, and of course at length in Hamel's exhaustive biography. It is enough to say that he first made himself popular in Paris by defending the right of the people to petition, and by moving that all citizens should be allowed to enter the National Guard. His ascendancy in the Jacobin Club gave him, through its affiliations in the provinces, influence all over France. In the Legislative Assembly his oratory was put in the shade by that of the Girondins; Vergniaud in particular could always hold the turbulent house spellbound with his eloquence, and Robespierre's speech on the war in January, 1792, fell quite flat, although it was one of his best efforts. But the ineffectualness of the Girondins, who had laid the mine under the throne and were now beginning to whimper over the consequences of firing it, soon brought Robespierre and his colleagues forward again. After the 10th of August and the massacres of September his name is associated for the first time with bloodshed, but he took no practical part in this rehearsal of the Terror, although he said the day after the murder of the prisoners: "Yesterday no innocent man perished."

Enthusiastically supported by Couthon, Le Bas, his brother Augustin and St. Just, Robespierre did a great deal during the first session of the Convention to discredit the Gironde. He was also kept busy in defending himself against the attacks of Vergniaud, Guadet and others, but he made no speech of importance until the debate on the king's trial (December, 1792). Then he struck the keynote which carried the wavering Plain into acquiescence by declaring that Louis's death was a political necessity, not an act of justice. The "Mountain" (so called from the height of the seats on which the Jacobin deputies sat) from which Robespierre came down to deliver this speech was at that time a solid body. In a few weeks it had split into the three parties of Robespierre, Hébert and Danton. In a yet shorter time Robespierre had triumphed over both his rivals and fallen headlong himself. He did not fall like Lucifer through "aspiring pride and insolence," he did not fall because he had countenanced a multitude of murders. He fell, and it was just that he should fall, because he was little of soul, the head of a sect rather than a statesman, who talked a great deal about devotion to "la patrie," but knew nothing of patriotism; who worked, not for his country's good, but for the triumph of his theories—worked, let it be acknowledged, with indomitable perseverance, but without any genius or greatness of vision.

The visible decline of Robespierre dates from June, 1794, when he forced the Convention to decree that "le peuple Français reconnaît l'existence de l'Etre Suprême et l'immortalité de l'âme." The famous fête which followed on the 8th was arranged by David, and gave as much pleasure to the populace as the fête in honour of Reason had a few months earlier. Robespierre acted the part of high priest and delivered two long harangues, during one of which a figure emblematic of atheism was burnt. His fellow-deputies laughed at his farcical mysticism, his pontifical airs and graces; they resented the moral superiority with which he tried to overwhelm them. "Avec votre Être Suprême," said Billaud-Varennes, "vous commencez à m'embêter." Robespierre could not endure these taunts; he demanded the punishment of his revilers, but all the answer he got was the prosecution of crazy old Cathérine Théot, who had hailed him as a Messiah. At that moment Robespierre's practical power was at its greatest. The iniquitous law of the 22 Prairial had enabled him to extend the province of the Revolutionary Tribunal, and through it to take revenge on his enemies. But the affair of Cathérine Théot mortified him to such an extent that he retired from public life altogether for forty days. When he returned, the Convention was in open revolt against him. On the 26th of July he made a long speech complaining of the slights which had been put on him. It was received in gloomy silence, and after such a sitting a greater man would have felt the necessity of striking some decisive blow. Not so Robespierre. He only went to the Jacobin Club and made more speeches.

Then came the Ninth Thermidor. Billaud-Varennes got up in the Convention and denounced Robespierre, who was not allowed to answer; though he cried out "C'est faux!" and "Président d'assassins, je te demande la parole," in a voice so choked and inarticulate that the cry was raised, "Le sang de Danton l'étouffe!" As everyone knows, his arrest was decreed; the Commune rose and rescued him, but owing to indecision, or to desire to avoid further effusion of blood, or to blind confidence in his influence triumphing without the aid of force, he refused to take advantage of the movement. It is not known whether he shot himself at the Hôtel de Ville when Barras's force approached, or whether it was done by one of the soldiers who broke into the hall, but the first version is more generally accepted. He was taken back to the Convention with a shattered jaw, then before the Revolutionary Tribunal, and guillotined the next day (July 28, 1794).

A priest named Lefetz first called Robespierre the In-corrup-tible, and he never did anything in his public life to make the title a mockery. Still it must be remembered that he had no temptations to corruption in the common sense of the word. It was applause he coveted; it was the realisation of his dream of a chimerical democracy rather than personal aggrandisement which filled his mind. That he was sincere and single-minded may be freely conceded; he was excellently fitted to be the despot of a town council or board of guardians, and it was one of destiny's most freakish practical jokes to make him an active agent in a world-shaking revolution. As for his being a monster of moral turpitude, such an idea could never be entertained for a moment by a close student of the history of the Revolution. At worst he can only be blamed for egregious vanity, which blinded his eyes to the horror of bloodshed. The deeper we read into the documents of his age the stronger is our feeling of horrified surprise that so much evil could be effected by so insignificant a man.

LET me be dumb,
As long as I may feel thy hand—
This, this is all—do ye not understand
How the great Mother mixes all our bloods?
O breeze! O swaying buds!
O lambs, O primroses, O floods!

From T. E. Brown's "Poems."

Things Seen.

The Black Flag.

How the wind played on us, and how the little blue clouds sailed! Right ahead I could see the corner of Newgate. No crowd yet; no sign; just the old vista, the flying specks of pigeons, the early vans, the 'buses preceding and meeting us, a shoe-black's red jacket. It was twenty minutes to nine by St. Sepulchre's clock.

The 'bus flew on, but was conscious of the event. The driver turned and nodded; there was Old Bailey lore in the jerk of his hat-brim, the wand-like motion of his whip. With something like a blush I rose on the flying, rocking 'bus, and disembarked at Newgate-street. A hundred men and boys lined the pavement on the west side of the Old Bailey, but they were half hidden by carriers' carts. The carriers' horses were breakfasting—exploring their nose-bags with their backs to the gaol. The pigeons flew and blew about above. On the whole there was nothing to see.

At ten minutes to nine the prison bell began to toll in single strokes at short intervals. The sounds were uneven. I stood with my back to the shaft of a Rickmansworth farmer's cart, and thought nervously of a long summer's day I spent there twelve years ago, and the unsweetened cider that I drank. The bell did not impress me: it only teased. Then the police arrived. I looked up at the flagstaff. Innocent flagstaff! The cord quivered idly down its length, the pigeons flew close to it, and the little clouds were bisected by it as they passed. Far away, above someone's hat, I saw two youths on a high roof peering and craning, and then I settled my gaze on the flagstaff. The bell tolled interminably, and seemed a weary preamble. I could hear the low rumble of 'buses going to the Bank. Close by, a horse shook its harness, and some people started in fright. My eyes ached in the light behind the flagstaff. Then the cord shook—not with the wind. It was drawn out at an angle, and remained so I know not how long. The suggestion was that the warder was watching—flag in hand. Then we saw a peaked cap and a hand above the parapet—no more, and slowly the sun was blotted out. There was a dull, official cheer from the crowd. I cannot describe the unearthly effect. The eye saw, but the shadow of the black flag fell on the soul.

Bedford Row.

THE carriage had the amplitude of the century's youth. There was no rumble, but had there been one it would have seemed no excrescence. A coronet was on the panel, and the coachman was aged and comfortable and serene. The footman by the door had also the air of security that comes of service in a quiet and ancient family.

Suddenly from the sombre Georgian house emerged a swift young clerk with a sign to the waiting servants. The coachman's back lost its curve, the venerable horses lifted their ears, the footman stood erect and vigilant, as a little, lively, be-ribboned lady and her portly and dignified man of law appeared in the passage and slowly descended the steps. The little lady's hand was on his arm; she was feeble and very old, and his handsome white head was bent towards her to catch her final remarks. They crossed the pavement with tiny steps, and with old-world gravity and courtesy he relinquished her to the footman and bowed his farewells. She nodded to him as the carriage rolled steadily away, and I had a full glimpse of her face, hitherto hidden by her bonnet. It wore an expression kindly and relieved, and I felt assured that her mission had been rather to add an unexpected and benevolent codicil than to disinherit.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE Bishop of Wakefield's protest against Mr. Pinero's new play has produced a chorus of protests against the Bishop of Wakefield. The reason is obvious. The Bishop is strictly on his own ground when he praises or censures the morals of a play; but surely it is not too much to ask that a critic—even a bishop critic—should see the play first.

ANOTHER prelate, and not in a speech merely, but as a deliberate piece of writing, made not very long ago an assault upon another and a more famous play. It was thus that Cardinal Manning wrote (anonymously) of Dumas and La Dame aux Camélias, when Mme. Bernhardt played it in London:

The author belongs to a world that would despise us as much as we abhor it; and in this reciprocal and extinguishable variance we leave the author and all his works. But of the actress we must say that it is a perilous gift to be able so to play a false and evil part as to draw to falsehood and evil the sympathy and admiration of those who are good and true. What defence is to be made for La Dame aux Camélias, "la virginité de l'âme," and "la rédemption par l'amour," with its angelic sweetness, its transfigurations, and its halos of saints? We do not desire that our conceptions of angels should be transferred to courtesans. Vice does not here lose half its evil by losing all its grossness—it becomes doubly evil because of its intoxicating fascinations. There was a time when the matronly gravity and the maiden dignity of English women would have resented such a comedy as an insult.

Cardinal Manning did not sit in the stalls, any more than the Bishop of Wakefield did, before recording his criticism. As a matter of fact, the Cardinal had never once seen a play, a life-record in which not even the Bishop of Wakefield is likely to prove his match. The Cardinal's first and last essay in dramatic criticism was printed in the Weekly Register, a paper begun fifty years ago by his brother-in-law, Henry Wilberforce, which he himself afterwards owned, transferring it before his death to a layman whom he trusted, and who, after making it a tidy property, parted with it only last week.

Mrs. WILLIAM VANDERBILT, jun., became perhaps the mistress of more millions than any other woman alive when her own great fortune was united with the greater one of her husband the other week. But she has been put to straits—sore straits that would make a text for the author of No. 5, John Street—during her brief honeymoon. Without going from the West to the East in self-imposed renunciation, she has wanted clothes. The "most handsome villa in Long Island" is now a cinder; and its name, "Idle Hour," was a strange satire on the scene that took place the other night, when flight from the flames became literally a business of life. The mistress of a trousseau that has taken columns of the American press to describe "had no time to dress before making her escape from the house, but she obtained a supply of clothing from the lodge." There were many new sensations, no doubt, during the fire; but the newest of all probably was that experienced by the bride in getting, for the first time in her life, some clothes she really wanted. No wonder she came out to the lawn, took a seat, and watched the progress of the fire with equanimity.

THE Bedgebury estate in Kent, just sold by Mr. Philip Beresford-Hope, is a place of many memories. The house was built with red brick three hundred years ago, and the wings were added later. But the late Mr. Beresford-Hope spent a little fortune in re-building and re-decorating it after his own heart, till—if the truth be told—it partook somewhat of that "Batavian grace" which Lord Beaconsfield attributed to Bedgebury's possessor. In that house Mr. Beresford-Hope passed many happy years, deciding the "line" of the Saturday, and discussing the politics of Church and State with his brother-in-law, Lord Salisbury—a discussion averted, you may be sure, with allusions to Lord Beaconsfield of a not very complimentary kind. There, too, did he receive his nephew, Mr. Arthur Balfour, little suspecting what a position he was to hold in the hereafter, when—as Mr. Balfour has told us, not without a hint of the old family feud—"Lord Beaconsfield is dead." There are other words of Mr. Balfour's perhaps not wholly unconnected with the traditions of Bedgebury. Some people express surprise at the sympathetic attitude which Mr. Balfour, with his own well-known mental history, employs towards the High Church party. The sale of Bedgebury may serve to remind them that Mr. Balfour is the nephew, not of Lord Salisbury only, but also of the late Mr. A. J. Beresford-Hope.

THE plans for the new War Office in Whitehall by Mr. Young, for the new Local Government Board Office in Parliament-street by Mr. Brydon, for the new College of Science at South Kensington by Mr. Aston Webb, have all been deposited in the House of Commons, and you may know that Mr. A. J. Beresford-Hope is no more by the mere fact that there has been no extended debate about them. He was all for Gothic, and was, besides, ever keen for a tilt in the battle of the styles. The architecture of London is a subject on which men who feel at all feel keenly. They differ, and do not agree to differ. Pugin denied that a man could pray devoutly in any but a Gothic church, and the extravagance is characteristic of the various schools of combatants. The subject is one that should not, on any grounds, be confined to experts. Where is the man in the street in his right place if not in such a discussion? It is the man in the street who has comradeship with the buildings in the street, and he has a right to be heard in the choice of his friends.

How far the plans for these great new offices will meet with public approval has yet to be seen. Of those for Parliament-street and Whitehall, one may express a reluctant doubt. Immense are the difficulties of the designers. They cannot, like the church builders, fall back on their fathers—they cannot merely revive. The conditions of time and place are binding. Gigantic blocks of buildings to be lighted in a land of darkness present problems which Michael Angelo might have refused to face.

OUR architects, having been restorers and reproducers for so long, are little equal to the strain made upon them as originators. For years past one of their own number, one whose personality permits him to be a chartered libertine of the tongue, and to tell home-truths without offence—Mr. George Aitchison, A.R.A.—has been saying this thing: the principle of iteration is fatal to architecture. Soldiers, he says, if they were like architects, would still go out to fight in armour and with bows and arrows. In his optimistic moods he presses for the formation of a style of architecture in England that will express the modern movements and aspirations—the greater considerateness and benevolence of the days that now are. But the building that is thus expressive is not to be built in a day. Mr. Aitchison himself admits that the evolution must be slow. It must also be tentative; and you cannot play the experimentalist with enormous public works. They can be neither wholly reproductions, therefore, nor yet even largely creations. They are mongrels among the world's buildings, a bit borrowed here and a bit there. That is not very satisfactory; but it is, perhaps, the inevitable expression of a time of great mental and spiritual transition.

No. 1,053.

I HAD entered a little new shop near Holborn to buy an Evening Standard. A brisk, sweet voice forestalled me: "A Family Herald Supplement, please!" I stood aside and looked at the girl. She was about twenty-two. Her neat green cloth cape, the quiet set of her hat, her well-kept gloves, and her generally happy air proclaimed her to be the daughter of a well-going suburban home. Placing the Supplement in her small leather bag, she flicked out of the door and ran to overtake a King's Cross 'bus. I decided that she lived in Barnsbury.

"I suppose the Supplement is as popular as ever?" I said, vaguely interested in the purchase.

"Oh, yes; the Supplement never changes. It's an old standard, and the better sort of people stick to it."

"What do you mean by the better sort of people?"

"Oh, quiet, better sort of people—you know. Like that young lady. Do you think she'd buy one of these?"—and the news-vendor waved his hand down a long line of penny novelettes, in coloured covers, adorned with pictures of willowy heroines and impossible drawing-room tragedies. "Oh, no; the Supplement is class, and the people who buy it wouldn't be seen reading some of these things with pictures in them. What they like is a quiet love-story—you know—refined."

"Do they read the Supplement every week?"

"Yes. That young lady never misses it. You see, it's a nice story to have lying about the home; anyone can read it. It's respectable, you know."

I bought a Family Herald Supplement. The story it contained bears the number 1,053, indicating that the Supplement is in its twenty-first year of publication. A small wood-block showing Britannia seated on a lion, holding a trident, with a ship sailing by, emphasises the fact that the price of the Supplement is one penny. And below the title appears evermore the following proposition:

IF A TENTH PART OF THE FELICITIES THAT ARE ENJOYED IN THE REGION OF IMAGINATION COULD BE IMPORTED INTO REGIONS TERRESTRIAL, WHAT A DE-LIGHTFUL THING IT WOULD BE TO AWAKE EACH MORNING TO SEE SUCH A WORLD
ONCE MORE!

I believe I am correct in saying that this legend has always dominated the first page of the Family Herald Supplement. It is a clever legend. It is too long to tire: it might appear for ever and ever as a triangular adornment in type. But when, in a mood, it is read, how perfectly it must please! It is the sublimated essence of the mild suburban revolt against the dullness of life. It is Barnsbury's sigh translated.

Did I read the story? Every word of it. The hero, Charles Dysart, picks up a letter written by Bertha Vintrolles, a much-talked-of beauty, to whom he is shortly to be introduced. Therein he learns that Miss Vintrolles has made up her mind to marry him and his fortune; and, reading it, he soliloquises:

What does she mean? That she intends to marry him because he is "gilded" to the tune of twelve thousand a year? That she intends to find a refuge in his arms from her mother and her dressmaker because she will meet him next month and is a beauty? Well, he has a prophetic feeling that Miss Vintrolles will find then that she has scarcely waited long enough to count her chickens!

And so we are deliciously behind the scenes when Dysart and Miss Vintrolles meet in "a large, richly-furnished drawing-room in which is a crowd of people." Dysart's surprise and feeling of chagrin when Bertha, after all, makes no immediate assault on his heart; her provocative attentions to the detrimental young Chudleigh, and his to the worldly Effie Clitheroe; Mrs. Vintrolles's dismay as she watches these mis-sorted couples—such is the woof of the story. "Daughters are the bane of a mother's existence!" says Mrs. Vintrolles—a most effective speech when read aloud in Barnsbury. But, as Bertha says, "Never mind, mamma; I promised I'd marry him, and I will! Don't be frightened. Only I don't feel in a hurry about it. Let me go my own way, and you'll see it will be the better in the end." Note the absolutely unheightened, unsophisticated, Monday-in-the-suburbs quality of the dialogue. That is of the essence of the Family Herald Supplement style. The talk echoes the Barnsbury tea-table, and never soars higher than the persiflage of a dance in the Holborn Town Hall. The author's business is to moderately heighten the setting of life, and distribute wealth, beauty, leisure, and melodious surnames—but there the embellishment must end. The mirror must enhance Barnsbury, but Barnsbury must see itself in the mirror. A little flattery, even in speech, of course! Barnsbury knows French—"Oh, yes, a little, you know, only I'm forgetting it all—au contraire? Oh, yes, that's on the contrary—don't you see?"

She snubs Tom, too, in his surprise, at the first going off; not that this has never happened before—for, au contraire, it is of frequent occurrence.

As to allusion. It must be very simple. When Miss Vintrolles speaks of a heavy brass kettle which she has just hawked round a bazaar on her arm as an "Old Man of the Sea" she is understood.

As to conduct. The chaperone must win in the end, but meanwhile she may be put to a certain amount of confusion.

Mr. Pinero as a Serious Dramatist.

It is clear from "The Gay Lord Quex" that Mr. Pinero has not advanced since "The Benefit of the Doubt." In the latter play there were indications, as in "Trelawny of the Wells," and (ever so slight) in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," of a seriousness which sharply differentiated him from the playwrights of the hour. He, at any rate, had recognised that the art of drama was a branch of the art of literature, governed by the same canons, and subject to the same tests, as poetry or fiction; and that a play should be something more than a series of "situations" made "telling" at no matter what cost of truth and artistic decency. It is fit, therefore, that his work, whether or not it fall short, should be judged by the standards which we apply to all other forms of literature, but from which, by a tacit understanding, our contemporary drama is generally exempt.

Now, with regard to "The Gay Lord Quex," the most important law of drama is that the action must spring from, and move by means of, character. Novalis said: "Character is fate." But Mr. Pinero, in this play, would seem to say: "Accident is fate." The second act could not have occurred but for the accident of a society dame being pressed for time at a manicurist's. The whole of the third act would have been impossible if a lady's-maid's father had not fallen ill at a particular moment, and if a conversation in a garden had not, by the merest chance, been overheard. The final solution of the problem is due to the pure accident of a young man being caught in the act of osculation. What would be said of a novelist if he employed such stale devices for the furtherance of his story?

Again, look at the general "laying-out" of "Lord Quex." Two acts are employed in simple preparation. It is elaborate and clever preparation, but it is preparation. Not till the third scene of the third act does the essential drama start; and then the whole play is begun and ended in a single brilliant and effective scene. All that happens outside the one scene between Lord Quex and the manicurist is either preparation or redundancy. With the third act the proper play finishes. Mr. Pinero has tied his knot and unravelled it. But in the fourth act he somewhat leisurely proceeds to tie it again, and in the last breathless, scampering fifteen minutes of the piece he unravels it again, and, incredible though the thing may seem, yet once more ties and unravels. For all its three hours and twenty-five minutes of duration the play is hurried.

The fact is, Mr. Pinero has spent his powers upon one scene and one character, to the neglect of all else. The scene is that in the third act before referred to. And it is a good scene—up to a point. It is genuinely dramatic within itself, and the characters are handled with fine courage. There you see them in all their spiritual nakedness—the vulgar, impulsive, cattish, warm-hearted manicurist, and the lordly reformed rake fighting like a dastard for the happiness which, like a fool, he has lost. And then—what happens? Mr. Pinero suddenly grows afraid of his own truth. Casting aside the apple of Ibsen into which he has bitten so deep, he makes a dart for the saccharine of his old Robertsonian days; and brings down the curtain, amid a hurricane of applause, with as rank a bit of sentimentality as you will find in “Sweet Lavender” itself. The character is Sophy, the manicurist, a faithful and sincere portrait, earnestly studied, and drawn with a certainty and a dexterity which almost, but not quite, defy criticism. By the side of Sophy the other characters are shadows, or, at best, conventional types of stageland. The delicate fresh realism which has gone to the making of her shows up only too painfully the obscure unreality of her surroundings. For, after all, “Lord Quex,” with the exception of Sophy, is realistic chiefly in its superficialities—in the outward apparatus of luxurious verisimilitude upon which Mr. Pinero, in his capacity of stage-manager, so strenuously insists. In proof of this you have only to examine the two root-stems, as it were, of the play: the affection of foster-sisters, one base-born, the other aristocratic; and the reformation of a roué through the unconscious agency of a pure young girl—have not these affairs been a mainstay of melodrama for fifty years?

Remains the dialogue. It is, on the whole, good, but too “smart.” Sophy is made to say: “The Duchess looks for all the world as if she were an angel spending a Saturday to Monday here below.” Rather clever, no doubt; but Mr. Pinero well knows that Sophy never said such a thing.

The Invaluable Capital.

SIR,—I note a misprint on p. 29 of the new Omar, the strangely anonymous Omar:

That sallow cheek of hers to' incarnadine.

And in the equivalent line on p. 71:

That yellow Cheek of her's to incarnadine.

Such elementary faults are to be pardoned in the case of genius; in the case of printer's man quâ printer's man there is no excuse for them. If it is that the lover of FitzGerald will have his misplaced apostrophes and all—why, let us have literature spelt with two l's in our Stevenson, with all the rest of R. L. S.'s little weaknesses. Speaking of FitzGerald, have many of his Readers considered to what a Degree the Success of his Version, delightful though it be, is Due to his Employment of Capital Letters? Literature now, to its great Hurt, it may be, appeals now little to the Ear, but chiefly to the Eye; and whether this be because Reading Aloud is a Lost Art, as our Elders would have; or that our Taste is so far bittered that it will not suffer this Art in patience; which yet so far subsists as to make a natural Delivery the Rarest of Things: however this be, it is often seen that Poetry is most admired which in Sound is indeed Un-musical, and Prose which has no natural Nuance; for the reason that they charm the Understanding by instantly Impressing the Visual Sense, in such Manner that the Mind has no Need to go searching about to apprehend the Meaning. This I believe to be the Explanation of the Continued Admiration of Many for the Poems of such Writers as Pope and Addison, which many others count as poor Stuff: but by the Fact that all the Nouns are pointed out with such Clearness to the Eye, such work will impress the Sluggish Mind far more keenly and vividly than Work which does not so Solicit the Eye; and thus there are Persons of feeble Wits who reckon the Literature of the Last Century far superior to that of this: as a Woman will consider another Woman's Letter to be far the superior of a Man's, as it is so Emphasized, by Italics and Extravagant Words, as to penetrate the mind Instantly: And with Literature it is far other than with Jewels, for the Generality rate most Highly that which is Comprehended with Least Pain.

This Printing of Words by means of Capital Letters will also give a Passage a Balance and Rhythm which do not by Right belong to it; each Capital giving the Mind a little Pause: So that I have seen Passages highly Applauded by famous Critics, which stripped of their Nobility of Capitals had fallen into the most vulgar Journalese; no more, compared with their former State, than is a member of society compared with a member of Society.

As a Case in Point, consider the following Quatrain, done almost faithfully into English from Omar:

I.

Stay me with flagons, comfort me with wine,
This amber face make like a ruby shine,
And when I die with wine my body wash,
My coffin wattle of the roots of vine.

II.

Stay me with Flagons! Comfort me with Wine!
This Amber Face make like a Ruby shine!
And when I die with Wine my Body wash,
My Coffin wattle of the Roots of Vine!

The Roaring Moon.

SIR,—I am delighted. I have brought down, with quite a little shout, an avalanche, and I am not crushed—not even though Mr. Eyre Hussey has apparently never seen a tossing boat, moored in a current, with the water washing its prow. Tennyson might have said month, but he didn't. He said “moon,” and “moon” has a double significance, like a tree and its shadow. No doubt, to the many, a tree shadow suggests nothing but a measurable form. They can't conceive it extending beyond the reach of anything but the imagination (anglicè, lunacy). I have tried to follow up the extended shadow whithersoever it led, like “the stretched metre of an antique song.” That's all, upon my word. I am quite elated over the result—the hands up: “Me, sir, me!” to construe the obvious. But, believe me, I never supposed that Tennyson meant to imply that the moon sat up like a colicky baby and roared. On the other hand, I do say (it is just an opinion, but hard of refutation) that he would not have used the word in its secondary, only to imply its primary, meaning, save deliberately, and with the intention to justify his reader in the imaginative quest. Whither that goes, or how it is conducted, is a matter of temperament. Evidently, here is one discredited, but unrepentant, explorer, in the author of “Stopping-tones.”—I am, &c., Haikais in English.

Our Prize Competitions.

RESULT OF No. 27.

LAST week we asked for Haikais, first explaining that a Haikai is a Japanese form of verse consisting of three unrhymed lines of five, seven, and five syllables respectively, or seventeen syllables in all. We then quoted a few specimens to show the nature of a Haikai, which is light and fresh, a swift fugitive impression more often than not ending with a surprise. As a result nearly two hundred original examples lie before us (for many competitors have sent in several attempts), the best of which is this, by Mr. R. M. Hansard, 6, Compton-terrace, Eastbourne, to whom a cheque for a guinea has been sent:

The west wind whispered,
And touched the eyelids of spring:
Her eyes, Primroses.

Spring is the favourite subject with our experimentalists, but one or two are humorous. V. A. F. (Kensington), for example, adapts Voiture on the rondeau, and writes thus:

[First] five syllables;
Then seven; then five again;
Behold a Haikai.

While from E. S. (Ely) comes this pleasant trifle:

Through Haikais many
You seek for a poetess—
Lo, here's my coupon.

There is also some elaborate satire from E. H. (Ledbury), which we would quote but for the fact that its force depends upon spelling Haikai "Haiwai."

Here is a selection of examples:

A star fell nigh me,
I saw it in the woodland—
Lo, 'twas a primrose! [J. H., Oxford.]

Her eyes are the dove's,
Her black locks are the raven's,
But her heart is mine. [T. C., Buxted.]

A light rustling stir
In the full-foliaged tree—
Aha, the squirrel! [I. S., Brighton.]

I listen at dusk,
To the wind in the poplars;
And dream of the sea. [L. M. L., Stafford.]

At last! a footstep,
A cry, eyes dim and laughing!
At last, my sweetest! [W. G. F., Fowey.]

A cloud of whiteness
Against the sky deeply blue,
Stands the wild cherry. [M. J. S., Bournemouth.]

Competition No. 28.

The stock of worldly wisdom, as expressed pithily and humorously in proverbs, is too small. We ask our contributors to try to add to it, and we give them as models the following translated saws from Don Quixote, most, if not all of them, proceeding from Sancho Panza:

He whose father is judge goes safe to trial.
There is no friend for a friend.
You cannot catch trout with dry breeches.
There are only two families in the world—the Haves and the Have-nots.

Whether the pitcher strike the stone or the stone the pitcher, the pitcher suffers.

Under my cloak I kill (or command) the king.

All sorrows are bearable if there is bread.

There is no book so bad but that it contains something good.

Everyone is as God made him, and very often worse.

We do not ask for our competitors' wisdom to be expressed exactly in Sancho Panza's formulae: but it must have a kindred homeliness of manner. Most thinking persons have one or two pet pieces of counsel which experience has taught them; it is these which we desire to extract and put on record; but so long as the phrasing is original we do not mind if the thought is not. To the author of the best proverb sent us a prize of a guinea will be given.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, April 18. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the third column of p. 417, or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

Announcements.

WE attributed last week the new edition of Mr. Ruskin's chapter on "The Nature of Gothic," from Stones of Venice, to Messrs. Longmans. This was an error. The publisher is Mr. George Allen. The pamphlet, which has Mr. Morris's introduction, written for the Kelmscott Edition, prefixed, is a very interesting one.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish in a few days Rose à Char-lotte, by Marshall Saunders, a romantic story of Acadie.

MR. HENRY FROWDE announces that the first volumes of the British Anthologies, edited by Prof. Edward Arber, will be ready early next month. These are the volumes including the poems of Shakespeare, Jonson, and Milton, and their contemporaries. This is claimed by the editor to be the first adequate attempt that has ever been made towards an historical anthology at popular prices, and the series will contain about 2,500 entire poems and songs, by some 300 poets.

MESSRS. JARROLD & SONS announce for publication, on April 15, a new novel entitled The Prodigal's Brother, by Mr. John Mackie.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will publish immediately the popular edition of Mr. Bodley's France. It will be accompanied by a new preface reviewing the course of events in France since the first appearance of the work last year. The new preface will also be published separately in a form to permit of it being bound with the editions of 1898.

SIR WEMYSS REID'S Life of Mr. Gladstone, with contributions by F. W. Hirst, Canon MacColl, Rev. W. Tuckwell, G. W. E. Russell, Henry W. Lucy, Arthur J. Butler, and Alfred F. Robbins, will be published by Messrs. Cassell & Co. on April 18.

MYTH, RITUAL, and RELIGION. By

ANDREW LANG. New Edition, Revised and Re-set for issue in the SILVER LIBRARY. 2 vols., crown 8vo, 7s.

* * The original edition of "Myth, Ritual, and Religion," published in 1887, has long been out of print. In revising the book Mr. LANG has brought it into line with the ideas expressed in the second part of his "Making of Religion" (1898), and has excised certain passages which, as the book first appeared, were inconsistent with its main thesis. In some cases the original passages are retained in notes, to show the nature of the development of the author's opinion.

ONE POOR SCRUPLE. A Seven Weeks'

Story. By Mrs. WILFRID WARD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"An exceptionally clever novel of English society life from a Roman Catholic standpoint. The book is eminently deserving of notice, and will probably be widely read. It certainly teems with life and interest, and on every page of it bears the stamp of the thorough knowledge of her subject that the authoress possesses."—Scotsman.

"We have to thank Mrs. Ward for a singularly interesting and stimulating novel, in which, though the Roman Catholic standpoint of the author is never concealed, anything savouring of aggressiveness or proselytism is scrupulously avoided."—Spectator.

Author of "Pages from the Day-Book of Bethis Hardsacre," &c.; and

DAILY NEWS.—"These delightful compositions form a qualification to the familiar statement that in England letter-writing is a lost art. They possess the charm of old masterpieces written for private perusal only; their spirit is urbane and their style as polished as it is unaffected."

LITERATURE.—"The charm of the book lies mainly in that slowly elaborated presentment of character in which no method can rival the epistolary..... Every page in the book is pervaded by a charm which one values in proportion to its increasing rarity—the charm of scholarship."

The Outlook.

"Should attract wide attention at a moment when the 'Ritualist Crisis,' as it is called, makes so many readers think seriously of the present position of Protestantism. THE MORMON PROPHET.By LILY DOUGALL, Author of "A Dozen Ways of Love," "Beggars All," &c.

"Not only a most instructive chapter in the history of religious enthusiasm, but a powerful and fascinating psychological study.....This remarkable book will add much to Miss Dougall's already high reputation."—The Bookman.

"This is the story of Joseph Smith and of a fair woman whom he coveted. It is also a remarkably romantic history of the beginnings of Mormonism, with its 'wrong and right and misery,' impartial to the last degree. There is stirring incident from the first chapter, and the tale becomes positively thrilling. Miss Dougall gives to her first historical novel the epigrammatic force that marked 'Beggars All' ten years ago, and each of its welcome successors."

"Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick gives us a delightful and piquant picture of German social life, the atmosphere of which she has caught and communicates with equal fidelity. In this, as in her other stories, there is a vein of humour, ironical but kindly; about all her characters there is a ring of real life; her dialogues are natural and crisp; and her story is the product of a cultured mind."—The Saturday Review.

THE PRODIGAL'S BROTHER.

By JOHN MACKIE,

Author of "They that Sit in Darkness," "Sinners Twain," "The Devil's Playground," &c.

The plot of "The Prodigal's Brother" is largely founded upon a hitherto unrecorded and exciting incident in the Riel Rebellion. Mr. Mackie, in addition to having figured in turn as stock rider, explorer, and pioneer, was for some time in charge of a detachment of the North-West Mounted Police, and has seen no little active service amid the wild country, which is the scene of this, his latest novel.

The Bookman.—"An enthralling romance of adventure and intrigue. The dominant heroine... is almost as clever, as unscrupulous, and as fascinating as Dumas' famous creation.....The story... is told with infinite delicacy and charm; it stands out a clear and lovely idyll against the tangled background of plot and counter plot.....The translator has done his work so well, and with such evident sympathy with his original, that we are almost inclined to forget that it is a translation at all."

CONCERNINGISABEL CARNABY.By ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.

"An excellent novel, clever and witty enough to be very amusing, and serious enough to provide much food for thought. Isabel Carnaby is wholly delightful, her very weakness makes her charm. She is so feminine, so capricious, and so noble.....The dialogue is often excellent, and shows no small wit. Very funny are the sayings of Martha, the Methodist serving-maid, and very brilliant those of Isabel, whilst Paul's have the weight of sound reasoning and much force."—Daily Telegraph.

THE felicitations of all who admire brave thinking and fine writing are with Dr. Martineau, who to-day enters his ninety-fifth year. Dr. Martineau, as has been frequently remarked of late, was a schoolfellow of George Borrow.

THE list of books among the wedding presents to the Earl and Countess of Crewe is interesting:

- | | |
|------------------------------------|---|
| Mr. Asquith | Gulliver's Travels (1st edition). |
| Mr. Balfour | { Manuscript book in white vellum and gold. |
| Lord Cairns | |
| Lord Reay | Rabelais (illustrated). |
| Lady Ripon | A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan. |
| Bishop of Winchester . | Mary Stuart. |
| Bishop of Bath and Wells | Pilgrim's Progress. |
| Mr. William Watson . | { Imitation of Christ. |
| Sir Algernon West . . | |
| Mrs. Drew | His own poems. |
| Miss Helen Gladstone | Mr. Watson's Poems. |
| Mr. Herbert Gladstone | Sesame and Lilies. |
| Mrs. Gladstone . . . | Browning. |
| Sir Wemyss Reid . . | Keats. |
| Mr. Haldane | Mr. Gladstone's Gleanings. |
| Miss Braddon | Jane Austen's Novels. |
| | Works of Sainte-Beuve. |
| | Her own works. |

THE Prince of Wales's gift to the Earl of Crewe was an edition of Joachim du Bellay. English readers do not know this charming poet as they ought—for his old French is a little difficult—but Mr. Lang has translated some of his work with sympathy and the most dexterous skill, notably "Vanneurs." How does it go?

Lily and violet
I give, and blossoms wet,
Roses and dew;
This branch of blushing roses,
Whose fresh bud encloses
Wind-flowers too.
Ah, winnow with sweet breath,
Winnow the holt and heath,
Round this retreat;
Where all the golden morn
We fan the gold o' the corn,
In the sun's heat.

It was said of Du Bellay that he was born in 1525 as a compensation from Nature to France for the loss of Pavia—one of the prettiest compliments that exists.

THE facsimile edition of the Greek and Latin MS. of the Four Gospels and Acts of the Apostles—the Codex Bezae

Cantabrigiensis—is now obtainable in two noble volumes. Students who have hitherto had to journey to Cambridge to consult this priceless possession will be able to examine it under more favourable conditions; while the preservation of the text by facsimile makes it possible to view the decay of the original with more equanimity. The facsimile was made by M. Dujardin, of Paris, by the process known as héliogravure, and it has been completely successful. Mr. Scrivener, in 1864, wrote of Beza's gift to the University; that although it might seem less ancient than three or four other extant copies of the New Testament, it is in respect to modifications of the inspired text which it exhibits more interesting and remarkable than any other document of its class.

THE most cosmopolitan hymn-book yet projected is The Sacred Songs of the World which Mr. Henry C. Leonard is editing and which Mr. Elliot Stock will publish. The collection will represent many languages and religions; it will give examples from the best sacred poets of forty-eight European peoples, forty-nine Asiatic, twelve African, thirteen American, and eight Oceanic.

APPROPOS of anthologies, a correspondent has asked us to suggest a list of such works which would comprise the best and largest body of English verse. His idea is to bind them uniformly, and he hints at a wedding present. How would these do?—

- The Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics.*
Mr. William Watson's Lyric Love.
Mr. Quiller-Couch's Golden Pomp.
Mr. Beeching's A Paradise of English Poetry.
Mr. Henley's English Lyrics.
Mr. Locker-Lampson's Lyra Elegantiarum.
Mrs. Meynell's Flower of the Mind.
Palgrave's Treasury of Sacred Song.
Lord Selborne's Book of Praise.

WITH reference to our paragraph in last week's issue concerning "Zangwillitis," a correspondent writes: "Mr. Zangwill has touched hearts and won renown. I would like to tell how I recently stood at a dying bed, and heard the passing soul quote, spasmodically, from that poignant sketch 'The Sabbath-breaker.' I heard this one (my dearest of all), who was looking Death in the eyes, say: 'I am coming, my lamb. The little mother is on the way. And again, and yet again: 'The little mother is on the way, the little mother is on the way.' Surely no writer can ask more than the power to wing his words so that they are remembered, and bring comfort, on the threshold of death."

FULL particulars have now been published of the Daily Telegraph's scheme for supplying its readers with fiction. The "Hundred Best Novels" by the "World's Greatest Writers of Fiction" is an imposing style; but on examining the list we find that the Telegraph is merely still incorrigible in its diction: the authors are not really the Greatest Writers at all, nor the novels the Best. Sir Edwin Arnold, Mr. Traill, and Mr. W. L. Courtney have, we are told, assisted the editor with their advice. To which of these gentlemen, we wonder, belongs the credit of considering The Wide, Wide World one of the hundred best novels, and Elizabeth Wetherell one of the world's greatest writers of fiction? Again, Gabriel Conroy is almost the least satisfactory of Bret Harte's works; Amelie Rives is hardly a classic yet; and Valentine Vox might well be spared.

"We take joy, too," says the Telegraph, "in knowing that so large and rich a selection can be made of acknowledged masterpieces, from English literature mainly, and none of them be anything except pure, honest, and of good report." From which we gather that the edition of Tristram Shandy will be expurgated.

MEANWHILE the Daily News has also its little publishing scheme. True to its old-fashioned traditions, the Daily News pins its faith to the middle of the century and offers its readers only the works of Dickens. The set consists of nineteen volumes, completed by Forster's Life and the Dickens' Dictionary, a key to the works which is by no means so exhaustive as the Daily News seems to think. It is peculiarly fitting that the series should come from the Daily News office, for Dickens was its first editor and Forster its second. The edition is illustrated.

ANOTHER proof of the theory expressed by a contributor elsewhere in this number, that to become a Dickens commentator is to woo inaccuracy, is found in the Daily News article on Pickwick, in which its new edition was introduced to the public. From one of the quotations therein given the reader is led to suppose that the catch phrase, "Let 'em all come," which is now only too evident in the London streets, originated with Mrs. Bardell. Thus:

"Oh! you kind, good, playful dear," said Mrs. Bardell; and without more ado she rose from her chair and flung her arms round Mr Pickwick's neck, with a cataract of tears and a chorus of sobs.

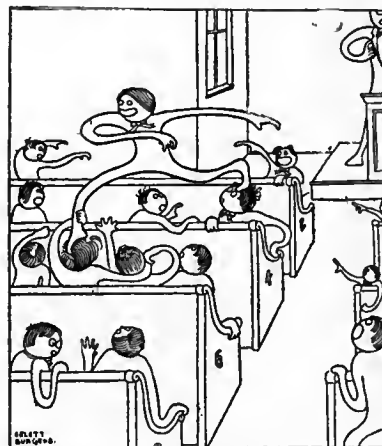

"Bless my soul," cried the astonished Mr. Pickwick; "Mrs. Bardell, my good woman—dear me, what a situation—pray consider—Mrs. Bardell—don't—if anybody should come——"

"Oh, let 'em all come!" exclaimed Mrs. Bardell frantically; "I'll never leave you—dear, kind, good soul"; and with these words Mrs. Bardell clung the tighter.

This is very pretty and curious. But what Mrs. Bardell really said was, "Oh, let them come!"

THE Purple Cow is not yet dead. Indeed, it seems probable that it never will be. Mr. Doxey, of San Francisco, the publisher of the Lark, has now compiled two little pamphlets from that periodical, The Lark Almanack for 1899 and The Purple Cow, which may be obtained in England from Messrs. Cazenove, of Henrietta-street; and

I love to go to Lectures
And make the Audience stare:
By walking round upon their heads,
And spoiling People's hair!

therein we find the old rhymes once more, and the old pictures. Two of these pictures we reproduce; and here are other tastes of Mr. Gelett Burgess's comic inventive powers:

The Window has Four Little Panes;
But one have I;
The Window-Panes are in its Sash,—
I wonder why!

and

The Sun is Low, to say the Least,
Although it is well-Red;
Yet, since it rises in the Yeast,
It should be better Bred.

and

My House is made of Graham Bread,
Except the ceiling's made of white;
Of Angel Cake I make my Bed;
I eat my Pillow every night.

Ah, yes, I wrote the "Purple Cow"—
I'm Sorry, now, I wrote it;
But I can tell you Anyhow
I'll Kill you if you Quote it!

To readers whose peace of mind is injured by these freaks of fancy we would point out that Mr. Gelett Burgess, their author, is now living in London.

A FIVEPENNY drop has suddenly occurred, and the new price for cheap fiction is a penny. There it is likely to stay: we can hardly expect it to go lower. Penny fiction is not new, of course, for works by the lady known as Annie S. Swan have been circulating in hundreds of thousands at that figure for some time, and Horner's Penny Stories are printed in millions, while Mr. Stead has been issuing penny abridgments of great novels for months past; but the authors offered by Messrs. Pearson are now approaching the penny public for the first time. These are: "Ouida," "John Oliver Hobbes," "Rita," Mrs. Hungerford, Mrs. Hodgson Burnett, Olive Schreiner, Mr. Grant Allen, Mr. Louis Becke, Mr. John Habberton, Mr. Fergus Hume, Mr. Clark Russell, and others. Meanwhile it may be remarked that we have received this week no fewer than twenty-six new novels, nineteen of which are published at six shillings.

MR. FISHER UNWIN's "Overseas Library" makes a beginning this week with Mr. Cunningham Graham's Ipané. We quote this passage from the preface:

Now, to my thinking, misapprehension still is rife as to the motives which cause men to write. Books have been written for many purposes—moral, religious, lewd, improving, ethical, and to make people stare; but many think, even to-day, when education, which, as we all know, intensifies artistic comprehension, spreading it even amongst the educated, is so diffused, that men write books to please a mysterious entity known as the public; that they regard this Mumbo-Jumbo as politicians do, or as the county councillor, who is uncertain even if he be a cuckold till he has duly put the matter to the democratic vote.

Nothing more false. For the most part all books are written from vanity, for hope of gain, either pecuniary or of some other nature, and now and then to please the writer, for it is known that some have gone to sea for pleasure, and sailors say that those who do so would go to hell for fun.

And so of books. Few men know why they write, and most men are ashamed of all they do when once it stares them in the face in moulded type.

FROM the preface to the late J. F. Nisbet's Human Machine (Grant Richards):

As for materialism, it is a theory which seems to me to fit in better with the known facts than any other, and to leave the majesty of God just where it was before. To the belittling of the Creator, indeed, I do not see that anything is more conducive than the current theology—Roman or Anglican. Matthew Arnold's conception of the Trinity as three big Lord Shaftesburys sitting up somewhere in the sky is approximately that of every little boy and girl brought up on orthodox principles. Sometimes this image is replaced by that of the Israelitish Jehovah—a tutelary divinity in the form of a man, and swayed by such human passions as love, anger, pride, hate, jealousy. In either case the proportions of the Creator are reduced to those of an Exeter Hall philanthropist. How much vaster and nobler is the materialistic conception of the Deity as an all-pervading force, impersonal in the human sense, but necessarily all-knowing because it is everywhere and in everything! How much higher than that of the anthropomorphic God! You may climb up to the top of Primrose-hill; you may shake your fist at the sky; you may take a Name in vain—and there is no response. Not the smallest—not even a flash of lightning! Because the unseen Power, whatever it may be, is not a "jealous God," animated by a paltry human resentment.

A WRITER in the new Paris Magazine discusses the translation of The Jungle Book—Le Livre de la Jungle—which has recently been published in France: "Although MM. Fabulet and d'Humières have accomplished their task admirably, they could not expect, nor could they be expected, to achieve the impossible. 'Je viens de manquer ma proie' is really inadequate as a rendering of the old wolf Akela's lament, 'Now I have missed my kill.' Mowgli, 'the man-cub,' is perforce transformed into 'le petit d'homme,' for there are no cubs in French, and the substantive 'petit' has to represent the young of the human and every other species. 'The camel doubled up camel-fashion, like a two-foot rule,' is rendered, 'le chameau se replia à la façon des chameaux, en équerre,' which entirely misses the Kipling imagery. The pack becomes 'le clan,' and when Shere Khan, the tiger, asks, 'Am I to stand nosing into your dog's den for my fair dues?' he is made to say, in French, 'Dois-je attendre le nez dans votre repaire de chiens, lorsqu'il s'agit de mon dû le plus strict?' This is a little more polite, perhaps, but it is not the Kipling manner. Indeed, Kipling à la Française not infrequently reminds one of the French customs notice, 'Messieurs les voyageurs sont priés d'assister à l'examen de leurs bagages,' as an equivalent for 'Passengers must look after their luggage.'

A CORRESPONDENT, "B. M.," writes: "Excuse my pointing out that the reviewer of D'Annunzio's Victim, in the current issue of the ACADEMY, is wrong when he alludes to D'Annunzio as 'a young man considerably under thirty.' He was born in 1863, so is 'considerably over thirty,' and I think you will agree that he looks it from the enclosed."

D'Annunzio

Mr. Henley, the editor of the series.

In a review of Holland's Suetonius, "Tudor Translations" series, in the ACADEMY last week, the dedication of the work to Mr. Cecil Rhodes was attributed to the editor of the work, Mr. Charles Whibley. This was wrong. The dedication was written by OTHER renderings of Maurice Maeterlinck's poem have been received from J. A. B., Edgbaston; C. S. O., Brighton; and R. H. S., Glasgow.

MR. W. B. YEATS is also among the dreamers. To the poem, "Tho Cap and Bells," in his new book, The Wind Among the Reeds (Mathews), he puts the following note:

I dreamed this story exactly as I have written it, and dreamed another long dream after it, trying to make out its meaning, and whether I was to write it in prose or verse. The first dream was more a vision than a dream, for it was beautiful and coherent, and gave me the sense of illumination and exaltation that one gets from visions, while the second dream was confused and meaningless. The poem has always meant a great deal to me, though, as is the way with symbolic poems, it has not always meant quite the same thing. Blake would have said "the authors are in eternity," and I am quite sure they can only be questioned in dreams.

THE first number of the Paidologist lies before us. The Paidologist, we ought perhaps to explain, is the organ of the British Child Study Association, which is an offshoot of a similar association in America. Prof. Stanley Hall, who is the leading inquirer among the Americans, contributes introductory words to bring the value of the pastime before English readers, and practical instructions are given by Prof. Earl Barnes. The game should, therefore, soon be well started. In the main the intentions are lacking nothing of seriousness, but in the "Editor's Bag" we find this: "A little boy, when being spoken to about God's care and love for us, said: 'Yes, God loves us: He will not give us the cane'; to which another child quickly replied: 'No; He can't reach us.'"

ANOTHER new periodical reaches us in Pensions and Progress, the organ of the Old Age Pension scheme. The little paper, which has for its motto "Humanity, Justice, Patriotism, and Progress," will be issued quarterly at a penny. The editor is Mr. C. H. Cook. We hope that it may produce the good at which it aims.

A GEOGRAPHICAL handbook in which each of the more important civilised countries is described by one of the leading geographers of that country, and other parts of the world are treated by experienced travellers who have an intimate knowledge of the regions with which they deal, should prove a distinct acquisition to geographical literature. Such a work, edited by Dr. H. R. Mill, will shortly be published by Messrs. George Newnes, Limited, under the title of The International Geography. No fewer than seventy distinguished geographers and explorers have contributed to the work, among them being Dr. Nansen, Sir W. Martin Conway, and Sir John Murray, who deal with the Polar regions; Sir G. S. Robertson, with Afghanistan; Sir William Macgregor, with British New Guinea; Sir H. H. Johnston, with British Central Africa; the Right Hon. J. Bryce, with Natal, the Orange Free State, and the South African Republic; and Mr. F. C. Selous, with Rhodesia.

SCOTTISH critics prefer Scottish writers. The readers of a certain Scotch weekly, on being asked to name the six most popular works of fiction by living authors, named Ian Maclaren's Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush, Mr. J. M. Barrie's The Little Minister and A Window in Thrums, Mr. Hall Caine's The Christian, Annie S. Swan's The Gates of Eden, and Mr. S. R. Crockett's The Lilac Sun Bonnet. Mr. Hall Caine must acquire a kilt to be at home in this company.

As some assistance to a better appreciation of the intellectual condition of the Samoans, we reproduce the first few lines of a letter written by the Samoan chief Tiu, Stevenson's friend, to Mr. Lloyd Osbourne, after the novelist's death. Tiu, it will be seen, although his usual costume is only a loin-cloth, can yet use the note-paper of the English housemaid, and assume our own forms of address. At one time Tiu was a Christian, but a difference with the missionaries prompted him to return to the faith of his fathers. The correspondent to whom we are indebted for the letter asks if any of our readers can translate Samoan. "They say," he adds, "you can get everything in London. Can you get this?" Perhaps some reader will reply. We hold the remainder of the letter.

A PLEASANT ambiguity is contained in the prospectus of a new novel which reaches us from one of the literary agencies. "The story," says this document, "concludes with the righting of a cruel wrong, the just destruction of its author, and the happiness of those who have temporarily suffered through the machinations of the wicked." We have not read the tale, and, therefore, cannot form any opinion; but the destruction of the author certainly seems an extreme measure.

THE following intimation reaches us from Toynbee Hall: "The students' gratitude to Dr. S. R. Gardiner has been given form in a silver bowl, which it is proposed to present to him on Saturday, April 22. The Bishop of London has promised to speak. Dr. Gardiner's pleasure will be to meet as many as possible of his old students. Will you, therefore, add to his pleasure, and make a point of coming at eight o'clock?" We have not the pleasure of being among Dr. Gardiner's students, nor is it possible for us to attend. But we hope the bowl is a nice one.

MR. SIDNEY COLVIN.

From the Copyright Series of Portraits of Contributors to the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

WE give this week a portrait of Mr. Sidney Colvin, whose services in arranging the present exhibition of Rembrandt's work in the White building of the British Museum can hardly be over-estimated by the art student. Mr. Colvin, who has been Keeper of the Prints since 1884, was born in 1845. He has two claims upon the recognition of readers: his writings on art and his friendship with R. L. Stevenson, on the authoritative life of whom he is now engaged. It is intended to bring out this work in two parts, one to consist entirely of letters, and the other of biography.

ONCE upon a time Mr. Anthony Hope began a series of articles called "The Fly on the Wheel" in a magazine. They came, however, to an untimely end, and he has since left journalism alone. But in one of the papers of the series the question (by a woman)—"Oh, Mr. Fly, how do you think of those lovely stories?" or (by a man) "I say, Fly, old chap, how the deuce do you turn out all that stuff of yours?" was answered thus in a page from the Fly's Journal:

Let us suppose that I am bidden to write a short story. I arrive at my working-den at 9.45 and read my letters. The rest of the day is much as follows:

10.0.—Put on writing-coat; find a hole in the elbow.

10.3.—Light pipe, and sit down in large armchair by fire.

10.15.—Who the deuce can write a story on a beastly day like this? (It was quite nice weather, really—that's the artistic temperament).

10.45.—I must think about that confounded story. Besides, I don't believe she meant anything after all.

11.15.—I wish the — these — people hadn't asked me to write for their — paper!

11.45.—Hullo! Will that do?

12.0.—Hang it, that's no use!

12.30.—I suppose if I happened to have a head instead of a turnip I could write that story.

12.40.—Yes! No! By Jove, yes! Where's that pen? Oh, where the —? All right, here it is! Now then! (Scribble.)

1.0.—Lunch! Good; I believe it's going!

1.30.—Now I'll just knock it off. (Scribble.)

2.15.—Well, I don't quite see my way to — Oh, yes I do! Good! That's not so bad.

3.0.—One, two, three—three hundred words a page. Well, I've put that in in good time, anyhow! Where's that pipe?

3.15.—I think I'll fetch 'em. Pitched in passion, by Jove!

3.40.—Oh, I say, look here! I've only got about 1,200 words and I want 2,000. What the deuce shall I do?

3.50.—I must pad it, you know. She mustn't take him yet, that's all.

4.0.—She can't take more than a page accepting the foo, though; it's absurd, you know.

- 4.15.—Oh, confound it !
 4.45.—Now let's see—two, four, six, seven. Good ! I'm in the straight now !
 5.0. — Thank Heaven, that's done ! Now I suppose I must read the thing over. I know it's awful rot. Well, that's their lookout, they've bought it.
 5.3. — It's not so bad, though, after all.
 5.11.—I rather like that. I don't know, but it seems rather original.
 5.15.—H'm ! I've read worse stories than this.
 5.20.—No, I'm hauged if I touch a word of it ! It's not half bad.
 5.25.—Pretty smart ending !
 5.30.—Well, if there are a dozen men in England who can write a better story than that, I should like to see 'em, that's all !
 5.35.—Puff, puff, puff, puff ! Well, I shan't touch a pen again to-day.

Bibliographical.

A MAMMOTH anthology of English verse : that, it would seem, is the latest benefaction Mr. Arber proposes to bestow upon the students of literature. Those students owe already a very considerable debt to the man who began, thirty years ago, that invaluable series of English Reprints on which so many intellects have been nourished ; whose Facsimile Texts, English Garner, and English Scholars' Library are scarcely less valuable in their way ; and who, only a year or two ago, gave us a useful collection of documents on The Pilgrim Fathers. We may be pretty sure that the text of the announced anthology will be impeccable, for Mr. Arber obviously has unlimited patience. But the production of an acceptable selection from the entire English corpus poetarum (down, I suppose, to the era of existing copyrights) presupposes not only editorial accuracy but critical capacity, and Mr. Arber's project seems to be so ambitious that he will, of course, not be surprised if his collection is closely and carefully scrutinised.

Rather late in the day will come Mr. Arthur Milman's promised biography of his father, the Dean. Dr. Milman died a little over thirty years ago. It is not often that a modern celebrity has to wait so long for a Life. Yet few deserve such a memorial more obviously than the author of Fazio and The Martyr of Antioch, the historian of the Jews and of Christianity. Fazio is not in the current repertory of the stage, but it was performed in London within the last decade or so. The History of the Jews was reprinted so recently as 1894, and there were new editions of the Early Christianity and the Later Christianity in 1883. The Dean's correspondence should be eminently interesting.

Mr. Arthur Humphreys must believe that Emerson still has a vogue in England, or he would not entertain the idea of bringing out yet another edition of the sage's essays. Of such editions there are several extant. In 1891 the essays were issued with the imprimatur of St. Lubbock. They had been published in two volumes in the previous year ; Henry Morley had edited them in 1886, which year also saw the reproduction of The Conduct of Life, and other Essays. There were editions in 1866, 1853, and 1848 leading back to that which Carlyle prefaced in 1841. I take no account of the fact that the essays have necessarily been included in all complete editions of Emerson's prose from 1883 downwards. However, the more the merrier. The essays cannot be too widely known, too sumptuously presented. As someone truly said, Emerson was not exactly a thinker, but he had detached thoughts which many have found quickening and fruitful. He does not supply a philosophy of life, but he helps us to construct one.

Nothing is more certain than that there are many things which, done for one generation, have to be done over again for the next. About half a century ago William Howitt published in two volumes his Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets ; but that is no reason why a literary lady of to-day should not produce (as, it seems, she proposes to produce) another book on the "homes and haunts" of celebrated people, to which she intends to give the name of Literary Hearthstones. How a hearthstone can be literary I know not ; but we must not cavil.

Lays of the True North, and other Canadian Poems—that, I note, is the name given to a forthcoming volume of verses. I think we may take for granted that the authoress has gone for the first half of the title to the lines by Tennyson in the epilogue to the Idylls of the King :

And that true North, whereof we lately heard
 A strain to shame us : "Keep you to yourselves ;
 So loyal is too costly."

The announcement of a new volume of verse from the pen of Mr. Washington Moon will surprise those who think of him (when they think of him) as only the intrepid exponent of The King's English and the no less vigorous critic of Revisers' English. Yet it is a fact that a volume of verse by Mr. Moon, called Elijah the Prophet, and Other Sacred Poems, has run into a fifth edition, which will be issued shortly ; and, moreover, is not Mr. Moon the author of a work of prose-fiction called (somewhat lengthily) With All My Worldly Goods I Thee Endow ?

The title of the latest novel issued by Messrs. Hurst & Blackett—The Faith that Kills—makes one think, of course, of W. G. Wills's story, The Love that Kills, as well as of the play so named (an adaptation of "L'Arlésienne") which was produced in London some years ago. Obviously, the phrase is one on which an endless series of variations could be played ; why not The Fear that Kills, The Joy that Kills, The Sorrow that Kills, and so forth ? Meanwhile, The Faith that Kills is, as a title, not bad, for it embodies a cynical paradox which should attract.

Talking of story-titles, I see it stated that Mr. Leonard Merrick will christen his next work of fiction either An Enemy of Society or Weapons of the World. I would suggest the adoption of the latter. The former has been used by Ibsen for a play ; and to come into apparent competition with the Norwegian dramatist would be, perhaps, a pity.

The publisher of No. 5, John Street has been advertising "The New Novel—The New Writer." I wonder how Mr. Whiteing, if he has seen the advertisement, felt when he found himself described as "new" ? The truth is, the best of us are "new" to the new generation.

Intellectual Intrepidity.

Aspects of Religious and Scientific Thought. By R. H. Hutton. (Macmillan. 5s.)

As this volume is edited by Miss Roscoe, Mr. Hutton's niece, we may suppose that the fifty-four essays it contains represent the flower of that sincere, inquiring mind on certain contemporaneous religious and scientific questions. It is a monument of intellectual intrepidity. The essays all fall within the compass of half-a-dozen pages: they deal with every ethico-religious and scientific question that stirred the intellects of Hutton's day, and their full assurance of omniscience is that of a schoolmaster adjudicating upon the examination papers of his form. No man could attempt such a task, and continue it for a lifetime, with never a shade of doubt in his own infallibility, were it not for the strong support of unquestioning followers. That support, it is hardly necessary to say, Mr. Hutton had. He was proprietor and editor of the Spectator, one of the few papers whose policy has been unswerving and unalterable. Mr. Hutton was the Spectator, it expressed his views; the reins never fell from his hands till death called him; he gathered about him men who thought as he thought, felt as he felt, wrote as he wrote; and, as the years passed, a large body of readers, faithfulest of flocks, grew up around his personality, who accepted the views of the Spectator as they accepted the routine of the festivals of the Church, and who would have missed the one as much as the other. The flock were gentle souls, fond of flowers and birds; more particular about the appointments of their dinner tables than the food the dishes contained; devoted to the clergy; admirers of Mr. Leader, R.A.; middle-aged, and declining gracefully to a future existence for which they were fully prepared. They looked askance, yet with an awful interest, at a Huxley travelling rough-shod over their dearest orthodoxies; they read of the intellectual subtleties of a Matthew Arnold with tremors and pangs of sorrow (was he not the poet of "Geist's Grave"?) but to stand up in the arena of their own drawing-rooms and fight these giants with their own little bows and arrows, oh, that was impossible! But there was no occasion for it. The Invisible David of the Spectator would overthrow the mighty, would make it all clear for them at the week-end in that article in smaller type that followed at the end of the leaders. He would let fly his arrows at the joints in the giant's armour; he would come forth from the fight bearing his sheaves with him. Their little tremors of doubt would cease, their pinions would drop comfortably to the side again.

A writer must have a rare moral and intellectual sincerity to inspire such confidence. That was Mr. Hutton's indubitable gift. We may agree with him or not; but of the beauty and nobility of his nature there cannot be two opinions: he was the least material of men. If, like Browning, he did not "greet the Unseen with a cheer," he lived in the secret knowledge that the things which are not seen are eternal. He sat at his desk doing good, in accord with his own definition of good. The rage of parties, the rush of movements, the clash of creeds, never embroiled him. He surveyed such things temperately, defined (as he thought) their tendency, explained their true meaning, and, whenever he thought it worth while, exclaimed: "Observe this Giant, although he knows it not, he is with us, and where he is not with us he is wrong!"

Mr. Hutton's favourite method, excellent for his purpose, was to quote from the writings of the personality under review a passage that could be termed "A Confession," and then to proceed to interpret and mould the confession into harmony—indeed, often into identity—with his own philosophy of belief. It is not our business here to mould or to incline any man's thought into divergent channels; but it may be as well to quote Mr. Hutton's own confession in order to understand the standpoint from which he criticised the intellectual ethics of his day. The passage occurs in the article called "Matthew Arnold's New Christian Catechism":

If the Bible is not a revelation of the character of God, it is nothing in the world but a book the whole source of whose inspiration is illusion. And if it be, as I hold, the true revelation of the character of God, then the supernatural is real . . . Christ revealed God; and without God, his teaching would be baseless. Physical science reveals only law; and if there be anything beyond law, its teaching is inadequate.

There is something Titanesque in the way Mr. Hutton set himself each week to appreciate, to explain, to flout, or to annex to his own service the ripe thought of his day. None escaped him. Maurice, Clifford, Kingsley, Newman, Huxley, Tyndall, Jowett, Browning, Tennyson, Dr. Martineau, Mill, Matthew Arnold—he docketed them all. And having thus surveyed modern thought, having catalogued and classified the intellectual endeavour of his contemporaries, did this spiritual adjuster find himself at the end of his resources? Oh, no! Almost the last of Mr. Hutton's essays, that dated 1897, bears the title "The Limits of Divine Power."

The essayist had his favourites. Mr. John Morley receives the most punctilious salute as the foeman worthiest of his steel. The article is apropos a new chapter of the essay on "Compromise."

I am not ashamed [says Mr. Hutton] to feel far more sympathy with the nobler aspects of unbelief, than with the ignobler and shiftier aspects of so-called faith. A diplomatic Churchman, who has borrowed hardly anything from the Christian spirit except St. Paul's boast that he had been all things to all men, is a phenomenon which seems to me far more threatening to the Christian faith of our own day than the sturdy and, so far at least as this essay goes, the charitable "I believe not" of such men as Mr. John Morley.

Mr. Hutton does not attempt to gather Mr. Morley into his net as he gathers Huxley; Mr. Morley is reprimanded and passed by with a sigh. His humanitarian religion will not do. It is an intellectual juggle, not a philosophical reconciliation; "indeed, I hardly expected such mere wistfulness of sentiment, such impracticable though kindly endeavour, from so robust a thinker." From Mrs. Besant, we gather, Mr. Hutton expected nothing. He ignores her, dismissing her as a writer who must evidently be allowed to exhaust herself in a series of spasmodic feats of intellectual acrobaticism before she has any chance of gaining a position of calm and peaceful trust.

Let us glance briefly at three of the essays in this volume—those on Huxley, Mill, and Browning—which exemplify Mr. Hutton's method of showing that the views of other people, although they knew it not, were fundamentally in harmony with the views held by himself and his readers. The article on Huxley is called "The Great Agnostic," and was written in the week following the cessation of that "eager and opulent life." After a just and sympathetic panegyric, Mr. Hutton proceeds to quote the famous passage wherein Huxley likens human life to a game of chess between men and a hidden player:

We know that his [the hidden player's] play is always fair, just, and patient. But also we know, to our cost, that he never overlooks a mistake, or makes the smallest allowance for ignorance. . . . My metaphor will remind some of you of the famous picture in which Retzsch has depicted Satan playing at chess with man for his soul. Substitute for the mocking fiend in that picture a calm, strong angel playing for love, as we say, and would rather lose than win—and I should accept it as an image of human life. Well, what I mean by education is learning the rules of this mighty game.

Most people, we imagine, whether they are with Huxley in his agnosticism or against him, would allow that this fine passage is quite in accordance with the agnostic position. Huxley's own experience, his knowledge of life, surely entitled him to say that the hidden antagonist is "always fair, just, and patient." Neither is it inconsistent with Huxley's agnosticism to depict the unseen antagonist as "a calm, strong angel playing for love," seeing that the imagery is adapted from Retzsch's picture, and Huxley expressly states that with the substitution of the angel for the fiend he would accept it as an image of human life. But Mr. Hutton does not see it in that light. The "great agnostic" must be caught and gently branded. Says Mr. Hutton:

Nothing seems to me clearer than that Prof. Huxley borrowed, from a religion which he thought wholly unproved, his description of the unseen player in this great game of life. . . . In my belief he had a half-unconscious craving, to which he thought it wrong to give way, for that passionate faith which he said that he desired to undermine in all cases in which there was, in his opinion, no possibility of what he termed unification.

Huxley's reply to this would have been pungent reading.

Browning, to most of us, is just Browning, observer and fighter, student of men and women, explorer of the human heart, profoundly interested in the tortuous workings of the human mind, and the myriad ways in which it tries to express its conviction of the moral law, and its realisation of God. Browning might have said: "Such is life as I see it; or, rather, as these men and women whom I have imagined see it." To create a theological Browning from his works is a task his readers could have well spared. It is almost naughty. A theological Browning! The morning star in a cope and mitre! Need we say Mr. Hutton attempted it? "He was not an Athanasian," says Mr. Hutton. No, neither was he an Alsatian. "Perhaps," continues Mr. Hutton, he did not hold theologically the whole [the italics are ours] of the Nicene Creed. But he held to the Incarnation in a sense much more eager and much more progressive and much more constant than he held to any of the doubts and hesitations which the opponents of that doctrine had suggested to him. He believed, from his heart, that Christ revealed God, and was personally the divine Son of God, in a sense a great deal deeper and a great deal more vivid and personal than most orthodox Christians.

Why, as well might one argue that Browning was a Theosophist from the lines in "Evelyn Hope":

Delayed it may be for more lives yet,
Through worlds I shall traverse, not a few:
Much is to learn, much to forget,
Ere the time be come for taking you.

In the essay on John Stuart Mill we find the same partiality of interpretation; sympathetic and temperate, but none the less partial for that. This, according to Mr. Hutton, is the kind of influence that Mill must exercise on the development of English thought:

He will have convinced many materialists that, though there can be no omnipotent God of perfect holiness, there may be a very powerful, invisible Being who is helping us to struggle against impossible conditions, not much more or not much less mighty than Himself. And he will have induced certain Rationalists who smile at revelation to believe that it becomes a sceptic to reserve the possibility, at least, that Christ actually was exactly what in the first three Gospels He declares Himself to be.

If Mr. Hutton had private doubts, he does not allow them to appear in his writings. As he blandly strove to insist that all the best thought of his day was really in harmony with the Huttonian analysis of the eternal verities, so in poetry the best was ever what he chose to call the best. In one short article on "The Modern Poetry of Doubt," he gives four pontifical expressions of opinion, the wisdom of which is, to say the least, very arguable:

There is no lyric in all his [Tennyson's] volumes quite equal to that which tells how

. . . the stately ships go on
To their haven under the hill.

The English language does not contain lines of despair at once so calm and so poignant as those with which he [Shelley] closed the unequal but marvellous poem of "Alastor":

It is a woe too "deep for tears" when all
Is reft at once, when some surpassing spirit,
Whose light adorned the world around it, leaves
Those who remain behind not sobs or groans,
The passionate tumult of a clinging hope,
But pale despair and cold tranquillity,
Nature's vast frame, the web of human things,
Birth and the grave, that are not what they were.

When will any chord be struck of a despair deeper than this?—

When the lamp is shattered,
The light in the dust lies dead;
When the cloud is scattered,
The rainbow's glory is shed.

There is nothing in our modern poetry more touching in its quiet sadness than this: [Then follow Arnold's lines beginning—

While we believed, on earth He went,
And open stood His grave,
Men called from chamber, church, and tent,
And Christ was by to save.]

These dogmatic utterances in the domain of poetry are typical of Mr. Hutton's habit of thought—a habit that grew upon him as the years sped, to find him seated more firmly, and still more firmly, in the editorial chair, his congregation growing in numbers, and in affection and reverence for their self-appointed pastor. No doubt if he captured the younger minds—for youth is curious and implacable; but those who had grown up in the spiritual effulgence that shone from that sincere, dogged mind, that cut itself loose from tradition only to cling the more closely to it, never forsook him. His life was indeed one to be envied. He was the friend, the consoler, of a little nation of lovable and orthodox English men and women, who wanted nothing better than to be made more and more content with their folded pinions and the grassy track that led down, undulating a little here and there, to the promised end. It was a beautiful life, and the example remains; but that is all. The essays are interesting intellectual exercises, but they will not live. For such high honour the vision must be more direct, more personal, less pedagogic, less hidebound by the past. For such high honour the inspiration must come from the source, not from the mouth of the river.

Words, Words.

A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles. Edited by Dr. James A. H. Murray. Vol. IV.: Germano—Glass-Cloth. Vol. V.: Hod—Horizontal. (Clarendon Press. 2s. 6d. each)

THE two "parts" of Dr. Murray's dictionary which lie before us are like unto the others we have received. They amaze by their fulness, their penetration, and especially by their enormous trawl-catches of quotations. Dr. Murray's industry is best illustrated by comparing his Dictionary, section for section, with the dictionary which has hitherto borne the palm for comprehensiveness. Thus in the Germano—Glass-Cloth section the following table can be made:

	Century Dic.	New English Dic.
Words recorded: Germano—Glass-Cloth	954	2053
Words illustrated by quotations	409	1638
Illustrative Quotations	1108	8488

Similar figures might be given for the Hod—Horizontal, or any other, published section of Dr. Murray's work. But there is no need to insist on the superior size of the Great Pyramid.

We handed these two sections to a practical journalist; and we asked him to glance through the pages and jot down his impressions of the usefulness, to himself, of such words as may be uncommon, or curious, or more or less obsolete. He has done so, and this is what he writes:

"Germicidal" is the first word to attract me, for it is becoming clear that germicidal mania will soon have to be recognised as a morbid activity of these times. "Germinate" is a necessary, frequent word, but I do not propose to adopt Mr. Hall Caine's use of it. He is quoted from the Times: "A crowd of people gathered in the street and germinated alarming rumours." Correct, and even expressive, as this may be, it brings a smile. It seems to imply that the crowd knew what it was doing, and was set on the business. I like Jeremy Taylor in his sentence (worth quoting just now):

The Church was then a garden of the fairest flowers, it did daily germinate with blessings from Heaven, and Saints sprung up.

Here the "invaluable capital" (see Mr. Miall's excellent letter in last week's ACADEMY) can hardly be said to throw dust in the eyes. I should think that in these days of humanity and Old-Ago Pensions the word "gerocomy," meaning the science of the treatment of the aged, stands an imminent chance of being aired. "Gerrymander" is a word that I shall probably never use; but its origin, given by Dr. Murray, interests me:

1881 Mem. Hist. Boston III. 212 In 1812, while Elbridge Gerry was Governor of Massachusetts, the Democratic Legislature, in order to secure an increased representation of their party in the State Senate, districted the State in such a way that the shapes of the towns forming such a district in Essex county brought out a territory of regular outline. This was indicated on a map which Russell, the editor of the Continent, hung in his office. Stuart, the painter, observing it, added a head, wings, and claws, and exclaimed, 'That will do for a salamander.' 'Gerry-mander!' said Russell, and the word became a proverb.

I see that a Quarterly Reviewer is alone in spelling the word with a j—but, then, he is a Quarterly Reviewer. There is an interesting account of the old word "gests," in all its meanings. It was used for "deeds, exploits" in 1876 by Messrs. Besant and Rice in the Golden Butterfly: "Her bosom heaved when she heard of heroic gest." Perhaps she was trying to remember what the word signified. "Gesticulant" has a shade of meaning that would recommend it above "gesticulating" now and then. For example, Mr. Blackmore, in Springhaven:

The figure of the ungainly foe . . . huge against the waves like Cyclops, and, like him, gesticulant.

Now, had Mr. Blackmore written "like him, gesticulating," the image would have been ludicrous.

"Gesture," as a verb, is a word to keep in mind. It can do immense amount of work, thus (in the Pall Mall Gazette): "He . . . gestured his intention of throwing the baby to the ground if anybody attempted to approach him." But I think there is something forced in this use of it by Mr. Howells: "His father made an offer to rise. 'Don't go,' said Lapham, 'gesturing him down again.'" There is too much literary gesture here. "Get" is a little word, but it breedeth twenty-one columns of definitions and quotations in the Dictionary. It is a word of all work, so that you cannot expect it to be beautiful; but its more inelegant uses ought to be discouraged. "The book is prettily got up" is a frequent sentence: the book may be, but the sentence is not. There are many other uses of "get" and "got" which are too colloquial for a careful pen; the subject is tedious. Let me, however, share with the reader one quotation; it shines out of the page in biographical radiance:

Mr. Justice Grantham succeeded in getting the animal under control.

That is all. It will go down the ages conveying this glad upshot. The reports will gather dust and be neglected; judges will come and go, and the law become a yet more "ungodly jumble"; but there, safe in the great Dictionary, will stand the pleasing record: "Mr. Justice Grantham succeeded in getting the animal under control." Clearly it was a struggle, but—never shall it be doubtful that the amiable judge succeeded.

"Gibbeted" is an instance of a word surviving its unlamented parent. In 1886, according to one writer, it was still possible to be "gibbeted in the Times." An ugly word—let it go. "Giff-gaff," meaning mutual help, give and take, is not marked as obsolete. "The giff-gaff principle of making friends" is from the Daily News of March 22, 1892; the word seems crisp and useful. The giff-gaff system of reviewing books has been saddled with a far less expressive name. But giff-gaff also means interchange of remarks, promiscuous talk; and I can imagine it to be useful in this sense too; Mr. Crockett has it in his Lilac Sunbonnet: "the shrill giff-gaff of their colloquy." That is good. "Gig" has one or two obsolete and rare meanings of interest. It is obsolete in its meaning of a flighty girl, though a writer so comparatively modern as Mme. D'Arblay wrote in her diary: "Charlotte L.—called, and the little gig told all the quarrels."

In the sense of an oddity or fool the word probably survives locally. Whyte-Melville makes someone say in Kate Coventry: "Such a set of 'gigs,' my dear, I never saw in my life. . . . not a good-looking man amongst them." Yet note that the word is put into quotation marks. "In high gig" meant in high spirits. "Gig" had the third meaning of fun, glee. Sir Walter Besant locates the phrase in the thirties of this century in his Fifty Years Ago: "A laughter-loving lass of eighteen who dearly loved a bit of gig." No connexion with "giggle" is suggested. By the way, I see that Mr. Leslie Stephen has had the temerity to write of the House of Commons "giggling over some delicious story of bribery and corruption." Although "gig," a flighty girl, is obsolete, "giglet," meaning the same thing, is apparently not so. A writer in Chambers's Journal uses it with effect in the sentence: "Why should female clerks in the postal service consist of pert giglets hardly out of their teens?" "Giglet fairs" (for hiring female farm-servants) are still held in the West of England. From "gig" we may pass to "girl," and find that "girlery" stands good as an English word. Lamb used it in a letter to Wordsworth in the sense of girls collectively; and it is to be found in the Noctes Ambrosianæ. Probably Christopher North re-invented it. "Girn," to show the teeth in rage or pain, is a strong word. "The mastiff girns" is from Browning; and we must all have seen it in The Water Babies: "how she [the otter] did grin and girn when she saw Tom." I pass on, skipping twenty-eight columns under "Give," and end my inspection of the "G" words with "gladful." The only writer quoted as using it since Spenser is Mr. William Watson: "Then came the gladful morn."

Between Hod and Horizontal I find fewer interesting words. "Hoddynood" and "hoddypeak" and "hoddypoll," each meaning a simpleton, are obsolete, though simpletons survive. "Hodiernal" is a word above and beyond me. Someone is quoted as writing: "The commonest events of hodiernal life." Hoity-toity! By the way, you may make hoity-toity into a noun. Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton in the Athenæum: "The talk gets naturally upon 'lords' in general, gentility, nonsense, and 'hoity-toityism' as the canker at the heart of modern civilisation." A "holimonth" is a month's holiday—but it is an impossible word. "Holus-bolus," all at once, all at a gulp, was used by Mr. Morley a few years ago. To modern minds "honey-dew" is a brand of tobacco and little else, but to our forefathers it was the sweet sticky substance found on the leaves and stems of trees, and was associated in their minds with manna. Pliny thought that honey-dew was "either the sweat of the heaven, or the slaver or spittle of the stars, or the moisture of the air purging itself." From this to Kingsley in Two Years Ago is a transition: "I say, how do you sell honeydew?" "Honeymoon" may mean, by transference, "the first warmth of newly established friendly relations." "Spain in the honey-moon of her new servitude" is from Burke, and 'twill serve now. "The brief honeymoon of the new king and his parliament," writes Mr. Goldwin Smith. "Honorificabilitudinitary" is a grandiose extension of honorificabilitudo—honourableness. It is marked as obsolete. So it is in a sense; but its existence is in no danger. So long as the "Bits" order of journalism survives, and so long as the Burslem Intelligencer or Okehampton Star have corners to fill, there will appear this sentence: "The longest word in the English language is honorificabilitudinitary." "Hoodpick" is obsolete; it meant a miser in the seventeenth century. "Hooky-crooky" is scarce and American, but should be useful to describe underhand methods. "Hope-lost" is also obsolete, and is surely worth reviving in its meaning of a despairing man, one who has lost hope. Wrote someone in 1648: "Like a Company of poor Hope-losts they look up to that place of Honour, where erst they sat." Many a good word does the same.

A Poet of Content.

The Shorter Poems of Robert Bridges. (Bell & Sons. 1s. net.)

MR. ROBERT BRIDGES for a shilling! These are democratic times indeed. It is true that the shilling is a shilling net, and true democracy demands the remission of threepence, but the concession is not the less for it, and we thank Messrs. Bell cordially for this pocketable and distinguished little book. The choice is a good one too, for if Mr. Bridges is ever to win his way to what is called popularity it will be with his Shorter Poems, rather than with the longer poems or plays. For a poet's plays the general reader—that not altogether unreasonable and very honest tyrant—cares nothing; nor is he over eager to peruse any form of poetry that requires a long sitting and close attention; but lyrics he loves, especially lyrics of the open air and fair ladies.

Yet whether or not he will love Mr. Bridges's lyrics is another matter. Mr. Bridges has certain qualities not quite to the taste of the general reader: he is austere classical, precise, reticent. He refrains from fervid autobiography. He holds some things too sacred for print. His first concern as a poet is to please his own mind, and as his own mind is cloistral and super-refined, and as the general reader's mind is not, there may be difficulties. And yet, none the less, there are many moments when the poet and the non-poet are at one: in his love of river and hill, of bird and flower, of September gardens and winter sunshine, of sea and cloud, Mr. Bridges but expresses—with, of course, much of beauty added—the sentiments of most of his thinking countrymen. This little book is the discreet and exquisite expression of a rapturous love of nature and the best things of life.

None the less, we fancy that Mr. Bridges will remain always a poet's poet. His ear is too delicate, his experiments in metre are too nice. The ordinary reader is so often baulked in the pleasant occupation of keeping time to the syllables with finger or foot. It is the poets who go tip-tippety that find their way to the large circulations; Mr. Bridges, we can believe, is peculiarly disappointing at times, for he chooses the tip-tippetists' subjects, and brings to them an austerity usually associated with the poetry rather of the soul than of nature.

But these are matters about which enough has been said. Let us, rather, refresh our memory of Mr. Bridges's beautiful art. Here, for example, is that clean and cheery cloud poem from Book I., one of the few—too few—cloud poems that exist:

Who has not walked upon the shore,
And who does not the morning know,
The day the angry gale is o'er,
The hour the wind has ceased to blow?

The horses of the strong south-west
Are pastured round his tropic tent,
Careless how long the ocean's breast
Sob on and sigh for passion spent.

The frightened birds that fled inland
To house in rock and tower and tree,
Are gathering on the peaceful strand,
To tempt again the sunny sea;

Whereon the timid ships steal out
And laugh to find their foe asleep,
That lately scattered them about,
And drave them to the fold like sheep.

The snow-white clouds he northward chased
Break into phalanx, line, and band:
All one way to the south they haste,
The south, their pleasant fatherland.

From distant hills their shadows creep,
Arrive in turn and mount the lea,
And flit across the downs, and leap
Sheer off the cliff upon the sea;

And sail and sail far out of sight.
But still I watch their fleecy trains,
That piling all the south with light,
Dapple in France the fertile plains.

The stanzas illustrate Mr. Bridges's pictorial power. Indeed, these Shorter Poems are a veritable little landscape exhibition: there is a picture in every line. Look, for instance, at this nocturne:

The clouds have left the sky,
The wind hath left the sea,
The half-moon up on high
Shrinketh her face of three.

She lightens on the comb
Of leaden waves, that roar
And thrust their hurried foam
Up on the dusky shore.

Behind the western bars
The shrouded day retreats,
And unperceived the stars
Steal to their sovran seats.

And whiter grows the foam,
The small moon lightens more;
And as I turn me home,
My shadow walks before.

Is it not clear and distinct? More timely is this lyric of the spring:

Spring goeth all in white,
Crowned with milk-white may;
In fleecy flocks of light
O'er heaven the white clouds stray;

White butterflies in the air;
White daisies prank the ground;
The cherry and hoary pear
Scatter their snow around.

That is Mr. Bridges's simplest way. In his more luscious manner is "Nightingales," a poem in which some of the melancholy of the bird's song, some of the beauty of the May night, seems to linger:

NIGHTINGALES.

Beautiful must be the mountains whence ye come,
And bright in the fruitful valleys the streams wherefrom
Ye learn your song.

Where are those starry woods? O might I wander there,
Among the flowers, which in that heavenly air
Bloom the year long!

Nay, barren are those mountains and spent the streams;
Our song is the voice of desire, that haunts our dreams—
A thrice of the heart,

Whose pining visions dim, forbidden hopes profound,
No dying cadence nor long sigh can sound,
For all our art.

Alone, aloud in the raptured ear of men
We pour our dark, nocturnal secret; and then,
As night is withdrawn

From these sweet-springing meads and bursting boughs of May,
Dream, while the innumerable choir of day
Welcome the dawn.

But for richest lusciousness, perhaps, the experiment in what has been called "honeycomb verse"—"The Garden in September"—is the best. The subject, of course, is luscious in itself; the very title is almost a poem. Mr. Bridges begins:

Now thin mists temper the slow ripening beams
Of the September sun: his golden gleams
On gaudy flowers shiue, that prank the rows
Of high-grown hollyhocks, and all tall shows
That Autumn flaunteth in his bushy bowers;
Where tomtits hanging from the drooping heads
Of giant sunflowers, peek the nutty seeds;
And in the feathery aster bees on wing
Seize and set free the honied flowers,
Till thousand stars leap with their visiting:

While ever across the path mazily flit,
Unpiloted in the sun,
The dreamy butterflies
With dazzling colours powdered and soft glooms,
White, black and crimson stripes, and peacock eyes,
Or on chance flowers sit,
With idle effort plundering one by one
The nectaries of deepest throated blooms.

Mr. Bridges is, indeed, a poet to envy. To have such a garden, to be so constantly alive to beautiful things, is truly desirable. And he caps all by this confession:

The idle life I lead
Is like a pleasant sleep,
Wherein I rest and heed
The dreams that by me sweep.

And still of all my dreams
In turn so swiftly past,
Each in its fancy seems
A nobler than the last.

And every eve I say,
Noting my step in bliss,
That I have known no day
In all my life like this.

Few voices in these degenerate, discontented days utter such satisfaction as this. Rather is complaint the fashion. We honour the poet for his content.

By these extracts we have done Mr. Bridges less than justice; but then we have quoted to serve not his but our own ends. They may, however, we trust, send many persons to the book.

The Groundwork of Science.

The Groundwork of Science: a Study in Epistemology. By St. George Mivart. (John Murray.)

MEN of science who are something more than narrow specialists seldom fail to recognise that the phenomena they study are ultimately inexplicable without recourse to fundamental assumptions of metaphysics. The more adequately they recognise this fact, the more clearly will they endeavour to draw the line between the phenomena of science which lie on its hither side and the noumenal existence which lies beyond. And it is the cardinal duty of anyone who attempts to deal with the inasensible web of metaphysical causation which forms the groundwork of science to distinguish with the utmost clearness between the realities of experience and the underlying realities in terms of which experience may itself be explained. It is here that Dr. Mivart in his recent work, as in previous works, fails. We do not doubt his honesty of purpose; we do not question his ability; but we believe him to be lacking in that rare gift of discriminating insight in matters fundamental without which the most honest and able craftsman may exercise his craft in vain.

A long and unnecessarily elaborated argument leads up to the conclusion that external objects, at any rate in so far as their so-called primary qualities are concerned, have an independent existence, for which an unexplained and questionable intuition vouches. Almost pathetic is the earnestness with which Dr. Mivart pleads for a belief in the reality of matter. We say "pleads" rather than "argues," for where intuitions are concerned argument is futile for those who are not so unfortunate as to possess them. Now we know the doctrine of the independent and noumenal existence of the matter and energy with which science deals. It is termed materialism. Unquestionably, Dr. Mivart is a materialist in this sense; but for him matter and energy do not by any means exhaust the realities of noumenal existence. In the closing words of the book: "Unless we are profoundly mistaken, it is only through the conception of such an active causative principle underlying and pervading the material cosmos, together with the recognition of the dignity of human reason, that we can understand the groundwork of science and attain to a final and satisfactory epistemology." So that we have two sorts of noumenal existence—(1) matter and energy, and (2) an underlying causative principle. These must be either co-ordinate, or the one subordinate to the other. It can hardly be doubted that Dr. Mivart would choose the latter alternative. We may, indeed, fairly assume from the general tenor of his work that matter and energy are themselves to be regarded as the product of the principle of causation. If this be so, we have one noumenon causing another, and that other causing the phenomena of sensation!

Now Dr. Mivart accepts and, in another connexion, makes skilful and effective use of Occam's maxim: "Entia non sunt multiplicanda præter necessitatem"; but he does not seem to have realised that its application here rules out altogether his subordinate noumenon, leaving, on the one hand, the phenomena of experience, and, on the other, the underlying principle of causation: matter and energy belonging to the former category.

We are not sure that Dr. Mivart has reached sound conceptions of causation. It is of fundamental importance to distinguish between causation as understood by science, on the one hand, and metaphysical causation, on the other. The former is expressed in terms of antecedence and sequence, and involves an indefinite retrogression to the limits of weariness. The latter is the true groundwork of science, its essential raison d'être. Physics deals with the sequence of phenomena in terms of matter and motion. Psychology deals with a sequence of states of consciousness in terms of cognition, emotion, and so forth. The metaphysics of physics deals with force as the cause of the motion of material systems; the metaphysics of mind deals with the force which underlies the sequence of states of consciousness. The one word force, thus understood, sums up the groundwork of science. For some this is merely a synonym for the unknowable; but we agree with the author that it is also the Supreme Reason, and that this is why the phenomena of science form a rational system, of which the symmetric form of the crystal, the painted wing of the butterfly, the instinct of the spider, the intelligence of the dog, and the intellect of man, are direct or indirect expressions.

A Superior Family.

The Etchingham Letters. By Ella Fuller Maitland and Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart. (Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

Good genuine letters, growing from a spontaneous desire on the part of the writer to please and interest a friend, are rare enough. How much more so are good artificial letters by literary experimentalists! In fact, the manufactured letter is almost always a failure, judged as a letter, however informing it may be. The author seems to be confronted by the insuperable difficulty of self-consciousness, proceeding from the knowledge that the destined haven of the missive is not, as it ought to be, the pocket of an intimate correspondent, but naked print. Few letters will stand print; and the better they stand it, by so much the less are they good as letters. Many of the letters which it is customary to extol (and quite rightly) for what they say and the way they say it, must have cut a very poor figure at the breakfast-table when they were originally opened. Probably the best letters of all—letters, not essays or "causeries"—pass between obscure persons who have never thought of authorship, or heard that it is wrong to underline and shameful to split an infinitive.

So much of preamble to these studies in literary epistolising called The Etchingham Letters, which never succeed in persuading us that the services of the Post Office were for a moment requisitioned. Even had they been anonymous, we should still have doubted their genuineness; but with the names of the collaborators on the title-page, of course all illusion is defeated. It is not so that retired Indian officials write to their sisters. The little somethings that make for credibility are lacking: brothers and sisters, even when the brother is a baronet, do not assume these courtly attitudes, these polite distances. No, these corresponding Etchinghams fail to convince. Also, we regret to say, they fail to a large extent to entertain. Their minds are too superior, their sympathies too narrow; their caste teaches them to touch life only superficially. We can follow the love affairs of the family with but very languid attention, and we rapidly tire of Hans-place society, among whom Elizabeth Etchingham dwells. Sir Richard's environment, at Tolcarne in Wessex, is more tolerable; but there again we are much in a world of exiguous donnish intellect. Indeed, as we read on, Walt Whitman's plea came into mind:

O something pernicious and dread!
Something far away from a pious and puny life!
Something unproved! something in a trance!
Something escaped from the anchorage and driving free!

And there it remained, a continuous undertone of protest, until we had done.

None the less there are pleasant and well-thought things in the book. Sir Richard has much learning, and some of his criticisms are suggestive, although it seems to us that he underrated Maeterlinck. His praise of Colonel Tod's Rajasthan is excellent, and it should be the means of inducing a publisher to issue a new and accessible edition, especially at this season of joy in heroic deeds and men of might. This is a timely word on Omar Kháyyám, upon whom Sir Frederick Pollock is, of course, an authority:

Some draw the wine to drink thereof full deep.
And some i' the mosque their night-long vigil keep—Unsteadfast all, tossed on a shoreless flood;
For ONE doth wake; fools in their folly sleep.

So says Omar Kháyyám, the real and serious Omar, I conceive, when he rends the veil of his ambiguous conventional imagery, and ceases from his antinomian flings against the formalism of both mullahs and súfis. How do I know, you may say, that this and not the other—or one of the others—is the real Omar? Well, I don't; but this and like utterances—not fitting into the common forms even of unorthodoxy—seem far less likely to have been interpolated than the six hundred and one stanzas about wine and moonlight and the lips of the beloved by the lip of the field (the boundary between tilth and wilderness in a country living on irrigation), which scores of versifiers might have written at any time over several centuries. Not that the wine and moon, and so forth, need always have their literal meaning, or only that meaning. My own belief is that the reader is often wilfully left to take his choice as he may deserve; but that is yet another story.

One thing we may point out before leaving the book: there are a great many people who very naturally dislike to see any distortion of the Scriptures, and for their sakes it might have been worth while to omit the parody of Proverbs xxx., amusing though it may be to the irreverent.

Be you still, be you still, trembling heart;
Remember the wisdom out of the old days:
He who trembles before the flame and the flood,
And the winds that blow through the starry ways,
Let the starry winds and the flame and the flood Cover over and hide, for he has no part
With the proud, majestic multitude.

ONEGAL AND ANTRIM.

BY STEPHEN GWYNN.

This is a worthy addition to the series which was begun with Mr. Norway's Highways and Byways in Devon and Cornwall. Mr. Gwynn carries on the tradition well and with a genuine love of his subject, yet with discretion. He does not strain a single quality of the country, and admits that its history is only "the vague tradition of a defeated race, and a legend-lore which has never been wrought into poetry." It is a country "for the most part remote, lonely, and storm-beaten." But with all this to its discredit, scenery and people are alike delightful. "Always you will be among the same brown and purple mountains, always in sight and seldom out of hearing of the sea, always you will be crossing swift, peaty streams and rivers, every one of them the home of trout and salmon, and harbouring no coarser fish: always there will be, on the one hand, the home of snipe, grouse, and woodcock, and the haunt of cormorant and seagull on the other; in short, you will be in the ideal country for a holiday, always somewhere between the heather and the sea." Mr. Gwynn wisely advises the tourist to talk to carmen and boatmen, and absorb their humour and modified Lowland Scottish dialect. Of their quaint inversions and happy choice of words he gives many examples. Speaking of a field overgrown with rushes, an Antrim man said: "It'll be a quare tragedy gettin' them rushes out o' thon field." That is delightful. "Are there fish in the pool to-day?" "Fish is it? It's fair polluted with them." A poor woman's answer to a lady who asked her whether she was a widow, was: "'Deed, mem, A'm the worst soort o' a wudda; A'm an ould maid." A notable feature of the book is that Mr. Hugh Thomson appears in it as a landscape draughtsman. We certainly prefer his figure studies, which here, as elsewhere, are delightful. (Macmillan. 5s.)

EMERALDS CHASED IN GOLD.

BY JOHN DICKSON.

We speak of the British Islands, forgetting that they are many. Yet our Island's islands are fascinating in their remoteness, and lovely in their storm-guarded peace. "The farthest Hebrides," wrote Wordsworth, and left us wondering. On these uncatalogued islands men live with Nature and a weather-beaten parson, and do not know that they are envied. Ten such can be seen from Edinburgh, or, at least, from Blackford Hill, as Scott well knew:

Yonder the shore of Fife you saw;
Here Preston Bay and Berwick Law;
And broad between them rolled,
The gallant Firth the eye might note,
Whose Islands on its bosom float,
Like emeralds chased in gold.

Mr. John Dickson has written a very careful and a very charming book about these emeralds chased in gold, whose names a herald might mouth with satisfaction; they are: Inchgarvie, Inchcolm, Inchkieth, the Bass Rock, the Isle of May, Cramond, Inchmickery, Fidra, Craigleith, and the Lamb. Of these only three have found historians, and all have been insufficiently described. Mr. Dickson is thorough. His thoroughness is human enough to omit mention of Dr. Johnson's visit to the Bass Rock, though he describes Carlyle's visit to Inchkieth. The proprietorship, geology, agricultural character, and past history of each island are entered into with loving care. Of fine material there is no lack, for several of the islands were once homes of piety. On Inchcolm stands the ruins of the monastery which Alexander I. vowed to Saint Columba, after being storm-bound on the island for three weeks. A poor anchorite, a disciple of the saint, shared with him and his courtiers the milk and shell-fish which were his only food. Inchkieth is rich in the family history of Keiths, Strathmores, and Buccleughs. May had its priory, and on it the saintly Adrian was murdered by the Danes, as Wyntoun saith:

And apon holy Thursday
Saynt Adrian thai slave in May
Wyth mony of hys Company.

On Fidra are the remains of a hermitage, which "appears to have served the purpose of a desert to the sisterhood of North Berwick, when they wished greater quietude for meditation and devotion than their regular place of residence afforded them." The Bass Rock, which became a scene of martyrdom when Charles II. decided that Presbyterianism was not "fit for a gentleman," is the best-known of the islands; but Mr. Dickson has added to our knowledge of its civil and ecclesiastical history. A very sound little book. (Oliphant, Anderson, and Forrier.)

POEMS AT WHITE NIGHTS.

BY GORDON BOTTOMLEY.

The Unicorn Books of Verse now number five, and all have character of their own. Mr. Bottomley, whose title is due to admiration of Marius the Epicurean, is a conscientious artificer with the sense of beauty ever awake. His verse is perhaps a thought too sedate for a lyricist, but it is interesting and well chiselled. We should have liked more epigrams and fewer sonnets. Landor's own grace is suggested here: On Landor's Poems Found in a Cedar-wood Desk:

Comatas, prisoned in a cedarn chest,
Was fed by bees that sought his honeyed song;
But these forgotten fragments, far more blest,
Live by their own clear sweetness, cool and strong.

There is room for a poet who will take up Landor's old office of addressing his contemporaries in wise and melodious quatrains and octaves. Mr. Bottomley might apply for the post. (Unicorn Press. 2s. 6d.)

IVORY, APES AND PEACOCKS.

BY "ISRAFEL."

We do not know which wearies us most—"Israfel's" fine writing, or his attempts to be funny. Here are the two in combination:

And when the poetic Southern moon, which can fire the heart of a tourist or the top of a soda-water bottle, shines on the desert, and water and distance are veiled in a silver haze of illusion, the beauty of the Suez Canal seems to me to share the psychology of Chopin's most mournful preludes and the wonderful elemental sadness of Tchaikovsky's music.

"Israfel" is musical, and whithersoever he travels he never forgets that he has been to Bayreuth. "The sea colours are as nervously and perfectly and bewilderingly interwrought with one another as the leit-motifs in 'Tristan.'" The Bazaar at Bombay, seen for the first time, has "the fluidity and the intense life of music; it is like the prismatic 'Preislied' in the 'Meistersinger' heard for the first time." Bombay itself has atmospheric effects "beautiful as those in the 'Rheingold.'" The oleander has a "Chopinesque perfume." At Jeypore "the plain theme of the bullock cart is wondrously orchestrated." It is a pity that "Israfel" riots thus, for he has eyes and words at his command, and could do better. (Unicorn Press.)

THE QUEST OF FAITH. BY THOMAS BAILEY SAUNDERS.

These essays, of which parts have seen the light in the Athenaeum, deal with some of the serious contributions to the doubt of our own day. Huxley's Collected Essays are the text of a discourse on Agnosticism. Mr. Balfour's Foundations of Faith are taken as an example of how the sceptical spirit may apply itself to discredit the sceptic. Mr. Gladstone's Studies Subsidiary to the Works of Butler, and the Duke of Argyll's defence of the teleological argument, suggest reflections on the relations of Butler's and Paley's influence to the thought of a later generation. All these things are done calmly, and you can always understand what Mr. Saunders means. (A. & C. Black. 7s. 6d.)

Fiction.

The Amateur Cracksmen. By E. W. Hornung.
(Methuen & Co. 6s.)

THE modern story of crime, its detection or its perpetration, wherein the leading factor is ingenuity of plot, probably deserves more critical attention than it has hitherto received. It may not be the highest development of fiction, but it is a form of literary art—or rather, to be cautious, there is no reason why it should not be a form of literary art. Three things are necessary, so G. H. Lewes has told us, to good literature—vision, sincerity, and æsthetic beauty. Now no one would deny that the Sherlock Holmes series, for example, has both vision and sincerity; Dr. Conan Doyle “realises” intensely, and his best work is obviously and thoroughly sincere. That his outlook is narrow, and his characters crudely conventionalised, is beside the point, for all art is narrow when compared to life, and all art must be more or less conventional; without convention one could not have form. Where Dr. Doyle and his imitators fall short is in the quality of æsthetic beauty, of which most of them seem to have not the slightest perception. It must be said, however, for Mr. E. W. Hornung that his book does disclose a certain feeling for beauty. His search for the precise epithet is sometimes quite successful, and all his stories have a gracefulness of contour not often to be observed in this species of work. Mr. Hornung is avowedly an imitator (or shall we say a “flatterer”?) of Dr. Doyle. Yet he has his originalities. His hero, A. J. Raffles, possesses, it is true, the Sherlock Holmes attributes; but he uses them for the commission of crimes, not for their punishment. Of course, he was not “really” a criminal—only an amateur, though an amateur who could meet and beat most professionals. He had a code of honour, and stuck to it; otherwise he would have been impossible as a hero.

“We shall have our work cut out,” was all I said.
“And do you suppose I should be keen on it if we hadn’t?” cried Raffles. “My dear fellow, I would rob St. Paul’s Cathedral if I could, but I could no more scoop a till when the shop-walker wasn’t looking than I could bag the apples out of an old woman’s basket. Even that little business last month was a sordid affair, but it was necessary, and I think its strategy redeemed it to some extent. Now there’s some credit, and more sport, in going where they boast they’re on their guard against you. The Bank of England, for example, is the ideal crib.”

And so on, till all one’s notions of right and wrong are turned topsy-turvy. A. J. Raffles is successful in all his little affairs till the last one, when a grim Scottish detective, who has shadowed him throughout, brings him up all standing. The “amateur” escapes with his life from a precarious position, and probably Mr. Hornung’s intention is that at a future date he shall renew his doubtful activities.

The book is distinctly a good one. It is perhaps inferior to its exemplar in that wealth of corroborative detail which convinces, and that ingenuity of weaving which enthralls, but, on the other hand, it has a lightness and brightness which Dr. Doyle never attempted.

Life at Twenty. By Charles Russell Morse.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

MR. MORSE must expect to be depreciated as an imitator of Mr. George Meredith. He has certainly caught the manner of that master so closely that one’s irritation at what at first seems something deliberately affected passes into astonishment that the ironies should furnish England’s only Richter with so plausible a double. In respect of style, Mr. Morse consistently remains at the level of a telegraph wire above the ground. Opposed to the feebleness of common writing, this richness of phrase inspires our gratitude, but it does not answer the desideratum of Mr. Herbert Spencer with regard to a perfect style for imparting information. Far from reducing the “friction” to a minimum, Mr. Morse engages us in a combat with triumphantly contorted sentences, and when it is a case of imagining the position of a locality or the details of a story we could wish him to be more lucid. There is one considerable error he might have avoided if he had studied the dialogue of Mr. Henry James as well as the no longer inimitable manner of setting forth which, in the case of Mr. Meredith, creeps into the life of his puppets to the disadvantage of their separate individuality. A peculiarly intellectual tone enters into the talk of all Mr. Morse’s important male characters, with the exception of his wicked baronet. Mr. Morse is himself Jim, Holt, Crowell, and Stalker. Jim is the son of a typical farm-labourer. He has enjoyed a fair education, but this is how he talks: “Take the elderly man and the petticoated naïveté. . . . She finds his sensibilities ordered belligerent around his purse. . . . Touch his solvency and you are into the quick of his doleful existence.” Holt has a taste for the abstract. “Have you seen Weldon’s lines?” he asks, adding: “A good instance of the man with a wish to do, and the fancied faculty to apply immediate means to an end remotely conceived to approximate the consummate.” Stalker, to whom this remark is addressed, seems not insensible to its unnecessary abstruseness; yet it is he who observes that, in a state of supreme content, man is “advised of the universe’s control in the cocksure of happiness that inflates his own thorax.” His silly insult to Mozart (p. 171) should not have passed unrebuked. Crowell we suppose to be a big, awkward fellow. He is compared to a “grampus in love.” Yet on the heroine’s threatening to run if he lose his sense of propriety, he thus replies with refinement and polish: “The loss should excuse any ultimate action in me as your captor.” Mr. Morse is not overburdened with plot. His “Rose” is tempted nigh to falling, and her recovery sounds the most melodramatic note in the book. There is a true femininity about his women: a certain Tabitha has the ageless sweetness of lavender. We have quoted some ugly sentences, and pace tua, Mr. Morse, we object to split infinitives. But the wit of the novel is undeniable and often brilliant, the acuteness of its reflections remarkable. Mr. Morse observes both nature and human nature with calm, keen eyes. His description of the little society of naturalists called “The Tramps” is clever and thorough: only a naturalist could have done it. Great things may be hoped for from Mr. Morse. His sense of beauty will grow, and with that growth what is otiose and ugly will drop away from his work.

An Earthly Fulfilment. By John Reay Watson.
(Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

THIS is a study of middle-class life in a remote town of Australia. To judge from the chapter headings (“XXV.—Halts on the Verge of a Climax,” and so on), you would think it was old-fashioned in methods. But it is not so. The author has, probably, absorbed French models. He is clever and sincere, and has a due sense of the dignity of his art. He tries to be a realist, and within limits he succeeds. The greyiness of life does not daunt him. He records faithfully and neatly, if without distinction. The calamity is that his devotion to accuracy of detail interferes with his sense of the dramatic. In art accuracy is desirable, but dramatic quality is more than desirable—it is essential. An artist is an artist because he discerns the bright-hued drama which underlies even the greyest existences.

To put the matter in another and commoner way: Mr. Watson is dull. But we think that he will not always be dull, for in one or two scenes he has contrived to rid himself of the obsession of trivial observations, and the result is good. The plot of An Earthly Fulfilment, reduced to its simplest, is an old one: the love of two women for one man. As regards the women, Minnie Turner is a girl, Alison Hunter is a married woman, and the man, Huddie Clarke, is not her husband. Minnie has just allowed Clarke to kiss her—

"Someone is there," she said, in maidenly anger.

He turned quickly, and fell back, terror-stricken for the moment. Mrs. Hunter stood in the doorway a picture of dismay, and looking for a way to escape.

"You here?" he said quiveringly. An unshaped fear ran through his blood and left him motionless.

Minnie advanced to Mrs. Hunter, who retreated into the shop; Haddie purposely came between them.

"Don't come near me," cried Mrs. Hunter to him. "Have I not suffered enough? What is there left in me to ruin? Have you no pity, no mercy?"

Minnie stood in the doorway looking at her. The woman's manner was inexplicable to her. She felt that its inner meaning was far outside her experience. Words jingled in her brain devoid of meaning, yet she realised that the whole situation threatened a catastrophe. She caught a look from the terrified Mrs. Hunter, and she felt suddenly that she herself was degraded in her part in this scene. She saw her sex as only a barren necessity of man's existence. Life thundered emptily in her ears, and she sank back afraid.

Mrs. Hunter had left her home.

The chapter in which this passage occurs is the best in the book, and it indicates a natural power which Mr. Watson will do well not to hamper by too strict obedience to a mere theory of technique.

The Capsina. By E. F. Benson.
(Methuen. 6s.)

MR. BENSON'S new book, like its predecessor, The Vintage, deals with the Greek war of Independence. The Capsina is the head of a longshore tribe. She scores off the old wise men, and holds them up to the ridicule of the parish council, and so secures her position against any Salique prejudice. She builds ships and sails them, engages Turkish vessels and sinks them by twos and threes. Then she falls in love with a person who acts as her first lieutenant: he is styled "little" Mitsos because he is so big. Mr. Benson would seem to have taken some trouble in the study of places and events, and, therefore, it is with reluctance that we confess that his story has failed to win our sympathy, or even to hold our attention. A typical passage from this narrative of action may make the reader understand why:

"Hoist the foresail," she cried [they were pursuing two of the enemy's ships].

Mitsos looked up; the ship, he knew, was carrying as much sail as she could.

"You will lose your mast," he said.

The Capsina turned on him furiously. "Let us lose it then," she cried.

"And you will go no faster," he said. "More sail will only stop the ship."

"That is what they say," she remarked. "They say it pulls the ship over, and makes the bows dip. What do you advise, little Mitsos?"

We do not question the accuracy of the seamaanship; we think it quite likely that more sail than enough "will only stop the ship." Perhaps the same fault is committed sometimes by writers of romance, with similar "pulling over" consequences.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE GAME AND THE CANDLE. BY RHODA BROUGHTON.

Here is the work of the practised novelist. Nothing could be more clean-cut or suggestive of future drama than Miss Broughton's first chapter, in which Henry Etheredge, in his fifty-sixth year, seeks, with his dying breath, to wring from his wife, of whose past fidelity he was assured, a promise not to marry "the person of whom you took leave five years ago beside the fountain in the circular garden." He had witnessed the parting from behind a yew hedge, and this was the first time he had mentioned the matter. (Macmillan. 6s.)

ON THE EDGE OF A PRECIPICE.

BY MARY ANOELA DICKENS.

Miss Dickens's name is a guarantee of careful work and character-drawing above the ordinary. Here we watch the attempt of a feckless but resourceful loafer to marry an heiress whose memory has been destroyed in a bicycle accident. Theatrical life, more or less shady, moves in the background. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

A SEMI-DETACHED MARRIAGE. BY ARABELLA KENEALY.

A shrewd and witty book by a lady who is stepping surely to the front rank of novelists. The motive is the unhappy life of a healthy English girl, wedded to a neurotic with the artistic temperament. He holds that "Love is a flame celestial, a spark Olympian, never intended for the warming apparatus of a drawing-room." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

MORE METHODIST IDYLLS. BY HARRY LINDSAY.

We were able to give warm praise to Mr. Lindsay's first series of Methodist Idylls. They showed an intimate and sympathetic knowledge of life in Methodist circles; and in style and treatment they were not wanting. Here we have a new batch. (Bowden. 6s.)

THE MAN BETWEEN.

BY ROBERT HALIFAX.

This story, by the author of All for a Woman, is "the record of a rare romance, bound up with two hearts and a treasure-hunt." A tale full of mystery and action. The following snatch of a song, twice quoted, gives its keynote:

Heigh-ho! it's a beautiful world, sirs,
If only you'll study your tide;
Here grins a rock, there threats a shock;
But, devil! the ocean's wide.
Ho! stand at the helm yourselves, sirs,
And lay hard to your memoree:
It's never a boat as'll keep ye afloat
But—"a fig for old Destinee!"

(Richards. 6s.)

HER PROMISE TRUE.

BY DORA RUSSELL.

Miss Russell is an industrious writer of readable novels. She has written another, showing how Belle Wayland kept, or rather did not keep, the promise she gave to Hugh Gilbert on the Hove sea wall. (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

THE MAN AND HIS KINGDOM. BY E. P. OPPENHEIM.

A romance of a tiny South American State. The reader's curiosity is aroused at the outset, when Gregory Dene and Miss Denison, each bound for San Martino, meet on ship-board. Intrigue, fighting, and love throw their varying lights on the pages. (Ward & Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE UNCALLED.

BY PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR.

Mr. Dunbar is the negro poet, the author of Lyrics of Lowly Life. His novel is of pious provincial life in Ohio. A quiet and pathetic story. (Service & Paton. 6s.)

THE PASSING OF PRINCE ROZAN. BY JOHN BICKERDYKE.

Mr. Bickerdyke has contrived a story in which the Old Bailey and the Arctic Sea, a City swindle and "five hundred miles in a small open boat," are blended in a narrative that, if it contains many improbabilities, is vigorous and entertaining throughout. (Burleigh. 6s.)

THE FAITH THAT KILLS. BY EMERIC HULME-BEAMAN.

The principal episode of this readable story is an evening at a club (not the Suicide Club) where members play cards for their lives, the holder of the ace of spades being bound to drink then and there from a bowl of subtle poison causing a painless death. The dedication is to Mr. Kipling. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

FOR BETTER OR WORSE? BY CONRAD HOWARD.

Mr. Howard dedicates his novel to the fathers and mothers of the twentieth century, his purpose being that they shall read, mark, and digest his pages, and learn thereby to instruct their children differently in religious matters. Let us teach our children about evolution first, and read about creation later: that is the author's view. (Unwin. 6s.)

ON THE EDGE OF THE EMPIRE. BY EDGAR JEPSON AND CAPTAIN D. BEAMES.

Mr. Jepson is already known by his Passion for Romance. Here he has collaborated with a practical soldier in a series of stories of fighting and plotting in Northern India and on the Afghan border. (Heinemann. 6s.)

FORBIDDEN BANNS. BY ANNABEL GRAY.

A melodrama in the form of a novel. "You like women, major?" "I think they are about the best diversion going in this weary world—better than cards, races, betting, or drink, anyway." (White. 6s.)

ROSE-À-CHARLITTE. BY MARSHALL SAUNDERS.

The hero is Vesper Nimmo. Years before, an ancestor had been an active figure among the Americans who persecuted and imprisoned the Acadians. One young Acadian, dying, cursed him and his line. With the hope of making some restitution Vesper visits Nova Scotia, and becomes friendly with the French settlers there—and meets Rose-à-Charlitte. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE DEATH THAT LURKS UNSEEN. BY J. G. FLETCHER.

We do not like the system of naming a book of short stories solely by the first story it contains; it is misleading. "The Death that Lurks Unseen," which is concerned with a Nihilist plot, turns out to be only one of nine short stories covering a wide range of life. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

MORALS OF THE MIDLANDS. BY MRS. EDWARD KENNARD.

In her latest hunting story Mrs. Kennard gives us a blend of hard riding and wayward affections. Her way is to smooth the rough places at the last, and allow conjugal errors to fade in the rays of forgiveness. A good readable novel, full of average human nature. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

TALES OF THE WONDER CLUB. BY DRYASDUST.

The Wonder Club met in the old inn "Ye Headless Lady," in the Midlands, toward the close of the last century. It was an exclusive little coterie, scornful to admit commercial gentlemen, and its chief delight was to listen to stories of the marvellous class, told by the members in turn with every circumstance of dignity. The irreverent named it "The Morbid Club," and we are inclined to think not altogether without reason. "The Phantom Flea" is the first story, and other stories, equally suggestive of the weird, are: "The Spirit Leg," "Lost in the Catacombs" and "The Haunted Stage Box." (Harrison & Sons. 3s. 6d.)

THE REBELS. BY M. McDONNELL BODKIN.

Another romance of '98. "'Look, Val! look well,' she said, as she lifted him in her arms and pointed to the fading outline of the hills. 'That is Ireland; our own Ireland. You may never see it again, but you must never forget Ireland till you die.' . . . The deep voice of her husband, who had come softly up behind them while she spoke, whispered solemnly, 'I swear it'; and the sweet, clear voice of the child echoed the words 'I swear.'" (Ward & Lock. 6s.)

ROMANCE OF THE LADY ARBELL. BY ALASTOR GRAEME.

A high-falutin novel founded on the fortunes of Arabella Stuart. The first sentence runs: "That year of Grace autumn was falling early, so that all red berries made gouts of blood about the gloom-fiery heralds of winter-storm." Which is not pretty, and we don't know what it means. (F. V. White & Co. 6s.)

THE PRODIGAL'S BROTHER. BY JOHN MACKIE.

A romance of the great North-West. The author has had experience of the life he describes, having served as an officer in the North-West Mounted Police. There is hand-to-hand fighting with Indians. (Jarrold. 3s. 6d.)

A RIVIERA ROMANCE. BY BLANCHE ROOSEVELT.

A lively novel of life on the Riviera. The author—whose literary work was thwarted by many illnesses, ending in her death—is a defender of the gaming tables. (Downey & Co. 6s.)

THE LADY OF THE LEOPARD. BY CHARLES L'EPINE.

A weird novel; partly resembling Elsie Venner. An adventuress absorbs the nature of a leopard, and equipped not only with its cunning and watchfulness, but with extraordinary hypnotic powers, she throws herself at Sir David Grevil's head and adds strange complications to a drama of inheritance and family secrets. (Greening. 6s.)

THE WEIRD OF DEADLY HOLLOW. BY BERTRAM MITFORD.

Another of Mr. Mitford's numerous and sensational stories of South Africa. (White. 3s. 6d.)

AN AWKWARD MEETING. BY R. H. SAVAGE.

A collection of slap-dash sensational stories, by the author of My Official Wife. (White. 2s. 6d.)

THE RESURRECTION OF HIS GRACE. BY CAMPBELL RAE-BROWN.

A horse-racing story with a horrible plot. (Greening & Co. 3s. 6d.)

BELLING THE CAT. BY DORRINGTON PRIMM.

"A delicious sense of possession thrilled through his heart. She was his—his wife for ever"—the last words. (White. 6s.)

I'm here in Clifton, grinding at the mill
My feet for thrice nine barren years have trod;
But there are rocks and waves at Scarlett still,
And gorse runs riot in Glen Chass—thank God!

Alert I seek exactitude of rule,
I step and square my shoulders with the squad;
But there are blackberries on old Barrule,
And Laugness has its heather still—thank God!

About Dickens.

I.—Mr. Gissing.

WHY is Dickens so frequently and abundantly misquoted, his incidents misrepresented? Why do writers, capable of correct quotation from, and accurate allusion to, Sappho, Martin Tupper, and M. Anatole France, come to grief when they come to Dickens? To his adorers, of whom I am humblest among the greatest, this laxity is exasperating. A few years since, some monstrous person, wishing to speak of Sam Weller's famous crumpet story turned the crumpets into muffins. Aghast at this outrage, the late Mr. Walter Wren wrote to a daily paper, protesting that, to his best recollection, muffins are not once mentioned in Pickwick. Absurd! Muffins are mentioned thrice, and a muffin boy once. Yet Mr. Wren, if report be true, shared with Sir Walter Besant and another the distinction of having scraped through Calverley's intricate Pickwick Papers examination. Not long ago, a critic, wishing to redeem the memory of Dickens from the stain of bad English left upon it by the title of Our Mutual Friend, observed that the phrase is put into the uneducated, if poetic, mouth of Silas Wegg, and that Dickens was therefore aware of its vulgarity. It is not put into Wegg's mouth, but into Mr. Boffin's, and in Little Dorrit there is proof that Dickens divides with—horresco referens—with Miss Austen the disgrace of having personally sanctioned the vulgarity.

But that Mr. Gissing should be an offender is very grievous. His recent monograph on Dickens is by far the finest and truest elaborate piece of criticism that has yet been written upon Dickens. Yet flies are in the amber: vexatious flies. As thus: Page 57—speaking of the abuse of "coincidence" by Dickens, Mr. Gissing writes: "When Oliver Twist casually makes acquaintance with an old gentleman in the streets of London, this old gentleman of course turns out to be his relative, who desired of all things to discover the boy." The point is unaffected; but Mr. Brownlow was not Oliver's relative, he was his father's dearest friend. Page 82—speaking of the principles upon which Dickens metes out his punishments, Mr. Gissing writes: "Squeers or Mr. Creakle we will by no means forgive; nay, of their hard lot, so well merited, we will make all the fun we can . . ." But we take leave of Mr. Creakle as a Middlesex magistrate, exhibiting his pet and pious criminals, Littimer and Uriah Heep, to the disgusted David and Traddles. I am not aware that a Middlesex magistracy is a very miserable position. Page 121—speaking of "the respectable man," Mr. Gissing writes: "If my memory serves me, Mr. Pecksniff did not keep a gig (possibly it is implied in his position) . . ." Mr. Pecksniff's gig is carefully described, defined, and named—in one chapter the vehicle is mentioned by the name of gig no fewer than eighteen times. Upon p. 141, I would prefer to have the great and dear name of Mrs. MacStinger spelled as Dickens spelled it. Upon the following page it is untrue to say that Mrs. Gargery provoked the fight between Joe and Orlick "by a malicious lie." She was malicious, but told no lie. Upon page 147 we meet with "Sophy Whackles." Now Dick Swiveller's flame was, until she became Mrs. Chaggs, Miss Sophy Wackles. Page 159: Dora Spenlow's dog was Jip, not Gip. Page 164: "The booful lady" should be "the boofer lady." Page 168: The huge dish, which young Copperfield was supposed to have devoured unaided, consisted, not of cutlets, but of chops. Page 172: Mr. Gissing speaks of "Mr. Smallweed giving his friend Mr. Jobling a dinner." Prodigious! No Smallweed ever gave anyone anything—but trouble. Mr. Guppy gave the dinner; and when Chick Smallweed returned to his family circle the grandfather complimented him for living upon his friend. Page 174: Old Mr. Willet is described as sitting, after the ruin of the Maypole by the rioters, "staring at his old-time companion, the kitchen boiler." This he could not have done, for the rioters left him tied to his chair in the bar: if he was consciously staring at anything, it was at the downcut Maypole looking in through the window. Page 185—speaking of Sketches by Boz, Mr. Gissing writes: "Dealing for the most part with vulgarity, his first book is very free from vulgarisms. In one of the earliest letters to Forster, he speaks of 'your invite'; but no such abomination deforms the printed pages." Unhappily, this very abomination itself deforms the pages of Boz: Mr. Gissing will find it in "The Steam Excursion." Page 192: Mr. Gissing, quoting the description of a certain scene, says that it occurs when "Jonas, become a murderer, is lurking in his own house . . ." It occurred before, not after, Montague Tigg's murder, and the fact intensifies the suggestive grimness of the description. Page 236: "A tragedy of drink Dickens never gives us." Mr. Gissing forgets "The Drunkard's Death," last of the Sketches by Boz; also "The Stroller's Tale," in Pickwick.

Infinitesimal, these slips of memory or of the pen: reflecting no discredit upon Mr. Gissing's admirable study, which has placed all lovers of Dickens in his debt for ever. And yet they are characteristic, symptomatic, of that slight inaccuracy which besets those who write upon Dickens, or refer to him. I am convinced that were Mr. Gissing to write upon Thackeray no such slips would occur. It seems reserved for Dickens to enjoy, with the Bible and Shakespeare, that penalty of popularity and familiarity, inaccurate usage. It has never been my lot to write of Dickens, and I am glad of it: for I am certain that the epidemic of error would have promptly seized me, and that I should have found myself writing about Sam Swiveller and Dick Weller, or sending Mr. Pickwick into the wrong bedroom at Norwich.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

II.—Mr. Quiller-Couch.

MR. QUILLER COUCH, in his Speaker article last week, invented a most plausible and engaging theory to account for the feebleness and poverty of the French version of Pickwick, published in 1838. It is clear that Mme. Giboyet, the translator, says "Q," undertook the work in collaboration with a M. Alexandre D., and was driven by the author's disapproval to suppress A. D.'s share of the work. "Q" imagines that Dickens was favoured with a sight of half the translation, and at once wrote as follows:

45, Doughty-street,
September 25, 1837.

MY DEAR MADAM,—It is true that when granting the required permission to translate Pickwick into French, I allowed also the license you claimed for yourself and your collaborateur—of adapting rather than translating, and of presenting my hero under such small disguise as might commend him better to a Gallic audience. But I am bound to say that—to judge only from the first half of your version, which is all that has reached me—you have construed this permission more freely than I desired. In fact, the parent can hardly recognise his own child.

Against your share in the work, madam, I have little to urge, though the damages you represent Mrs. Bardell as claiming—300,000 francs, or £12,000 of our money—strike me as excessive. It is rather (I take as my guide the difference in the handwriting) to your collaborateur that I address, through you, my remonstrances.

I have no radical objection to his making Messrs. Snodgrass, Winkle, and Tupman members of His Majesty King Louis XIII's corps of musketeers, if he is sincerely of opinion that French taste will applaud the departure. I even commend his slight idealisation of Snodgrass (which, by the way, is not the name of an English mountain), and the amorousness of Tupman gains something—I candidly admit—from the touch of religiosity which he gives to the character; though I do not, as he surmises, in the course of my story, promote Tupman to a bishopric. . . .

A. D.—has been well advised again in breaking up the character of Sam Weller and making him, like Cerberus, three gentlemen at once. Buckingham (Jingle) and Fenton (a capital rendering of the Fat Boy) both please me; and in expanding the episode of the sausage and the trouser-buttons A. D.—has shown delicacy and judgment by altering the latter into diamond studs.

Alas! madam, I wish the same could be said for his treatment of my female puppets, which not only shocks but bewilders me. In her earlier appearances Mrs. Bardell (Milady) is a fairly consistent character; and why A. D.—should hazard that consistency by identifying her with the middle-aged lady at the Great White Horse, Ipswich, passes my comprehension. . . . The whole business of the fleur-de-lys on Mrs. Bardell's shoulder is a sheer interpolation, and should be expunged, not only on grounds of morality, but because when you reach the actual trial, "Bardell v. Pickwick," you will find this discovery of the defendant's impossible either to ignore or to reconcile with the jury's verdict. Against the intervention of Richelieu (Mr. Nupkins) I have nothing to urge. A. D.—opines that I shall in the end deal out poetical justice to Mrs. Bardell as Milady. He is right. I have, indeed, gone so far as to imprison her; but I own that her execution (as suggested by him) at the hands of the Queer Client, with Pickwick and his friends (or, alternatively, Mrs. Cluppins, Mr. Perker, and Bob Sawyer) as silent spectators, seems to me almost as inconsistent with the spirit of the tale as his other proposal to kidnap Mr. Justice Starsleigh in the boot of Mr. Weller's coach, and substitute for his lordship the Chancery Prisoner in an Iron Mask. I trust, madam, that these few suggestions will, without setting any appreciable constraint on your fancy, enable you to catch something more of the spirit of my poor narrative than I have been able to detect in some of the chapters submitted; and I am, with every assurance of esteem, —Your obliged servant, Boz.

To which A. D. is reported by Mr. Couch to have replied:

MADAME,—Puisque M. Boz se défie des propositions lui faites sans but quelconque que de concilier les gens d'esprit, j'ai l'honneur de vous annoncer nettement que je me retire d'une besogne aussi rude que malentendue. Il dit que j'ai conçu son Pickwick tout autrement que lui. Soit! Je l'écrivai, ce Pickwick, selon mon propre goût. Que M. Boz redoute mes Trois Pickwickistes!—Agreez, Madame, &c., &c.,

ALEXANDRE (Philippi Filius).

Hence the loss of Les Trois Pickwickistes.

Mr. Ruskin at Home.

AN interesting description of a visit paid to Mr. Ruskin, on the occasion of his eightieth birthday in February last, is given in the current number of Saint George's, the organ of the Birmingham Ruskin Society, by Mr. John Howard Whitehouse, the editor. We make a few extracts:

Mr. Ruskin's house has been frequently described, and its exterior appearance, at least, is familiar to many. It is quaint and unpretentious, though larger than would be expected by one who had seen it from the outside only. Of the treasures within the house it is difficult to speak—they are so numerous, and of such extraordinary interest. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Severn, by whom we were most hospitably received, guided us through these, and thus deepened the interest of a visit which to us will be ever memorable. Mr. Ruskin's study is a long, comfortable, and in every way delightful room, with a superb view of the hills and lake. It is lined with books, of course—I did not see any room in which there were not some—but it also contains many other objects of beauty and rare interest, including a collection of minerals and some paintings by Burne-Jones and Rossetti. Of all his treasures Mr. Ruskin probably prizes most dearly the MSS. he possesses of several of Sir Walter Scott's novels.

Next in interest to Mr. Ruskin's study is his bedroom. It is a small room, and in one corner is a simple little wooden bedstead, entirely devoid of any trimmings or ornamentation. One side of the room is covered with books. The other three are almost entirely covered with Turners, and it is these, of course, which give the chief interest to the room. There is probably no other room in the world which could show such a collection. Although this is the master's favourite bedroom, he has not been using it recently, as, owing to the severity of the weather, and the weakness naturally arising from his advanced age, it has been thought wiser for him to remain chiefly in another room, which he temporarily uses both as a sleeping and living room.

It was in this room that we were introduced to him. He was seated in an arm-chair before a small table near the window, the sunbeams playing upon his venerable face. In his old age he presents a most impressive appearance, to which his long flowing beard adds not a little. With the exception of that beard, it appeared to me that his face had undergone no material change since the days when he was a professor at Oxford. The lines were, indeed, more pronounced, the expression sadder, but it was still the face which had been painted many years before, with such admirable skill, by Prof. Herkomer. As to Mr. Ruskin's physical condition, it would be idle to deny that he is very weak and frail, but mentally he is quite clear, and though now unable to do any work whatever, he still takes a lively interest in the progress of the world.

We learnt at Brantwood some interesting facts respecting Mr. Ruskin's habits of recent years. Until a month or two ago he was able to get out every day when the weather was fine, sometimes taking slow walks, and sometimes going in a bath-chair. Of evenings it was his custom to read aloud some portion of one of Scott's novels, his love for which is so well known. He is now, for the most part, read to. Oliver Twist was read to him not long ago, and, although familiar with it, the re-reading of the book gave him much delight. The last work which has been read to him is Mr. C. E. Mathews' Annals of Mont Blanc.

In the closing years of his life, the master is perfectly happy. He gave expression to this fact on the morning of his birthday. He felt so happy that he wished to live on. He must have been touched beyond all words by the multitude of messages which were arriving at Brantwood from all parts of the world. Miss Kate Greenaway sent an exquisite sketch of a group of happy, joyous, dancing children, and one of the most touching greetings I saw was from an American lady, who sent eighty white flowers, bearing the inscription :

Eighty flower sprays for eighty pure and lovely years.

It was a fitting greeting to the great prophet in the twilight of his days, when, as his biographer so eloquently says, "the storm cloud has drifted away and there is light in the West, a mellow light of evening time, such as Turner painted in his pensive epilogue. There is more work to do, but not to-day. The plough stands in the furrow, and the labourer passes peacefully from his toil homewards."

Things Seen.

Confirmation.

It was a confirmation by a bishop-suffragan. That was why the bells were ringing at half-past two on Sunday afternoon, flooding Fleet-street and the Strand, and exciting the Law Courts' pigeons to silly flights.

Inside the railings a man in a silk hat was talking paternally to some boys, and elderly people were beginning to arrive and pass in. The warm sunshine flooded the little spaces in front of the church and the flagged churchyard, and found rainbow colours in the hats and frocks of a few children that hung about. The ivy near the porch was last year's, but it looked hopeful in the bright air, and the figures on the church clock were flashing. Fleet-street was very quiet, Wych-street was a long winding lane with a few people in it, and all the region of the Law Courts and Clements' Inn was tranquil. The girls and children who had foregathered to see the arrivals looked like village children in their homely frocks and finery. A few men stood about, and seemed as if they would smile if cause were given.

I entered the church and found the pews gay with daffodils. Girls in white dresses were being fitted with caps and veils of whitest gossamer in a little tiring-room, open to all eyes, and in the opposite room a bearded chorister was publicly wriggling into his surplice. As the girls received their veils they were passed up the church and planted out like lilies in the pews to the left. The boys sat on the right; they had all had their hair cut. The ubiquitous good vicar ran and reddened. Anon he was talking intensely to a canon, or a prebendary, or a dean, or someone, and pointing to every part of the church in turn, sketching arrangements in the air, frowning, smiling, leaving off and beginning again with more urgency than before, and all the time the white-voiled girls were passing up the nave one by one. Four-wheeled cabs were arriving, full of white maidens, who stepped out with a pretty stateliness, or rolled out like dumpy snowballs. And the bells rang and re-echoed. Far up Wych-street I saw stout mothers and elder daughters conveying specks of white. Little girls in white came from Clare-market, and Drury-lane, and from the stuffy courts behind the Strand; they came, it seemed, from anywhere and nowhere.

Suddenly the bells ceased with a great shock of silence, and at this precise moment an aged clerical gentleman crossed the little square carrying a portmanteau. His hat and gaiters told me he was the bishop-suffragan. He just pecked at the bill announcing the Confirmation, and passed in. No crowd remained. Nothing showed that the dull old Fleet-street church held that flushed company of boys and girls. The 'buses rolled in their long orbits, and a bicyclist, speeding west with intent eyes, yawped on his syren.

Romance.

WE started from the Engadine Valley in the dim dawn, a dozen of us, in ramshackle carriages—in the dim dawn, feeling our way through the solemn passes, snow-capped mountains on either side, receding here and there to make way for large lakes, placid among the everlasting hills. Loath was I to leave the mountain airs, reluctant to feel the breeze growing warmer on my cheek; but we were making for Italy—that was the compensation. We drove down, down, down, and by-and-by—'twas late in the afternoon—we crossed the frontier. White dust lay thick on the winding road; gnat, gaudy insects buzzed about our heads; heavy-scented air took the place of the brisk breezes that had blown up there in the dim dawn. Soon we came to a toy village, and there I was bidden to change carriages, to join a party of five in a huge, lumbering diligence.

A man and a girl sat on the box-seat by the driver, and inside was an elderly woman with corkscrew curls, and another man, a tall, loose-limbed Scot, who insisted that I should take his seat facing the horses. As we drove along the white road the dusk began to fall, and the stars peeped out in the luminous sky. As we drove along through the scented air, with no company but the mild-eyed, curious kine watching from the roadside, the darting bats, the winged insects, and the busy flies, it was borne in to me that Romance was encompassing us, that we were carrying Romance with us into Romance-land. The man on the box was talking eagerly to the girl, but it was plain to the dullest eye that she paid small heed to his pleadings. Her figure remained firm and unyielding, her small head, embedded in coils of black hair, did not move, but it seemed to me that her back—straight and svelte above the Scot's head—spoke. And once she half turned. Then the unexpected happened. The man on the box turned suddenly, his face was pale. "Jimmy," he cried, "I want my coat from the rumble. Will you take my place?" The girl made a sign of protest, but he jumped down, and in a moment the Scot had swung himself up and was seated by her side. We drove on through the warm night. She leaned closer to the Scot's shoulder. His personality seemed to encompass her. Her head bent. The moon hung over the crest of the hill, night came up with her garniture of stars; and so we entered Italy.

"Robespierre."

THE stolidity of the English! It is real enough. I spent half an hour last night in the gallery of the Lyceum Theatre. The audience was dense and devout. A man standing at my side appeared to be hanging by his chin to a wooden partition. And yet he could not see the stage! It was the terrible prison scene that I looked down upon over hats and heads solid as a pine-wood on a hill that one has surmounted. A hushed pine-wood it was; and as the guillotine roll-call proceeded every eye was set on those terrible and gallant partings. When the soldier gave his life for his married namesake—it being doubtful which was condemned—I felt the cheer coming, and it came. When the mother of that golden-haired child was torn away, with her pitiful promise to "come back," the pine-wood did not breathe. A girl at my side wept quietly. Many were weeping. All submitted to the spell of this scene of death and sacrifice.

The astonishing thing was that when the act was over there was only a quick sigh, a momentary whisper, a wind that was and was not. Then I saw men deep in the Evening News. The girl who had wept said that she "met Sally in Sloane-street last Thursday night." The gallery attendant shouted "Orders, gents!" He had not the wit to say "citizens." And the counter in the bar, at the back of the gallery, was wet with beer.

Memoirs of the Moment.

STEVENSON, the man of Letters, was a man, too, of Affairs—at any rate in Samoa; and there is little doubt that were he now alive the boats belonging to Mataafa had not been destroyed, the villages of Mataafa's people had not been erased, they themselves had not been slain; nor should we have had to record the incidental losses of gallant English and American seamen. The feuds between rival chiefs are of old duration, and the jealousy between the German representatives and those of England does not date from yesterday. But Stevenson, lover of justice as he was, and true cosmopolitan because a true wanderer at heart, never descended into partisanship, whether local or national, and his influence with the natives and their chiefs was in proportion to his own disinterested sense of fair play. Of Mataafa he was the champion, in the columns of the Times and elsewhere, in the early nineties. "Mataafa," he confessed in a letter to a stranger, "is known to be my hobby. People laugh when they see any mention of his name over my signature; I know that nothing can be more fatal to his cause than that he should be made ridiculous; and I cannot help feeling that a man who makes his bread by writing fiction labours under the disadvantage of suspicion when he touches on matters of fact."

YET one of these facts was this: that Mataafa had been imprisoned for rebellion against a document drawn up in Berlin which he had never seen. "It is to be noted," said R. L. S., "that what I will venture to call this infamous protocol—a measure equally of German vanity, English cowardice, and American incuria—has never yet been translated into the Samoan language. They feared light because their works were darkness." The italics were, on that rare occasion, Stevenson's own, and the final words may be taken as the measure of difference between much of the sentiment that was Stevenson's and that which is Mr. Kipling's. Well, Mataafa was liberated—a man "very piously inclined," of whom Stevenson prophesied that he would probably "enter at least the lesser Orders of the Church." How bitter Germany then was against Mataafa and his English friends those people who read Stevenson's letters in the Times will remember. In the end the novelist was nearly cast into jail for sedition, under an Act specially framed by the German authorities in order to muzzle him. Time's revenges are instant even in the South Seas, it seems. The Englishman who accused Stevenson of giving arms to the rebels was himself sent to prison for three months—though Stevenson did not live to know the result of his libel action; and to-day it is Germany, not England, that hesitates to hunt down the followers of Mataafa—Stevenson's "hobby"; while Stevenson's house itself has become the property of a German.

THE Duchess of Marlborough, who was once a vice-queen in Ireland, had somewhat outlived her influence. Although a great "Evangelical," she loved the precedence and orderliness of Courts; and the death of her two sons was an additional blow to her, for the very reason that it reversed the natural rule, and that they preceded her, who should have preceded them, to the tomb. Her subsequent life she always regarded as an anomaly, which the affection of a bevy of daughters—most substantially married daughters too—could never quite remove. The Duchess ruled at a time of some social revolution, in many ways to her advantage. Class barriers were disappearing; and when the Duchess received, at her Dublin Court, philanthropists and others whom secretaries had hitherto handled not without a sense of boredom that showed itself as swagger, they found her as simple as their own women-folk, and went away as discoverers, bearing the news to their edified friends and families in the provinces.

OF keenness as a discoverer the Duchess of Marlborough had herself none. She followed conventions where insight might have saved the situation. The great talents, also the defects, of her two sons she took at the public's valuation, rather than on any initiative of her own by which that ready public verdict might have been anticipated, or reversed, or righted. It was characteristic of her that, at a time when the churches of England were undergoing a transformation and furnishing themselves with mystical emblems, she, called upon to fix a form of memorial to her husband, selected a marble pulpit, doubtless quite in keeping with the adjacent solidity of Vanbrugh's palace of Blenheim. She was a woman of "consistent life," and Lord Beaconsfield regarded her, with his wholly unimpassioned eye, as a representative and wholly admirable British matron.

CHARLOTTE BRONTË did not set up to be an art-critic, but she had her views about pictures, and held them with her own tenacity. In 1851 she went to the Royal Academy Exhibition, and her comment was: "About half-a-dozen pictures good and interesting, and the rest of little worth." The words make a useful landmark, and after fifty years one is certain that the number of pictures Miss Brontë might appreciate has increased somewhat; also that of the first six the terms of praise could be strengthened. Of the pictures in the forthcoming exhibition it is yet rash to speak, but the hanging is likely to be as bad as it was last year, the gain of the lowering of the skyline effected by Lord Leighton being again sacrificed in the contest between quality and quantity. And all the time the diarists of to-day will be making such entries as that quoted from Miss Brontë. It is not as if the selectors and hangers had not been roundly told.

ROMAN CATHOLICS all over the world are going to celebrate the year 1900 with demonstrations quite unique in their nature and their universality. A committee has been working for some time, in secret, and its deliberations have been submitted to Rome, whence will shortly issue a summons to the two hundred and fifty millions who—at least nominally—are reckoned of the fold of St. Peter. The celebration is decreed; and it is to be doubly marked—by the erection of a memorial cross in every church, and by a bonfire. On the hill-tops of Christendom, and far beyond bounds, will these new fire-worshippers assemble in presence of the symbolic flames, which denote the cleansing fire that burns the accumulated dust of years and the light that typifies the Light of the World. Treated as a mere advertisement—and that is how everything gets to be regarded—the scheme is supero.

MR. PURCELL's death found him at work on a book he had in hand—a biography of Ambrose de Lisle, of Garendon Park, Leicestershire, the prototype of Eustace de Lyle in Coningsby; but it is sufficiently advanced to allow of its easy completion of publication. Once a clerk in the Bank of England, and afterwards a very struggling man about Fleet-street, Mr. Purcell had his one great opportunity as the biographer of Cardinal Manning. Never a friend of the Cardinal, he had him at his mercy at last, and, by imputation and otherwise, he dealt him blow after blow from the boldly assumed pedestal of an official biographer. The little sauce of scandal made the dish palatable to the general public, with this result, that the biography passed into the hands of a far larger body of readers than it would otherwise have reached. This last thought helped the Cardinal's friends to forgive Mr. Purcell.

The Reign of Daintiness.

"Books," it was remarked the other day by a keen critic, "are in fashion." They are in fashion in the sense that the crinoline is out of fashion. Apart from all studious love of books, books are now bought because they are the thing. It follows, almost as a matter of course, that with this spirit reigning, the external appearance of books has a close bearing on their sale. And such is the fact. "Pretty," "handy," "dainty"—these are the adjectives bestowed and sought after. So well is this understood by certain firms of publishers, that no effort is spared to produce the popular kind of format; and competition in the editing of masterpieces is probably less real and keen than competition in the daintifying of those masterpieces when edited.

It has seemed worth our while to take the general views of booksellers on this question, and we have had no difficulty in collecting opinions.

The testimony is nearly all corroborative of the proposition that prettiness is becoming the one thing needful in book formats. But there are significant exceptions. A large Birmingham bookseller would fain stem the tide. He writes:

A book need not be "pretty and handy" in the sense that the "Temple Classics" are pretty and handy. For our part, we strive to instil the desire for books issued in a solid and noble format, like the "Cambridge" Shakespeare, 9 vols., Pepys, 10 vols. (Bell), and the like. Shelves filled with books "pretty and handy" look miserably mean, whereas a well-stocked library in octavo format has a dignified appearance, and is a pleasure to own. Notwithstanding, we are grateful to Mr. Dent and others for the many authors they have given us in books "pretty and handy."

That is a sound point of view; and a Leeds bookseller's report indicates that the hard-headed Yorkshire book-buyer has severe tastes:

I do not find that books with illustrations or designs on the cover command any better sale than those issued in plain cloth covers. The former are more attractive for window display, but as a rule my customers prefer a neat-looking book, and are more concerned that the printing and illustrations inside should be of a high order rather than the cover be ornamental. A gilt top and cut edges are preferred. The cloth should be of such a texture as not to rub, this being most desirable from a stock-keeping point of view.

We take the opportunity of notifying publishers of the dislike to smooth cloths which booksellers feel. A Brighton bookseller is quite angry:

It is strange that publishers, after the protests of the trade, persist in issuing books in the horrible smooth cloth which is, unfortunately, very largely used. It is not only a loss to the bookseller in keeping them in stock (as they inevitably become rubbed in a few days, and, in fact, show every finger-mark), but is prejudicial to the sale. The kinds of cloth used for the "Border Waverley," "Crown Dickens," and "Biographical Thackeray" are far preferable and not more expensive. We consider that for ordinary books (and novels especially) the art linen binding, in nice colours, now considerably used, is by far the most effective and the best for wear.

That books are purchased for their outsides is the clear opinion of an Eastbourne bookseller, who writes as follows:

The public are not panting to purchase books; but if they can be shown some pretty little editions they are tempted to buy what they had no intention of doing. Many notable examples of this could be given. Renewed life has been imparted to Mrs. Ewing's works by the issue of the pretty 2s. 6d. edition, and the increased sale of Dickens's Pocket Edition since the binding has been changed, are other examples. The neat Pocket Editions of Thackeray, Brontë, and Gaskell increased my sale of those authors one-hundredfold.

Similarly a London bookseller declares that the new edition of A Tale of Two Cities, issued by Messrs. Chapman & Hall, has sold very largely on account of its portability and pretty appearance. A good instance of the power of format to give new life to standard books is the series of "Illustrated Romances" issued by Messrs. Dent. The bindings are attractive and the coloured illustrations are much appreciated. It is very desirable that all novels should be issued with cut edges.

We echo the wish expressed in the last sentence, but we fear in vain.

Our correspondents give the following among good models in recent book production:

Messrs. Dent's series of Classics, Shakespeare, and old Dramatists; Messrs. Lawrence & Bullen's Muses' Library; Messrs. Gay & Bird's dainty "Bibelot" series; and Messrs. Bell's "Cathedral" and "Endymion" series. In children's books, Mr. Lang's Fairy Books, the pretty series illustrated by C. Robinson, and the reprint (John Lane) of Walter Crane. My Japanese Wife, by Clive Holland (Constable), Bullen's Idylls of the Sea (Grant Richards), Canton's Child's Book of Saints (Dent), the "Endymion Series of the Poets" (George Bell), Housmann's Field of Clover (K. Paul).

An Explanation.

SIR,—My unpretentious little story, Autobiography of a Child, has been referred to as history. May I protest against the misapplication of a title so solemn and serious to matter so fragile and fugitive as a tale of childhood? The story is essentially a work of imagination, an effort to interpret the vision and mind of a child and tell her story from her point of view as I imagined she would tell it. Such a task has nothing at all of the nature of history. Its concern is impressions and pictures, not facts. In the drama of existence facts are of comparative insignificance. The important thing is not what is relatively true, but what we believe to be true, since this alone reveals temperament and character. Shelley and an Oxford don would hold very different opinions of Oxford as an institution, and both would be equally sincere and worthy of attention in their expression of their diverse opinions. We should turn to the one for history, and own that we proffered the other in the realm of imagination.

I am aware that the barbarous frankness of my heroine will be repulsive to a large class of readers, but I have made a concession to their susceptibilities in depicting her as a very naughty little girl. Like another little girl, "when she was bad she was horrid"; and, like that undisciplined young lady, she more often than not deserved to be "spanked most emphatic." Now, I might have represented her as a tortured angel instead, and she herself, if consulted, would, I suspect, greatly have preferred to enter fiction as a stained-glass ideal of virtuous infancy.

I relied on her unhappiness for the reader's indulgence, for those who love children will agree with this writer that it is intolerable to think even a bad child can be unhappy. If the story of Angela should bring home this fact to a single reader whom life hitherto had not taught it to, it will not have been written in vain.—I am, &c.,

THE AUTHOR OF "AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A CHILD."

Haikais.

SIR,—Will you permit me, apropos of your recent Literary Competition, to call your attention to two "Haikais" published in 1895, in the introduction of a book of poems entitled Seen and Unseen; or, the Monologues of a Homeless Snail, by Yone Noguchi, a young Japanese poet living in San Francisco, U.S.A.? I take the liberty of forwarding you a copy of the book, not so much in refutation of your guarded expression of belief that "hitherto no Haikais had been written in English," as to bring to your notice the remarkable essays of a Japanese poet, writing in an unaccustomed tongue. My friend was at one time on the staff of a prominent Japanese monthly magazine, whose editor, S. Shiga, in a happy critique, has called him the "different-tongued Tatsuo" — Yone Noguchi being a nephew of the poet Tatsuo Kumoi. His first attempts in English were printed in the Lark in 1895. The Haikais (or "Ho-kus"?) in question were translated and interpreted from Basho by Noguchi, and re-phrased to fit the set form by myself. These "inspirations" of the "high-qualified" Basho are too subtle for anything like literal rendering in English, especially within the narrow limits given the original form; and, indeed, it is doubtful if any two Japanese would agree upon the precise meaning of the imagery, all interpretations, from the literal to the symbolistic, being found.

The first of the Haikais published in Seen and Unseen is:

Alas, lonesome road,
Deserted by wayfarers,
This autumn evening!

And the other, one of the most beautiful of Basho's, which seemed especially applicable to this young exiled poet:

Ah, lonely, lonely,
Shall this flower's neighbours be,
When to-morrow comes!

Besides these, Yone Noguchi translated many other poems of his beloved Basho, and I add a few that I phrased with considerable license, in the attempt to suggest the almost intangible allegorical meaning, or metaphor, which seems to be the essential beauty of these Japanese verses.

Upon an ancient battlefield:

These Summer grasses
Wave o'er the dead heroes' bed
Where they lie, dreaming.

Upon the Pilgrim's "garment-changing" time:

Spring changes Earth's robe;
Lay off thy dun garment, too,
Showing thy fair form!

O, lofty gum-tree,
Mark how the bold sun glances
On your fresh young leaves!

As to the Imperial, 21-syllabled "U-tas," I have never seen one written in English; but you can, no doubt, call forth a claimant for this honour also. Finally, may I ask, for my own information, whether the Glose written for the Lark by Porter Garnett has ever had a rival, and whether a Lai or a Virelai Nouveau has ever been written in English? If so, I would suggest that you offer a prize in some forthcoming competition for the best model for a new "set form" of verse — essentially original, not a variant upon the old French forms.—I am, &c.,

GELETT BURGESS.

The "High History."

SIR,—I should like to offer some comment upon the attitude of the reviewer of the High History of the Holy Grail towards what the Germans would call "literaturgeschichtliche Forschung," investigations into the origin and development of literary works. Such investigations are, it seems, "of interest to none but the pedant." Why? Would the reviewer style the botanist or the astronomer a pedant? Would he hold knowledge in either case a bar to enjoyment of the flower's beauty or the heavens' sublimity? It is just possible he may, but I do not think he would venture to give utterance to his opinion. Were he to do so, the least instructed of editors would tell him that such a doctrine was out of date—was, in the bad sense of the word, childish. But with regard to literature matters are different. It is still thought not unworthy of a grown-up man to maintain that a desire to understand the laws which regulate the development of literary art argues pedantry and unfits for the appreciation of literary beauty. The very reverse is, I believe, the case. The man who knows is not only more capable of enjoyment than he who is content to remain ignorant, he actually does enjoy more. Knowledge is a more august and inspiring—she is also a more fascinating and consoling—mistress than ignorance.

The amusing thing is, that the reviewer, unknowingly, gives away his whole case. He is delighted to learn from Dr. Evans "that the High History can justly claim an antiquity coeval with our greyest cathedrals." Of course, my friend, Dr. Evans, makes no claim. He knows far too much of the history of architecture. It is his contention that the whole Grail legend is a creation of the early thirteenth century, at which date even the reviewer may know that several of our cathedrals had a respectable antiquity behind them. I, on the other hand, do hold that the Grail legend contains elements which are not only "coeval with our greyest cathedrals," but are immeasurably more antique; I maintain that the framework and many essential incidents of the legend are largely pre-Christian. This is a contention which should be welcome to the reviewer, far more welcome than Dr. Evans's. Yet it can only be demonstrated by the process which he contemptuously describes as "dissecting our Lancelot and numbering the stones of Tintagel"—by the careful and minute comparison, that is, of all the versions of the story with a view to determining which are the older and which the younger elements.

One more point. Your reviewer states "that not a little of the magic of this magical book flows from the pen of the translator." I trust he will not be offended if I ask him whether he has read the French original, and, if so, where? I yield to no one in admiration of Dr. Evans's version; I place it—there can be no higher praise—on a level with Lady Guest's Mabinogion or Mr. Lang's Aucassin and Nicolette. He has done full justice, but he would, I think, agree with me that he has done no more than justice to his original. It is all too insufficiently recognised that the French prose of the twelfth and early thirteenth centuries is one of the most delightful mediums for narrative in the whole range of literary history.—I am, &c.,

ALFRED NUTT.

[Our reviewer writes: Mr. Nutt's letter is an instance of what one may term a point of view; the article of which he falls foul is another. But he is entirely mistaken in supposing that I am anxious to wage scornful war upon exact knowledge in any department of learning. Such an attitude would be, as Mr. Nutt himself qualifies it, "childish in the bad sense of the word." My position with respect to this particular book was that of the "plain hearer of a story," and having asserted my position, I assumed it to be granted.

Having, then, no "case" at all to make out, I submit that I have given nothing away in my "greyest cathedrals," except a phrase for your correspondent to worry over. I feel, indeed, abashed at Mr. Nutt's implied knowledge of architecture. But, aware as I am of partial exceptions, I am humbly tenacious of my belief that our oldest cathedrals in their entirety, as we see them to-day, are not very much older than the beginning of the thirteenth century. And I would ask your correspondent to accept the statement for what it was intended, as at least an approximate and picturesque statement of the truth. That Mr. Nutt maintains that the "groundwork and many essential incidents of the legend are largely pre-Christian" is doubtless reasonable enough and is perfectly welcome to me, although, alas, the contention has scarcely the charm of novelty.—YOUR REVIEWER.]

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 28.

WE asked last week for original proverbs expressed with some of the raciness noticeable in a few specimens quoted from Don Quixote. The result has not been so satisfactory as we could wish, for though a great many saws have been contributed, few of them could have been uttered by Sancho Panza. We have decided to divide the prize: half a guinea to Mr. Thomas Constable, Hurstwood, Buxted, Sussex, for "Just in time" is the brother of "Just too late"; and half a guinea to Mr. George Stronach, M.A., Broomieknowe, Midlothian, for Hard work is a better relish than Worcester Sauce.

Had not the following—from "Dick, Watling street"—come too late, it would have been a prize-winner:

Too polite often gets none at all.

Among the others are:

It is always possible to do one's best.

[W. S., Greenside.]

The old umbrella seldom gets lost.

[G. R., Aberdeen.]

Fall in love with whom you please, but be very careful whom you marry.

[C. A., Glasgow.]

Men should be judged only by their temptations.

[E. M. J., London.]

He who carries a guinea in each pocket walks between two friends.

[R. H., Aston Manor.]

The man who cannot beat the donkey beats its saddle; it is not always the real culprit who gets the blame.

[E. R. W., Farnborough.]

There are two classes of people in the world—those who ride bicycles and those who dodge them.

[A. C., Blackford.]

Sympathy is like a kiss, good for nothing till it is divided between two.

[M. M., London.]

Affirm, but deny not; for truth is greater than thyself.

[D. S., London.]

An old lady once spoke of herself as having "just enough interest to buy a candle to see how to spend the principal."

[Cantab.]

Don't put up your umbrella before it rains.

[T. B. D., Bridgwater.]

Every herring should hang by its own tail.

[M. L. M., Ealing.]

One can never tell what style of ugliness an artist will admire.

[A. B. C., London.]

A Hindu student wrote to me once to ask for some help. He said: "My father has always been a frugal man; but, sir, you are aware that no amount of frugality can suffice to a man that has no income!" This I submit as my proverb. Every day I feel more and more convinced of the profound truth of it.

[H. L., Worcester.]

It is no consolation to get chewed up by a first-class dog.

[B. B., Handsworth.]

Who makes friends gives sympathy; who retains friends possesses discretion.

[M. T., London.]

To poke fun is sometimes to poke a fire.

TIMES.—"In spite of the claims and attractions of a score of competing subjects, the sway of the classics is still as strong as ever, and University men are found to write Latin verse and Greek prose as good as any that was written under the sway of Hawtrey and Kennedy. The volume called 'Cambridge Compositions' deserves to be called a new 'Arundines Cami.' The editors, Messrs. Archer Hind and H. D. Ricks, both Fellows of Trinity, are two of the best-known Cambridge scholars of the day, and their contributors include such a gallery of Senior Classics and the like as have probably never been brought together in one book before."

A HISTORY of the COLONIZATION of AFRICA by ALIEN RACES. By Sir H. H.

JOHNSTON, K.C.B., H.B.M. Consul at Tunis. Crown 8vo, with 8 Maps, 6s.

DAILY NEWS.—"Among the multitude of popular books on Africa, there was room for one which should give a concise account of the successive attempts of alien races to colonise it. In this volume we have the desired account, written by the most competent living authority. His 'Colonization of Africa' is a model of what an historical summary and handbook should be. It is just the kind of book for readers who want to acquire a general idea of the ebb and flow between East and West in Africa, and of the relation of the European movement now in progress to movements in the past."

The Literary Week.

THE late William Morris's views on the Laureateship, as made public in Mr. Mackail's biography (which we shall review next week), were peculiar and interesting. Mr. Gladstone was willing to offer Morris the succession to Tennyson; but, on being sounded, the Socialist poet, although pleased with the honour, declined unreservedly, stating that, in his opinion, the function of Poet Laureate was that of a ceremonial writer of verse, and that the Marquis of Lorne was the fittest person to fulfil it.

AN interesting posthumous work of Alphonse Daudet appears this week in Paris—Notes sur la Vie. The book is a collection of the novelist's memoranda of conversations, marginalia from his library, "Things Seen," and germs of stories. There is also the skeleton of a long novel on which Daudet had set his heart—"La Caravane." The volume is edited by Mme. Daudet.

THE discovery of George Borrow's correspondence with the British and Foreign Bible Society, made since the publication of Dr. Knapp's Life of Borrow, has drawn forth a letter from Mr. Murray defending Dr. Knapp from suggestions that he might have sought for these letters with more zeal. Mr. Murray makes it clear that Dr. Knapp did his best to gain the letters, but was frustrated by accident. Says Mr. Murray: "These letters must, of course, be of considerable interest to all lovers of Borrow's writings; but I understand that they supply scarcely any facts or data which Dr. Knapp has not, by infinite pains and research, discovered from other sources."

MR. CLEMENT K. SHORTER has resigned his position as editor of the Illustrated London News and Sketch. Under his editorship the Illustrated London News acquired a very welcome literary flavour, an example which the other picture weeklies speedily followed. Not the least attractive feature of the News was the weekly letter on literary topics, signed C. K. S. Mr. Shorter also gave quite a literary interest to the Sketch, a paper he founded and steered to phenomenal success. The causes which led Mr. Shorter to resign these appointments are not stated, but we understand that he is about to embark in an important enterprise.

IN an interesting commentary on Miss Palgrave's Life of her father, the late F. T. Palgrave, Mr. Lang refers, in Longman's, to certain improbable circumstances connected with the Oxford Chair of Poetry and the contests for it.

"But how odious these contests are," he says. "The competitors are usually friends (as Mr. Courthope and Mr. Palgrave were; as, in fact, the competitors almost always are), and why should they be pitted against each other in a quest of votes? It is no reflection on Mr. Courthope to say that it was Mr. Palgrave's turn, and he was elected. Then the tenure of office—ten years—is too long. Men wax old before their turn comes round. Make it an affair of three years' tenure. In three years anybody can say what he has to say. . . . There can be no doubt as to who should succeed Mr. Courthope in the chair of Mr. Matthew Arnold; and, afterwards, les jeunes should have their opportunity."

THE cover chosen for Messrs. Methuen's series of six-penny novels, which have a general title—"The Novelist"—is glowing crimson and gold. The paper approximates to cloth in texture, and the effect is striking. Now, when publishers, especially of cheap books, resort to pictorial covers, this reliance on decoration and monotone is noticeable.

THE chorus of satisfaction elicited by the publication of the Browning love-letters has been suddenly and rather disconcertingly interrupted this week by the publication in the Standard of the following letter from Mr. C. J. Moulton-Barrett, the eldest surviving son of Mrs. Browning's father. Mr. Moulton-Barrett says:

In spite of earnest protests, Mr. Browning, with a want of delicacy hardly conceivable, has published the letters of his father and mother previous to their marriage. The careless indifference of Mr. Robert Browning, "There they are, do with them as you please when I am dead and gone," was no excuse for the sacrilege. His mother would have been horrified. She loved her father.

The notices of the book have generally been so cruelly unjust to my father's memory that I consider it my duty, as his eldest surviving son, to relate the facts. My father acted as his own merchant for his Jamaica estates, and on that account went daily to the City. He never met Mr. Browning. He was aware of his visits, and he regarded them, like the visits of Miss Mitford and Mr. Kenyon, as affording my sister pleasure. My sister had been an invalid for years. By the directions of Dr. Chambers her room was kept at a certain temperature, and she never left it. Under these circumstances my father lost his daughter. He had loved her from her childhood. He never recovered it. I venture to say few fathers would take the hand of a man who had so acted. And I would add, few sons, either for gain or love of notoriety, would make public the confidential letters of their mother.

Upon these remarks we comment, as far as is advisable, on another page.

WE give this week a portrait of Selma Lagerlöf, the Swedish novelist whose work has recently found so many readers in this country. In a recent article on Gosta Berling's Saga in Das Litterische Echo of Berlin, a critic divides modern Scandinavian writers very clearly. They obtain, he says, little appreciation at home, but rumours of their success come from abroad — from Germany, France, and England — and “a consequent chafing under existing conditions is almost unavoidable. Scandinavian writers, therefore, have taken two directions. Onset are the fighters, the irreconcilables, and irony and satire are the chief means they employ in writing their winged words. Ibsen is the great representative of this class, and others are Björnson, Strindberg, Skram, Christian Elster, Kjelland, the Lefflers, and Garborg. . . . There is a second and smaller class of writers in Scandinavia, but neither have these come close to the life of the people. They stand aloof from the life of the present. They live in a world of the past, in a world idealised by their fancy and imagination. Their minds are haunted with the splendour of times that are gone, with the greatness of that which once was and even yet casts its shadows on the earth.” To this second school, the chief name in which is J. P. Jacobsen, belongs Selma Lagerlöf.

SELMA LAGERLÖF.

WE wish that someone could take up Mr. Sidney Lee's challenge. In the interests of sport it should be arranged. Mr. Lee, speaking at the dinner in his honour at Birmingham, on Monday, remarked (we quote from the report): “The noxious Baconian bacillus was very much alive in the brains of men in all parts of the world. It was ‘a tale, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.’ Bacon was no poet: he tried to write verse and failed miserably. Mr. Lee undertook to prove to any impartial jury, who were pledged to abide by the spurious logic of the Baconians, that every poem usually assigned to Lord Tennyson was really the exercise of Mr. Gladstone's recreation, or that the volumes that had come forth under the present Poet Laureate's name were the ejaculations of the muse of their distinguished fellow-townsmen, Mr. Chamberlain.” Will not the Baconians demand the exhibition? But surely if any Mr. Chamberlain is the true Poet Laureate, it is Mr. Austen [i.e., Austin] Chamberlain.

A DENIAL to Mr. Lee's statement that Bacon was no poet has already been educed from Shelley's works, such is the vigilance of newspaper readers to-day. Shelley wrote:

“Lord Bacon was a poet. His language has a sweet and majestic rhythm which satisfies the sense, no less than the almost superhuman wisdom of his philosophy satisfies the intellect. It is a strain which distends, and then bursts the circumference of the reader's mind, and pours itself forth together with it into the universal element with which it has perpetual sympathy.” But this, of course, means nothing in the present connexion. Mr. Lee meant that Bacon was no technical poet; and he was not.

APPROPOS of Birmingham and Shakespeare, the following is the dedication of a little book called The Mystery of Shakespeare's Sonnets, by Mr. Cuming Walters:

TO MY FRIENDS,
The Members of the Literary and Dramatic Society,
The Members of the Sociological Society,
and
The Members of the Spencer Club,
(all of Birmingham),
This Little Volume is Dedicated.

MENTION last week of Joachim du Bellay has brought us correspondence on the subject. Among the letters is one from Dean Carrington enclosing a translation of Du Bellay's epitaph on his cat, which we print elsewhere in this number. Dean Carrington, who is now eighty-five years of age, is known for many charming translations from the French, notably his little edition of Victor Hugo in English. Mr. Philip James Bailey, the author of Festus, who was eighty-four last week, was styled at the time our oldest living poet; but Dean Carrington is his senior, and so, as our “Bookworm” points out, is Mr. Aubrey De Vere.

THE world, indeed, needs a reminder that Mr. Bailey is still living. His home is at Nottingham, where he dwells in great simplicity. His great age will not permit of much literary exertion, but he is still busy with the annotations to Festus. The first edition of the poem was published in 1839. A census of its readers to-day would probably yield the most meagre results; yet Tennyson recommended it to FitzGerald for its occasional grandeur. Its teaching is this:

No soul,
Though in sin's lowest, blackest death employed,
Lost to the world, to angels, to itself,
Is lost to God.

And preachers continually quote such lines from it (though perhaps unwitting of their source) as—

We live in deeds, not words; in thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart throbs; he most lives
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

And “Who never doubted, never half believed,” and “Night brings out stars as sorrow brings out truths”—a motto for Maeterlinck.

ANOTHER poet, whom many persons may mentally range with Mr. Bailey, is treated of by Mr. Gosse in the new North American Review—Richard Hengist Horne, the author of Orion, and the friend of the Brownings, as readers of the recently published volumes of Letters will remember. Horne was born at midnight between the last day of 1802 and the first of 1803, and he lived until 1884. His Orion, published in 1843, was brought out at a farthing—a lesson in cheapness to our publishers to-day. Says Mr. Gosse: "Purchasers had to produce their brass farthing for each Orion, and no change was given. This was done 'to mark the public contempt into which epic poetry has fallen,' but it was also a very good advertisement. Everybody talked about Mr. Horne's 'farthing' poem, and, after some editions had run out, the price was cautiously raised. But when the tenth edition appeared at a cost of seven shillings, the public perceived that its leg was being pulled, and it purchased Orion no more."

"It was in 1874," says Mr. Gosse of Horne, "that I set eyes on him first, in circumstances which were somewhat remarkable. The occasion was the marriage of the poet, Arthur O'Shaughnessy, to the eldest daughter of Westland Marston, the playwright. There was a large and distinguished company present, and most of the prominent 'Pre-Raphaelites,' as they were still occasionally called. In the midst of the subsequent festivities, and when the bride was surrounded by her friends, a tiny old gentleman cleared a space around him, and, all uninvited, began to sit upon the floor and sing, in a funny little cracked voice, Spanish songs to his own accompaniment on the guitar. He was very unusual in appearance. Although he was quite bald at the top of his head, his milk-white hair was luxuriant at the sides, and hung in clusters of ringlets. His moustache was so long that it became whisker, and in that condition drooped, also in ringlets, below his chin. The elder guests were inclined to be impatient, the younger to ridicule this rather tactless interruption. Just as it seemed possible something awkward would happen, Robert Browning stopped up and said in his loud, cheerful voice: 'That was charming, Horne! It quite took us to "the warm South" again,' and, cleverly leading the old gentleman's thoughts to a different topic, he put an end to the incident."

THE death occurred at Geneva last week of Landor's son and heir, Mr. Walter Savage Landor, who was born in 1822. Another son, Mr. Charles Landor, who resides at Florence, succeeds to the family estates. Mr. Charles Landor is the father of the traveller, Mr. A. H. Savage Landor.

THE latest champion of the Split Infinitive favours us with the situation in dramatic form:

It seemed a very small thing to cause so much commotion. The critics were examining it excitedly.

"What is the matter with the poor thing?" I asked; and they cried with one voice: "Can't you see? It's split."

It was quite true—the poor thing had an adverb right in the middle of it. But it did not seem unhappy.

"I come out of the works of a good writer," it said proudly; and at that the critics protested again.

"He isn't a good writer! You prove that he isn't!" they cried; and their shouts made me nervous—I had been trying to write a little myself.

"What is the harm of it?" I asked; and at that they ceased to be either so ready or so unanimous.

"We have agreed to unanimously think—" began one, and corrected himself hastily: "We have agreed to think it unanimously wrong." Which I feel sure did not exactly express his meaning.

Another mentioned that somebody's grammar had decided that it was not to be done. But the general verdict was that to split the infinitive was wrong because it had never been done before.

My mind was relieved by the information, because I knew that I had never written any form of expression in my books which I did not find in common use around me.

"If nobody ever does it, why all this excitement?" I asked.

They became unanimous again. "Everybody is doing it," they cried.

"Then the objection to it will soon disappear," I said; "the usage of to-day is the authority for to-morrow, and, after all, a rule of grammar is only a record of what is done."

"But it is useless and unnecessary," they said; and the poor badgered little split infinitive smiled.

"Then, why does everybody use me?" he asked, and it seemed to me that his question would need some answering.

There was one critic who seemed rather tired, and him I took aside. "Does it really pain you all so very much?" I asked.

He glanced round to see that he was not overheard: "Well, it is like this," he said frankly, "suppose you have to criticise style. You may not know what style is, or you may not have time to look for it. So you just glance at the infinitives. If they are split, the man has no style; if they are not split, he has, and your work is all done without any trouble. That is what it seems to me to really amount to."

All unconsciously he had committed the terrible offence. Everybody does.

APPROPOS the mistaken ascription to Mrs. Bardell of the phrase "Let 'em all come," we have received a letter from "C. P. H.," in which he says: "No one, so far as I know, has seriously attempted to write the history of catch-phrases and street-sayings; and one wonders why it is so. Nothing more interesting is conceivable to him with a turn for the curious; yet no one seems to venture. Let us not think of these sayings as merely vulgar trivialities. Many are far more than that. They 'have a tale to tell' that is interesting reading, and are often indicative of past popular movements and Courts. It was a remark of Walter Thornbury, many years ago, that some permanent record of these fleeting phrases would prove invaluable to future students of the history of the manners and customs of London (and elsewhere) in the nineteenth century. Many will agree with him. May the opportunity produce the historian." The historian, we fancy, will need many gifts besides a good memory to make his book really valuable.

IN connexion with the new edition which Emeritus-Professor Bain is about to issue of his great work, The Emotions and the Will, a jocular allusion made by Mr. Andrew Lang (in reviewing, some years ago, a book entitled The Senile Heart) to the venerable Aberdeen Professor has a certain appropriateness: "To catch his right ear in his left hand, his left foot in his right hand, and then to stoop and pick up a piece of paper from the floor with his mouth at the imminent hazard of his nose and spectacles is the ambition of him to whom Europa listens when he talks about the region of the emotions."

THE following amusing appendix to The Open Question appears in the Sketch:

ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.—ALARMING ADVENTURE OF A TOWNSMAN.

The fishing-boat, Celestial City, No. 10,007, Ezra B. Pettigrew, captain, when making for harbour last evening, observed, at the cessation of a severe gale from S.E., a small sail-boat tossed by wind and waves. On examination through a spy-glass it proved to be the Yaffli, China Town, and its occupants, a lady and gentleman, were discovered to be prostrated by sea-sickness. The gallant seamen of the Celestial City tacked towards it, boarded the boat, rescued the crew, and took the sail-boat in tow.

NEARLY DROWNED.

The lady and gentleman, to whom hot brandy and other restoratives were speedily administered, proved to be Mr. Ethan B. Gano and his charming wife, Mrs. Valeria Gano, both of this city.

SUBSTANTIAL FORM OF GRATITUDE.

It is needless to say that on safely reaching the harbour they expressed themselves as sincerely grateful to the crew of the Celestial City in a form substantially expressing their gratitude.

POOR Bard of Avon! He has made his appearance this week, on the boards of a suburban theatre, as a leading figure in a musical extravaganza! The force of irreverent cruelty can no farther go. A Mr. Eden Greville wrote, and produced some years ago at a West End playhouse, a play called "Shakespeare," in which the Bard also made his appearance. Therein, however, Shakespeare was treated with a certain measure of respect. To be sure, he was represented as anticipating, in his conversation, the things he was afterwards to put into his plays; but that was better than portraying him, as in this week's extravaganza, as given to quoting from his works, even to the point of reciting the whole of the "All-the-world's-a-stage" soliloquy. Shakespeare has, no doubt, a good deal to answer for, in one way or another; but after the treatment to which he is subjected in this new fanciful farce (it is called "The Merry-go-Round") all his sins should be forgiven him. I should note that the Bard figured in a musical play, called "The Seven Ages," brought out in America ten years ago; but in that work, I gather, he was not subjected to such indignities as his fellow-countryman has heaped upon him in this week's production.

Some day, I hope—though none of us now alive may be here to see it—there will be a final and authoritative collection, chronological in arrangement, of Carlyle's printed letters. To the number of these a new addition is about to be made, and one is disposed to hope that it may be the last. Few things are more irritating than the fragmentary way in which public personalities are nowadays revealed to us. Only by a piecemeal process can we build up our notions of what famous people were like. In these elaborate times, whole literatures are allowed to grow round interesting individualities—as, for example, in the cases of Tennyson, R. L. Stevenson, D. G. Rossetti, and so forth. I venture to think there are by far too many books about the writers of books; in no other sphere of human activity is there so much biographical loquacity.

Let me add my entreaties to those of "W. J.," who begs Messrs. Smith & Elder to make a single volume of the biographical prefaces which Mrs. Richmond Ritchie has been contributing to the latest edition of her father's Works. Of course, theoretically, we ought all to buy that edition; but for my own part I prefer the editions I already possess. The volumes of the "Biographical" edition are a little noticeable in the matter of avoirdupois. If Mrs. Ritchie's prefaces are ever collected as suggested, I hope they will themselves be prefaced by Mr. Leslie Stephen's condensed (and now revised) biographical sketch, which now so happily supplements Mrs. Ritchie. There would still be room for that two-volume book by Mr. Lewis Melville, which seems likely to have more features of value than I was at first inclined to hope for.

Apropos of "our oldest poet," Mr. Aubrey De Vere is two years older than Mr. "Festus" Bailey, who has just received that imposing description. I can conceive some people arguing that he is also the better poet of the two. Mr. Bailey has done his fame an injury by adding so greatly to the original bulk of "Festus." The "fifteenth-anniversary edition" of that poem runs to 794 well-filled pages! Mr. De Vere, on the other hand, is, perhaps, too austere for "the general." If any of the readers of this column have yet to make acquaintance with Mr. De Vere's work, I would advise them to start with the selection made by Mr. John Dennis, and published some years ago. That, I venture to prophesy, will give them an appetite for the Complete Works.

To read the announcement that the Rev. A. S. Walpole has written a volume called Little Arthur's History of Greece as a companion to Little Arthur's History of England is to feel quite young again. How many worthy middle-aged English people are now living who imbibed their first knowledge of the annals of their country from Lady Calcott's world-famed effort! Have any of them seen a copy of it from those days to these? Few have, I trow. There is, by the way, a Little Arthur's History of France, which made its appearance in the early eighties. There is no reason, of course, why the series should not be indefinitely extended.

They say that Mr. Herman Merivale, one of our few "literary" dramatists, has written, and that young Mr. Martin Harvey will produce, a play on the subject of Don Juan. I fancy that the latest serious drama on this topic was that which Mr. Richard Mansfield published seven or eight years ago, and in which, moreover, he appeared upon the American stage, himself enacting Don Juan. A copy of his work is before me, but I find I have not yet cut the pages thereof. I see, however, that our old friends Leporello, Donna Elvira, and Zerlina reappear in this piece, which has the saving merit of being written in prose.

Gay Erudition.

A Paladin of Philanthropy, and Other Papers. By Austin Dobson. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

"His essays . . . bear that unmistakable stamp which denote the writer who has not crammed his subject for the purpose of preparing an article, but who has, so to speak, let the article write itself out of the fulness of his resources." These words, from p. 167 of this book, are part of a tribute which Mr. Dobson pays to Dr. Birkbeck Hill's literary achievement. But they are so true of Mr. Dobson's own essays that we must insist on perverting them, for the moment, to the praise of their author. The fulness of Mr. Dobson's resources within his own field is his fundamental quality. He charms us because he raps out such numbers of interesting facts. His gay erudition enslaves us. You may say that erudition is nothing without art, and you may protest that there are two Mr. Dobsons—the one who knows facts, and the other who adorns them. But the most usual exposition is not always the most convenient, and it pleases us to insist that Mr. Dobson's charm as a prose-writer is resident mainly in the extraordinary fulness and availability of his knowledge of the social life of the eighteenth century. The man who, walking in the green country, said he thought he could be a poet if he only knew the names of things is credited with having made a shrewd observation. And it is the truth that names and facts, when they live multitudinously in one man's brain, are a pretty sight in themselves. Mr. Dobson provides us with such a spectacle in almost every essay he writes. He multiplies facts; he makes facts explain facts, facts support facts, facts adorn facts; he is a Little Master of mosaic, and his effect is obtained by putting down polished pebbles of fact decisively, with the small, delicate gestures proper to such work. And the pebble is always ready, and the expertness evident. We do not care where you take Mr. Dobson up, the principle holds in degree. Here are a few sentences from the twelfth paper in this book, "The Grub Street of the Arts"—that is to say, St. Martin's-lane:

At or "behind No. 104" lived Sir James Thornhill, in a large house with a grand allegoric staircase painted by himself. One of his successors was John Van Nost, son of the Van Nost of Piccadilly, who rivalled Cheere in leaden figures, and who was credited with that egregious gilt statue of George I. which once adorned the enclosure at Leicester Fields. Another tenant of the same house was Frank Hayman, Hogarth's crony and co-decorator at Vauxhall, who filled so many eighteenth century books with noses à la Cyrano and spindle-shanks. (His own legs, by the way, were probably his model, if one may judge from those of Viscount Squanderfield in the "Marriage A-la-Mode," for whom he was the admitted sitter.)

Now count the lines in this little passage, and then count the facts and suggestions that they harbour. The proportion of mental satisfactions—if we may snatch the term—is surely very large. Well, that is Mr. Dobson's method. In his hands it is a good method. He has employed it in writing the fifty-nine essays which are contained in the three volumes of his Eighteenth Century Vignettes and in this book, which differs from the Vignettes in little more than its title and a red cover.

Mr. Dobson's method keeps its charm because he does not abuse it. The display, even the orderly and effective display, of facts may easily weary by iteration and offend by pedantry. But Mr. Dobson never offends. His method, being perceived, is judged by its own canons; and we think it is no more than true to say that Mr. Dobson rarely, if ever, sets down a needless fact. Writing of Henry Luttrell he says, on p. 219 of this book: "Unlike all or most other wits, Luttrell is never obtrusive; even the choicest bon mots are only brought forth when perfectly applicable, and they are given in a tone of good breeding which enhances their value." Those who know Mr. Dobson's essays best will judge how fitly this tribute to Luttrell might be returned to the giver. Only, for bon mots one would write touches of humour. It goes without saying that Mr. Dobson's method excludes fine writing, the sustained period, and the purple patch. His short swallow-flights of statement and allusion have no association with these arts. Not that Mr. Dobson's style could be called staccato, still less uncoloured. In his paper on "Old Whitehall," a paper which is of peculiar interest just now, Mr. Dobson summarises the events which associate the Banqueting Hall with the Merry Monarch:

It was in the Banqueting-House that Charles begged his Honourable House of Commons to amend the ways about Whitehall, so that Catherine of Braganza might not upon her arrival find it "surrounded by water"; it was in the Banqueting-House that he gravely went through that half-solemn, half-ludicrous business of touching for the evil; it was in the Banqueting-House that, coming from the Tower of London with a splendid cavalcade, he created at one time six Earls and six Barons. Under its storied roof he magnificently entertained the French Ambassador, Charles Colbert, Marquis de Croissy, on which occasion he presented Mr. Evelyn, from his own royal plate, with a piece of that newly-imported Barbadian luxury, the King-pine; it was here also that he received the Russian Ambassador with his present of carpets and sables and "sea-horse teeth," and the swarthy envoys from Morocco, with their scymetars and white albays, and their lions and "estridges" [ostriches]. But perhaps the brightest and most vivid page in connection with this famous old building is that in which . . .

Here is colour. But Mr. Dobson adds a long quotation from Pepys, and already, in his bracketted explanation of "estridges," he has shown how far from his intention it was to indulge in anything like a rhythmic "flight." Imagine Macaulay—who delighted to assemble a multitude of facts—allowing such a passage to walk so quietly, and end as a porch to Pepys's Diary. But Mr. Dobson does it, and we are not disappointed. For, as we have said, Mr. Dobson has no brush to flourish, no pot of purple to exhaust; he works in mosaic with a neat dexterity.

Yet we would not suggest that he has no "passages" which can be read for their own sake. When it is needful Mr. Dobson can give us a picture broadly painted. Thus, he is describing Old Slaughter's Coffee-House in St. Martin's-lane—this hostelry stood at the southern corner of Great Newport-street, which is now absorbed in Cranbourne-street; its bow windows looked up Long Acre—he writes:

Its chief customers were the artist-folk of the Lane and its vicinity. Hither from Leicester Fields would come Hogarth, bragging of the new-old theories in the "Analysis," and scoffing at the "grand contorno" of the virtuosi; hither Hayman, and the gold-chaser Moser, and Isaac Ware, the chimney-sweep-turned-architect who translated "Palladio," and (from his studio over the way) Roubillac, raving in broken English of the beauties of the Chevalier Bernini. Here, again, would be seen the shrewd Swiss enameller Rouquet, taking notes of the state of the Arts in England for the benefit of Marshal Belle-Isle; and Gravelot, who held that no Englishman could draw; and "Friar" John Pine of the incised "Horace," who had a print-shop at No. 88. Luke Sullivan, the engraver of the "March to Finchley," McArdell the mezzotinter, and Richard Wilson from Covent Garden were also well-known visitors; while in later days, when evening drew on, and the last rays of light faded from the unfinished canvas, the tall, ungainly figure of Wilkie would slip in quietly to a remote table and a hurried meal at which modest repast he would sometimes be joined by a noisier and more demonstrative companion, the Benjamin Robert Haydon whose ambitious "Curtius leaping into the Gulf" now adorns a London restaurant. Nor was there wanting a sprinkling of authors to carry on the traditions of Pope and Dryden, for Collins of the "Odes" is reported to have used this time-honoured hostelry, and Goldsmith refers to its Orators in the "Essays" as if his knowledge were experimental. Here, too (as everywhere), was to be found Johnson, studying spoken French from the mouths of the French frequenters of the place, and (always) expressing his opinions in forcible language. The "fasting Monsieurs" — so he calls them in his London — disgusted him with their harebrained and irresponsible frivolity. "For anything I see," he declared, confirming the previous verdict of a friend, "foreigners are Fools!"

We have made only illustrative use of the contents of Mr. Dobson's new volume. The "Paladin of Philanthropy" turns out to be our old friend General Oglethorpe—he who founded Georgia and praised Johnson's London "in all companies." This is not the longest essay in the volume. In discoursing on Goldsmith's Poems and Plays Mr. Dobson adds a third to two earlier essays on this writer; and his paper on "The Latest Life of Steele" (Mr. Aitken's) may be linked to "Steele's Letters" in the Vignettes. Two writers of reminiscences, John Taylor and Harry Angelo, give Mr. Dobson congenial matter to quote and expound. Angelo gave Byron lessons in the broadsword, and presented him with a screen (which Mr. Murray is believed to possess) which bears on one side "all the eminent pugilists from Broughton to Jackson, on the other the great actors from Betterton to Kean." One cannot remember any other English poet of note to whom such a gift could have been offered. John Taylor has one good story about Macklin, the actor, which Mr. Dobson kindly rejuvenates:

He saw him [Macklin] in Iago, in Sir Paul Pliant of the "Double Dealer," and in other characters; but held that he was "too theoretical for nature. He had three pauses in his acting—the first, moderate; the second, twice as long; but his last, or 'grand pause,' as he styled it, was so long that the prompter on one occasion, thinking his memory failed, repeated the cue . . . several times, and at last so loud as to be heard by the audience." Whereupon Macklin, in a passion, rushed from the stage and knocked him down, exclaiming: "The fellow interrupted me in my grand pause."

Henry Luttrell, the forgotten society wit; Gay and his "Trivia"; Boswell's predecessors and editors; "Old Whitehall"; "Changes at Charing Cross"—such is the material of these essays. It is the material with which Mr. Dobson has worked all along, and of which his mind is full. In these days people are not willingly interested in the eighteenth century, and Mr. Dobson knows it. It is his triumph that he holds us not by disguising his subjects, or pleading for them, or linking them to present interests; he holds his readers by showing them that he knows the eighteenth century as minutely as they know the nineteenth. He holds them by a gay erudition which, in its own field, is unparalleled.

A Monument of Personality.

Confessions of an English Opium Eater. By Thomas De Quincey. (J. M. Dent. 1s. 6d. net.)

To the "Temple Classics" has been added an edition of De Quincey's well-known Confessions of an Opium Eater. Mr. Walter Jerrold is responsible for the edition, and for the compact notes which are added to the volume. With these latter we have but one trifling fault to find. In a note to De Quincey's quotation from Wordsworth—

Or lady of the lake

Sole-sitting by the shores of old romance—

it is said: "This should read, 'Or lady of the mere.'" De Quincey himself, as his editor should know, elsewhere explains that "lady of the lake" was the original reading of this famous passage, which Wordsworth afterwards lamentably marred by substituting "mere," purely because

"lady of the lake" happened then to be a cant term for a public woman. A more serious fault is, that there are occasional misprints in the text, which show a lack of careful proof-reading. But with these trifling flaws the edition should henceforth become a favourite with all lovers of the Confessions.

The editor has wisely given us the revised edition, not the original reprint. From a purely artistic standpoint, the original form is, perhaps, best. It is more compact, more confined to the essential and central point of the dreams; there is less of the De Quinceyan flux and involution of verbose clauses. But there is so much additional matter in the revised edition of the profoundest interest to all lovers of the Opium Eater that none of them would willingly forego it. Then, even from the artistic standpoint, there are passages in the latter—such as the description of De Quincey's sensations in the deserted ball-room of the Shrewsbury hotel, where he halted on his flight to London—of quite characteristic solemnity and elevation, showing his style at its best, or nearly so. We could not spare the later edition, with all its multitudinous faults upon its back.

It is one of the strangest of masterpieces—disproportionate, voluble, divagating, exasperating, tedious, insistent upon the infinitely little, full of sentences which no man can grasp at first reading, merely from their intricate burden of qualifying clauses, again qualified by qualifying clauses, till the attention faints under the onerous and continued effort; yet a masterpiece none the less. That is the wonder. A masterpiece none the less. It is a monument of personality, triumphant over all defects issuing from that personality. Because they issue from and illustrate it, they become themselves interesting; but this could not be unless it were a very singular personality. Part of the interest lies in the contrast between the man and his destiny. A recluse mind, of Asiatic subtlety and intellectuality, shrinking by nature from decision and action, given over to endless reading and reverie, he would have been best as an Indian sage, or, failing that, as an Oxford don. His temperament is shown by one highly significant fact which he relates. Passionately fond of music, he yet found it impossible to learn the piano. And why? Because the effort of execution disturbed the perfect passivity needful for the receptive enjoyment of music. The pleasure of a performer is utterly different from the pleasure of a listener; and it was for the latter alone that De Quincey was qualified. Such he was: shy, gentle, tender-hearted, if they do allege that he had a portion of feminine spite (which may be doubtful); yet also with an endless capacity for brilliant talk when he was drawn into society. Yet this delicate student was thrown into the most active contact with strange sufferings and experiences, such as few among the most energetic temperaments encounter in their life history. Such a personality in such alien surroundings presents a piquant contrast and curious psychological results.

Yet it need never have been. There is a sense of Greek tragedy, of fatal impulsion, in the course of his life. Born heir to a modest but sufficient patrimony, he ought to have passed to the University, and there have taken his natural place as a don. Literature would have lost some singularly exotic writings, but a life would have been saved from blight. His guardians were inexcusable in their neglect or hard obstinacy. His mother (though he does his filial best to shield her) was an intolerable specimen of religious priggishness, of cold self-righteousness. Between them all the little sensitive, contemplative genius received cruel measure. It is not only the turbulent who break bounds and scandalise decorous authority; the timorous, ill-understood child of genius, who cannot fit into the pigeon-hole made for him, is oft-times driven into that revolt not native to him. So the lad, desiring only to study and think, fled first from school, and then to London, where he hid from his guardians and tried to raise money on his expectations—only to be left, by the calculated delays of money-lenders, in starvation.

What we get, at this wretched human cost, is a glimpse of the tragedy of the London streets seen through the most refined and alien of organisations. He found shelter at night in the decaying house of a shady legal practitioner in Greek-street. There he was the partner and protector of a poor little child, more piteous than the Marchioness in the house of Sampson Brass. She, poor ignorant waif of ten; he, strange dreamy creature of culture, a fallen leaf from the social trees above her; both forlorn, and weak, and hunger-bitten, they came together from the opposite poles of life. Having so many practical ills to fear, she feared also ghosts, and nestled to his arms from the desolate cold and the spectres of her childish fancy. Their heads on a bundle of law-papers, covered only with a cloak and such odds-and-ends as they could rout from a lumber room—what novelist's invention has peopled a house at night with a more pathetically incongruous pair?

Better known is that other sad friend of his, the "unfortunate" Ann, who saved his life when his head dropped swooning from her own starving bosom. Together, in the memory of all pitiful souls, these two will for ever pace Oxford-street, the "stony-hearted." But the climax of the book is, of course, the dreams, and the strange revelations of opium with which it concludes, both ultimately resulting from the effects of those early privations. In spite of De Quincey's elaborate and thoroughly scientific account of the mysterious workings of opium, it is a memorable proof how inveterate are popular prepossessions that not one among the vulgar prejudices he combats is a whit less prevalent and strongly held to-day. That opium has the effect of stupifying; that it has the very contrary effect of making drunk; that it hurries its victim rapidly to the grave; that it is to some unknown extent and in some vaguely-conceived way more deadly than alcohol—all these things are as much matters of faith as ever they were. If only to establish the true effects of the singular drug, to clear it from its fanciful, and confine it to its quite sufficiently real evils, this book would be worth reading.

But the crowning glory of it is the dreams. The level excellence of these has, indeed, been exaggerated. There is much (let us grant it) which is laboured, much where the elaborate paraphernalia of an astonishingly complex and accomplished technique is accumulated without sufficient warrant of underlying inspiration. But for those who know how to distinguish and select there are here passages of such vaporous sublimity (in the truest sense of that abused word), such ministerial grandours of style, as we know not where else to look for. Over all the manifold technical resources of style, the most intricate, and in its most exacting manifestations as applied to subject-matter the most exhausting, De Quincey possessed a mastery never excelled, and—on the whole—scarce equalled in the long range of English prose. And here you may find the chosen treasure-house of its display. The mere architecture of the sentences in some of the chief passages is to the literary student an astonishment. That well-known dream which ends with the exclamation: "I will sleep no more!" is, among many superlative examples, the superlative example. Such long march of intermingled clauses, all controlled and marshalled without confusion; such gradual accumulation and gathering of sound, agitated, retarded, accelerated, and at length hurrying to the climax as with the irresistible impulsion of its own amassed weight; lastly, such a close, such a reverberant and long-falling finale, like the breaking of many waters, all mark this out as an unparalleled exhibition of virtuosity in style. He speaks (in the Spanish Military Nun) of "a mighty sunset rolling down like a chorus"; and that fine phrase might fitly describe the grandours of his own sentence-closes. He was indeed a virtuoso in prose; it was his orchestra, for which he composed, and over which he was master in all its resources.

A Dashing Little-Englander.

The Ipané. By Cunninghame Graham. (T. Fisher Unwin: "The Overseas Library," No. 1. 2s.)

As a contribution to impressionistic literature this book is often satisfying and brilliant; but if one regards it as an indication of the abraded condition of Mr. Cunninghame Graham's susceptibilities, it is a really painful "document." England has settled permanently upon his nerves, to the ruin not only of his equanimity, but of his grammar. The first sentence in the book is a sad example of the effect of constant annoyance upon a man with a genuine feeling for words—a stylist in fact. It must be quoted: "None of the following sketches and stories have the least connection with one another, or with each other." We consider that such a sentence—unless, indeed, it was written "east of Suez, where there ain't no ten commandments" of syntax—is distinctly too unconventional for this prim and convention-ridden country. It is possible, of course, that Mr. Graham wrote it maliciously, just to show his scorn for our British manners. Ah! those manners! No matter what subject he is discussing—whether it is the internal polity of Paraguay, or niggers, or the death of William Morris—Mr. Graham will bring them in. Even when inventing a new Icelandic saga, he will devote pages, whole pages, to the vituperation of those manners:

In fact the man was a survival, or at the least an instance, of atavism strongly developed, or would have been so styled in England; but in Iceland all such niceties were not observed, and his compatriots merely called him mad, being convinced of their own sanity, as men who make good wages, go to church, observe the weather and the stocks, read books for pastime, marry and have large families, pay such debts as the law forces them to pay, and never think on abstract matters, always are convinced in every land.

You see: we are not even to pay our debts; and as for earning a livelihood or going through the ceremony of marriage . . .

And further:

The weak are the majority. The weak of brain, of body, the knock-kneed and flat-footed, muddled-minded, loose-jointed, ill-put-together, baboon-faced, the white-eyelashed, slow of wit, the practical, the unimaginative, forgetful, selfish, dense, the stupid, fatuous, the "candle-moulded," give us our laws, impose their standard on us, their ethics, their philosophy, canon of art, literary style, their jingling music, vapid plays, their dock-tailed horses, coats with buttons in the middle of the back; their hideous fashions, auilne colours, their Leaders, Leightons, Logsdails. . . .

That "Logsdails" is the last perfecting touch. Imagine it: to the accident of an initial letter the painter of the admirable "Venetian Courtyard," in this year's New Gallery, owes his inclusion in the "Snaekoll's Saga" of Mr. Cunninghame Graham!

If the English do not blush under Mr. Graham's indictments it is probably because they are "pug-nosed"—yes, "pug-nosed brothers in the Lord"—and, therefore, incapable of the act. Yet they have much to be thankful for. They should be thankful that they are not Scotchmen. Mr. Graham is a Scotchman, but he has the stern spirit of a Roman father, and he saves for his own countrymen the bitterest, the most savage, of all his satire and invective.

The reader may be inclined to ask what all this has to do with the "Overseas Library," with "the actual life of the English outside England," as the editorial preface phrases it. We do not know. Not half the book is even remotely connected with the ostensible subject of Mr. Unwin's new series. Probably a hundred pages would contain all that the author has to say about the doings of the abhorred English overseas. Let us say again that those hundred pages are excellent. Mr. Graham has been a traveller for many years. He has observed, if not wisely, at least picturesquely. He has a fine natural instinct for literature, and he writes as one who, if he had taken himself seriously, might have reached true distinction. Sketches like "Bristol Fashion" and "The Ipané" could hardly be bettered for colour and the quick movement of life; they have real value; they paint pictures on your mind which you cannot soon efface. As for the rest of the book, it is mere rhodomontade and irresponsibility and crude thinking; for Mr. Graham has made a mistake often made by travellers. To wander far is not always the best way to arrive at a just estimate of human nature, and there is nothing more conventional than the hatred of conventionality. It may happen that the explorer of two hemispheres is more narrow-minded and priggish than the common man who has stayed at home, married, earned good wages, and sat on a coroner's jury.

A Greek Exponent of Culture.

Longinus on the Sublime. The Greek Text after the Paris Manuscript. With Introduction, Translation, Facsimiles, and Appendices. By W. Rhys Roberts, M.A. (Cambridge: University Press. 9s.)

THIS is an admirable and scholarly edition of an author somewhat neglected during the present century. It is based on the best text, taking into account the labours of Continental scholars; it is furnished with an exhaustive yet succinct introduction, dealing with the disputed points in regard to the treatise; and with excellent appendices, furnishing exact aid to the student concerning the text, the peculiarities of vocabulary, the authors mentioned by Longinus, and the bibliography of the work. All this was needed, for (as Mr. Roberts reminds us) it is sixty years since the last English edition of this celebrated book. Finally, Mr. Roberts provides a very careful and good translation, printed in parallel pages with the Greek text. This is an arrangement we should like to see extended to other classical works; and altogether we have here the edition of Longinus which every student will wish to see on his shelves.

The book constitutes in effect a critical and to some extent comparative study of Greek and Roman literature, by a cultivated Greek of rather uncertain date. Since it is not on the Sublime, and probably not by Longinus, it has naturally been called Longinus on the Sublime. "Would you desire a better reason?" as Falstaff says. It has long been ascribed to Cassius Longinus, the famous Greek rhetorician of the third century A.D., who became minister to Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, and encouraged that learned and spirited queen to resist the Emperor Aurelian. Aurelian did not approve of the doctrinaire in politics—such as Mr. John Morley; and somewhat over-emphasised his views by hanging Longinus. But, in spite of this elevated end, it is now generally admitted that Longinus did not write the treatise On Elevation. It is a pity, because there would have been a touch of the Squeersian method about Aurelian's sentence. The work was probably written about the first century by an unknown Greek rhetorician. As for the title, it does not signify the sublime in our present English sense. "On the Grand Style" would be a nearer rendering, using the phrase in Matthew Arnold's sense to mean the elevated and dignified style in literature.

It is an interesting book, for all the touch of obviousness which it sometimes has, inevitably, to modern eyes. Here you may perceive what a Matthew Arnold of the early empire was like; substituting Greek letters for English, and Roman for French. A fervent disciple of culture, in his quest of the grand style he ranges over the whole field of Greek and Latin literature, and even gets in an allusion to Moses. He actually quotes, as an example of grandeur, the first chapter of Genesis: "God said, Let there be light, and there was light: Let there be land, and there was land." Not quite accurate, as though he were generalising from memory, but a surprising example of liberal taste in the old critic. Macaulay fell foul of him for praising a passage of Plato, "as full of conceit as an ode of Cowley." De Quincey abused him for his "frosty raptures" over the vast strides of Neptune in Homer, and asked how they were superior to Jack's seven-league boots. But De Quincey was in his most frisky abomination of slangy humour, and one knows not whether to think it a serious view of Longinus. An "old critical posture-master," he calls him; and there is some truth in it. Longinus (he must keep the name, for want of another) is apt to be "frosty" in his set outbursts of eulogy, and to be thinking of his own eloquence while he affects to praise another. One feels him often childish from the advanced standpoint of modern criticism. The "grand" passages he admires at times seem a trifle obvious to our taste. And he shrinks with timid dislike from a boldly poetical passage in Æschylus, where, on the apparition of Dionysus—

Frenzy-struck is the hall, bacchant the roofs.

The daring metaphor is too much for him; but the modern—and English—poet will admire its fine energy of imagination. As if the quaking of the walls, the quivering of the roofs, might not with perfect imaginative keeping be compared to Bacchic possession! He is superficial, he has no philosophic insight. And he writes confoundingly difficult Greek, which only a profound or brilliant author has a privilege to do. But he is a mine of interesting quotation, he has a high-minded view, he is right at the root; and his general criticism is eminently sensible, sometimes strikingly just. Not illuminative, but just—that is the word for his criticism in its best flashes. Take the passage, for instance, where he condemns an over-rhythmical style, because it expresses not the emotion of the words but of the rhythm. He means a set of rhythm, and he is right. But he should rather have said that such rhythm is meaningless, and, in truth, conveys no emotion at all. The point is, that he knew the function of rhythm was to express emotion—which few modern critics know. A very interesting book in an edition which it is a pleasure to read.

The Memorial Catalogue of the Burns Exhibition. (Hodge: Glasgow. 42s.)

In the summer of 1896, the galleries of the Royal Glasgow Institute of the Fine Arts were given up to an exhibition of portraits, pictures, manuscripts, books, and relics connected with Robert Burns. The undertaking was managed with peculiar success, and such a complete collection of objects of interest was shown as, perhaps, had never before been brought together in connexion with any man of mark, and may never be excelled in the future. A memento of this occasion is now obtainable in the form of an exhaustive catalogue, illustrated very fully by reproductions of certain of the more interesting exhibits. From these we reproduce a few portraits.

The beautiful head of the poet is from a drawing by Archibald Skirving, a skilled portrait artist in chalk and crayons. The original is in red crayon, and is the property of Sir Theodore Martin. Nasmyth's best portrait (he painted three altogether) is supposed to be the best of all, but Skirving's is very persuasive. Nasmyth's may be consulted at any time at the National Portrait Gallery. The head is rounder, the eyes are larger and more intense; perhaps it is nearer realism. Many other portraits distinguished the exhibition, among them one of Burns as a youth, lent by Lord Rosebery. On the back was an account of the picture, stating that it had belonged to a gentleman of New York whose father, a doctor, had received it from an old patient called Mrs. Cunningham, who was first both Hyslop Burns. Subsequently she became Mrs. Thomson, of Crossmyloof. She was born in 1791 and lived until 1873. As she was but four when her father died she had but little to tell of him at first hand. Below these, from a photograph, is Robert Burns, the poet's eldest son, in whose head, curiously enough, it is more easy to trace a likeness to Scott than to Burns. Lastly, we give a portrait of Isabella Burns, afterwards Mrs. Begg, the poet's youngest daughter. This picture is from a painting by Robert Taylor, and was lent by Mr. Robert Burns Begg, a direct descendant of the poet.

For these portraits, and also the other relics shown in the Royal Glasgow Institute Galleries, the Committee had to thank the piety of collectors and private individuals, most of whom dwell, as the owners of such things should, in Scotland. The need for such piety cannot, of course, be too forcibly insisted upon, especially nowadays, when the enterprise of Americans is so keen and astute. The number of articles of priceless value which cross the Atlantic every year is enormous. At every sale of literary curiosities which may be held, in any part of this country, American collectors have their representatives, who are, probably, better furnished with money or with generosity than their English rivals. We have already said something of the need for patriotism in such matters; which is continually being illustrated by news of America's wealth and our increasing poverty in early Shakespeares. No such exhibition as this of Burns relics will be possible soon, unless we strive to keep our treasures at home.

We have, of course, only dipped into this Burns catalogue. Its cousin to Mary Campbell—"Highland Mary." The picture had been painted for Mary Campbell, and after her death it passed to her cousin: about a portrait so much romance may play!

Below the Burns is a water-colour drawing of old Mrs. Burns, the poet's mother, and, beside it, a photograph of her grand-daughter, and Burns' daughter, Eliza-riches are manifold: and the care and taste that have been expended by the publishers upon it are another proof of the place which Burns holds in his native land. To possess it is to be at once curiously in touch with the poet and his friends and neighbours. Indeed, no careful biography could so vividly bring the life of Burns before the mind.

War in the Dir'st Degree.

Memoirs of Sergeant Bourgogne, 1812-1813. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THIS is a book which one lays down with fatigue—the fatigue that is honourable to the writer. We revolve the tragedies of the flight from Moscow with a sense of having laid in material for thought in unarrived moments when the imagination is aglow.

This Bourgogne was a Vélite sergeant of the Imperial Guard. In 1812 he was in Portugal, engaged against the English. One day they received orders to march for Russia, and six months later Bourgogne heard the historic shout, "Moscow! Moscow!" We are with him in all his duties in the deserted burning city. We know how his company fared; what preposterous comforts and treasures they amassed, running through flaming and falling streets. The miserable convicts who fired the city are shot against walls. A Jew, tearing his beard to see his synagogue in flames, is seized by Bourgogne for a guide. All his valuables, he says, were in the synagogue: "Have they anything to sell or exchange?" They loot an Italian confectioner's shop and are cut off by flames; then, sheltering from rain and fire, they pass the time in making jam-fritters. In their quarters the non-commissioned officers lie "like pashas on ermine, sable, lion, and bear skins, smoking costly tobacco in magnificent pipes"; they have champagnes, preserved fruits, and silver ingots.

Then the flight, and its crescendo of horror. Even two days after leaving Moscow the scene was grotesque:

The next day (the 30th) the road had become very heavy, and many carts laden with booty had the greatest difficulty in getting along. Several were damaged, and others were lightened by throwing away useless parts of the load. I was that day in the rear-guard, and could see from the extreme rear of the column the beginning of the frightful disorder that followed. The road was heaped with valuable things—pictures, candlesticks, and quantities of books. For more than an hour I was picking up volumes, which I glanced through, and then threw down again, to be taken up by others, who in their turn left them on the road—books such as Voltaire, Jean Jacques Rousseau, and Buffon's Natural History, bound in red morocco and gold.

Surely War's ironies have seldom produced a stranger picture than this—Napoleon's horde flinging down the literature of their country which the studious Muscovites had bound in morocco and gold.

One might ponder on the way in which the soldier and the natural man played on each other in this unparalleled walk through the snow. On a certain night some hundreds of men were burned to death in a barn, and their comrades robbed their bodies and, warming themselves, said, "What a beautiful fire!" Yet the next night a hundred and fifty dragoons stood all night round the Prince Émile of Hesse-Cassel, pressing tightly against each other to protect him (he was not twenty years old) from the fiendish north wind. In the morning three-quarters of these men were frozen dead, along with ten thousand others who had sunk in the snow during the night. Hunger and honour contended all through the hellish drama.

At Smolensk we have a lurid scene in a church where Bourgogne, nigh dead with cold and hunger, finds his own company singing, mad drunk; some clown playing on the organ amid volumes of smoke; the churchyard heaped with dead bodies for which no graves could be scooped in the frozen soil; and the door blocked with corpses over which new-comers walked as over logs, without a glance at their feet.

Once Bourgogne fell by the way, and begged an old grenadier to help him. "I have not got any," he said, raising two stumps to show that his hands were cut off. Fortunately, he found a friend, one Picart, an old moustache, a good fellow with an unquenchable humour, and for three days these two dodged hunger and the Cossacks through leagues of forest. Picart adored the Emperor. Yet he would break out:

He is a regular fool of a conscript to have waited so long in Moscow. A fortnight was long enough to eat and drink everything we found there; but to stay there thirty-four days just waiting for winter to come on! I call that folly. If he were here, I could tell him to his face that isn't the way to lead men. Good God! the dances he has led me the last sixteen years. We suffered enough in Egypt—in the Syrian deserts; but that's nothing compared with these deserts of snow.

When the two struck the mournful columns, they were able to watch the Emperor go by. He was followed by seven or eight hundred officers and non-commissioned officers, "walking in order and perfect silence, and carrying the eagles of their different regiments, which so often had led them to victory. This was all that remained of 60,000 men." After them came the Imperial Guard, to which the two wanderers belonged. Picart wept, and struck the ground with his musket, saying: "I don't know mon pays, if I am awake or dreaming. It breaks my heart to see our Emperor on foot, his baton in his hand. He, so great, who made us all so proud of him!" It is a picture that we know.

Sergeant Bourgogne lived through it all, had the cross of the Legion of Honour, and settled down to be—a draper! It was an inspiration to give Alphonse Chigot's sketch of Bourgogne after he had left the Army—Bourgogne in a tall hat and curly hair, the boulevard figure of an old soldier, kindly, courteous ("wouldn't hurt a fly"), ready for a newspaper and a glass of wine. And all that behind him: the fires of Moscow, the snow, the wolves, the obscene hunger, the league-long litter of dead men glad to be dead. The portrait we reproduce shows us Bourgogne the soldier, with the cares of command on his set face.

Bourgogne died in his bed, well tended, in 1867, and his book lives as a soldier's record of war at its worst.

I LOVE the great despisers because they are the great adorers, they are arrows of longing for the other shore.

I do not want many honours nor great treasures; that inflameth the milt. But one sleepeth badly without a good name and a small treasure.

THE ART OF DINING.

BY A. HAYWARD.

A new edition of an urbane and entertaining book. The matter therein first saw the light in the Quarterly in 1835-6, and was reprinted, with additions, in 1852. Hayward, it seems, played the part of guide-post, pointing the way, but not taking it; for he wrote: "The fact is, I got up that article just as I would get up a speech from a brief, and I would not eat half the things mentioned in it if they paid me for it." Of good stories there are many in the book. This, for instance, of the Duke of Wellington:

The Duke once requested the connoisseur whom the author of Tuncred terms "the finest judge in Europe" to provide him a chef. Felix, whom the late Lord Seaford was reluctantly about to part with on economical grounds, was recommended and received. Some months afterwards his patron was dining with Lord Seaford, and before the first course was half over he observed: "So I find you have got the Duke's cook to dress your dinner." "I have got Felix," replied Lord S., "but he is no longer the Duke's cook. The poor fellow came to me with tears in his eyes, and begged me to take him back again, at reduced wages or no wages at all, for he was determined not to remain at Apsley House. 'Has the Duke been finding fault?' said I. 'Oh, no, my lord; I would stay if he had: he is the kindest and most liberal of masters; but I serve him a dinner that would make Ude or Franeatelli burst with envy, and he says nothing; I go out and leave him to dine on a dinner badly dressed by the cookmaid, and he says nothing. Dat hurt my feelings, my lord.'"

Mr. Charles Sayle has revised the little manual, and added notes, recent menus, and some college graces. A very agreeable work. (Murray. 5s.)

THE QUEEN'S SERVICE.

BY HORACE WYNDHAM.

This book embodies the experiences of a private soldier in a British infantry regiment at home and abroad. It is a really excellent budget of information about Army life in all its aspects. We have chapters entitled "Route-Marching and Field Days," "Sunday in Barracks," "On Escort Duty," "A Military Court Martial," "A Voyage in a Troopship," "Soldiering in Gibraltar," "A Military Funeral," "Married Life in the Army," besides many others equally to the point. The book is not one on which we can dwell at length, but the following story, which was related to the author by the convivial sergeant who enlisted him at St. George's Barracks, is so amusing and racy of the army that we quote it:

One afternoon in December two young men came sheepishly into the barrack-square. That they were regular country bumpkins was patent at a glance. A smart Sergeant of Hussars, spotting them as likely subjects for that branch of Her Majesty's Service which he himself adorned, hastened up, and accosted them.

"Well, my lads! You'd like to join the Army, I dare say. How would you like to come into my regiment, wear a smart uniform, carry a sword, and have a fine horse to ride? Come, what do you say?"

"That would be prime, wouldn't it, Bill?" eagerly exclaimed the first yokel. "Us'll come, mister."

"That's right, my men! Come along and have a drink with me."

Just at that moment up came Recruiting-sergeant number two, a Gunner, who also had his eye on the men, and likewise on his recruiting fee.

"Hie, you men!" he broke in, "what's that chap there been sayin' to yer? He's been a-kiddin' you, 'e 'as! You're fond of 'osses, I dessay? Well, then, just you come along with me, and you'll 'ave two 'osses each to ride, and when you're tired of riding, why, you can sit on the gun-carriage. What do you think of that, now?"

"Orl roight, Sergeant. That'll suit us, won't it, Bill?"

"Ay, that it will!" replied his companion, apparently dazzled by the thought of the stud of horses waiting for him, and the prospect of wearing a gold-braided jacket like the sergeant's. At this point my friend, Sergeant Gibson, arrived on the scene, and, quickly divining the circumstances, exclaimed, "Come, my fine fellows! Don't you believe a word of what these two chaps have been a-telling you! You take my advice, now, and just let me send you into my corps. I've got two vacancies in the regiment, one for Sergeant-major, and one for Quarter-master. You can toss up, between you, which you'll have!"

"I got them two blokes," said old Gibson, with a chuckle. "They're in India now. They've been six years in the regiment, and they're both privates still."

We can cordially recommend Mr. Wyndham's book—which, by the way, is dedicated, "by permission, to Rudyard Kipling, the friend of soldiers"—to all who take a personal or patriotic interest in the army. (Heinemann. 3s. 6d.)

BRYHTNOTH'S PRAYER.

BY C. W. STUBBS, D.D.

Dean Stubbs combines the pietist, the archaeologist, and the humorist in this genial little book. He is not a poet exactly, but he has a pretty rhyming faculty and cheery sentiments. We quote one of the more mischievous poems, "Memorable!":

And did you once find Browning plain?
And did he really seem quite clear?
And did you read the book again?
How strange it seems and queer!

And you were living before that,
And you are living after,
"Red-night-cap Country," think of that;
It almost moves my laughter.

I read it once, or was it?—No!
"Sordello," that was it, no doubt:
The "History of a Soul," you know,
Six thousand lines, or thereabout.

But thoughts I picked up as I read it,
And one, indeed, should be confess't
If Guelph you put in Ghibbelin's stead, it—
Well, I forget the rest.

Dean Stubbs afterwards atones for this by a reverent sonnet on Browning. (Unwin. 1s. 6d.)

FAMOUS LADIES OF THE ENGLISH COURT.

BY MRS. AUBREY RICHARDSON.

Mrs. Richardson has written a book which will be enjoyed by ladies to whom Miss Strickland's works appeal, or are no longer accessible. She aims at something more than compilation: it has been her aim to make allowances for "the jealousies of memoir-writers and diary-keepers." Hence, in her account of Penelope, Lady Rich, Mrs. Richardson says:

Her life-story has been often told, though never with completeness. In The Dictionary of National Biography Mr. Sidney Lee gives a highly detailed and exhaustively referenced account of her career; but no touch of sympathy, no attempt to understand the nature of a sensitive woman, placed in a difficult position, disturbs the serenity of his lofty condemnation of her frailties.

It is possible, however, that Mrs. Richardson misunderstands the scope of the Dictionary; neither condemnation nor forgiveness has any importance in its pages compared with facts. Mrs. Richardson's sketches are twelve in all, and include the Lady Mary Sidney; Lucy, Countess of Carlisle; Anne, Countess of Sunderland; Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough; and the Lady Sarah Lennox. An interesting book. The illustrations are numerous, but vary greatly in the merit of their printing. (Hutchinson. 10s.)

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

BY W. BLAKE ODGERS.

This book is "an attempt to sketch our existing system of Local Government, to state in popular language the net result of the combination of recent legislation with the former law." It is the substance of six lectures delivered in Middle Temple Hall, and is modelled on Mr. Mackenzie D. Chalmers's book on the same subject in the "English Citizen" series. There is a difference between the two works, due to time. Mr. Chalmers pleaded for reform; Mr. Odgers gives thanks for the reforms secured by the Local Government Acts of 1888 and 1894. Yet Time is again the victor, for Mr. Odgers's book was in print before Mr. Balfour brought in the London Government Bill now before Parliament, and hence this measure does not receive notice in its pages. With this disadvantage, it remains a very clear and orderly exposition of a difficult subject. (Macmillan.)

THE STATESMAN'S YEAR BOOK, 1899.

Dr. Scott Keltie, the editor of this excellent handbook, again has compiled a valuable and interesting volume of information. The year 1898 was a busy one, including as it did the Soudan Campaign, the American-Spanish War, and the division of China, but these great events are carefully accounted for in these pages. The new maps are two of Africa, showing telegraph and political divisions, and existing and projected railways; Newfoundland, illustrating the French shore question; and Hong Kong and adjacent territories. The present is the thirty-sixth year of issue. (Macmillan.)

NOTES ON COLOUR.

BY W. CLIFTON.

This is a book of a new kind: a manual of drawing both practical and jocular. For Mr. Clifton, who is Professor of Painting at the Royal Artillery Institution at Woolwich, is also a humorist. This is one of his landscape riles:

First came the sky, then came the Earth,
Earth to herbage then gave birth;
Man was born to sorrow and sin,
He was made last, so put him last in.

And we find also this piece of concentrated wisdom:

It was so of old, it is so now,
May be till crack of doom;
Roots must toil beneath the soil
That flowers above may bloom.

The purpose of Mr. Clifton's work is to show that the laws which regulate monochrome can in most cases be applied to colour when painting. (Grant Richards. 2s.)

A GEM OF ORTHODOXY.

BY S. L. MARSDEN.

The title of this book is a joke. It is the only one, but it has the advantage of being repeated on every other page. The author's purpose is to show that the central dogmas of the Christian creed are immoral and absurd. So the book opens with the doctrine of redemption as it was rather loosely stated by "a popular evangelical missionary" in 1874. For twenty years Mr. Marsden waited in painful silence for a solution that should satisfy his moral sense; then he set himself finally to demolish the theological edifice of nineteen centuries. To quote from Gibbons (sic), Moheim, Milner, and others all that has been written of simony, temporal ambition, and unscrupulous intrigue, omitting all allusion to virtue, civilisation, and saintship, then indignantly to ask, Shall these be your prophets?—this is Mr. Marsden's simple method of preparing the way for an examination of the teaching of the Scriptures. When he comes down into the arena of Biblical criticism, Mr. Marsden's equipment may be judged from the fact that he builds up an elaborate—and truly an original—argument against the personality of the Holy Ghost out of the rarity of initial capitals in his Greek Testament. Fiction.

The Confounding of Camelia. By Anne Douglas Sedgwick.
(William Heinemann. 6s.)

THE author of this novel is one of those skilled persons who (in the phrase of Meredith, to whom she owes something) can keep

The topic over intellectual deeps
In buoyancy afloat.

Gifted with wit, and an intellect exceptionally agile, she is not afraid to handle a theme which is among the tritest in fiction. Camelia Paton toyed with two men, of whom she loved one. She made the other propose to her, accepted him, and then threw him over—only to find that the right man, disgusted, would have none of her. It is possible that Miss Sedgwick does not know how often that particular story has been told. But we know—or, rather, we have an idea—it must run to hundreds of times; and, therefore, we can congratulate her the more weightily upon her success. The Confounding of Camelia is indeed good, and more than good; it is fresh, delicately original, and finely observed. All which goes to prove that subject is little and treatment much. Camelia is such a heroine as many novelists dream of but few can draw. She has wealth and beauty, and she is the cleverest woman in London society; and the reader will believe it. She had faults, and none knew them better than Mr. Perior, her mentor, and the man whom she really did love:

Ethical worth had come to be everything to him. Camelia simply did not see it. He himself had armed her with that scientific impartiality before which he felt himself rather helpless, before which good and bad resolved themselves into very evasive elements. She told him that her science was more logical than his, it had made her charitable to the whole world, herself included, whereas he was hard on the world and hard on himself. His very kindness lacked grace, while her unkindness wore a flower-like colour. He was sorry for people, not fond of them—but Camelia was neither fond nor sorry. They were shadows woven into the web of her experience, her business was to make that experience pleasant, to see it beautifully. It was this love of beauty—beauty in the pagan sense—that baffled him in her. She had put appreciation and an exquisite good taste in the place of morality. Life to her was a game, to him a tragic, insistent conundrum. These, at least, were Perior's reluctant conclusions.

But Camelia soon had to alter her opinion that life was a game. She presumed too much upon the persuasive power of her personality, and for a whole year the cleverest and most alluring of women, the woman who had dismissed Cabinet Ministers, sat apart in a sackcloth of the soul. Yet in the end she was not confounded.

Miss Sedgwick has a subtle and distinguished imagination. Her style, on the whole, matches it; but we should like to warn her against the habit of long sentences. Some of her efforts rival in bigness those of the late Léon Cladel, who delighted in long sentences and could accomplish them perfectly. Miss Sedgwick is sometimes less fortunate. Here is an instance: "The love of adventure, of prowess, of power, had shown itself in Charles Paton; but much had been forgiven—even admired—with a sense of breathlessness, in a cloud-compelling younger son (his looks had been altogether supreme), which, when seen flaunting indecorously in the daughter, was highly unpopular."

A Modern Mercenary. By K. and Hesketh Prichard.
(Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

OUSTED from the paternal acres, John Rallywood, of the Lancashire Rallywoods, takes a commission in the army of Maïsau, one of that group of small Teutonic states discovered a few years ago, with so much advantage to English fiction, by Mr. Anthony Hope. For a long time

Rallywood serves on the frontier without distinction; but when trouble arrives, when the agents of Germany and England and Russia foregather in the ante-rooms of Maïsau's palaces, when the "specials" of the great London dailies lounge through the squares of its beautiful capital, then is Rallywood discovered by Selpdorf, the all-observing chancellor, and he becomes an officer of the royal guard. And what a guard! So exclusive, so punctilious, so proud is it, that the Three Musketeers themselves might not have scorned to enter its ranks.

Germany wishes to Germanise Maïsau; England wishes differently. England has the incomparable diplomat, Major Counsellor, but Germany has the aspiring and unscrupulous Count Sagan, cousin of Gustave, the reigning Grand Duke. Treason is afoot:

With a sudden hoarse shout of triumph Sagan flung his great arms about the Duke's body.

"By St. Anthony, Gustave, no man shall stop our conversation now!"

The Duke made no attempt to release himself from the rough hug that held him prisoner. He merely raised his hood with one hand, so that Sagan, his coarse mouth still wide in laughter, could stare into the countenance not four inches from his own.

Consternation and fury swept over the Count's features. From under the hood a red challenging face, a big white moustache, and shaggy-browed humorous eyes met his gaze. The sight held him gaping. But only for a second. Then he whipped out his pistol.

"An English plot, by Heaven!"

But Rallywood was quicker still. A sharp knock on the Count's wrist sent the bullet into the ceiling.

And that was neither the first time nor the last that Rallywood risked his mercenary's life. At least once he had to choose between his honour as a soldier and the welfare of the English cause; and he chose, and in the end all was well, and England won; and Rallywood acquired not only the heart of the beautiful Valérie Selpdorf, but also his hereditary acres.

Mr. and Mrs. Prichard merit praise for this performance. Without being either original or distinguished, their work is sound and good. They have a true gift for narrative, and their characterisation is more subtle and convincing than one expects in romance of this kind.

The Rapin. By Henry de Vere Stacpoole.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

"RAPIN" is applied here (we suppose) to Toto. Toto, born in the purple, upon the confines of old age—two-and-twenty—began to have a queer sort of feeling which he could only denominate "money-hate"; or rather it was "a want to make money and not to spend it." At this point fate threw in his way the last of the Grisettes. Her name was Celestin. She lived in an attic on three sous a day. She wove her dreams of beauty into eternal hats, and her eyes were of the colour of Neapolitan violets. Having advertised the world that he was on his way to Corsica to shoot moufflon, Toto disguises himself with seriousness and his baptismal name, Désiré, and seriously enters upon the study of painting. He soon wearies of the art, for which he had no serious aptitude, and before long also of Celestin. A convenient pleurisy presently relieves him of the burden. The child dies, leaving behind her a tender memory and a dejected little bird.

The purposeless, good-natured, selfish Toto moves actively and ambitiously in the midst of a crowd of journalists, artists, and men of letters; and the intrigues and manœuvres which attend the flotation of a great journalistic enterprise are an effective background to the delicate idyll of Celestin. The spirit of gaiety shines upon most of the pages. Here is a characteristic passage.

Gaillard is a decadent poet. He brought to Toto all his troubles:

The "Fall of the Damned" had been furiously attacked by a friend in the columns of the Libre Parole, yet it was far from flourishing. He brought a copy dressed in a fawn-coloured wrapper, and adorned with red devils tumbling head-over-heels, and presumably into the pit.

"The cover," said Gaillard, "has spoiled the sale a good deal. You have no idea of the influence of a cover on a book; devils have gone out of fashion in the last month. It's all owing to that exposure of the Satanists—silly fools!—and of course it is just my luck, for I have a little brochure in proof called 'Bon jour, Satan.' Well, then, I must change the title; and what does that mean? Why, re-writing the book. People are turning religious, it seems; that is where art hits one. The silly public takes a whim into its head; the artist must meet it or starve. I had a meeting with Chauvin, my publisher, to-day. You should have seen his face. He declares the market for poetry is dead, and the silly fool wants me to write him something manly and religious."

Gaillard, with his greed, his boundless self-conceit, his egoism, and his singular gift of picturesque impromptu fiction, is one of the most amusing characters in recent fiction.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE AWKWARD AGE.

BY HENRY JAMES.

Mr. James's first story since his much discussed Tico Magics. The scene is London, and the figures are of not quite the best society. In the opening chapter Mr. Langdon is described as having "at all events conclusively doubled the Cape of the years—he would never again see fifty-five: to the warning light of that bleak headland he presented a back sufficiently conscious." A book of singular, mellow urbanity. (Heinemann. 6s.)

ANNE MAULEVERER.

BY MRS. MANNINGTON CAFFYN.

Mrs. Caffyn is "Iota," author of A Yellow Aster. In this story we have another of her searching studies of the nature of a not too happy young woman. Anne has emotional adventures with men throughout the book, but we leave her a melancholy celibate, whispering to herself:

A short life in the saddle, Lord,
Not long life by the fire!

(Methuen. 6s.)

THE NEWSPAPER GIRL.

MRS. C. N. WILLIAMSON.

A very bright, original story of Lucille Chandler's experience as a journalist. Lucille Chandler is a millionaire, but exchanges personalities, so to speak, with a humbler friend, and her adventures in her assumed name and characters are the materials of the novel. (Pearson. 6s.)

PROBABLE TALES.

EDITED BY W. STEBBING.

The "editorship" is obviously assumed. There are twenty stories, professedly by as many narrators. These are of a fantastic and satirical nature, the first being concerned with Dampfbootlos Land, where it is enacted by law that everybody may unsay anything within a quarter of an hour after the words have been spoken. There is another place where everyone works for someone else, another where marriage is obsolete, and a fourth where feudal institutions survive. (Longmans. 4s. 6d.)

THE MANDATE.

By T. BARON RUSSELL.

A close study of seamy life in London by a writer who is taking a sure place among the realists. The relations of husband, wife, and the "tertium quid," as Mr. Kipling calls him, form the subject-matter, the "tertium quid" being the central character. Incidentally the curtain is raised on shady finance and those that thrive by it. A grim but interesting work. (Lane. 6s.)

A TRIP TO PARADOXIA.

By T. H. S. ESCOTT.

"And Other Humours of the Hour, being Contemporary Pictures of Social Facts and Political Fiction." The hour is not always an exact description, for in one of the stories a poet is satirised for his use of the phrase "too utterly utter." "How I became Prime Minister," "Lord Boscobel's Garter," "How I became Bishop of Barum"—these are some of the other titles of this sprightly work, by a well known literary sharpshooter. (Greening. 6s.)

TANDRA.

By ANDREW QUANTOCK.

A bustling story of mining-camp villainies and mining-camp loves in a land of sand-storms, tarantulas, and mangrove swamps: a land that "grills all day under the Tropic of the He-Goat," and "stews all night in the juice of its millionaires." (Pearson. 3s. 6d.)

HANDS IN THE DARKNESS.

By ARNOLD GOLSWORTHY.

The sensational can no further go than in this novel. A doctor who has attended an inquest on a man in the morning, at midnight sees that man scramble out of his grave vowing vengeance on his murderers. The supposed murdered man communicates the fact of his resurrection to his daughter—who had been the only mourner at the burial—by telepathy! And then reverting to his murderers, he hints at certain hidden treasure. All this in the first chapter. (Pearson. 3s. 6d.)

FORTUNE'S MY FOE.

By JOHN BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.

A distinctly readable novel of eighteenth century life, showing how Beau Bufton attempted to win Ariadne Thorne and her hundred guineas, and how he was discomfited by Sir Geoffrey Barry in sword-play and in love. The London of the period is deftly sketched in the background, and the story ends amid the cannon smoke of Quiberon. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE SCHEMING OF AGATHA KENRICK.

By R. F. ELDRIDGE.

One of the characters describes Agatha as "a flirt and a freethinker, a woman who hides her history." She is, in fact, an embittered adventuress, who, to revenge herself on the man she has vainly loved, plans for him a marriage which she calculates will result in his unhappiness. (Sonnenschein. 6s.)

CALUMNIES.

By E. M. DAVY.

A novel of young married life, showing how a young husband mismanaged his relations with a woman, how calumnies arose, and how all ended happily. The match-making mother of the heroine is well-drawn. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE PASSION OF ROSAMUND KEITH.

By M. J. PRITCHARD.

A blend of love and adventure. The story begins in England, and passes to an attack by robbers on the Turkish frontier, the imprisonment of Rosamund in a monastery, and an overwhelming flood. The end is, however, happy, for Paul, after dragging Rosamund from the waste of waters, "stooped and kissed her on the mouth." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

MASTER PASSIONS.

By MRS. DARENT HARRISON.

The scene is Paris and Stattheim, among artists and musicians. Melville was an artist and Madge a musician; and theirs were the master passions. In the end they understood each other and lived happily, but there had been difficulties on the way. Art society in Paris is described with some minuteness. (Unwin. 6s.)

A STRANGE EXECUTOR.

By BENNETT COLL.

Extract from letter of a dying man in the Bush: "If you are still hard up for something to do, with a touch of excitement to flavour it, take my name and go back home. If you think seriously of this, let me give you a word of caution. Beware of a man called John Nambury." Then the story begins, and behold John Nambury and excitements. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE MYSTERY OF THE MEDEA.

By ALEXANDER VAUGHAN.

A story of murder. The case is put into the hands of Detective Endicott, who writes subsequently to the Chief of the Criminal Investigation Department: "Sir,—Having been entrusted by you with the task of finding out the author of the murder in the Cumberland Hotel, I now beg to make my report. I——" but it would be unfair to continue. Detective Endicott's report "surprises by itself." (Pearson. 3s. 6d.)

A DREAM OF FAME.

By JEAN DELAIRE.

The dreamer is Giuseppa, and the story tells how her genius flickered out amid the petty cares of married life, and left only—a wonderful picture of the Resurrection. The fate of this picture is an important part of this well-conceived story, the end of which is as ironical as the earlier portions are pathetic. (John Long. 3s. 6d.)

FAITH.

By J. HENRY HARRIS.

A Cornish story dealing with struggles of faith and doubt in a Methodist family. Faith is the subject and also the heroine. The hero comes up to London, and writes to Faith: "The people here have their emotions and everything under control, and the services appear to me quite dead. . . . I thought if Brother Andra was only here and to shout 'Hallelujah! Praise His holy Name!' everyone would be electrified and shocked. I do believe he would be turned out." Commercial morality in London and simple faith in Cornwall are the warp and woof of the story. (Service & Paton. 3s. 6d.)

THE KNIGHT OF KING'S GUARD.

By EWAN MARTIN.

"I was born in the nineteenth year of the reign of King Edward of Caernarvon, at the stead of King's Dene, near Torre Abbey, where I was baptized on Candlemas Day, in the year of the Saviour, 1327." These are the opening words of this novel, and, together with the title, they indicate the character of this readable story. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE WATERS OF CANEY FORK.

By OPIE READ.

A romance of Tennessee, and stirring at that, by a writer with a growing reputation in America for good fiction. His way here is yet to make; but this story should help sensibly. (Innes. 6s.)

KING OR KNAVE: WHICH WINS?

ED. BY W. H. JOHNSON.

Mr. Johnson professes to edit "the second of the manuscripts found in Pierre Fourcade's strong-box." The result is "an old tale of Huguenot days," with the motto: "Everyone carries his destiny in his own bosom. . . . Fate is but the deepest current of one's nature." (Gay & Bird. 6s.)

The Last of the Irish Bards.

"THE BARD OF THOMOND," who died in Limerick on April 19, was an Irish peasant poet with a distinctive touch of genius. In the cabins of the South of Ireland, where the works of the poets of what is called "the Celtic revival" are absolutely unknown, and, if known, the mysticism which is their chief characteristic would only bewilder and repel, as something entirely foreign to the modes of mind and habits of thought of the humble occupants, the Bard's war-ballads, legendary poems, and songs on the joys, the griefs, the ideals, the superstitions of the country folk are sung and recited, stirring the blood and making the hearts of the hearers beat faster, like the inspiring blast of a trumpet. Michael Hogan—who may, in truth, be described as the last of the Irish bards—was born in very humble circumstances. His father earned a precarious wage as a carpenter and wheelwright; and he himself was taken from school at the age of ten—his sole educational equipment being, as he once told me, the ability to write indifferently and spell badly—to work as a labourer in a Limerick flour mill. Twenty years of his life were given to this rough and uncongenial labour; but his poetic imagination and his natural talent for verse, of which he gave early indications by lampooning some of his fellow-workers in the mill, were kept alive and nourished by the varied course of reading, chiefly poetical and historical, to which he devoted the evenings after his day's hard toil.

In 1880 Hogan collected all the songs and ballads he had written for the Dublin journals, or published locally in pamphlet form, and they were issued in a substantial volume, entitled Lays and Legends of Thomond, by Messrs. Gill & Son, Dublin. It is by this book that the Bard of Thomond will be best remembered. He also published during the seventies a series of powerful and caustic satires of Limerick personages and manners, called Shawn-a-Scoob. The Irish people have always been extremely susceptible to satire—this, indeed, was the secret of the enormous power and influence exercised by the ancient bards—and for ten years the very name of Shawn-a-Scoob inspired the good citizens of Limerick with fear and trembling. These works show that Hogan was a typical bard; that he possessed all the literary qualities of his ancient prototypes—their pride and insolence, their exalted notions of the greatness and dignity of their office, their rhetorical passion, their extravagant imagery, their vigour of description—which are to be found in the sagas of the Irish bards. In one of his poems he writes:

Here's to the Bards! the brave old Bards! who kindled the martial fire
In Chief and Prince with the eloquence and magic of harp and lyre;
When the soul of the proud, like a lightning-cloud, flamed up at the thrill of Song,
And leapt to the fight, with a fierce delight, to avenge an unmanly wrong;
When with godlike might
Worth, fame, and right
Were defended by steel-nerved men—
O God of the Free!
It was grand to see
The pomp of our country then!

Here is another passage characteristic of his powers, from "A Life Picture":

I am Bard to none but the God above
Who sent me the gift of Song
From His angel-choir, and taught me to love
The right, and to hate the wrong!
I sing no tinsell'd autocrat's praise,
I crouch at no lordling's knee;
Not birth nor blood, but the True and Good,
And the Loving, are themes for me!

At times his outlook on life was jaundiced and gloomy. He continues:

But scarce as the Just, are the True and Good,
And the Loving on earth are few,
And the hemlock grows where the sweet wild rose
That was planted by God's hand, grew!
Heaven wastes its glory in endless floods—
Earth blossoms in every part—
While the serpent breeds and the nettle buds
In the gloom of the human heart!

As a specimen of the wild and whirling words of his battle-pieces, and their breathless life and action, the following passages are typical:

The wild battle-blast of the trumpet has sounded,
And swift to the onset the giant hosts bounded;
The field flamed and roared with the torrent of arms
Like a huge forest swung by the madness of storms.
Have you seen, at Ardmore, the white billows advancing,
When the sea to the tune of the whirlwind is dancing?
And the wave-giants, rising and roaring together,
With their awful war-songs, charging mad on each other?

Thus raged the dread fight in tumultuous disorder,
And the sounding plain trembled from centre to border.
Spears whistled and rattled in deadly collision,
To the hearts of the combatants seeking admission;
Souls of heroes, forsaking the temples that shined them,
Flew out thro' red rents from the clay that confined them;
Shields leap'd from the axes, in many a splinter
Like wither'd leaves tost from the dark groves of winter;
And towering heads sunk, with the helmets that bound them,
While their reeking brains smok'd on the weapons that found them.

But the Bard had softer moods, as his many love songs testify. In his "Colleen Dhu" he sings:

My life was as a sunless thing,
A dead leaf on a withering tree,
Till you, like heaven's dawn of Spring,
With leaves and blossom came to me.
My heart was as a lonely well,
That song or sunshine never knew,
Until your beauty's radiance fell
Into its depths, my Colleen Dhu!
I wish I were a mountain-fay,
And you a little honey-cup,
I'd range the summer fields all day
To find you out, and drink you up!
Your soul within my soul, we'd live
The long years of creation thro',
And Heaven above could only give
An equal joy, my Colleen Dhu!

Hogan had an extravagant and almost childlike pride in his title of "Bard of Thomond," and he loved to show himself to the people of Limerick in the ancient garb of the office, often with a very ludicrous effect. Personally, he was a low-sized and thick-set man, with a homely, florid face—unmistakably Irish in its cast and expression—fringed by an unkempt red beard. One of the earliest things I can remember was a procession of the trades of Limerick, with bands and banners, on the inauguration of a new mayor. In the centre of a triumphal car sat the Bard of Thomond—a comic figure—clad in a long white robe, and on his head a tinsel crown, leaning in a reflective attitude over a harp, with a young lady in green and gold, typical of Erin, by his side; while on another car, which followed immediately behind, copies of the Bard's "Inauguration Ode" were being worked off on a printing press, and distributed to the people. In another procession I remember seeing him in the character of Neptune, seated in a fishing boat, wearing a green robe, and a trident in his hand. In after years I got to know him intimately. He was a most entertaining companion. His literary information was wide; he knew all the legends, traditions, and superstitions of Clare and Limerick, which he had picked up first hand from the peasantry of those counties. He was very shrewd in his estimate of men and things, and had a keen sense of humour. He delighted in reciting his ballads. His voice was low and hoarse; but he had splendid declamatory gifts, and he would work himself into a frenzy of passion when describing the crash of the contending clans in his rhetorical battle-pieces.

In 1889, when the Bard was in very indigent circumstances, the Corporation of Limerick appointed him to a sinecure office, called the "Rangership of the Shannon's Banks," at a salary of a pound per week. At one time some of the councillors who had felt the sting of his satire insisted that he should be called upon to send in a report on the condition of the banks of the river. His report was as follows: "The banks are in good condition, but the ceiling would be the better for an occasional application of whitewash." The reference to the ceiling mystified one of the city fathers at the meeting of the Town Council, and when the Clerk explained it meant "the blue vault of heaven," he indignantly declared that he did not come there to be humbugged. The Corporation never again asked the Bard to do anything for his pound a week.

Epitaph on a Cat.

After Joachim du Bellay.

BY DEAN CARRINGTON.

LIFE I can no longer live,
Magny. If you bid me give Cause of my despairing pain—
Of no losses I complain,
Rings, or money, or of purse.
What then? Oh, 'tis something worse!—
Three days since did death destroy
My chief treasure, love and joy.
What? The thought fresh grief doth wake 'Tis as though my heart would break,
So to write or speak I dread—
Belaud, my grey cat, is dead!—
Belaud, who may well be said
Fairest work by nature made
'Mong the total race of cats;
Belaud, lethal foe of rats;
Belaud, with such charms as nigh
Earned him immortality.

First of all, then, let me say
Belaud was not wholly grey,
As cats which in France are born,
But like those which Rome adorn.
Silvery grey, and softer far
Than or silk or satin are.
Small his head and teeth—his eyes
Shot no glance which terrifies,
But whose pupils, greenish-blue,
Somewhat imitate the hue
Which through rain the varied bow
'Thwart the heavenly arch doth throw
Head to match, his size appears,
Slim his neck and short his ears,
And beneath his ebony nose
Mouth like small lion shows;

And around his mouth there grew
A small board of silvery hue
Nature there had seemed to place
To defend his pretty face.
Small his paws, his legs were trim;
Soft his throat was, and his tail—
Long as those which monkeys trail—
Barred its length with many a band,
The fair work of Nature's hand.
Such Belaund—dear animal!—
Who from head to foot was all
Of such beauty that I ween
Like of him was never seen.

Greater woe was ne'er conceived,
Loss that cannot be retrieved,
My sad heart is wrung—I wis
That e'en Death, although she is
Like a bear for cruelty,
Yet, had she ta'en pains to see
Such a cat—how fierce soe'er—
She had felt obliged to spare,
And my sad life would not now
Hatred still to live avow.
But stern Death did not survey
All the pretty tricks and play
Of my Belaund, nor the grace
Of his every movement trace:
How he doftly scratched or leapt,
How he turned about or crept;
Or a mouse caught, and awhile
Let it go—but then with guile
Quickly caught again, and so
Oft would take, oft let it go.
Often with his dainty paw
Would he gently stroke his jaw
Or the rogue would slyly sit
On my bed, or seize a bit
I was eating, yet he ne'er
Would offend or roughly tear
But amused attention claims
By a thousand tricks and games.

Oh, good Lord! what pleasant fun
'Twas to watch my Belaund run
Swiftly for a ball of thread,
Or when chose his merry head
After his own tail to race
Round and round in wheeling chase
Like a garter fasten it
Round his legs as he did sit,
And so solemn looked, as he Might a Sorbonne doctor be;
Or at times, a pretty sight,
He would make pretence to fight,
But soon as again caressed
All feigned anger he repressed.
Belaund's sport no malice hid,
Belaund never mischief did,
Nor worse crime than but to seize
And bear off a scrap of cheese,
Or a linnet eat whose song
Vexed him—this no doubt was wrong.

But we men, Magny, are not Perfect in all points I wot.
Belaund went not night and day,
As some cats do, after prey
And for naught but eating care—
His expenditure was spare.
Small his appetite, and he Took his diet frugally.
Belaund was my favourite;
Belaund my companion quite;
In my room, at bed and board

Closer friendship did afford
 Than by any dog is lent.
 Ho by night ne'er howling went,
 Like those dreadful cats who wake
 Sleepers and night hideous make Oh, my little Belaud, would
 To heaven I had wit so good
 And a style of such high worth
 As to blaze thy merits forth,
 Then Belaud, I swear and vow,
 That in verse as fine as thou
 You should live on earth while cats
 Wage unceasing war with rats.

Things Seen.

The Conjuror.

It was fifteen years ago. The sands were alive with the sun and busy with a chattering crowd, and covered with all manner of stalls and enchanting matters that threw the oddest shadows. I made first of all for the sea, that I had not seen for a whole year, and there I helped some fishermen to haul a net. I think those fishermen must have cast their nets only for little boys, who felt vastly big as they skinned their hands on the lines, for they drew the most improbable grounds, and never, that I saw, caught anything but a few dabs (that were thrown into shallow pools for the admiration of bare-legged little girls), a red walking gurnard or so, and indeterminate masses of strange-smelling jellyfish. Then I bought jumbles and parkins at a stall, which was kept by a brown old woman in a great red shawl. Have you never eaten jumbles and parkins? They are somehow new and aromatic, wild and yet urbano, exotic, yet English; they are the Rossettis of biscuit-life. And then I came to the Conjuror.

The Conjuror was going to tie someone up in a perfectly inextricable fashion, and then to untie him with a magic word. He was a fascinating person, with bold, swarthy features and a mop of the blackest hair. I thought him like a Red Indian. I never should have looked at him if I meant he should not choose me. Indeed, I gazed at him very hard, and his imperious forefinger drew me to the sun-warmed centre of his magic circle, where I stood as bold as a lion in the pride of my emancipation and my new summer clothes.

The Conjuror tied me up in a very ingenious way. All eyes were upon us, and the nurses ceased from chatting. I forget the exact sequence of the performance; but I remember that a heavy man in shabby grey—he was, I think, a photographer—whose face was very dull, very red, and very miserable, and who plainly was nearly unconscious with drink, mumbled out that I was a “— confederate.” The Conjuror very sharply ordered him off, and he retired behind a nursemaid, and swayed there dismally. I suppose he was jealous of the Conjuror’s crowd. When the magic word was uttered, and my shackles fell off me, the Conjuror went round with his hat, and the crowd melted away—all but the red-faced man, who stood dismally swaying in the sunlight. He observed the melting of the crowd with glassy eyes, and felt, perhaps, that here, after all, was a fellow. He produced, with his clumsy, swollen fingers, two pennies and three farthings, and made a step towards the Conjuror, who had thrown down his hat and was drinking out of a bottle.

“Here, I did’n’ mean any ’fence when I int’rup’ ye,” he said, holding out the coins. The Conjuror looked up, pocketed the coppers, and cried: “Be off, Wilkins, and put yer head under the tap!” and returned to packing up his traps. The red-faced man wandered off aimlessly along the sands. I could not reason it out, but I felt that the Conjuror was not so nice as I had thought, and that the dull, red-faced man was somehow pathetic.

Inequality.

FLOSSIE, the pug, was growing so obese and languorous from want of exercise, gastronomic indulgence, and the sultry air of drawing-rooms, that Miss Bradley had been obliged to hire the bath-chair man to take her for a constitutional each morning, since the maids (who had no heart) refused to do so, and the back garden did not provide a sufficiently spacious promenade. She had just seen her darling off, and turned in her loneliness to the morning paper. “What, more open spaces!” she commented with indignation. “This County Council is becoming quite a scourge! What can the people want with open spaces? Haven’t they their homes? With all this pampering and petting of ‘the people’ [acrimonious emphasis] the upper classes will soon be unable to afford the bare necessities of life!”

A maid broke in upon her reflection. “If you please, Miss, the man has just left Flossie’s mixture, and he is glad you are sending her into the Park; he thinks she ought to have an airing at least twice a day.”

“Thank you, Ellen. Tell him I will make arrangements for it; and ask him to send in his bill.”

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE growth in the number of newspapers is evidenced by the number of critics at the Press view of the Royal Academy—a constantly increasing crowd. On Wednesday the rooms, which ten years ago were sparsely inhabited, seemed almost thronged. The increase is due, not to the large addition to the London Press only, but to the additional importance attached to the London exhibitions by papers published in the provinces. Not all the attenders are writers of articles, yet they are critics all the same, and very influential ones—Mr. Burnand, for example. The editors of leading magazines and reviews, which may or may not publish somebody else’s articles on the trend of the year’s art, are known by their lightheartedness on these occasions. Lord Beaconsfield once said to a neighbour at the Academy banquet that the feast was spread in vain for him, for under his plate all the time were the rules for a speech. The critic who really has to criticise is in the same plight; and nobody can be astonished if Mr. Humphry Ward has an anxious eye and Mr. Walter Armstrong takes off his hat. All the same, the most responsible of critics has a feeling of pleasurable expectation in coming face to face with the art of the year. There is always certain to be something to admire, and even a possibility that there may be something to discover. The diversity of taste among these experts is at least as great as it is among outsiders. The strangest pictures attract groups of admirers. One man produces a foot-rule and takes measurements; another dictates a homily to a shorthand writer. A third of the critics are women.

LORD BROWNLAW has said exactly the right thing to the agitators about the decoration of St. Paul’s. Deans, it seems, must be irascible if they are crossed. “How much have you subscribed?” is Dean Gregory’s irrelevant query to the people who object to see anybody’s money spent in defacing a national building. But Lord Brownlow has the peacemaker’s reward when he expresses his conviction that “the deep interest now taken by all sections of the public will tend to render easier the task of bringing the decorations to a satisfactory conclusion.” There was no need that the exchange of opinions on either side should have sunk below that level.

THE book of the Browning Letters has been one of the greatest gifts made of late years to our literature and to our life. Marriage as an institution has been under some sharp censures of late, and it had in that volume for the most pessimistic of readers its sure defence. That a book performing so great a service should be attacked as a thing sent forth by its editor for "notoriety" or for "gain" is just a part of that unfitness of things which human history constantly presents. Mrs. Browning's brother in Jamaica has written a letter of protest against the action of his nephew in taking the world into the confidence of his parents, and he has written it in the interests of "good taste"! That letter we reproduce elsewhere. The father of Mrs. Browning, he says, is cruelly maligned. "He had loved her from childhood" and he "lost her." That is the common lot of parents, after all; and Mr. C. J. Moulton-Barrett appears to be the inheritor of what can only be described as his father's madness in treating his daughters as chattels at his own sole disposal.

THE secrecy of Mr. Browning's engagement with Miss Barrett is put forward as the offence. Mr. Moulton-Barrett "ventures to say that few fathers would take the hand of a man who had so acted." But why did he so act? Both he and Miss Barrett loathed concealment. The simple fact is that her father had shown himself the violent opponent of another daughter's marriage with a man he did "know." Miss Barrett was present at a scene which suggested to her that her father would not stop short of personal violence were her own engagement known; and, as all know, her father showed his "love" for her after her marriage by never opening the letters she addressed to him. To write as Mr. Moulton-Barrett has done is to write in bad faith, or with a prejudice which blinds the eyes to the salient facts of the situation. And there is a point of view in which the conduct of his father, as the opponent of his sister's marriage, may be canvassed more severely than has yet been hinted at in print. It is not necessary to go into sordid details; but if need were, something could and should be said in explanation of conduct which not even a false idea of filial piety should have led Mr. Moulton-Barrett to defend.

THE weather on Tuesday was not the cricketer's, and when eleven of the Artists' Cricket Club was counted that morning at Richmond some five defaulters had to be named. Mr. Tuke, the painter of seas, was among the expected ones whom April showers of rain deterred. The ranks of the Artists' opponents were equally thinned. In the scratch game which was played Mr. Chevallier Tayler made the biggest score; Mr. LaThangue bowled effectively; and as wicket-keeper Mr. Jacomb Hood had the praise of the bystanders, who included Mr. Melton Fisher.

A GREAT company was launched last week, with Scottish directors in a dominant majority. The prospectus was sent to the London Press as an advertisement, but the instruction was given that the list of papers was not to include the names of the two dailies which have sent forth Sunday issues. That, of course, is the true inwardness of the rather defensive and apologetic paragraphs appearing in the Daily Telegraph, claiming as its fellow-offenders, if offence is the word, the Daily Chronicle, on account of the Sunday edition of Lloyd's Weekly News, and the Globe, on account of the Sunday issue of the People.

THE race for news among the correspondents of papers is made in general in the interests of the public. But not always. Nobody gains very much by the publication of the names of persons guilty of indiscretions almost instantly repented, and the indiscreet persons suffer irremediably. A lady lately disappeared from her home, to which she has since returned. The situation was entirely private, and with the reconciliation following the estrangement the matter would have ended. But meanwhile, however, the paragraphist had perpetuated it. Every difficulty could be surmounted but that of a publicity which is surely as uncalled-for by public policy as it is cruel to both the innocent and the guilty in its consequences.

Correspondence.

E. A. Poe, Mr. Lang, and Father Tabb.

SIR,—As I am the only one living of those whom Mr. Lang measures with Edgar Poe, in his recent quatrain, may I say how entirely I agree with you in thinking that what he calls nonsense is really good criticism?

To prove this, I send you my epigram, published some years ago in Harper's:

POE'S CRITICS.

A certain tyrant, to disgrace
The more a rebel's resting-place,
Compelled his people, every one,
To hurl, in passing there, a stone;
Which done, behold, the pile became
A monument to keep the name.

And thus it is with Edgar Poe:
Each passing critic has his throw,
Nor sees, defeating his intent,
How lofty grows the monument.

I am, &c., JOHN B. TABB.

Haikais.

SIR,—Looking over some old notebooks I find that I once perpetrated a Haikai without ever having heard of that recondite form of verse. This was how it ran:

Passing in perfume,
Ah, tender soul of the rose,
Philomel mourns thee!

Would that one could produce thus unknowingly a Ballade or Chant Royal—but of these verse forms it is, alas! impossible to be unconscious!—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 29.

LAST week we asked for nonsense rhymes, somewhat in the manner of those quoted from the Lark. No very brilliant effort has resulted. The prize has fallen to Miss Gertrude Newstead, 9, York-place, Clifton, for this:

"If half the road was made of jam,
The other half of bread,
How very nice my walks would be,"
The greedy infant said.

Among other rhymes are these:

I love to stand upon my head
And think of things sublime
Until my mother interrupts
And says it's dinner time.

[C. E., West Kirby.]

A lobster wooed a lady crab,
And kissed her lovely face.

"Upon my sole," the crabbees cried,
"I wish you'd mind your place!"

[L. L., Ryde.]

Keep Elephants as Fire-Engines,
For Nature's use is plain:
They draw the water up their Nose
And Squirt it out again.

[T. V. N., South Woodford.]

(With an excellent picture.)

Although it does not quite conform to the conditions—for it is not exactly a nonsense verse, and certainly like nothing in the Lark—we consider the following epigram by C. H. H., Richmond, the best contribution of the week :

I wonder who was First of Men
To Think himself a wit,
And who will be the Last of men
To Sigh because of it

Competition No. 30.

WE return this week to our studies in the reading habits of types—a serious change after so much frivolity. Given the middle-aged wife of a country rector, with interests in the parish and her garden, and an only son in the Navy—say what are her ten favourite books. To the competitor whose list is, in our opinion, the best a cheque for a guinea will be sent.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, May 2. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the third column of p. 492 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given : we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered.

Announcements.

TWO new books by the Right. Hon. Professor Max Müller are in the press—Auld Lang Syne (second series), which will be devoted entirely to recollections of Indian friends and correspondents, and Six Systems of Indian Philosophy.

MESSRS. SANDS & CO. have in preparation a series of volumes which will be called "The Imperial Interest Library." The volumes will deal with the colonies, dependencies, and spheres of influence in Greater Britain. The greater portion of each volume will be devoted to modern developments, so that the reader will be placed in a position to understand the political, social, and commercial situation in such countries as China, Egypt, South Africa, India, Australia, &c. The first volume, which will be published shortly, will deal with China.

AN English edition of Dr. Bloch's The War of the Future will appear in May—in time, it is hoped, for the first sitting of the Peace Congress—through Mr. Grant Richards. The work has been considerably condensed in translation, as in the original it runs to six or seven large quarto volumes. It will be published under the title Is War Now Impossible? and will form the second volume in the Russian Library, for the editing of which Mr. W. T. Stead is responsible.

AN important illustrated work on Turner, including many of Mr. Ruskin's criticisms hitherto printed for private circulation only, will be published in the autumn by Mr. George Allen.

DANTON: a Study.

By HILAIRE BELLOC, B.A., late Scholar of Balliol College. Demy 8vo, with Photogravure Portrait, 10s.
"A piece of real tragedy, given with admirable restraint and eloquence."

Spectator.

"We greet Mr. Belloc as a rising star in the world of letters....One is amazed at this book coming from so young a writer. In spite of paradox and occasional gush, the style, in the main, is as lofty and pure as is his treatment of his magnificent subject."—Literature.

"Mr. Hilaire Belloc's admirable life will fill a place from which it will not be easy to displace it. His study is philosophic, luminous, and exact, and, so far as the ascertained facts of Danton's life are concerned, exhaustive."

Scotsman.

By FELIX MOSCHELES, Author of "In Bohemia with Du Maurier." With 3 Photogravure Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"A decidedly entertaining book."—Times.

"A very pleasant, readable book....It is not so much his reminiscences....that attract us, as the unintentional portraiture of his own personality, radiant with good spirits, sweet nature, and quick wit."—Bookman.

"A sparkling book written by a light-hearted man, who is luckily able to say that he has lived a thoroughly happy life."—Glasgow Herald.

THE GREAT LORD BURGHLEY:

A Study in Elizabethan Statecraft. By MARTIN A. S. HUME. With Photogravure Portrait. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d.

"In Major Hume's volume we have at last an adequate biography of Lord Burghley."—Spectator.

"A valuable, thoughtful, and stimulating book, which is likely to remain the standard biography of the founder of the House of Cecil."—Speaker.

"A capable, informing piece of work, excellently adapted to the needs of readers who are willing to be taught of what stuff our great men are made."—Globe.

SECOND EDITION, NOW READY.

JOHN RUSKIN, SOCIAL REFORMER.

By J. A. HOBSON. With Photogravure Portrait. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"A very thoughtful and interesting treatise."—Spectator.

"Mr. Hobson has in this beautiful and heart-searching analysis of Ruskin's teaching made the crooked paths straight and the rough places plain; he has, in fact, synthesised it, so that the man in the street can understand it if he will. No living economist is more thoroughly equipped for the task."—Bradford Observer.

RAMBLES ROUND MY LIFE.

By NEWTON CROSLAND.

As his arguments, supposed to be unanswerable, have been ignored by the Athenæum, the discussion in its columns must be considered futile. A weak attempt is made therein to show that C. Anyand was Junius; but the handwriting is unlike; the slope and shape of the letters are characteristically different.

A Few Press Notices of Volume I.

THE GUARDIAN.—"The work promises to be, when completed, the best Biblical encyclopedia in English. Dr. Hastings has shown his wide sympathies by his choice of contributors, who represent many shades of Christian opinion."

ACADEMY.—"Both the editors and the publishers are to be congratulated upon the appearance of the first volume of this most excellent work.....If the other volumes keep up to the high level of this one, the editors will have produced the best Biblical Dictionary which has yet appeared."

ATHENÆUM.—"We must congratulate the editor on the well-selected list of specialists to whose names he can refer as 'the best guarantee that the work may be relied on,' and on the exceedingly great care that has evidently been bestowed on the technicalities of editing, revising, and printing. ...The mention, however, of these few names and articles must only be taken as specimens of the many others that deserve recording."

THE CRITICAL REVIEW.—"A timely, trustworthy, and most valuable guide.....It represents the best type of scholarship—the scholarship that is liberal, critical, and, in the best sense, scientific, but that is also unpretentious, restrained, far removed from anything flighty, precipitate, or ostentatious.....No English Dictionary of the Bible, even of the first magnitude, can compare with the new one in the department of Biblical Theology."

THE TIMES.—"This Dictionary seems likely to take its place as the standard authority for Biblical students of the present generation."

BRITISH WEEKLY.—"We welcome with the utmost cordiality the first volume of Messrs. Clark's great enterprise, 'A Dictionary of the Bible.' That there was room and need for such a book is unquestionable.....We have here all that the student can desire."

LITERATURE.—"The first instalment of the new 'Dictionary of the Bible' has been eagerly expected, and will be warmly welcomed."

GUY BOOTHBY'S GREATEST NOVEL.

"PHAROS, THE EGYPTIAN."

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, bevelled, 6s.

With 12 Full-Page Illustrations by JOHN H. BACON.

"This powerful novel is weird, wonderful, and soul-thrilling. Mr. Boothby succeeds in making it almost real, and its marvels and mysteries almost credible. There never was in this world so strange and wonderful a love story, and Mr. Boothby's admirers will probably agree that the most marvellous fiction he has ever produced is 'Pharos, the Egyptian.'"—The Scotsman.

"The central idea of the story is a good one. In the hand of Victor Hugo, even of Maurius Jókai, such a theme might have been made sublime: Mr. Boothby does better than that, with a result that is truly surprising. There is not a chapter without its lurid incident, not a page which does not titillate the jaded curiosity."—Academy.

GUY BOOTHBY'S POPULAR NOVELS.

Uniform with the above, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. each.

Profusely Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD.

Mr. RUDYARD KIPPLING says: "Mr. Guy Boothby has come to great honours now. His name is large upon hoardings, his books sell like hot cakes, and he keeps a level head through it all. I've met him several times in England, and he added to my already large respect for him."

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. each Volume.

With Illustrations by JOHN CHARLTON, G. P. JACOMB-HOOD, LUCY KEMP-WELCH, S. E. WALLER, and others.

The Series is well printed from type specially cast, on Dickinson's best antique paper, and neatly and handsomely bound in cloth gilt, with design by A. A. Turbayne.

"Whyte-Melville's charming novels. ... It does one's world of good to read anything written by Whyte-Melville, and for youth and the rising generation what can there be better?"—Sporting Life.

"As a tonic..... commended us to his breezy, healthy novels. What pleasure the jaded mind can find in his manly writings! Sport and romance and love are his themes, and few there are that handle them better."—New Age.

"It has long enjoyed great popularity, and this fine literary edition will, no doubt, secure fresh readers in abundance. No better set of these favourite novels could be desired, binding, type, paper, and pictures all being of the best."—Nottingham Guardian.

The Thrilling Story of the Adventures of Lieut. Johansen, the sole companion of Dr. Nansen after leaving the "Fram."

350 pages, large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

Illustrated by nearly 70 beautifully printed Photographs, &c.

WITH NANSEN IN THE NORTH

By Lieut. H. JOHANSEN.

"There is not a dull page in the book, for nothing of interest escaped the attention of the brave and keen-witted adventurer, whilst his forceful and picturesque style is admirably conveyed by the translation."

Manchester Guardian.

"The book, with its great budget of thrilling stories, is as exciting to read as a romance of adventure, and that is a great thing to say of a volume that aims at being a record of practical experiences."—Westminster Budget.

"Not a whit less interesting than the original story of the expedition narrated by its distinguished leader. He (Johansen) has a good deal more to say than mere 'ditto to Dr. Nansen,' and everyone who is familiar with Nansen's own account will assuredly hasten to make acquaintance with that of the brave and modest comrade who shared his privations and dangers."—The World.

JUST READY.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF SOCIETY.

By J. WILSON HARPER, Author of "Money," &c.

Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

This new book will no doubt revive the popular interest created in Mr. Benjamin Kidd's "Social Evolution." The work explains the fundamental principles of social organisation with remarkable clearness and ability, and in a way which convinces the reader of the author's mastery of the subject he has taken in hand.

The Dundee Advertiser says: "It is written in a pellucid style which it is delightful to read, and is enriched with a wealth of illustration that is reminiscent of Buckle. The chapters on the economic basis of society will probably be found of deepest interest, though the evidence of research and wide reading in that part of the book dealing with the origin of society, is certain to command admiration. It is a work that will make its way to the front, as it well deserves to do."

NEW NOVEL BY E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM,

Author of "Mysterious Mr. Sabin," "As a Man Lives," &c.

THE MAN AND HIS KINGDOM.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Illustrated by AMBROSE WALTON.

A stirring romance of modern communism and political intrigue, which between them shake to its very foundations the life of a certain remote and disaffected South American Republic. The story should add considerably to the already important reputation of its author.

READY AT ONCE.

THE HOUSE OF RIMMON.

By Mrs. COULSON KERNAHAN,

Author of "Trowinett of Guy's," "Frank Redland, Recruit," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth gi, 3s. 6d. Illustrated.

"A powerfully written tale of domestic fiction, which will be read with deep interest. Each of the author's characters is lifelike and full of individuality. English middle class society has never been more graphically painted, and the human interest of this tale, allied to the graphic realism of its style, render it a really remarkable novel."—Morning Post.

OUT FROM THE NIGHT.

By ALICE MAUD MEADOWS.

Author of "When the Heart is Young," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Illustrated by ST. CLARA SIMMONDS.

"A new novel by a young and brilliant writer, whose previous novels have attracted very wide attention. In this latest novel Miss Meadows well sustains her reputation as a writer of very remarkable power. It is a book which will, we feel sure, arrive at a wide popularity."—Reynolds.

Author of "A Stolen Life," "Paul Beck," "White Magic," &c.

THE REBELS.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. Illustrated by J. AMBROSE WALTON.

"Another historical novel from Mr. Bodkin's able and vigorous pen. A swinging story, in which there is much character and not a little dramatic power. It is a story of incident first of all, and its pages are crowded with stirring scenes and moving events."—Aberdeen Free Press.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN'S SELECTED LIST.

SHAKESPEARE in FRANCE.

Under the Aiglon Régime. By J. J. JUSSERAND, Author of the English Novel in the Time of Shakespeare, &c. Cloth, 2s.

This work describes the singular vicissitudes which accompanied the introduction of Shakespeare's plays to the French nation. It is copiously illustrated with quotations from criticisms—some of them very amusing—and the transformations and mutilations which Shakespeare had to endure are set forth in Mr. Jussierand's bright and sparkling manner.

PIERS GAVESTON:

A Chapter of Early Constitutional History

By WALTER PHELPS DODGE, Barrister-at-Law.

Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s.

This work treats of a period in the history of England which is dealt with by no other modern work. It sketches the career of a man who was for some time practically Dictator of England. It introduces a great deal of new matter, which is the result of several years of study and research, and throws many sidelights on the reign of the second Edward.

The Literary Week.

MR. YEATS'S play, "The Countess Cathleen," will be performed in the Irish Literary Theatre, Dublin, four times next week. How much of its vague, mystical beauty will be preserved is a question. Personally we would rather read the play in the quiet of the study than witness it lit by footlights; but tastes differ, and the Irish Literary Theatre deserves all encouragement.

Who will go drive with Fergus now,
And pierce the deep wood's woven shade,
And dance upon the level shore?
Young man, lift up your russet brow,
And lift your tender eyelids, maid,
And brood on hopes and years no more.
And no more turn aside and brood
Upon Love's bitter mystery;
For Fergus rules the brazen cars
And rules the shadows of the wood,
And the white breast of the dim sea
And all dishevelled wandering stars.

That is one of the songs in this most musical, intangible drama.

MR. MARTYN'S "Heather Field" will also be played next week, on two evenings, and its merits as an acting play, upon which so much has been written, almost to the losing of tempers, will then be determined. Subsequently may come plays by Fiona Macleod and Mr. Standish O'Grady.

THE death of Mrs. Marshall removes a writer who was perhaps better known by school-girls than by the adult reader. She was described as a novelist in the evening papers recording her decease, but authorship is a better classification. Mrs. Marshall's stories were not exactly novels: her method was to take a historical personage, and about him to arrange a simple narrative. Thus were produced Penshurst Castle (Sir Philip Sidney), Under the Dome of St. Paul's (Sir Christopher Wren), to mention but two of her numerous works. They were very popular, and several of them reached the honour of translation and a Tauchnitz edition. Mrs. Marshall died at her residence at Clifton.

POINTS from Lord Rosebery's speech at the dinner of the Newsvendors' Society:

I sometimes wonder what would be the idea of a perfect paper, and I believe—I hardly dare to speak my feeling—but I believe it would be a well-arranged Times without the leading articles.

My idea of journalistic happiness would be that we should have advertised and brought to our notice nothing but truth unmitigated and undefiled.

I have always noticed this difference between your Southern newsvendors and those I meet with in Scotland, that in Scotland they show a malicious and malignant art in the way in which they offer you the paper to which it is known you are politically opposed, and with all the more zest if they know that it contains an unsparing criticism of yourself and your party.

If I were to speak on the subject [seven-day newspapers] at length, which I have no intention of doing, I should plead also for the newspaper reader.

I daresay, if we were to cut them both open [Sir Edward Lawson and Mr. Harmsworth], we should find that they neither of them very much care about this expansion of enterprise; but, in the necessary rivalry of trade, in the fierce competition of journalism, it is found necessary to press forward and forward, and if there were an eighth and a ninth day a week I do not doubt they would invade them too.

MR. BENJAMIN VINCENT, for forty years librarian of the Royal Institution, has passed away in his eighty-eighth year. Mr. Vincent was the friend of Faraday, and, like Faraday, was a member of the small Sandemanian sect. Like Faraday, too, he rose from small beginnings. He started as a printer's reader at Messrs. Spottiswoode's, and by sheer industry made himself a ripe classical scholar. He had also a fund of general information hardly surpassed, and for many years he edited Haydn's Dictionaries of Dates and Biographies.

AMONG American visitors to London just now is Mr. Hamlin Garland, the author of Rose of Dutcher's Coolly and Main-travelled Roads. Mr. Garland, who has never been in England before, was born in Wisconsin, and now makes his home in Chicago. Before taking to authorship, he lectured on literature at Boston. In Mr. Zangwill, Mr. Kipling, Mr. Bernard Shaw, and Mr. Barrie he finds best promise and best performance among our younger men. Mr. Garland has recently travelled in the Yukon districts, and the result is a book which Messrs. Macmillan will publish shortly under the title The Trail of the Gold Seekers. It will consist of poetry and prose.

THE approaching break-up of the staff of the Sketch is exciting much interest in journalistic circles. Mr. Clement Shorter's resignation has been followed by the resignations of Mr. J. M. Bullock, the assistant editor, and Mr. King, the advertising manager. We understand that Mr. Shorter, assisted by these gentlemen, will shortly found a new threepenny illustrated weekly paper, the capital for which is subscribed.

ONE would hardly expect Mr. Frederic Harrison and the late William Morris to be in agreement on many points; yet they might be supposed to entertain somewhat similar views with regard to the genius of John Keats. But no. Whereas Morris called Keats the greatest of our modern poets, Mr. Harrison, in unveiling a memorial tablet to Keats at Edmonton last week, remarked that "had he lived thirty or forty years longer than he did, he might, had his character as a man improved, have found a place in the second rank of our national poets." Were Keats no better than that, it seems almost a waste of good money to erect a tablet to him at all; and Edmonton must be not a little puzzled by the event. Precisely where Mr. Harrison actually places Keats as we have him we cannot conjecture; for a place in the second rank of English poets would be his, you must understand, only had he lived thirty or forty years more. But a middle-aged Keats, a middle-aged Adonais, is beyond the imagination.

On the same occasion a tablet to the memory of Charles Lamb was also unveiled; and to him also Mr. Harrison denied the first rank as a writer. Moreover, Lamb "could not be regarded as a great teacher or inspirer." Here we seem to see the governing principle of Mr. Harrison's criticism. Unless a man can figure among the saints in the Positivist Calendar, his work must be depreciated. Keats had some of the weaknesses of youth: hence we cannot allow to "Endymion" and the "Ode on a Grecian Urn" the highest rank of poetry. Lamb "taught" nothing: hence he is not among our foremost writers. As if dogma and writing had any relation, and as if Lamb's life of unselfish devotion were not one long and magnificent lesson! No; Mr. Harrison's cold and niggardly methods of appraisal will not do. It is not thus that memorial tablets to Lamb and Keats should be dedicated to the public.

SOUTH LONDON has not many literary associations, and therefore it is gratifying to find a disposition to honour the few it possesses. The Lambeth Central Library will shortly be enriched by a tablet to the memory of William Blake, much of whose life was spent on the Surrey side. The memorial takes the form of a medallion portrait from Phillips's painting in the National Portrait Gallery. Room is also found for a bas-relief reproduction of Blake's own design, "Death's Door," which he made for Blair's "Grave." South London has fairly beaten North London in this matter. Blake was born in Broad-street, near Golden-square, and he died in Fountain-court in the Strand. He was for some years resident in Poland-street. Blake, by the way, made curious use of London localities in some of his mystical poems. Thus in "Jerusalem":

The fields from Islington to Marylebone,
To Primrose Hill and Saint John's Wood,
Were builded over with pillars of gold;
And there Jerusalem's pillars stood.

MR. STEPHEN CRANE must by this time have ready a sufficient collection of Cuban war stories to make a book. In the new Cornhill is another episode remarkably treated, Mr. Crane once more showing us the young journalis-face to face for the first time with the realities of battle. The thing is very slight, but nothing seems too slight for this writer's narrative power. Indeed, whereas most novelists avoid all incidents but those which "come off," Mr. Crane seems almost happier with a frustration, a fiasco, than otherwise.

MR. E. H. COOPER, the author of Mr. Blake of Newmarket, The Marchioness Against the County, and a volume of short stories just published, has an interest in public questions which is not too common among novelists. In the April Fortnightly Review the unsigned article on "Lawlessness in the Church" was from Mr. Cooper's pen.

ANOTHER pseudonym has been unmasked by the Scots Pictorial. Anyone possessing a volume of poems published in 1886, entitled Dulcie Cor, by Ford Bereton, may be interested to know that Ford Bereton and Mr. S. R. Crockett are one and the same. An autobiographic poem, called "Ford Bereton Himself," has this passage:

Though his heart rang clear and true
To the human love he knew,
Still to them his heart was truer—
To the sunshine and the trees.
Hardly dearer was the human
Love of tender, loving woman,
Quiet eyes and sad caresses,
Than the upland wind's embraces
And the song of woodland bird.

The bulk of the little book is amatory.

THE new Stevenson letters in Scribner's deal with his life in America, and are more interesting than the last instalment. The recipients are Mr. Colvin, Mr. Henley, and Mr. Gosse (called Weg, because, says Mr. Colvin, he was lame at the time, and Stevenson was reminded of Silas Wegg; but also, we may suppose, because Mr. Gosse's initials are E. W. G.). Here is Stevenson on one of his more gruesome stories, since published in the New Arabian Nights volume:

Herewith the Pavilion on the Links, grand carpentry story in nine chapters, and I should hesitate to say how many tableaux. Where is it to go? God knows. It is the dibbs that are wanted. It is not bad, though I say it; carpentry, of course, but not bad at that; and who else can carpenter in England, now that Wilkie Collins is played out? It might be broken for magazine purposes at the end of chap. iv. I send it to you, as I daresay Payn may help, if all else fails. Dibbs and speed are my mottoes.

HERE is another and more personal passage:

I have that peculiar and delicious sense of being born again in an expurgated edition which belongs to convalescence. It will not be for long; I hear the breakers roar; I shall be steering head first for another rapid before many days; nitor aquis, said a certain Eton boy, translating for his sins a part of the Inland Voyage into Latin elegiacs; and from the hour I saw it, or rather a friend of mine, the admirable Jenkin, saw and recognised its absurd appropriateness, I took it for my device in life.

BUT perhaps the most interesting of all the passages is that relating, in a letter to Mr. Henley, to the first draft of Prince Otto. Wrote Stevenson, in 1880 :

The Forest State or The Greenwood State: A Romance, is another pair of shoes. It is my old Semiramis, our half-seen Duke and Duchess, which suddenly sprang into sunshine clearness as a story the other day. The kind, happy dénouement is unfortunately absolutely undramatic, which will be our only trouble in quarrying out the play. I mean we shall quarry from it. Characters — Otto Frederick John, hereditary Prince of Grünwald; Amelia Seraphina, Princess; Conrad, Baron Gondremarck, Prime Minister; Cancellarius Greisengensang; Kilbian Gottesacker, Steward of the River Farm; Ottilie, his daughter; the Countess von Rosen. Seven in all. A brave story, I swear; and a brave play too, if we can find the trick to make the end. The play, I fear, will have to end darkly, and that spoils the quality as I now see it of a kind of crockery, eighteenth century, high-life-below-stairs life; breaking up like ice in spring before the nature and the certain modicum of manhood of my poor, clever, feather-headed Prince, whom I love already. I see Seraphina too. Gondremarck is not quite so clear. The Countess von Rosen, I have; I'll never tell you who she is; it's a secret; but I have known the countess; well, I will tell you; it's my old Russian friend, Madame Z. Certain scenes are, in conception, the best I have ever made, except for Hester Noble. Those at the end, Von Rosen and the Princess, the Prince and Princess, and the Princess and Gondremarck, as I now see them from here, should be nuts, Henley, nuts.

The author was justified in his terminology. They are nuts.

D'ANNUNZIO has before now failed to interest his countrymen in his plays; but his new drama, produced last week at Naples, was received with disapprobation of an extreme order. "Gloria," the play in question, is an attempt to blend the severity of the Greek manner with a plot of surprising modernity—no other than a passage from recent Italian politics, including domestic troubles in the Crispi family, and the recent African campaign. In spite of the acting of Eleanora Duse and Ermete Zacchoni, the drama failed utterly; and "The man is a madman" was the verdict on D'Annunzio.

Sartor Resartus as an illustrated book was a surprise; but Shakespeare's Sonnets as an illustrated book is more so. For in Sartor, although we had never given the matter a thought before Mr. Sullivan's daring experiment lay before us, there is a wealth of subject for the sardonic pencil; but the sonnets are poor in distinctive pictorial opportunities. However, Mr. Henry Osipov, the artist of the illustrated edition which Mr. Lane has just published, has found sufficient pegs upon which to hang a number of decorative drawings. Seen apart from the text, no one, we imagine, would guess for a moment what they were; but with the text beside them they have a certain far-fetched relevance to it.

THE late Lord De Tabley's Flora of Cheshire (Longmans) is enriched for the general reader by a biographical notice of its author by Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff, another devoted botanist. Herein are quoted passages from a number of interesting letters from Lord De Tabley, who was a man of many parts—botanist, poet, numismatist, traveller, and the first authority of his day on bookplates. In one of the letters we find this :

CHAPTER I.

How small the world is! In early life I advertised for Carex stricta, which everyone talked about but no one had seen. Reply came, from the infinite, by the pen of one Mathews of Birmingham, who sent it.

CHAPTER II.

Years pass on. Ten years ago Mathews writes to reclaim his specimen.

CHAPTER III.

Years pass on. My father dies, and it is necessary to get a valuer for some salt-mines. One Mathews is suggested. He proves the hero of Carex stricta!!! Tableau and curtain.

"His recluse life had thinned his friends," is one of Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff's sentences. Alas! how often is it so.

FROM Mr. Bodley's new preface to his France, just re-issued by Messrs. Macmillan in a one-volume edition :

Certain English critics, most amiable to the author, have told him that his sympathy for the French has led him astray, when he contrasts the virtues of a nation with the vices of its representatives and rulers, because "every people has the government it deserves." The maxim is of French origin; but for England to apply it to France in her distress is like a matron, prosperously married and settled, telling a less fortunate sister, whose chosen lord and master has turned out a riotous spendthrift or an unseemly lunatic, that every woman has the husband she deserves. Without pressing this analogy, I may say that American critics, some of whom have reviewed this book with profound political science, have not cited the aphorism. I do not know if their silence on the point is due to their national experience; but Englishmen who emphasise it seem to do so not as a scientific observation, but rather as a paraphrase of one of our favourite professions of faith: "Deus, gratias ago tibi quia non sum sicut ceteri hominum, velut etiam hic Gallus." This traditional self-righteousness, which foreigners of all nations readily impute to us, has somewhat marred the tone of English criticism on the last scandal which has aggravated the malady of the Third Republic. In discussing the Dreyfus case we have the right to boast of our Habeas Corpus liberties, and of our distaste for military rule. We have no right to assume an air which insinuates that neither miscarriage of justice nor religious disability has been known in England within living memory.

A CORRESPONDENT, "A. G.," pursuing his researches into the origin of the street phrase "Let 'em all come!" suggests that Tartarin's cry "Qu'ils y maintenant viennent!" is its parent.

HEARD in a library :

SUBSCRIBER : "Please give me the 'Prisoners of Hope.'"

ASSISTANT : "That's by Zenda, isn't it?"

ANOTHER version of M. Maeterlinck's poem received from W. E. M., Oxford.

ANOTHER correspondent informs us that a bookseller in a large provincial city recently discovered an assistant arranging four new copies of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass on the shelves devoted to books on gardening.

THE Unicorn Press is about to put forth two new periodicals: one, the Chord, a shilling musical quarterly; the other, Beltaine, the organ of the Irish Literary Theatre. The latter will be published whenever a number seems to be desired—without regularity.

Bibliographical.

THE publication of Mr. Justin McCarthy's Reminiscences naturally makes bookmen think of him as he was and is as a bookman. His position in Parliament has been and is "all werry well"; but it is hardly as a politician that he will live in the memory of his contemporaries or the judgment of posterity. One thinks of him, perhaps, first as the novelist, and is grateful to him for Dear Lady Disdain and Donna Quixota, to name no others. One remembers, too, what remarkably "easy reading" was his History of Our Own Times—a notable instance of the triumph of style over subject. Still more, however, to the taste of the bookish man was Mr. McCarthy's Con Amore—a happily-entitled volume, made up of essays on literary topics. This, I assume, has long been out of print; but some of it, at least, is well worth reproducing, along with other fugitive products of Mr. McCarthy's flowing and picturesque pen. On the whole, one is inclined to think that Mr. McCarthy has not made the most of his agreeable literary faculty: he has given up to Irish politics what was meant for the belles lettres.

Was it worth while to tell all over again the story of Florizel's Folly? Mr. John Ashton has done it, and I take for granted that he has gone to the original sources for his information. Florizel, as we all know, was George IV., then Prince of Wales; his Folly was his (temporary) devotion to the actress still remembered as "Perdita" Robinson. Mrs. Robinson wrote her own Memoirs, and they were published in 1801 in four 12mo. volumes, other editions following in 1803 and 1826. I take it that The Mistress of Royalty, or The Loves of Florizel and Perdita, "portrayed in the amatory epistles between an illustrious personage and a distinguished female" (1814), was a work of the imagination. Curiously enough, we get a glimpse of this "Perdita" in Mr. Beavan's recently-published James and Horace Smith. At Bristol, in 1765, Robert Smith, the father of the parodists, spent a few days with a Captain Derby and his wife, whose little daughter, then four years old, grew up to be the frail "Perdita" of the princely "Florizel."

It is well known that the Katie Stewart of the late Mrs. Oliphant was published originally without her name on the title-page. Mr. John Blackwood, her publisher, thought it "might be good for her to have an anonymous reputation"—a remark which her mother, in a letter printed by Mrs. Coghill, caps by saying, "Honest man, he little knew of John Drayton and his neighbour." To this utterance Mrs. Coghill appends this note: "Novels published anonymously for the benefit of her brother William, which some ingenious critics have supposed to be written by him." Now, I find that a two-volume novel called John Drayton was published in 1851 by the Bentleys. I find also that a three-volume novel called Ailieford—"by the author of John Drayton"—was issued in 1853 by Hurst & Blackett. These, I presume, are the two stories, written by Mrs. Oliphant, which were "published anonymously for the benefit of her brother William." But why, then, do they not figure in the list of Mrs. Oliphant's published works printed at the end of her Autobiography?

Talking, a fortnight ago, of Mr. Arber's forthcoming anthology, I ventured to express the belief that at least the text would be "impeccable." Mr. Harold Littledale, it seems, has not quite the same unquestioning trust in Mr. Arber's accuracy. He writes to say that he has just been comparing Mr. Arber's reprint of Scoloker's Diaphantus (in The English Garner, vol. vii.) with Dr. Grosart's reproduction of it (1880), for which Dr. Grosart claimed that it was taken direct from the unique Bodleian original. The result of the comparison is, that Mr. Littledale finds in the Arber reprint numerous inaccuracies. But then, what is there to prove that Dr. Grosart was in this case himself "impeccable"? Surely the proper thing would be to compare Mr. Arber's reprint with the original from which Dr. Grosart took his.

It is "real good" news that the late A. K. H. B.'s diaries and correspondence are not, after all, to be published. The worthy man left behind him instructions to that effect, and for that act of propriety let him be duly praised. It is perfectly intolerable that privacy should be so frequently violated in the supposed interests of the general reader. Down with the many-headed! In this particular instance there would have been no shred of excuse for further publicity, for A. K. H. B. had already given us three volumes of intimate autobiography, and autobiographical passages are scattered all over his writings. Few people have talked so much about themselves and their friends as A. K. H. B.

My joy over the A. K. H. B. business is, however, chastened by the announcement that more documents relating to the families of Charles Lamb and William Hazlitt have been discovered, and will be in due course utilised for public purposes. Is it not about time we decided that the farthest limits in Lamb and Hazlitt literature have been reached? That literature already bulks far too largely. Assuredly we do not want to know anything more about the Lamb and Hazlitt "families." The continued "chatter" about the men themselves is bad enough.

Now that the Prince of Wales has made a wedding-present of the works of Joachim du Bellay, that worthy is likely to have at least a passing vogue among us. Already attention has been drawn to Spenser's tribute to the Gallic Bard ("first garland of free Poesie that France brought forth"); one may add to it that of George Dainel in his Vindication of Poesy:

. . . the happy writ
Of Bellay, here shall live eternally,
Eternising his name, in his own wit.

Mr. Yeats's Poems.

The Wind Among the Reeds. By W. B. Yeats. (Elkin Mathews.)

Poems. By W. B. Yeats. New Edition. (Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

MR. W. B. YEATS is well known as one of the most active and prominent leaders of that movement in present literature which goes by the somewhat high-flown title of the Celtic Renaissance. It numbers both poets and prose-writers belonging to the kindred kingdoms of Ireland and Scotland. In Scotland it boasts Miss Fiona Macleod. Miss Jane Barlow represents another side of it; while even Wales sends its contributors. Mr. Yeats has forwarded it both with poetry and prose, and he has a number of coadjutors. Such movements are the fashion nowadays. In France a union of Gascon writers has broken out with much parade and display and self-glorification, after the way of things Gallic in general and Gascon in particular. The Celtic movement is less self-laudatory and more workmanlike. Our English instincts might desire even less public emphasis; but it is the way of the hour, and it cannot be questioned that the members are doing a needed thing in trying to awaken the dormant literary instincts of Ireland. For it is in Ireland that it is most noteworthy, by contrast with the long neglect of letters in that country; and it is a plain fact, dependent on no flourish of trumpets, that at present Ireland has a number of workers who have made their mark in the more refined and fastidious pursuits of literature.

None among them has a more genuine, more distinctive and personal note than Mr. Yeats. His first book, The Wanderings of Oisín, some years ago made that evident, and he has not receded from the promise then given. His work has been slender in quantity. Since he collected his previously published verse into one by no means bulky volume of Poems, his total product in verse and prose is included in five small books (counting the present one). But it has quality; it is artistic and conscientious. His prose inclines to a poetised style: it is good of its kind, but not eminently good. With all its poetic infusion, it has nothing tawdry. With all its self-conscious artistry, the note is not forced: its rhythm is a true prose-rhythm, with none of that terrible bastard movement—like blank verse gone very much to the bad—which makes most writing of this sort anathema. A very good specimen is "Dhoya," included in the volume called John Sherman. Yet it is not sufficient for a reputation.

That reputation must rest on Mr. Yeats's poetry. Here he stands quite alone: a poet he is, and—to our thinking—a poet only. In everything else which he writes he suggests the poet. As poet he suggests nothing outside poetry—the simple essence; not poetic embodiment of this thing or that, but just poetry. In this respect he belongs natively to the same order as Coleridge and Spenser and Shelley—when Shelley has got kings and priestcraft and the making of new universes off his mind: the Shelley of the songs and the "Skylark" and the "Cloud" and the "Witch of Atlas." Not that Mr. Yeats is as one of these; not his a large or wide gift. It is, in truth, an exceedingly contracted gift; but a gift it is, authentically his and no man else's. Whether from singular self-judgment or the good-hap of simple sincerity, Mr. Yeats has practically recognised this. He has known that his gift was small, he has known that his gift was narrow; he has known that his gift was his gift—or he has acted as if he knew, which comes to the same thing; and he has held to it and within it, unswerving and contented as the blackbird on the bough. "O blackbird, sing me something new!" cries Tennyson. "Always true is always now," answers the wise blackbird and Mr. Yeats. "A poor thing, but mine own," he might modestly claim with Touchstone.

This gift of Mr. Yeats, so one and individual, is easy to feel, not easy to state: it is not the gift of any poet before him. Some of his earlier work, in particular, shows close study of Shelley, and happy affinities with Shelley's lighter fancy; but his most characteristic work is not at all Shelleian. Nor yet can we acquiesce in Mr. Andrew Lang's description of him—"a Celtic Heine." We fail to see resemblance between the German poet and Mr. Yeats. In connexion with this "Celtic movement" we have heard much of the characteristic quality belonging to that native Celtic poetry sealed from the Saxon reader by the language in which it is written—a quality sometimes noted in Matthew Arnold's phrase as "Celtic magic," sometimes in a later phrase as "the Gaelic glamour." The latter has the advantage that it does "something affect the letter," as Holofernes says when he means to alliterate abominably. The Saxon is disposed to be sceptical, after much search, as to the very existence of this quality. He looks for it amid the poems of Irish writers in the English tongue, and finds it not. Even the strange thwarted genius of Clarence Mangan has nothing answering to this. Still less can one attach the phrase to the writers of the "Celtic movement." It may be hidden from us behind the veil of the old Erse tongue, but it finds no way beyond it. These young Irish writers of the movement have their various powers, but not this. There is one exception (to our mind), and it is Mr. Yeats. To the peculiar aura, the effluence of his poetry, if we were asked to attach the phrase "Celtic magic," our conscience would not take alarm. Certainly, if it be not the magic (on which let Celts pronounce), it is a magic which merits a distinctive phrase.

It is an inhuman beauty, a haunting of something remote, intangible, which the poet himself only feels, but cannot trace to its source. In proportion as he becomes, or tries to be, definite this power passes from him. It is when he is obeying the dictates of an emotion, a sentiment, as insubstantial and uncapturable as a gust of the night, that he achieves this most delicate and evanescent charm. With a true instinct of his own prevailing quality he calls this latest book The Wind among the Reeds. No less frail and mysterious than such a wind is the appeal of Mr. Yeats's best verse.

The very finest examples are contained in his collected Poems—namely, "The Lake-Isle of Innisfree" and "The Man who Dreamed of Fairyland." The first expresses in most daintily sweet verse the appeal of remembered solitary water and reedy isle to a born dreamer stranded in city streets. The second embodies in finely haunting verse Mr. Yeats's most constant mood—the call upon the visionary's heartstrings of the legendary country, where is "the light that never was on sea or land." On the whole, it is Mr. Yeats's best poem. And it should be; for he is himself "the man that dreamed of fairyland." All his poetry is one plaintive cry for a domain set apart from "life's exceeding jocundity." We are not pronouncing whether this is a wholesome or desirable frame of mind. Perhaps we have other views. We merely state the case. And since every poet is best when he expresses his dominant love, Mr. Yeats is always at his best when he is dealing with the world of fays or spirits. At such times his lightness of touch is exquisite. It is hard to say where the fascination lies. It is as much in the music as the apparent words—a true test in lyrics of this kind, which are sensitive rather than intellectual. Take this quite incidental lyric from the fairy play, "The Land of Heart's Desire"—a song sung by fairies to entice a mortal girl:

The wind blows out of the gates of the day,
The wind blows over the lonely of heart;
And the lonely of heart are withered away,
While the fairies dance in a place apart:
Shaking their milk-white feet in a ring,
Tossing their milk-white arms in the air;
For they hear the wind laugh and murmur and sing
Of a land where even the old are fair,

And even the wise are merry of tongue;
But I heard a reed of Coolaney say:
"When the wind has laughed and murmured and sung,
The lonely of heart shall wither away."

Could anything be more airy and delicate? In this sense Mr. Yeats has always been a mystic. He has always "dreamed of fairyland." But in this new volume there are signs that he desires to be a mystic in a more recondite sense. The old Irish mythology, which always attracted him, he has taken up the study of in its symbolic meanings, and endeavours to import it into his verse as a vehicle for the expression of modern and personal ideas.

Frankly, we view this development with alarm. It would always be a perilous experiment, because (unlike the language of Greek or Biblical religion) Irish mythology is so unknown to English readers. But Mr. Yeats's treatment of it increases the difficulty. He frequently uses this mythological imagery in a sense of his own, though in his elaborate notes he acknowledges himself doubtful about the correctness of his interpretation—that he is, in fact, guessing at the meanings of the symbols he uses. But how shall the reader follow this arbitrary use of symbolism, or be certain where the poet himself is uncertain? The only road out is the clumsy expedient of explanatory notes. This is not the true use of symbolism, and from a purely poetical standpoint is quite inartistic. It creates wanton difficulty. Mr. Yeats should at any rate be clear to the few who understand the system of mythological imagery. But his arbitrary use of it often leaves even them in the dark. "I use this to signify so and so," is the formula. But he should not "use it to signify" anything. He should use it (if he needs it) for what it does signify; and if he is unsure what it signifies, he should not use it at all. It is wantonness to darken his poetry by employing recondite imagery, which he confesses elaborately he is doubtful about the meaning of. Frankly, there is more ingenuity than insight in much of it.

This we have said with some emphasis, because it is a feature which threatens to mar Mr. Yeats's poetry; and his poetry is too good for us to see it marred with equanimity. But it is the trick of an artist unduly enamoured of a new medium for its own sake, and he will grow out of it. There is plenty of work in this new volume which shows the old charm. Take the "Cap and Bells." Mr. Yeats confesses that the meaning varies to him. But this is not the result of obscure expression; and a poet may quite legitimately be doubtful about his own allegory. It is a wise poet that knows (in this sense) his own child.

The jester walked in the garden;
The garden had fallen still;
He bade his soul rise upward
And stand at her window-sill.

It rose in a straight, blue garment,
When owls began to call;
It had grown wise-tongued by thinking
Of a quiet and light footfall.

But the young queen would not listen;
She rose in her pale night-gown;
She drew in the heavy casement,
And pushed the latches down.

He bade his heart go to her,
When the owls called out no more;
In a red and quivering garment
It sang to her through the door.

It had grown sweet-tongued by dreaming
Of a flutter of flower-like hair;
But she took up her fan from the table,
And waved it off on the air.

"I have cap and bells," he pondered,
"I will send them to her and die;"
And when the morning whitened,
He left them where she went by.

She laid them upon her bosom,
Under a cloud of her hair,
And her red lips sang them a love-song,
Till stars grew out of the air.

She opened her door and her window,
And the heart and the soul came through;
To her right hand came the red one,
To her left hand came the blue.

They set up a noise like crickets,
A chattering wise and sweet,
And her hair was a folded flower,
And the quiet of love in her feet.

We might venture an interpretation. The mistress whom poets serve desires not a poet—a poet pure and simple—for his wisdom, his study, let us say, of solar mythologists (who are not even the chattering of owls, for owls see in the dark), nor for his much service, but just for—his cap and bells, for his sweet intuitive gift of rhyme. That is the way of knowledge and of all else for him. Truly, if he follow that way, "the heart and the soul come through." But there is much else, besides this poem, to show that Mr. Yeats is still Mr. Yeats.

The Human Machine. By J. F. Nisbet. (Grant Richards.)

THERE can be little or no dispute of the high value of this exceedingly interesting and stimulating book: it has the essential literary quality of authenticity; it is to a very large extent a real man openly thinking, and the thinking is that of a man born to think, and believing quite sincerely that he came into this world mainly to that end. Philosophers are born, not made. Just as some men seem to concentrate into a clutching fistful of money or laurels; as some find their complete and final expression in some antic of costume and gesture; as some, again, are but the suburbs of stomachs weaving the whole world into the image of a spread repast, even so was Nisbet—a brain, a resolute interrogative brain, endeavouring to reduce the vast tangle of being to some semblance of consistency and order. From most men "An Inquiry into the Diversity of Human Faculty in its Bearing upon Social Life, Religion, Education, and Politics," would be the most impersonal and insincere production conceivable. One can imagine a bright young colonial bishop, Thirty-Nine Articles all duly subscribed, well married, and everything proper, throwing off something of the sort as a proof of contemporaneous vitality on his way to the higher sees; or a retired banker engaging in the enterprise as a foil to golf. But this "Inquiry" was Nisbet. This volume is, indeed, a mere extract and sample of the substance of his life.

He was a big and rather heavy-looking man, with a remarkable absence of gesture. There was something—"stiff-necked" one might call it—in his carriage, a careful deliberation in his speech; and to the end he had a Scottish roughness and fulness in his words. He dressed as though the thing were a trouble to him, and roused himself to social ceremonials as to unavoidable irrelevance. Quite casually, and because one must eat and drink before one may inquire, he was dramatic critic of the Times—and, for a time, of the Academy—and I doubt if there was ever a less histrionic critic of the stage. One saw him of a first night thrusting quietly but resolutely through a vast, excited jabbering of elegant and animated personalities, absolutely unsympathetic, and quite inflexibly resolved to do justice and two thousand words, observe sound principles of praise and blame, and keep the standard low and level between the highly emotional beings of applause upon the stage. He did a vast amount of journalistic work beside this dramatic criticism, but much of that was even less intimate and congenial than these latter exercises. And his private life, too, was, I think, something incidental. He was no doubt a man of strong affections, and no timid abstainer from living; he was no solitary, and in his last illness there was courage and help unstinted for him. But his strongest affection and desire were assuredly for the quest—that perpetual quest!—of the unassailable truths of being.

The onus of solvency never left him a week—hardly a day—free from that consuming inquiry; but one part of his journalistic work shaped itself more and more to the outline of his mind. I do not know what form "The Handbook" in the Referee originally possessed, but in the end it became, very satisfactorily, Nisbet talking to himself—in odd company, for the other voices concerned themselves chiefly with such matter as the recrudescence of brown boots at Brighton, the possible nature of Mr. Fitz-Duke's autumn production, and the private concerns of certain almost ostentatiously amusing pedigree pups. This present book consists very largely of the substance of these "Handbook" articles, shaped—probably by one of the last efforts of Nisbet's failing strength—into one coherent whole. One might naturally expect them to fail of unity under these circumstances, but this is by no means the case. They are hardly open to criticism on the score of logical continuity; and the manifest stiffness and inferiority of the first dozen pages—which seem to have been "written in"—and an undetected repetition here and there, seem to me, at least, to add rather than detract from the human value of the whole; for the book is assuredly a human document—a Confession of Faith. Of Faith!—albeit Nisbet was in formula a materialist and unbeliever. In one thing, at least, he had an unbounded, an organic faith; faith so strong that he showed it—where men's faiths are so rarely evident—in his life. And this exceptional faith of his was in the supreme value of telling oneself the truth. Usually, the Act of Faith begins by renouncing that.

It is on account of its permanent worth as a human document that I have insisted at the beginning of this review of this book's high value. One is inclined to such insistence from a sense of its necessity. Succeed as it may now, I do not doubt for one moment but that this volume will have far more appreciation at a later time than it will from the existing public, and that its real value will increase with the years. There is in the present time singularly little interest felt in character, apart from the sexual aspect; even religious questions nowadays seem mainly rephrasings of that great preoccupation in terms of Sin and Purity. Nisbet's former work, on The Insanity of Genius, temperately and soundly argued, was comparatively speaking a failure. Dr. Nordau's bawling version of the same thesis, coarsely seasoned with gross personalities, sauced with a dressing of sexual incontinence, and puffed vociferously by the large and influential section of the reviewing public with a bias in that direction, attained a vast success. But this inflamed state of the public imagination is perhaps transitory, and a day will return when men, curious for the reason of their being, will refuse to be diverted from such questioning by physical and emotional excitements. To them, this very complete exposition of the views and character of a hard-headed nineteenth century materialist will assuredly appear worthy of a sympathetic study.

They will certainly find a wide gulf between this work and the doctrines of the materialists of a hundred years ago. There is all the space of this unparalleled century of discovery; indeed, for the materialist this century has been a century of revelation. A hundred years ago there was not a little justification for the theologian's argument that materialism was an attempt to liberate the mind from moral obligations. Materialism too often presented itself as a gross common-sense, or clad itself with contemptible sentimentalities far less reasonable than the theological contradictions it disavowed. The tawdry and irrational idealism of William Godwin presents "universal happiness" as the desirable and attainable goal of mankind, and it was from the vicarage of Malthus that the austerer teaching came. The thought of Nisbet is child of Malthus, not Godwin. Godwin belongs to the vanished age; he is simply the unclerical brother of the amiable and virtuous Paley, who, secure in a peaceful home and prosperous country, started his Natural Theology with the assertion that the world is evidently made for the happiness of the creatures therein. By way of contrast, one may read Nisbet's chapter on Happiness. He weighs the lot of this man and that. He evidently starts with a bias for happiness as the desirable thing. "There is probably a far greater measure of happiness among the lower animals than among human beings, and more among the unenlightened than the so-called superior races and classes." "In much wisdom is much grief, and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow." To this thought he recurs several times in the book—finally, just at the end, in a way that is very characteristic. Man is not made for happiness. He seeks, strangely enough, things that are not happiness, for that is the law of his being. There Nisbet stops, seeing no clear way beyond. But his stopping-place is a long journey from Godwin and Paley.

Again, when he deals with dreams and ghosts and the riddle of the quasi-material spirit, comes the same resolute stoppage at the limit of assurance. Yet again he stops short at the religion of science. "Is it conceivable that from the doctrine of the pitiless and immutable 'laws' of science there may be developed something like a religious sense? . . . In the face of the unknown, reverence and submission there must be. I do not know that the attitude of the materialist in presence of the First Cause can be essentially different from that of the Christian towards the Godhead. . . . Prayer seems to be a necessity of the human mind in affliction." And there he stops, in no hurry for the religion; seeing for the time nothing further in that direction, and discreetly saying as much. He was no fanatic of preconceptions, or he would not have said as much as this, or, saying it, would not have stopped there, nor would he have made the remarkable admission he makes of the effect of Lourdes upon his mind; and to me, at least, it has a touch of the heroic, that feeling, as he certainly did, a strong attraction towards certain aspects of devotion, he would defile himself with no helpful self-deceptions to anticipate his call, but remained, as he was meant to remain, outside, amid his riddles.

He wrestled to the end, declining always any unstable additions, any hopeful interpretations. In his last chapter he writes:

The achievements of science have consisted in the discovery of small and isolated facts here and there in the established order of things. The record of these facts is what we call Knowledge, and it is really so small as hardly to be worth considering. We are standing on a small illuminated spot in the midst of the Unknown. Above us, beneath us, all around us, impenetrable mystery.

In that persuasion he died. That was his creed. He died while he was still only in his early middle age, after many years of struggle and irksome labour, and with his work still almost unrecognised. He died after a year of intermittent illness, and with many things to trouble him; but he died stoutly, with the same mental steadfastness as he had lived. At least this much of the "impenetrable mystery" he understood—not to be afraid. I do not believe his ultimate thinking and questioning is a thing that can altogether die, that we gauge all the influence of such a life as his, or that the full measure of his recognition has yet come.

Cromwell and His Times. By G. H. Pike. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

The Two Protectors. By Sir Richard Tangye. (S. W. Partridge & Co. 10s. 6d.)

From Cromwell to Wellington. Edited by Spencer Wilkinson. (Lawrence & Bullen. 10s. 6d.)

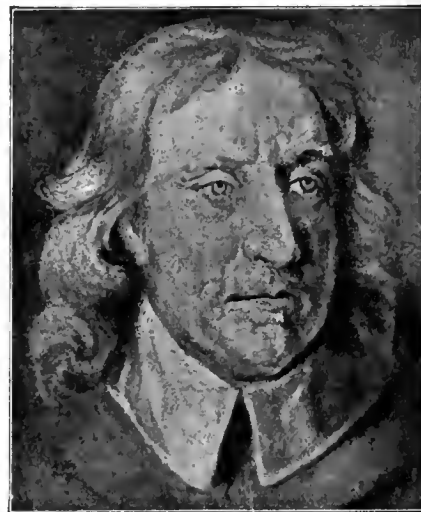

THERE is observable the springing of a revolutionary mine in literature just at present. First, there were two simultaneous shocks on the subject of Danton; then followed Robespierre; and now comes a general upheaval in regard to Cromwell, heralded by the triple explosion recorded above. The composite volume, From Cromwell to Wellington, we have already noticed, and are only concerned here with the admirable military monograph on Cromwell contributed to it by Lieutenant-Colonel Cooper King and Mr. Spencer Wilkinson. The other two volumes are not more than compilations for an occasion. Both are written by thorough Cromwellians; both rely largely on extracts from Carlyle, to which Sir Richard Tangye adds yet more copious extracts from Mr. Frederic Harrison. But while Mr. Pike makes a manifest endeavour to hold the scales as even as his personal admiration will allow him, Sir Richard Tangye is too uncompromisingly partisan in every way to carry weight with the historical student. On the other hand, Mr. Pike writes distressing grammar, while Sir Richard Tangye writes correctly, and contributes some interesting details (in one case valuable) from original materials in his own possession. The latter, therefore, bears a certain independent value, apart from his monograph itself.

You may regard Cromwell from the standpoint of Sir Richard Tangye, as a mixture of patriot and saint who only once, doubtfully, was a little harsh, and never otherwise made a mistake or did any wrong. You may regard him from the standpoint of the Legitimist Society, as a Tyrant, Regicide, Hypocrite, and a great many other capitals. But either way you must confess him one of the most remarkable specimens of human ability that have appeared among the English race. He was born a country gentleman, he never had any training in public affairs, any education in war, till he was past his youth. Yet so soon as circumstances bring him forward, he develops supreme capacity both as captain and statesman. In warfare his only parallel is Clive. And even Clive began his military career in earlier life. Both were at first civilians by profession. Cromwell learned the elements of the military art from Dalbier, who had served on the Continent, as Clive learned them under Major Lawrence. Both, with this slight schooling, evolved an intuitive knowledge of the great principles of command which consummately trained soldiers have lacked. But again Cromwell has the advantage. Clive fought only Asiatic enemies, and was engaged only in small affairs. The one apparent exception—Plassy—is no exception; for the enemy, paralysed by the treachery of their generals, retreated after a mere cannonade. They never came to close quarters; whereas Cromwell fought with English, Scots, and Irish, and commanded large bodies in great battles. His strategy was admirable, as in the instance of the Scots campaign, noticed by Lieutenant-Colonel Cooper King. The Duke of Hamilton was marching south through Lancashire, Cromwell made a parallel march northwards through Lancashire, separated from Hamilton by the intervening hills; while Lambert's cavalry acted as a further screen on the western side of the hills. Then, turning westwards through a pass, he interposed between the Scots army and Scotland, came suddenly down on Hamilton from the north (whence he was least expected), surprised him at Preston with his army cut in two by the Ribble, and completely routed him; only a small portion of the Scots regaining their country. In most of his battles with the Cavaliers he was second in command; and he won them after they had been lost by the General-in-Chief. He alone introduced discipline into the Parliamentary army, and made it the best-trained force in Europe.

Once only was he out-manœuvred. That was by Leslie, before Dunbar; and in the end Leslie made the fatal mistake, while Cromwell made none. It was an old story. Leslie stood on the defensive, and brought Cromwell into grievous straits while he did so. But he failed to pursue his strategy to the end. If there be one thing shown by military history, it is that a third-rate general may baffle a first-rate general by dogged defensive strategy. But it is also characteristic of the third-rate general that he scarce ever carries through his defensive strategy. When he has gained an advantage by cautious passivity, he foregoes it by an aggressive movement. So, by patiently keeping his position, Pompey baffled Cæsar, and drove him to precipitate retreat. But not only did he timorously refuse to push his advantage at the right moment (in the lines of Petra), at precisely the wrong moment he descended from his watchful security into the field of fatal Pharsalia. He feared to act when he should have acted, he acted when he should have feared to act. So the French suffered Edward and Henry to snatch victory out of famine-stricken retreat at Crécy and Agincourt. So Leslie baffled Cromwell, till, at the crowning hour, he pushed his right wing down from the hills to ruin and Dunbar.

It was solely Cromwell who averted a war more lingeringly ruinous than the Wars of the Roses, to which otherwise there was a certain resemblance, for North was drawn against South. If the Eastern Counties were for the Parliament, the Western Counties kept the balance by siding with the North and the King; but Yorkshire, the flower of the North in those days, no longer marched under the Southern banners, as when it followed great ill-fated Warwick—a great advantage to Charles over Henry, his predecessor in doom. After Edgehill the King's way was open to London; but the fatuous Royalist leaders refused to follow Rupert, who for once gave wise, no less than daring, counsel. Some of them did not want Charles to triumph too speedily, lest he should be too absolute. There was plenty of time they thought; but "he that will not when he may ——" In fact, both Royalist and Parliamentary generals were imbued with the ideas of the Thirty Years' War on the Continent, which, as Cromwell saw and said, was deliberately prolonged to keep soldiers of fortune in employment. Armies roved about the country, met, and beat or were beaten. If they beat, they did not follow up the enemy; if they were beaten, the enemy did not follow. So the war jogged on interminably, to the heart's content of both generals and soldiers, who were on a good thing, and did not want to spoil trade. They were not paid, but they had the plunder of the country, and took their pay out of it. The Roundhead generals were quite at one with the Cavaliers as to this mode of conducting the war; consequently the Cavaliers saw no need for hurry after Edgehill. They must have regarded Rupert as a hot-headed young man, who wanted to end the sport before they had seen a fair run for their money. They did not dream that the Roundheads had a worse marplot than Rupert, who meant to end the game if they did not. This unsportsmanlike person (what better could be expected of a reputed brewer's son?) did not respect the rules of the ring, which allowed his adversary "time" to get on his feet again after knocking him down. He was even brutally capable of hitting him while he was down, and going on hitting until he had pounded him into submission, which explains why the Royalists, to their justifiable indignation, never had another chance after Edgehill. Cromwell did not understand how to make war like a gentleman, and the Parliament (whose own generals knew better) allowed themselves to be bullied into letting him have his own way. This came of the mere vulgar desire to win at any price!

No less as politician than as soldier was he unique, this Cæsar of the squirearchy. For no brewer's son was he, but of a family of knighted country gentlemen. He kept the revolution at a manly pitch throughout. Very different was it from its French successor a century later. It was middle-class, headed by the lesser gentry; it was political, not social; it aimed at the establishment of constitutional government. To many of the French leaders it served as model. Even Danton (a student of English literature and history, who always desired an English alliance) probably took the idea of his Committee of Public Safety from Cromwell's Committee of Safety. The earlier French leaders and the Girondins dreamed of a revolution within like constitutional limits, directed to like political aims, ignoring the terrible element of the sans-culottes, which from the first made the ultimate issue certain. There was no such social element in the English revolution. It was truly what history has called it—the Great Rebellion; and it was Charles who turned it into a revolution. Had he accepted the constitutional limits demanded by the leaders, there need have been no Regicide. Charles so clearly saw the constitutional aim of the Rebellion that he was blind to his own danger. We are clear that Cromwell was sincere in his overtures. Charles was not. That was the cause of what followed. He would not accept the accomplished fact. He would pursue the Turkish diplomacy of delay and tripping between the jealous rivalries of his opponents. Once Cromwell saw this, his very respect for the King's ability made it all the more impossible to temporise with so persistent an adversary. He was obliged to crush him, and he crushed him. He had to fight the Presbyterians; a third power was ruinous. That which Charles relied on for his safety became his destruction.

He knew that at last that he was doomed when he faced that stern array in Westminster Hall. As he took his seat on the opening day, at first sight of his judges, the head fell from his staff. Terribly significant must it have been to the Scriptural-minded Puritans. The head was indeed about to fall from the Royal power of England. In a grimly literal sense, the head was about to fall from this rod of the root of Stewart. Charles waited in vain for any man to stoop to his aid, as he looked in vain when sentence had passed on him. No such striking incident came to the bourgeois Louis XVI. at his trial. But Charles was regal enough to deserve that fateful incident should attend him. On both sides this Regicide was a scene worthy of English actors and its own high import. It contrasts in history with the squalid tragedy of Louis' trial, the undignified truculence of accusation, the tinsel declamation, the roaring patriotism, the tenth-rate stagy posturings, with one eye skewed at the gallery of posterity, as to ask how that strikes them. Here the judges are self-contained, sparing of words, respectful of their august prisoner and themselves; not striving to do a great thing bigly, but as men who do a grave thing gravely: which is, indeed, the essence of all worthy action. If Charles suffered any insult, it was not from them. Of the King's behaviour Marvel has spoken the last and lasting word:

He nothing common did or mean
Upon that memorable scene;
But bowed his comely head
Down, as upon a bed.

We can sympathise with an enemy's thrill of English pride in the King's attitude on the scaffold. This Puritan poet, praising Cromwell, felt no necessity, as a Desmoulins would have done, to disparage his royal victim. There you have not only the difference between the two historic trials, but the measure of Cromwell's character. His spirit is behind that stern act—too strong for violence, too direct for pose, too fateful for mean rancour, too confident for grudge.

He seized the government, for it had become a choice between the second Charles and himself, as his death soon proved. His life proved that there was no man in Europe so capable of governing. The country squire made England orderly at home, feared by all nations abroad. His actions belie him if he aimed at rule before the King's death. After that it became inevitable. His political consistency seems to us clear. Let it suffice that he was a very great Englishman, with a native genius for war and government unparalleled, who at a critical moment saved England from anarchy, and gave her the first strong rule she had known since Elizabeth, the last she was to know till she passed finally under Parliamentary rule. In his bluntness, his decision, his scorn of externals, his resolve to be and appear just himself, his homely domestic virtues, he was Anglo-Saxon of the Anglo-Saxons. Two men showed Puritan England in its essence—Bunyan in literature, Cromwell in action.

Other New Books.

THE GOOD QUEEN CHARLOTTE. BY PERCY FITZGERALD.

Mr. Fitzgerald does not assist the critic or his readers by any preface in explanation of this biographical compilation. But it soon appears that none is needed. Mr. Fitzgerald has no other aim than to write an anecdotal life of one of the most amiable of English queens. This he has done; and the feast is quiet and alluring. We are introduced to the Queen's early life in the quaint old court at Strelitz, and her journey to London via Harwich, where the mayor received her; Colchester, where they presented her with a box of eringo root, a local product; Witham, where she supped with open doors that all persons might see their future queen; Romford, where she was met by the King's coach and servants; and Mile End, where a squadron of the Life Guards surrounded the coach, and escorted her onwards.

She used to recall the agitating drive through London: and, when passing up along Constitution Hill that one of her ladies—no doubt the downright Duchess of Hamilton—said, looking at her watch, "We shall hardly have time to dress for the wedding." "The wedding!" exclaimed the Queen. "Yes, madam; it is to be at twelve (midnight)." Upon this she fainted.

We should think so. George III. was "a little disappointed at the first sight of his bride," but he married her at twelve (midnight).

Of the Queen's quiet court life, and her homely, unassuming virtues, we see much in Mr. Fitzgerald's pages. The Fanny Burney chapter is one of the best in the book. In it the Queen's taste in English literature, which she learned to enjoy with astonishing rapidity, comes pleasantly forward. Thus:

A few days later there was another visit and another pleasant talk, when the Queen asked her: "Miss Burney, have you heard that Boswell is going to publish a life of your friend, Dr. Johnson? I tell you as I heard. I can't tell what he will do. He is so extraordinary a man that perhaps he will devise something extraordinary." (How delighted would "Bozzy" have been had this speech been repeated, which we may be sure it never was.) She then began to discuss Madame de Genlis, whom she admired, and who sent her all her books. She talked of German literature, and complained that "they translate all our worst. And they write so finely now, even for the most silly books, that it makes one read on, and one cannot help it. Oh, I am very angry at that—she alluded to the Sorrows of Werther—very finely writ, and I can't bear it." Speaking of another book, she astonished the listeners by saying that "she had picked it up on a stall." "Oh, it is amazing what good books there are on stalls. Why, I don't pick them up myself, but I have a servant very clever; and if they are not to be had at the booksellers', are they not for me any more than for another?"

The book contains some good portraits, and is pleasant reading throughout. There seems to be quite a revival of gossipy history of queens and princesses and court ladies. (Downey & Co. 10s. 6d.)

NELSON'S FRIENDSHIPS.

BY MRS. HILDA GAMLIN.

The pith of this work, which fills two considerable volumes, is the defence offered by the late Mrs. Hilda Gamlin of Nelson's relations with Lady Hamilton. Mrs. Gamlin's complaint is that all Nelson's recent biographers have followed the theories of Dr. Pettigrew. Pettigrew was the first to make the statement that Nelson and Lady Hamilton corresponded under the name of Thompson on matters connected with the earliest existence of Horatio Nelson Thompson, their reputed child. Mrs. Gamlin discusses this thorny subject in great detail, animated by the desire to clear Nelson from the shadow which rests upon him. Her contention is that the "Thompson" letters—published by Pettigrew in 1848—formed part of a collection mixed of genuine and spurious documents. Pettigrew's failure to fully account for his possession of these letters is dwelt upon with scorn; and the alleged device of the parties in corresponding under the name of Thompson is treated by Mrs. Gamlin as follows:

The improbability of Pettigrew's version must be apparent, for the need of such schemes was both unnecessary and unlikely. Lord Nelson and Lady Hamilton could by no possibility have quite concealed the fact of a surreptitious birth in her Ladyship's new half-furnished house. In the case of a married lady, domiciled with her husband as was Lady Hamilton, if such delinquency had actually occurred, she was perfectly well situated for the concealment of misconduct; and, as all must readily admit, such an occurrence as the birth of a child would have been eminently satisfactory to Sir William, her husband, so why conceal? Such letters were perfectly unnecessary in face of the safe course in which lay no betrayal. Exposure would have come surely had those letters really been transmitted at the dates given; but when they were revealed all the chief actors were dead, and could not justify themselves, and even to-day the letters are unauthenticated.

Of the sincerity and ability of Mrs. Gamlin's attempt to prove that Lord Nelson's relations with Lady Hamilton were honourable to the last there is no doubt. It is to be regretted that the author has not lived to note the effect of her plea on the rather large body of Nelson "experts," and to support her views in the new controversy which is pretty sure to arise out of these volumes. Apart from their main purpose, and the Hamilton element in them, these volumes are a treasury of anecdote and illustrations relating to the hero of Trafalgar, and as such they are welcome. (Hutchinson. 2 vols. 28s.)

THE QUEEN'S EMPIRE. (VOL. II.)

This volume completes a series of photographic views typical of the spacious and ingenious days of Queen Victoria. Views of scenery, towns, manufactures, shipping, and what not, are brought together from all quarters of the Empire. Attractive variety! We have a photograph of the sorting-room at St. Martin's-le-Grand and a photograph of a police review at Sydney; a photograph of the fruit market at Quetta and of the High Level Bridge at Newcastle-on-Tyne. A capital work to give or possess. There could be no better book for father and child to read together than this. (Cassell. 6s.)

INSTRUCTIONS ON THE REVELATION OF ST. JOHN.

BY THE REV. CRESSWELL STRANGE.

These are thoughtful applications of the tremendous images of the Apocalypse to present-day problems and the ethics of social life. The day has passed when the antipapal interpretation of such figures as that of the lady of the seven mountains was rigidly required; and in the more diffuse and generalised interpretation Canon Strange may hope to gain in the added consent of his readers as much as he heroically sacrifices in picturesqueness and vigour. In his eschatology the author coyly hovers between universalism and purgatory, and entangles himself dreadfully in an argument deduced from the immersion of Death and Hell in the lake of fire—"which is the second death." Quite a respectable and suggestive book. (Longmans.)

PUBLIC SCHOOL SERMONS.

BY H. MONTAGU BUTLER.

The sermons are seventeen and they were preached from the chapel pulpits of Eton, Harrow, Marlborough, Wellington, and other public schools. Dr. Butler is recognised as one of the men endowed with the rare gift of preaching to boys without boring them. He is plain, but not obvious; simple, but not trite; sympathetic, but by no means saponaceous. His tendency is rather to minimise the importance of school successes and to strengthen the feeble knees. At times, when the subject has moved him, he touches eloquence, as notably in the panegyric of Lord Bessborough, the good genius of the Harrow games. (Isbister & Co. 5s.)

A DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. (VOL. II.)

This new volume (Feign to Kinsmen), towards which the very best of English Biblical scholarship has contributed, comprises articles on the Incarnation (R. L. Ottley), Jesus Christ (50 pp., W. Sanday), the people and kingdom of Israel, the writings of St. John, and the life and prophecies of Isaiah. We hope at a future date to consider this instalment of an important work at some length. Meanwhile we observe with admiration the judicial and dispassionate manner in which many of the conflicting results of criticism are lucidly stated. The mere devotee of letters may find in the articles on the uses of individual words much to edify him and something to amuse. The strange shiftiness of common words is exemplified very freely. "Fellow" is an example. Tindale, it seems, could reverently write: "And the Lord was with Joseph, and he was a lucky fellow." (T. & T. Clark.)

Fiction.

One Poor Scruple. By Mrs. Wilfrid Ward.
(Longmans. 6s.)

THIS is not an average novel. It holds you beyond the ordinary. You become really interested in the characters—not languidly, idly curious, but interested: which may be said of few novels. We do not assert that it is a fine novel—we think that it falls distinctly short of that—but it is the work of an author who might write a fine novel. From an unnecessary exculpatory note at the beginning we gather that it is a first book, and there are indeed signs of this throughout the tale—certain clumsinesses, indiscretions, and lapses from (literary) good taste. The creative power, however, seems curiously mature.

Mrs. Ward goes after atmosphere rather than event. Except one suicide, nothing very definite happens in all the four hundred pages. And it would be difficult to detach from the story any clear leading motive. Madge Riversdale is the young widow of the son of a great Catholic house, a gay, worldly creature of refined aesthetic taste, but apparently without moral seriousness. After a separation she mixes again with her dead husband's people. She loves Lord Bellasis, who has a divorced wife living. He proposes; she accepts, though Catholicism forbids such matches. The pendulum of her fate swings to and fro, moved by opposing instincts. In the end she does not marry Lord Bellasis. We just get a glimpse of the fundamental deeps of her nature, and the drama is over. In an epilogue we are told that ultimately she married with propriety.

We have conspicuously failed to describe the main theme of One Poor Scruple; failure was inevitable. The matter is too subtle, too elusive, too spiritual, to be seized and set down in a paragraph, or a page. We are not, indeed, quite sure that we have read the author's intentions correctly. But we are quite sure as to her courage and ability. It was no small thing to elucidate the complex psychology of an ancient and aloof family like that of the Riversdales. Mrs. Ward has performed the feat of making two complete generations of Riversdales live and move for us, parents and children and all the array of cousins and connexions. She can draw convincingly men and women of good blood and long descent, disclosing the effect of race and traditions. She has the large vision, the sense of perspective. What she has not is the ability to regard the lady's maid, the footman, the butler, as fellow creatures. Her world, extensive enough, is also singularly small. On the north it is bounded by the Duchess of A—and on the south by Celestino.

The Game and the Candle. By Rhoda Broughton.
(Macmillan. 6s.)

SPEAKING broadly, the beginning and the end of this story are good, while the middle is indifferent. The first scene, between the dying old selfish millionaire husband and his young wife, is very good. Mr. Etheredge, as he lay on his death-bed, told his wife that for years he had known that she loved another man. He said he forgave her, and that he should leave her his wealth and the freedom to marry again without forfeiting it—if she would promise not to marry that particular man. She would not promise, and her refusal is impressively done. So Jane lost the Etheredge millions. The rest of the story shows how she met her true love, loved him anew, arranged to marry him, and then suddenly discovered that he was worthless. Therefore she remained a widow. "He is out of sight," and she turns from the window, murmuring to herself: "As a dream when one awaketh."

Miss Broughton is, perhaps, given over too much to sentiment, and the emotional haziness of mere tender verbiage; but when she chooses she can be a literary artist. She is specially fortunate with her landscapes. Here, for example, is a Scotch scene:

... to the Sound across whose narrow space rise the noble barren hills of Skye. The Cuchullins hiding their sharp peaks in the clouds—hiding and then withdrawing them to show them to the sunlight. Glauegg with his feet in the water, and just behind him that twin hill which seems to mimic his profile, and the downward trend of his scar; other and other mountains, rounded, toothed, and endlessly varied, "backed like weasles," notched and bitten, continue the line, and close as at a lake-head the vision.

And on the faces of these hills what a mad riot of shine and rain! What momentary prisms travelling lightning quick! What a race of shadows! What vertical splendours of wet radiance! What intense green oases starting into light!

There is style here.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

STRONG HEARTS.

BY GEORGE W. CABLE.

Three stories by the author of Old Creole Days and The Grandissimes: "The Solitary," a tale of a man who took to drink but recovered himself by retreating to a lonely island, destroying his boat, and conquering the cravings; "The Taxidermist," the tale of one who loved birds, but loved men more; and "The Entomologist," the tale of one who put insects first and his kind second. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

RAGGED LADY.

By W. D. HOWELLS.

Another of Mr. Howells's minute studies of middle-class American life. On the face of them it would be hard to find more commonplace persons than Mr. and Mrs. Lander and the other characters in this book, and yet Mr. Howells, by his art and his humour, makes everything about them not only interesting, but almost necessary to us. (Harpers. 6s.)

MISS CAYLEY'S ADVENTURES.

By GRANT ALLEN.

Another of the episode novels which sprang from Sherlock Holmes's success. Mr. Grant Allen's new heroine, Miss Cayley, who has been beguiling the readers of the Strand Magazine, is a female Sherlock Holmes. She leaves Girtton a fully-equipped woman of the world, ready to cope with and frustrate any villainy and hold her own in any company. The stories are told with much spirit, and are illustrated by Mr. Gordon Browne. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

ADRIAN ROME. By ERNEST DOWSON AND ARTHUR MOORE.

A clever novel dealing with youth and genius and the blind operation of love. "He suffered a moment of vexatious shame at his inconsequent appeal to her; his long fingers fumbled nervously with his disordered papers; her presence there troubled him. The strange woman! What was his work to her, or she to him?" Thus Adrian Rome is brought to meditate about his wife. (Methuen. 6s.)

IRIS THE AVENGER.

By FLORENCE MARRYAT.

A melodramatic story. Iris Bevan, governess in the family of Sir Joseph Fritterley, devotes her life to discovering and punishing the seducer of her sister Mary. After many anxious chapters she believes herself to have found him, but on learning the true story, wherein he shines in heroic colours, she exchanges with him "a kiss of perfect faith and hope and love." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

CHILDREN, RACEHORSES, AND GHOSTS. By E. H. COOPER.

Twenty-two short stories of seamy life by the author of Mr. Blake of Newmarket. In the introduction Mr. Cooper writes of the late Mrs. Lynn Linton's fearlessness of everything: "She could so infect her companions that I have seen a man who had crawled on the ground for twenty-five years of his life rise up after two or three afternoons at her flat, and go away and criticise the manners of a duchess, or the menu of a Savoy chef, or the last poem of a Laureate, like a Saturday Reviewer of the 'seventies.'" A clever, but rather sordid collection. (Duckworth. 6s.)

THE KINGDOM OF MAMMON.

By VIOLET TWEEDALE.

The author's intention is to reveal hypocrisy and avarice in the high places of the Church of England, and to show how churchmanship and mammon may destroy love. The climax is the enthronement of Bishop Wedderburn as Archbishop of Canterbury. (John Long. 6s.)

AN EXILED SCOT.

By H. A. BRYDER.

The hero, Randal Cameron, escapes with Prince Charlie in 1746, flies to Amsterdam, and voyages thence to South Africa. The author revives the romance of the early Dutch settlements at the Cape, when the Bushmen were numerous, and the interior tribes had not assumed, "with other dubious aids to civilisation, the hideous slop-clothes of the up-country store." (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

FORTUNE'S TANGLED SKEIN.

By J. H. WALWORTH.

An American story. We begin in a thunderstorm. "'It was just such a night as this that—' 'Hold your tongue, Bocky,' said the head of the family, transfixing the trembling girl with a look." Some readers may find the tale engrossing. (Warne. 3s. 6d.)

ENGLAND'S PERIL.

By WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

"The great peril which befell England, and the subsequent downfall of the most accomplished and ingenious spy that France has ever possessed, occurred only little more than a year ago, but until this moment the strange story has never been made public property." This is the strange story, told in the gay Mr. Le Queux's manner. (White & Co. 6s.)

THE FARM IN THE HILLS.

By FLORENCE WARDEN.

An uncanny story of a series of disappearances on a Welsh mountain. (Sands. 3s. 6d.)

THE ROMANCE OF ELISAVET.

By MRS. W. M. RAMSAY.

This is the servant-girl problem transferred to Smyrna. Elisavet is a poor little kitchen-maid who repines at her lot and drudges along in misery, until at last the lane turns when the cook, Anastasia, is ordered goat's milk. Elisavet allows Panayotti, the farm boy who brings the goat every morning to be milked, to share her troubles. Thenceforward Elisavet's life becomes more eventful. Her romance is dedicated "to all true lovers." (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s.)

THE SPAN O' LIFE.

By McLENNAN AND McILWRAITH.

Mr. McLennan is the author of Spanish John, and herein he gives us, with a collaborator, more historical romance. The story, which is based to some extent on the memoirs of the Chevalier Johnstone, is of the Canadian War and the taking of Quebec. It is told partly by Hugh Maxwell, of Kirkconnel, Jacobite and gentleman of fortune, and the flavour of the '45 pervades the book. (Harpers. 6s.)

IN THE KING'S FAVOUR.

By J. E. MADDOCK.

This story opens in Edinburgh in the year 1513, and we are soon introduced to the gaieties of the court at Linlithgow. It ends with a spirited account of the battle of Flodden, at which "there was no shrinking, no recreant yielding; bishops and earls, lords and knights, squires and grooms fought in emulation, and poured out their blood like water." A good historical novel; useful footnotes are given where required. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

OUT FROM THE NIGHT.

By ALICE MAUD MEADOWS.

We have here "a mystery" told by Stewart Don. The mystery seems to take its origin in Stewart Don's foolishness in dealing properly with an emergency. It is rather irritating, too, to find a constable who is searching a room for a corpse, say: "Well, it's a puzzle; I can't understand it"; and, when the cupboards are suggested, replying: "You've hit it; of course, the cupboards." A London constable is no infant. But granted the mystery, the unravelling is interesting. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE SECRET OF SORROW.

By CECIL HEADLAM.

The sub-title of this novel, "The Confessions of a Young Man," reveals its character. It deals with a young man's loves and aspirations, and the conclusion of the matter is reflected in Stevenson's lines, quoted at the beginning:

I have trod the upward and the downward slope;
I have endured and done in days before;
I have longed for all and bid farewell to hope;
And I have lived and loved and closed the door.

The hero says, among other things: "I am never surprised at anything now, except humour in a woman." (Macqueen. 6s.)

VIRTUE'S TRAGEDY.

By EFF KAYE.

The dedication informs us that this is "the story of a true woman, who beneath the vivacity of comedy faces the drama of life with a great and loyal heart." A clever novel of marriage and divorce. (Macqueen. 6s.)

The Art Season.

Mr. Sargent and Others.

THE ostensible object of the shows at the Academy and New Gallery is the exhibition of works of art. The owners of these galleries mean to give the public an opportunity of noting the tendencies of English art; they mean to give the buyer special facilities for studying, comparing, and buying pictures. In truth, however, the New Gallery is much too narrow in its views, too friendly with amateur art and the affectation of deep, serious, moral purpose, although it understands and admits an obligation to show pictures to advantage. The Academy, on the other hand, while it professes to encourage and display every kind of art, displays above anything the confusion of its walls. While men like Morris have been trying for years to bring beauty into everything that accosts the eye, it is strange that the Academy has remained content to conduct the annual festival of the Fine Arts themselves with an utter disregard for all the laws that govern pleasurable seeing. Morris was not always faultless in his idea of decoration, but he was sincere in his belief that some thought for beauty and fitness even in the smallest matters of life would save pain and increase pleasure. To make reading easy and agreeable he worried himself over the shapes of type and the proportions of margins. But when the Royal Academicians have huddled together into their rooms as many pictures as possible of all kinds and degrees of merit and demerit they think they have behaved as artists, leaders of taste, and the official patrons of Fine Art in England. If a small book printed in black and white can fatigue and annoy the eyes by bad arrangement of forms and spaces, what degree of bewilderment and confused disgust may be inflicted on the senses by hundreds of large, small, dark, bright, modelled, unmodelled pictures hung as close and as high as they can be without any thought for their effect on the eye or their relative action on each other. Such is the Academy: an expensive protestation against art, against the belief that forms and colours make a language of the emotions, against all theory of style, all traditions of decorative effect, and against the well-founded doctrine that adjacent colours affect and modify each other; that the eye keeps, as it were, the taste of impressions for a while; that its nerves may be tired, confused, deluded by ill-judged and too close hanging of pictures. To hang such large exhibitions with taste is almost impossible: the old Salon is only better than the Academy in so far as it abstains from skying canvases. The New Salon and the New Gallery wisely occupy more space in proportion to the number of canvases; the first even makes an attempt to keep each man's work together.

The Academicians might hang fewer pictures, or they might class together works agreeable to each other in tone, subject, or treatment. That they do not see the necessity for looking after the welfare and due exhibition of pictures must raise grave doubts in the minds of many as to the very existence of art, as to the truth of the belief that there is any emotion to be had from relations between the elements of art—in fact, from colours and shapes. Some men have denied the power of sound; and we have only to conduct the forthcoming London Musical Festival on the principles of the Academy exhibition to persuade a great many more that considerations of key, tune, harmony, elevation of style, are fanciful refinements not believed in by artists, but only made to draw more money from the public pocket.

People asked each other on the Press Day, "Is the Academy any good?" We can answer confidently that, as an exhibition at least, it is positively vicious. If three-quarters of the pictures exhibited were replaced by brown paper the show would gain infinitely. For let us suppose brown paper to be neutral, neither good nor bad, to be itself without quality, and only influenced by the things beside it, then three-quarters of the Academy work is worse than brown paper, because it is actively disquieting, ugly, not to be harmonised, and not to be modified by the best work of the Gallery. Is not silence better than discordant noise? Is not sound music only when it becomes more lovely than silence? Not only do we see bad work at Burlington House, but we see it hung offensively. The effect of a whole wall is distracting, and without a painful effort you cannot examine it to find out which picture is sinned against and which pictures are the sinners. No judgment made in such a place is final, and the critic can be sure of nothing except the certain horror of the general effect, the presence, but in a depressed state, of a few good works, and the flaunting obsession of several blazers, painted not to represent nature or to soothe the eye, but to knock the meaning out of every work that may happen to hang on the same wall. We do not choose Mr. Byam Shaw as an example of this brutal art for lack of others, but because, being a draughtsman, strong also and enthusiastic in temperament, he is able to make himself more violently disagreeable than most men. "Love the Conqueror" fears no picture; it bears a deadly poison for any scheme of colour: but then it is itself not a picture; it is a magazine of all the pigments stored in bulk, unmodified by air, plane, distance, or decorative relation. International law among painters should prevent the use of such weapons in exhibitions. Most artists do not only buy their colours, but they use them in a key to simulate an atmosphere, to effect a harmony: Mr. Shaw throws off all those restraints and simply masses together all the crudest and strongest tints he can find; so that the only canvases that could live near him would be a piece of warm, low grey like some Rembrandts, or a sheet of high, dazzling silver like some Corots.

The few things that really survived the ordeal of the Academy were, in my eyes, Mr. Sargent's portraits, and scarcely all of them; Mr. Mark Fisher's landscape, "Old Lime Kiln"; and, of course, some of the sculpture. But of these the landscape was in the small Ninth Room, and the sculpture in the Lecture Room. Because Mr. Sargent's work resists, it does not follow that it quite escapes damage. Even those who know the principle of his work took some time to place and appreciate his pictures, and never enjoyed to the full the splendid brío of his "Lady Faudel Phillips"; the studied, dignified calm of his "Miss Jane Evans"; and the curious, subtle characterisation of his "Mrs. Charles Hunter." Mr. Orchardson suffered much in the Third Room (as, indeed, who would not?), in such a jumble of pale skies, bright yellow stuffs, blue seas, and every kind of false and lively hue possible to pigment. In this room, too, Mr. Arthur Lemon's aerial scheme, "A Moment's Rest," was sacrificed; and Mr. Dicksee's studious labour in dress and still-life was torn in pieces by neighbouring tints, which reached out and, singling each one his colour, between them absolutely dismembered the not over robust picture. Mr. Tuke stood up manfully with his canvas, "The Diver," one of his best studies of the nude in sunlight; but, then, his work was large, very high in tone, and not so very badly placed. Other men whose works we divined amid the confusion of the Academy were Messrs. Clausen, La Thangue, MacLure Hamilton, East, Aumonier, Harry Watson, Collier, A.

Stokes, Fritz Thaulow, J. Cooke, S. J. Birch, E. Burnand, J. M. Swan, and E. Waterlow. But we saw dimly, with eyes yet obliterated by every kind of violent abuse of colour. Speaking generally of this Academy, we may say that it was the day of landscape, a few portraits, and small things. Mr. Tuke's was the only conspicuous nude of considerable merit.

At the New Gallery Mr. Sargent again held us spell-bound with his clear, well cut, nervously drawn portrait, "Colonel Ian Hamilton." One cannot say that it was better than his Academy work, for the conditions of seeing were so utterly different. A feverish impatience possesses one at the Academy, leading one to stumble from exaggerated, ill-grounded enthusiasms to depressed, fatigued resignments or heady fits of nervous anger. One looks quietly at the New Gallery, and seems to avoid rubbish more easily than at the Academy. The visitor who will look long at Mr. Sargent's "Colonel Ian Hamilton" will find so much explained to him by so clear, so direct a method that he cannot cease to admire the delightful disproportion between the simplicity of means used and the completeness of illusion attained. Without fear, speculation, or doubt he may trust his eye to this guidance. He need not tire himself to seek explanation, to read meanings, to remember precedents; the few bold markings or suave transitions on this head are each and all eloquent with character. Expression looks clearly out of unmistakable modelling, neither lost in vague stippling nor glued in bogs of slush. The spectator can follow the firm contour of the face, slide safely over the long forshortening of the forehead, turn surely with every nuance of the light on every inclination of the shapely features, and then boldly accept the crowning accentuations of light on the sharply sculptured cheek and temple. After looking at this portrait, in which every inch of the head has character, other pictures, some of them eloquent, even beautiful, seem to give you, with all their style and all their accessories, about as much as you get from an outline in pencil. Most of them, indeed, give less than you get from a great draughtsman, since his contours, in themselves piquantly expressive, speak to you with the full force of a comparatively simple medium. The clearness and the emotional force of a statement in art bear an inverse ratio to the complexity of means used. When you add poor modelling, false lighting, shallow tone, bad colour value and useless accessory to an outline, you do not enhance, you altogether enfeeble its expressiveness. The additional resources of a mere complex medium, unless they contribute their due expression, only serve to create confusion, and to bury the character already expressed by outlines. This applies to every added quality in a picture, every extra marking in a decoration, every new feature in an ensemble of any kind. No doubt those who hang galleries after the fashion of the Academy hold other views, and believe that whatever is put into a room or a picture must look out of it effectively, and show itself to best advantage.

Mr. Sargent's picture, as far as the head goes, may be called his most pleasing work: he has used his means absolutely to the point. Nothing is wasted, nothing is indifferent, nothing is superfluous or embarrassing. Great as Burne-Jones was in invention, in the far-reaching touch of his hand upon literary associations, one could not say that his art was thus strong and simple, or the proportion of his means to his ends artistically effective. His loss, however, to the New Gallery is irreparable; the show has fallen towards the commonplace, and now that the master has gone the work of the mere imitator palls. We prefer that indocile, original painter, Mr. Holman Hunt, although his "Miracle of Sacred Fire in the Church of the Sepulchre, Jerusalem," incarnates the spirit we have tried to combat—the spirit that seeks finish by multiplication, expression by a labour disproportionate to the result.

R. A. M. STEVENSON.

J. K. Stephen.

ON a February evening just seven years ago came the news which saddened undergraduate mirth, which brought a sense of loss, personal and poignant, to every combination room in Cambridge. Poor "J. K. S." was dead—dead at the age of thirty-three, with the rich promise of his magnificent abilities all unfulfilled. Only a few months before had he been among us, had held his audiences at the Union spell-bound by his matchless eloquence, had written with consummate ease those verses which are his one surviving memorial, had made brilliant many an evening in college rooms by his luminous charm. He was the idol of the undergraduates; himself a Fellow, he would defy all the rules and conventions of the dons with sublime audacity. Continually some fresh anecdote, some happy epigram of his, would pass from mouth to mouth. One might fill many pages with the stories of which he was the hero; and none could know him, however slightly, without feeling that here was a man for whom it was possible to say with confidence that distinction and fame were inevitable. The massive brow under the tangled hair, the keen eyes, the very accent of the voice made you divine instinctively the powerful mind that lay behind them. As for his eloquence in debate, it is impossible to give the faintest idea of it by written words, but those who heard it will know that at least we could not exaggerate its effect. Of course, at the Union debates, we sometimes are apt to consider our geese to be oratorical swans; but no mistaken estimate of this sort was possible in this case. We will only give the testimony of one whose experience was very great, and who was flatly opposed to J. K. S. in political creed. Mr. Bruce, the Secretary of the Eighty Club, declared that, with the one exception of Mr. Gladstone, no orator to whom he had listened could be compared with J. K. Stephen. And then—orator, thinker, poet, and wit—he died at the age of thirty-three.

So much is here said of the man, because the task of considering his writings apart from the writer is one of more than common difficulty. They have been praised widely, and rather beyond their deserts. And as his personal memory becomes fainter through the lapse of time, it seems probable that those who read his verse with coldly critical eyes may well wonder at the eulogies bestowed upon it. His brother, Sir Herbert Stephen, has written the plain truth in the Memoir which prefaces the collected edition, when he says that Lapsus Calami and Quo Musa Tendis? "represent only a small and comparatively trivial part of his talents, and give no indication of the features of his character best remembered by those who knew him with any degree of intimacy."

Generally speaking, the criticism bestowed upon light verse is exceedingly inept. Either it is blamed for not being serious poetry, or it is accorded tolerant patronage as the work of a disciple of "Calverly and Austen Dobson." Thus, by his orthography does the critic enable us to gauge his familiarity with those writers. A disciple of Calverley, indeed, J. K. S. desired to be accounted:

If any critic would remark, in fine,
Of C. S. C. this gentle art he learned, to quote from the opening verses of Lapsus Calami, he would be content. And yet, frankly, it is not possible to gratify the wish. Both were Cambridge men; both were loyal and devoted to their Alma Mater, and gave this loyalty expression in their verse; both wrote admirable parodies of Browning. And there the resemblance begins and ends. Of the Calverleyan sparkle, deftness, and inevitableness J. K. S. had no share. His touch is heavier, his workmanship far less perfect. And when he is at his best, he is least like his predecessor. There is more thought in Lapsus Calami and Quo Musa Tendis? than in Fly-Leaves, and the humour is, generally speaking, of a subtler kind. But Calverley could never have rhymed—to give a single example—"in it I" with "equanimity," or have written lines (as J. K. S. does repeatedly) which it is simply impossible to scan.

The collected edition of J. K. S.'s work contains no more than 200 small pages; and, even so, it might have been reduced with considerable advantage. Included are trifles which should find no place—schoolboy rhymes, letters in verse the interest of which is purely personal, and "topical" pieces which figured suitably enough in the evening papers, but which are not worth reprinting.

Instead of Calverley it is, oddly enough, Robert Browning whose influence is most prominent in the volume. And to imitate Browning is not the best training for a writer of light verse, of which neatness, precision, and transparent lucidity are the chief essentials. Apart from the deliberate parody, to which we allude above, which is as successful a skit as Calverley's "The Cock and the Bull," one finds numerous instances in which Browning's manner gives form to J. K. S.'s work. Take, by way of example, the opening stanzas of the lines "To C. W. F." (Mr. Charles W. Furze):

You take a brush, and I take a pen,
You mix bright colours, I use black ink,
You cover a canvas, you first of men,
I write on a sheet for a scribbler meet.
Well, a contrast's a contrast; I will not shrink.
First you compose: a line's grand sweep,
A break, a blend, a guide for our eyes,
You've a tone to settle, a curve to keep,
An impression to catch, new tints to match;
And a lesson behind it surely lies.

There, patent enough, stands confessed the disciple of Browning; nothing could well be more unlike Calverley.

Yet there is genuine humour in most of his pieces, and the weak point is the manner rather than the matter. Too many of them are rugged and even slipshod; there is too little of that "labour with the file" which is absolutely necessary for the making of really good light verse. There are welcome exceptions to the too general rule; nothing could be neater than "A Pair of Fools" or the Wordsworth sonnet, which it is impossible not to quote:

Two voices are there: one is of the deep;
It learns the storm-cloud's thunderous melody,
Now roars, now murmurs with the changing sea,
Now birdlike pipes, now closes soft in sleep;
And one is of an old half-witted sheep,
Which bleats articulate monotony.
And indicates that two and one are three,
That grass is green, lakes damp, and mountains steep.
And, Wordsworth, both are thine: at certain times
Forth from the heart of thy melodious rhymes
The form and pressure of high thoughts will burst;
At other times—good Lord! I'd rather be Quite unacquainted with the A B C
Than write such helpless rubbish as thy worst.

Admirable, too, is the audacious Shakespeare parody, and, in a wholly different key, "Blue Hills" and "The Dawn of the Year," in which the humour is tinged with real poetic feeling. Many of the other verses have a charm for us owing to the glimpses they give of their writer's mind and character; but when one judges them by the cold impersonal standard of technical merit, their worth is seen to be comparatively small. In a word, it is probable that J. K. S.'s rhymes have suffered from indiscriminate eulogy. To rank them with the best work of Calverley is to sacrifice the critical faculty to personal affection. They are, for the most part, rather "rough copies" of good light verse than polished and completed achievements. That they are destined to survive is quite possible, yet it will be by an inversion of the general rule. They will be cherished as the memorial of a great man, whose early death was a loss which cannot be estimated. Assuredly the man will not be remembered for the sake of his verses. Rather it seems likely that the verses will be remembered for the sake of the man.

Things Seen.

The Congregation.

As we raced through the park—Windsor Park—Walt Whitman lilted in my brain:

There was a child went forth every day,
And the first object he look'd upon, that object he became.
The early lilacs became part of this child,
And grass, and white and red morning-glories, and white and red clover, and the song of the phœbe-bird.
And the apple-trees cover'd with blossoms and the fruit afterward, and wood-berries, and the commonest weeds by the road.
Shadows, aureola and mist, the light falling on roofs and gables of white or brown two miles off.
The horizon's edge, the flying sea-crow, the fragrance of salt marsh and shore mud,
These became part of that child who went forth every day,
and who now goes, and will always go forth every day.

All I saw became part of me: the trees radiant in blossom; the rabbits scurrying across the road; the dappled sunlight through the glades; the warm, rushing air; the meadows of shy primroses, and the infinite distances of spring woods. Soon, as we raced along, came the villas, and the traffic in the roads, and then the pale, towering castle, and the narrow, winding street that leads to Eton. It was punctuated with silk-hatted boys—sauntering, swaggering boys—hands thrust deep in their pockets, for such is the traditional custom. Slowly we felt our way through the narrow street till we came to the venerable college gateway. The hour was near five, and five (so we had been told) was the hour for service in the chapel. It was for that we had travelled so far—to sit among the boys, those picked English boys, to hear them sing, to be near them in their own chapel. It wanted but three minutes to the hour, but there were no signs of a gathering congregation. The young gentlemen with their old faces, and small hands thrust deep in their trouser-pockets, still sauntered along the narrow street. Now and then small figures in flannels walked briskly towards the playing fields. Idleness brooded over the quadrangle. I stopped a small bored boy. "There is a service in the chapel at five, is there not?" said I. He blushed a "yes." "But I see no preparations—no crowd of boys, no—" "Oh, the service isn't compulsory," he murmured. A man in a surplice came running across the quadrangle. The clock struck five. We entered the chapel. The officiating clergy and the choir, ruddy with health, faced one another. The opening words of the majestic liturgy rolled in the hushed air; the movement of life came faintly through the open doors; the sunlight stole through the tall windows and fell upon the white, carven, recumbent figure of some Important, long dead; the rich and solemn service proceeded, and except for us—wandering strangers—there was none to listen. Yes, there was one—a widow—whose emotions rose with the music and flowed with the prayers. She knelt in a carved stall, a black, human note in the great emptiness. The playing fields were white with cricketers. Boys sported on the river, boys strolled in couples through the narrow streets—they were boys. The service was not compulsory. Not a boy needed it. But that black human note throbbing in the great emptiness, she needed it. It was compulsory to her. And we, the strangers, who had come so far, and seen so much, found in that hour the zenith of our day. It became part of us.

Justice.

In the pine country I schooled myself into the habit of taking an early morning stroll; and as I came down the hill in that electric hour (the rain during the night had been strident and continuous) I saw far below me a cyclist toiling through the miry roads. He was a tall, fair-bearded man, clad in a long frock-coat, which filled and flapped in the wind. The mud made the roads almost impossible, and I was not surprised to see him turn his machine on to the gravel footpath. As he drew near to me, a village policeman slipped out from a side road and blocked the passage with outstretched arms. The cyclist stopped. "Your name and address?" demanded the policeman. "I thought I might ride on the path at so early an hour." "Name and address, please," repeated the imperturbable officer. The unhappy cyclist (he was a middle-aged man, sad and civil like Malvolio) stammered his answer, fumbling the while with a large, loose bag that hung upon the handle-bar of the machine. He could hardly speak for nervousness. His voice gave. The terror of the law—unknown, relentless—puckered up his gentle face as he stammered his name and address. Then, after two ineffectual attempts, he mounted his machine and ploughed his way upward through the miry road. "Who is he?" I asked. "He's a local preacher. He have got one of them mission chapels down Wimming-ton way." "And what did the bag contain?" I asked. "Mice!" "Mice?" "Yes; he gets up early every morning and goes round to the granaries collecting all the mice from the traps." The policeman paused to replace his pocket-book. "Then he gets on his bicycle and rides up to the heath and lets 'em loose." "And you," I cried, "had the heart to summon him for so trivial an offence when he was on such an errand of mercy." "Heart!—trivial offence!" he cried. "I'm a policeman. I've got my instructions. That's good enough for me. And, after all, sir, what's a few mice more or less?"

Memoirs of the Moment.

A WANT of unanimity is the commonplace of all kinds of criticism; but this year the breach between the art critics has become more than ever apparent. The papers may be said to have ranged themselves under two standards. In one camp are those who take things lightly, contented with what is offered to them and preferring to praise good-naturedly the pictures that are relatively good when compared with those that are worse. In the other camp are those who judge a picture by fixed rules of excellence, who ignore the accidents of the moment, and see it with the eyes of the foreigner and of posterity. Such critics—and surely with them must lie the duty and the glory of raising the art of England by elevating the public taste—have gained a large hearing—Mr. MacColl in the Saturday Review, "R. A. M. S." in the Pall Mall Gazette, and Mr. Pennell in the Daily Chronicle. The number of Academy pictures praised by these critics averages under a dozen—not one per cent. of those exhibited. In their appreciation of qualities as well as of quantities are they divided from their fellows. They do not turn at once to Mr. Byam Shaw's picture with the statement that they "recognise a number of the personages of history" in the ranks of Love's followers; they do not count it as of Art's company. Again, one camp advises Mrs. Hunter to send back her portrait to Mr. Sargent, R.A., to have the draperies completed; the other looks no further than the face, and finds that he has painted not a portrait merely, but, as Dr. Johnson knew a painter should—a history, a biography, an autobiography.

THE days when a painter must be praised because he was an "R. A." are still within the memory of middle-aged men. The magic letters were also the signals for sales and the augmenters of prices. A man of rare talent without such hall-mark might easily starve. Simeon Solomon in all his glory as a draughtsman went all but unremarked because he was not R.A. like one of these; and even Burne-Jones had to bow the knee and accept the semi-official recognition. As the years passed, things improved; Burne-Jones rose from his knees; and men like Mr. Brett wrote to the Times to complain that even the Academy had fallen off as a sale-room for the works of its members. The letters have lost their magic; they can be counted upon no longer to secure sales for worthless pictures; but they are still an aid to the painter whose work keeps pace with his repute: such, for instance, as Mr. Napier Hemy, whose large picture this year was sold at the Private View for considerably over £1,000.

THOUGH very little artistic interest attaches to the purchases of the Chantrey Trustees this year, there is a temporary touch of sentiment in the story of one of them. This is "My Lady's Garden," painted by Mr. Young Hunter. The fortunate artist is twenty-three years of age, and is a son of Mr. Colin Hunter, A.R.A. The profession of painting is not always immediately profitable, and some people sighed over the reckless optimism of youth when they heard that Young Hunter—in name and in fact—was engaged to be married. At the outset to have your canvas hung on the line and bought for £350 for the Tate Gallery is, at least, encouraging; and the lady herself may feel in this instance that she has her part in earning this first important contribution to the housekeeping, for she it is who sat to her future husband, and is "my lady" of the garden.

MR. WATTS, R.A., who did not attend the Academy Banquet or the Private View, is nevertheless in the best health and spirits, and he has found himself following with deep interest the tale of the plucky stewardess of the Stella, to whose fund he has sent £10. Mr. Sargent, by the way, who kept Mr. Watts company last year by absenting himself from the Banquet, this year appeared at the board, just to show, the newspaper reports to the contrary, that he really is alive—nearly as alive as the portraits he has painted.

TALKING of the Academy Banquet, one may venture to remark on the generally overlooked compliment paid by the President to his nephew, Mr. Rudyard Kipling. It had been hoped and expected, as was here announced, that Mr. Kipling would attend this year's Banquet and reply to the usual toast of "Literature." In his absence the toast of "Literature" was entirely omitted.

THE Academy's best enemies will not deny it the possession of a sort of shrewdness when it gave the Lord Chief Justice the brief for his speech at the Banquet. Lord Russell of Killowen was a wonderfully judicial advocate at the Bar; and he weighed not only his own client's claims, but his opponent's pleadings. Obviously, nobody last Saturday night gave him the case against the Academy. Equally obviously, the case for the Academy was somewhat strained. In proof of its cosmopolitanism, Lord Russell said it went outside the ranks even of Englishmen to bestow its greatest honours upon the best man—even if he were, like Benjamin West, an American. Well, the fact was that the Academy was the creation of Benjamin West, not Benjamin West the creation (whatever that might be worth) of the Academy. When, in 1768, West, Moser, and Sandby seceded from the Incorporated Society of British Artists, it was West, most of the three, who gained the charter for the new Academy from the King, and who induced the reluctant Sir Joshua to precede him as its President. Mr. Sargent has since then righted the reckoning between England and America—we are compensated at last for the loan of Benjamin West. But Mr. Sargent, like any other foreign Academician—Mr. Alma Tadema or Mr. Herkomer—could not be elected to the Royal Academy, Lord Russell may be surprised to hear, unless he had first taken out letters of naturalisation as a British subject.

On another point, however, the Lord Chief Justice thrust an arrow, whether consciously or unconsciously, into the very bosoms of his hosts. He admitted that the nation did give to the Academy the site on which Burlington House is built. But the Academy has never admitted so much—it has always barred Parliamentary inquiry or control on the plea that it was the creation of the King, a plea that is soon likely to be heard again in the House. For once again an undaunted member is preparing to demand an inquiry into the position of this rather vague institution, which runs as a national one at Academy banquets, and as a Royal one in the national assembly. A Minister will be asked if the Academy can be ordered to publish its accounts—a proposal Lord Russell of Killowen would assuredly approve, and the shocked statesman will reply that to do so would be to infringe the Royal prerogative.

APPROPOS it may be of interest to add that the gate money last Monday amounted in shillings to about £400, and that something like £12,000 is the total sum of the takings through the spring and summer season.

It is twelve years since the Queen was last painted by Angeli; and since she was first painted by him, more years than anybody cares to remember. Next month he arrives at Windsor from Vienna, and Her Majesty will sit to him as an octogenarian and, in her own opinion, for the last time. Meanwhile, the portrait by Mr. Orchardson has made little progress, partly because of the painter's indisposition; while the chances of the Queen's ever sitting to Mr. Watts, to Mr. Sargent, or to Mr. Shannon become more and more remote. She has done the next best thing in sitting lately to Mr. Onslow Ford for a very frank bust in marble; but as regards painters, the cry is the same at the end of her reign as it was in the beginning: "Non Angli sed Angeli."

Correspondence.

"The Vicar of Wakefield."

SIR,—After reading Mark Twain's censure of The Vicar of Wakefield in a recent ACADEMY I re-read in Goethe's Autobiography the sage's appreciation of this novel—"One of the best which has ever been written." Herder read the book to Goethe, whose opinion of "our excellent Wakefield" is enthusiastic. "The delineation of this character on his course of life through joys and sorrows," he writes, "the ever-increasing interest of the story, by the combination of the entirely natural with the strange and the singular, make this novel one of the best which has ever been written; besides this, it has the great advantage that it is quite moral, nay, in a pure sense, Christian—represents the reward of a good will and perseverance in the right, strengthens an unconditional confidence in God, and attests the final triumph of good over evil; and all this without a trace of cant or pedantry. The author was preserved from both of these by an elevation of mind that shows itself throughout in the form of irony, by which this little work must appear to us as wise as it is amiable. The author, Dr. Goldsmith, has without question great insight into the moral world, into its strength and into its infirmities. . . ." And so on in words doubtless unforgotten by many. Is it possible that the American humorist lacks the power of appreciating irony? But "the Vicar," after all, needs no defending.—I am, &c., R. M. L.
London.

The Invaluable Capital.

SIR,—May I point out that Mr. Miall makes no mention of the notes of exclamation used in the second reading of the quatrain? These, I venture to suggest, have a greater power than the capitals! Nobody, I think, has more appreciated the value of this apparently insignificant sign, or used it to finer effect, than Browning; indeed, the peculiar individuality of his poetry demanded the extensive use of some such mark as this exuberant atom!—I am, &c.,
MICHAEL CLOTT.

Homely Proverbs.

SIR,—In connexion with a recent "Literary Competition," the result of which does not seem to have been quite satisfactory, will you allow me to submit to you a few original saws of the homely sort, some of which may, perhaps, be thought not much below the level of those selected in your last number?

1. Suspicion has a key that fits every lock.
2. Don't pull the house down because the chimney smokes.
3. If you give me a knife, give me a fork too.
4. Give me to drink, but drench me not.
5. A hole in the purse, and the cupboard the worse.
6. The fuller the hand, the harder to hold.
7. Stroke the dog, but beware of his bite.
8. Heap on the coals, and put out the fire.
9. The fool kept the shell, and threw away the kernel.
10. One cock is sure to crow if he hears another.
11. In comes the fiddler and out goes the money.
12. The shorter the wit, the longer the word.
13. Saw off any branch but that you are sitting on.
14. My partner ate the meat and left me the bone.
15. If you break your bowl, you lose your broth.
16. Don't wait till it is dark before you light the lamp.
17. Every bell must ring in its own tone.
18. If you shoot one bird, you scare the whole flock.
19. Beware of pride, says the peacock.
20. You must shut your eyes if the dust blows in your face.

George Herbert's Jacula form a happy hunting-ground for proverbs of this class.—I am, &c.,

Anthologies.

SIR,—"Apropos of anthologies," might there not be added to the delightful list of English verse on p. 445, in the ACADEMY of April 22, Poems of the Inner Life, Selected Chiefly from Modern Authors, and published by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co.? It is surely one of the most perfect selections within the range it proposes to itself.—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 30.

LAST week we imagined a "middle-aged wife of a country rector, with interests in the parish and her garden, and an only son in the Navy," and we asked our readers to name her ten favourite books. The best list submitted is that by Mr. H. Thorns, South-street Epsom:

The Bible.
The Christian Year.
Christina Rossetti's Poems.
Southey's Life of Nelson.
Lady Brassey's Voyage in the Sunbeam.
Miss Mitford's Our Village.
Scenes from Clerical Life.
David Copperfield.
White's Natural History of Selborne.
Mrs. Loudon's Gardening for Ladies.

It would have been better to omit the Bible as understood; but most of our readers include it. Mrs. Loudon's Gardening for Ladies is a good choice. Dean Hole's Roses and Mrs. Earle's Pot Pourri from a Surrey Garden are given by several competitors; but we think Mrs. Loudon the better choice. Mrs. Earle's book is too recent to have been promoted to position of favourite, and Dean Hole neglects other flowers altogether in favour of the rose. Again, Captain Mahan's Life of Nelson is mentioned more than once, but Southey's would be the life most likely to be near the lady's hand. Among other books which occur on many lists, but are absent from Mr. Thorns's, are Cranford, Westward Ho!, Sesame and Lilies, The Garden that I Love, and A Fleet in Being. The last-named, we fancy, was read with the greatest interest, on account of its bearing upon her son's duties, but is hardly among the permanent favourites.

Competition No. 31.

On page 499 of this number of the ACADEMY will be found the record of a curious coincidence in the life of the late Lord De Tabley. Almost everyone has known an odd occurrence of this kind. To the contributor whose account of a genuine coincidence, personally experienced, seems to us the most interesting a cheque for one guinea will be sent; but it should be borne in mind that we expect only facts—in no way tempered by invention—and the narrative should be as succinct as the model.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, May 9. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 494 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

THE METAPHYSIC of EXPERIENCE. By Shadworth

H. HODGSON, Hon. LL.D., Edin., Hon. Fellow C.C.C., Oxford; Past President of the Aristotelian Society.

BOOK I. GENERAL ANALYSIS OF EXPERIENCE.

BOOK III. ANALYSIS OF CONSCIOUS ACTION.

BOOK II. POSITIVE SCIENCE.

BOOK IV. THE REAL UNIVERSE.

This work, to which the labour of eighteen years has been devoted, aims at setting forth, in outline, a complete system of philosophy. The idea upon which it rests is, that analysis of actual experience, avoiding assumptions, is the only trustworthy guide in framing a conception of the nature of the universe, of which we are a part, the framing of such a conception being the special aim and problem which philosophy proposes to itself. In adopting this idea, it breaks decisively with all a priori philosophy, and more particularly with the a priori philosophy of Kant, and the various idealistic systems to which it has given rise.

JÓKAI'S NEW NOVEL,

"An enthralling romance,"

Price 6s.

THE NAMELESS CASTLE.

Translated under the Author's supervision by S. E. BOGGS. With Photogravure Portrait of Dr. JÓKAI.

The Bookman.—"An enthralling romance of adventure and intrigue. The dominant heroine... is almost as clever, as unscrupulous, and as fascinating as Dumas' famous creation.... The story... is told with infinite delicacy and charm; it stands out a clear and lovely idyll against the tangled background of plot and counter plot.... The translator has done his work so well, and with such evident sympathy with his original, that we are almost inclined to forget that it is a translation at all."

A Book of which Mr. MAX PEMBERTON, writing in "The Sketch," says: "I, at least, remember no study of humanity of recent years which has revealed such fresh conceptions of the primitive things of life, or has permitted one to see the world with such a truly Eastern eye."

SECOND EDITION.

SELAM. By Milena Mrazović

Price 6s. Translated by Mrs. WAUGH.

The Literary World.—"Alike from the literary and the humanitarian point of view the tales are full of interest.... They are refreshingly unfamiliar in plot, in treatment, and in local colour. The choice of subject and the handling of it indicate the poet, and the tales are one and all full of strong though restrained feeling."

The World.—"There is no item in the collection that lacks evidences of the striking literary and imaginative gifts of its author."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SINNERS
TWIN," &c., &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, price 3s. 6d.,

THE PRODIGAL'S BROTHER.

By JOHN MACKIE,

Author of "They that Sit in Darkness," "Sinners Twin," "The Devil's Playground," &c.

The Daily Mail.—"Mr. Mackie's descriptions of Canadian scenery and of life in a remote settlement of the North-West are admirable. His characters, too, are well defined.... A book worth reading."

The Sunday Sun.—"Full of human interest."

The Sheffield Independent.—"There is a ring of strength and manliness in this book which is pleasant and invigorating. It is more of a character study than a story, though its romantic setting and the interplay of two or three leading characters upon each other make it a good story too."

A New Novel by the Author of "Poor Human Nature," &c.

Price 6s.

A STOLEN IDEA. By Elizabeth GODFREY,

Author of "Cornish Diamonds," "Poor Human Nature," &c.

The Sun.—"A pleasant story, and Miss Godfrey—whose 'Cornish Diamonds' and 'Poor Human Nature' were so popular some little time ago—is sure to win a host of readers for it.... We recommend the story."

THE DESIRE of THEIR HEARTS.

By MARGARET PARKER, Author of "Ida Cameron," "To Him who Waits," &c.

The Literary Week.

GABRIELLE D'ANNUNZIO's new play, "Gloria," as we stated last week, has been hissed off the stage at Naples, and now Eleonora Duse has abandoned her intention of producing it at Rome. The author, however, will publish his play in book-form, preceded by the dedication: "To the dogs who hissed it at Naples." Meanwhile, Signora Duse has promised to visit Paris in June, in order to give a single performance of "La Dame aux Camélias," the proceeds to go towards the Memorial to Alexandre Dumas filis.

ANOTHER round century of "best" novels is now purchaseable. The selection has been made this time not by a strong syndicate of editors and scholars, but by a city bookseller, yet the result seems to be much the same. Will not a rival firm or newspaper retort with the hundred second best novels? They might prove to be better than the "best."

MEANWHILE, cheap literature has once more received championship from Mr. Bryce, M.P. It was Mr. Bryce who advocated, some months ago, the shilling "six-shilling novel," which no publisher, however, has yet given us—the standard price having been fixed at sixpence. Now he asks, at the annual meeting of the National Home Reading Union, for single plays of Shakespeare and specimens of other masters at a slightly dearer rate than a penny—Mr. Stead's price for literature—suitably printed for reading in shaky trains. But the thing has been excellently done. Cassell's National Library, projected and edited by the late Henry Morley, is a wonderful collection of English classics at threepence the volume. Nothing better could be produced. Critics of publishing should master existing editions before they advocate new ones.

WE were among the first to suggest that the issue of new novels at sixpence might prove profitable to publishers. Messrs. Methuen's project for such a series, to be called "The Novelist," was soon afterwards announced; and on the 16th the public will be able to purchase at sixpence a new story by Mr. E. W. Hornung, entitled Dead Men Tell No Tales. An advance copy of this story has reached us. The striking red and gold paper cover adopted for the series is well chosen: it is neat, strong, and individual.

THE committee in charge of the scheme for the erection of a statue of Lord Byron in Aberdeen has decided to disregard the persons who, while favourable to the granite city having a statue of the poet, consider that it would be hurtful to the morals of young Aberdeen that it should be placed in front of the Grammar School. The statue is to be of bronze, and will stand on a granite pedestal.

A BELATED KINDNESS.

[THE McGill University, Montreal, has conferred the degree of LL.D. upon Mr. Rudyard Kipling.]

Why have you been so long, McGill?
Where were you when our friend was ill?
It's surely wrong to wait until
He's well to "doctor" him.

MR. KIPLING, as a matter of fact, is particularly pleased that this honour, the first of its kind (and the first, doubtless, of a long list), should come to him from the Lady of Snows, or, as he puts it in his letter of acceptance, from "the older sister of the new nations within the Empire."

APPROPOS of the new Doctor of Laws, the Duke of York is said to have remarked, concerning the attention paid by the papers to his recent indisposition: "Really, I might be Kipling."

WE are reminded by Messrs. Jarrold that they still have in stock certain minor writings by George Borrow, of which more is perhaps said than known. The books are that sardonic work The Turkish Jester; or, The Pleasantries of Cogia Nasr Eddin Effendi, of which a portion of the original edition still exists; The Death of Balder, a translation from the Danish of Ewald, and Targum; or, Metrical Translations from Thirty Languages and Dialects, reprints of which were issued some ten years ago.

THE following classified table accompanying a recent official report of the Imperial Library at Tokio indicates the nature of reading of 7,770 readers in twenty-four days at that institution:

	Japanese and Chinese Works.	European Works.
Theology and Religion	635	14
Philosophy and Education	2,368	145
Literature and Languages	8,038	998
History, Biography, Geography, Travel	9,768	460
Law, Politics, Sociology, Eco- nomy, Statistics	6,577	301
Mathematics, Natural Philo- sophy, Medicine	9,506	388
Engineering, Military Arts, In- dustries	4,943	205
Miscellaneous Books	4,840	529

The proportion of European works is very large.

THE circumstances that Mr. W. B. Yeats's poetical play, "The Countess Cathleen," touches upon the debateable ground of religion, and that a strong party had been formed to protest against its sentiments, helped to mar its performance at the opening of the Irish Literary Theatre on Monday. But that in good hands it is both dramatic and beautiful was none the less proved. Mr. Martyn's "The Heather Field," the play which was published with a eulogy by Mr. George Moore early this year, and afterwards served as the pivot of a sprightly discussion between Mr. Moore and Mr. Archer was produced, under the same auspices, on Tuesday, with great success, its interest being, to those who knew the play only in book form, amazingly real. The Irish Literary Theatre may, then, be said to be fairly started, and we trust that its career will be long and distinguished.

IN the little organ of the Society, Beltaine, issued by the Unicorn Press, is printed, among other relevant matter, the prologue to "The Countess Cathleen" and "The Heather Field," written by Mr. Lionel Johnson. We quote a portion :

The May fire ouce on every dreaming hill
All the fair land with burning bloom would fill :
All the fair land, at visionary night,
Gave loving glory to the Lord of Light.
Have we no leaping flames of Beltaine praise
To kindle in the joyous ancient ways ;
No fire of song, of vision, of white dream,
Fit for the Master of the Heavenly Gleam ;
For Him who first made Ireland move in chime,
Musical from the misty dawn of time ?

Ah, yes : for sacrifice this night we bring
The passion of a lost soul's triumphing :
All rich with faery airs that, wandering long
Uncaught, here gather into Irish song ;
Sweet as the old remembering winds that wail
From hill to hill of gracious Inisfail ;
Sad as the unforgetting winds that pass
Over her children in her holy grass
At home, and sleeping well upon her breast,
Where snowy Déirdre and her sorrows rest.

THE Irish Anthology, on the plan of Mr. Humphry Ward's English Poets, which Mr. T. W. Rolleston is editing for Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., is expected to be ready in the autumn. Mr. Stopford Brooke is writing the introduction, and also a notice of Thomas Moore; Mr. Lionel Johnson deals with Mangan; and Mr. A. P. Graves writes on Sir Samuel Ferguson. Other contributors of critical notices are Prof. W. McNeile Dixon, Dr. George Sigerson, Dr. Douglas Hyde, D. J. O'Donoghue, W. B. Yeats, and George Russell ("A. E.").

A LIFE of José Rizal, the Filipino novelist, has recently appeared in Austria. Rizal, a doctor both of medicine and of philosophy, who had a European education and was a graduate of the University of Madrid, was consumed by a passion for freedom. His love of his country was intense, and it eventually brought about his death. He had long plotted against Spanish rule, not only by directly inciting rebellion, but by attempting to found a colony for independent Filipinos in Borneo. Imprisonment did not deter him. At last, in December, 1896, he was shot by order of the Government. His end was dramatic. An hour before the execution he married the Irish girl to whom he had been betrothed. The Spaniards, by an act of cruelty that might have been spared, ordered the shooting to be done by Filipinos. "On the day following Rizal's death," says an account in the Boston Evening Transcript, "his widow passed the Spanish line at Manila and made her way on foot to the camp of the patriots. There Aguinaldo gave her command of a company, at the head of which the Irish bride-widow gained more than one victory. She has, perhaps, fallen ere this, a victim to American bullets. Before he died Rizal wrote a poem, which was his dying message to his native land, from which this is a stanza :

Farewell, adored Fatherland ; our Eden lost, farewell ;
Farewell, O sun's loved region, pearl of the Eastern sea ;
Gladly I die for thy dear sake ; yea, thou knowest well,
Were my sad life more radiant far than mortal tongue could tell,
Yet would I give it gladly, joyously, for thee."

Books about the American-Spanish War are increasing in number and decreasing in interest. The American public has ceased to buy them. Even Lient. Hobson's work has had only a moderate vogue. A literary critic who admires it remarked, says the Boston Literary World : "In a hundred years, when Hobson's narrative has been forgotten, some fellow will come along and make a novel out of the material in it and win a tremendous success."

THE Rev. A. B. Nicholls, the husband of Charlotte Brontë, now in his eighty-first year, is still vigorous in body and mind. Mr. W. T. Field, the Secretary of the Brontë Society, told the members on Saturday that he paid him a visit at Easter at his residence in Ireland, and had an opportunity of seeing Richmond's portrait of Charlotte Brontë, which has recently been restored, and is to be bequeathed to the National Portrait Gallery. The present Rector of Haworth, the Rev. T. W. Story, unlike his predecessor, is an admirer of the Brontës, and the members of the Society present at the re-opening of the Museum on Saturday had the opportunity of seeing the rooms in which Charlotte and her sisters lived and worked.

ACCORDING to the New York Publishers' Circular, the editor of a threepenny English magazine has forwarded to such men of letters as he considers eminent or amiable enough for his purpose a pudding-basin full of gelatinous matter, with the request that they will have it warmed, press their feet well into it, and send it back. This pleasing performance is to the end that the intelligent readers of the threepenny magazine may be able to consider whether each writer has the sort of foot that would be expected from a perusal of his works, or whether the works of a man with a foot like that seem likely to be worth reading. It is rumoured that one man of letters, favoured with this delicate attention, sent back the basin of gelatinous matter to the editor with the request that he press his head well into it.

THE American Bookman tells the following new and satisfactory story of Mr. Ruskin: "A certain person in this country sent a friend of his in England an American edition of Ruskin's works. They were seized by the Customs, of course, and were in peril of confiscation, when the consignee learned that if he could procure a letter from Mr. Ruskin allowing the books to pass into England the Customs would release them. Accordingly, a letter of request was sent to Mr. Ruskin, who replied promptly and with characteristic verve, as follows:

SIR,—I do not see that your friend's desire to give you a present at my expense is any apology for your intrusion upon me.—Yours, &c.,
JOHN RUSKIN.

The volumes," adds the Bookman, "came back to America, but in spite of very tempting offers the recipient of Mr. Ruskin's curt reply refuses to part with the autograph."

A CORRESPONDENT, signing herself "Lux," Devon, asks us to give publicity to the following plea: "I am interested in our local Literary Society, and wish to see it of real value to us all. Could any of your readers suggest in what way such country clubs could be developed besides the obvious lending library and reading-room? How to supply new and bright literature without encumbering limited shelves with books no longer asked for is another point on which advice of experience is sought. The carriage of books from Mudie's is a prohibitory tax on our small funds." Our correspondent encloses her name and address, and we shall be glad to forward to her any communications that may be forthcoming.

In a little anonymous book, entitled Richard Holt Hutton of "The Spectator" (Oliver & Boyd), containing a number of Mr. Hutton's more memorable utterances on many subjects, this little poem is quoted from one of his "Holid Rambles":

Through the sweet night half waking I had lain,
Lulled by the murmur of the rushing Inn,
Which seemed like memory without its pain,
The eager years of youth without their sin.

I rise: in moonlit curves the glacier spreads,
The peaks in ghostly beauty veil their might,
The dark firs wave their faintly-lighted heads,
The landscape seems a phantom of the night.

Those polar snows, lapped in soft summer air,
That ice, which sparkles back a southern moon,
Those black-stoled rocks like monks in wrath or prayer,
Bowed, bare-kneed, on the glacier, late and soon.

Real are they? or such dreams of fevered brain,
As wise men conjure now from sky and sod,—
That Love shrinks back from Law's advancing reign,—
That the Ice-Sea of Science threatens God!

In the Spectator article these lines were attributed to a poetic youth called "Mr. Q.," but the writer of this little monograph is of opinion that "Mr. Q." and Hutton were one and the same.

It is to be hoped that the new Victor Hugo books will be better than the new Daudet book, which we review elsewhere. But it may be assumed safely that they will. Mr. Paul Maurice, who has control of Hugo's papers, has arranged a new volume of Choses Vues; and a volume containing the poet's letters to his betrothed, "which were written out in little notes and slipped quietly into her hand during visits which gave the lovers no opportunity of private speech," is ready for the press. The publication savours of indiscretion; but, as in the case of the Browning love-letters, we shall not be able to decide until we have the book.

A CRITIC, dealing eulogistically with Mr. Dunne and Mr. Dooley, says that the caustic bar-tender of Chicago had a short previous existence in Mr. Dunne's articles as Colonel McNeery. Here are extracts from the Colonel's account of a "Lithry Congress" at Chicago:

"Divvle a word about pothry," he says. "It was like a meetin' iv th' Bricklayers' Union, it was, so it was, with all th' talk about how the dirty old book publishers was thrown it into th' poor potes an' grindin' thim down in th' ground. . . . Well, sir, be this an' be that, it turned out that there was oney wan pote in th' house. An' in th' name iv heavin who d'ye think it was? Bonney! Yis, yis. Divil th' liss. That's him. Th' little lawyer. Th' little guy with th' bunch iv whiskers. Oh, dear; oh, dear. Well, sir, if th' pope iv Rome—Gawd f'rgive me f'r sayin' it—was to come up to that bar at this blissid moment an' ask f'r gin an' bitthers I'd be no more taken back. I niver know'd Bonney was a pote. I thought he was more respectable. But he read a pome, an' tho' . . . pothry's not a leg hould f'r me, by gar, I liked Bonney's pothry. Listen:

'Th' splendid city build at Jackson Paark,' he says,
'To house,' he says, 'th' gathered treasures iv th' world
Must pass away, but reproduced in books,' he says,
'Th' wondhrous forms in beauty an iv use,
Which there,' he says, 'excite amazement and delight,
Shall put on immortality (no, be gar, that's wrong)
immortality and take,' says he,
'Their lasting place in human hist'ry,' says Bonney.

"Well," I says to Tiddy, "that's a dam'd fine article iv pothry," I says. "It sounds almost like prose," I says. "It is prose," says Tiddy. "Then," says I, "divil a bit the worse it is for that," says I. So we ups an' goes to the prize fight.

THE editor of a health journal asks us if we will "loan him" the block (recently used in the ACADEMY) representing Mr. Bernard Shaw as the Dying Vegetarian. We gladly do so. The name of the paper is Life and Beauty.

WE print the following note from a correspondent on M. Paderewski's performance at the Queen's Hall this week, as some expression of the extraordinary emotional effect which this remarkable pianist exercises on his hearers of almost every kind:

Men call him Paderewski, this sad-faced messenger of the gods. His name does not matter: where he is, he is not. Beethoven and Chopin are. Their spirits may rest, for they have found a voice. . . . I breathed rare mountain air for days. The spell was upon me. I had walked with the gods. I felt I could be my Ideal self. I could be, do, suffer anything. I could go to the stake for any cause if Paderewski would play my funeral march. . . . Mr. Wood thought he was conducting that orchestra, I suppose. He was not. Paderewski held it in the hollow of his hand. He fixed his eye upon it and the men played as they had never played before in all their lives. He magnetised it. In playing with him it was greater than itself. He was the soul of it. It bore him up on the wings of an orchestra inspired. It sank into silence with him and died away in pianissimos that came in far echoes from over the hills of silence. Great Beethoven faded, and Chopin spoke to us with his own voice. We listened, breathless, to the end when the strange spirit whispered to us in one mighty passage after another. Gigantic passages they were, yet no one thought "how clever," each one felt "how great," as the spirit came along in its last glorious march, upborne by the inspired orchestra. It was like the march of some white war-horse of the gods. It passed on to victory, out of sight, and deafening cheers brought the vision to an end, and I went out into the night walking in a land of ghosts.

Bibliographical.

I MAY be permitted to express in this place my personal and individual gratification at Mr. Fortescue's accession to the Keepership of the Printed Books in the British Museum, because Mr. Fortescue, as we all know, has distinguished himself especially in the realm of bibliography. There are hundreds, perhaps thousands, who have blessed and bless him for those Subject Indices of his. There is, of course, always one objection to compilations of that kind—that while they make easier the path of the inquirer, they also make easier the path of the lazy and even ignorant person who desires a reputation for erudition. However, Mr. Fortescue's Indices deal only with very modern books, and can therefore be only of limited service to the literary impostor. To the genuine student they are, within their range, invaluable. "What are the best books on such and such a subject?" This is a question which so many people put day by day, and even now it can be answered satisfactorily only by experts in the various departments of literary knowledge.

The "literary drama" is having quite an innings just now. Only the other day we had "Grierson's Way" at the Haymarket; this week there has been the Hibernian revival in Dublin; and on Monday next Mr. Poel is to give us, in London, FitzGerald's version of Calderon's "Vida es Sueno." I have already drawn attention to the many translations and adaptations of that play which exist in English. FitzGerald's version must, of course, always have a peculiar interest for all lovers of literature. But I do hope that on Monday "Life's a Dream" will not be rendered in the usual "Elizabethan" manner—i.e., with only one piece of scenic background and without any breathing space between the acts. This performing of plays from start to finish, without change of scene and without pause of any kind, is calculated not so much to turn the hair grey as to destroy it altogether. I always come away from the representations of the Elizabethan Stage Society a little balder than I went.

The decease of Mrs. Marshall reminds one of the large extent to which literary fame can be, so to speak, sectional—considerable, yet strictly limited—real, but circumscribed.

Very many adult people, no doubt, were aware that Emma Marshall was the name of the author of numerous popular stories (mostly of the quasi-historical sort) for the young; but by how many of those adults had any of those stories been read? Ought I to be ashamed to say that I never read one of them? The only bit of Mrs. Marshall's writing that ever came in my way was the essay on "A. L. O. E." and Mrs. Ewing which she contributed two years ago to Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign. This struck me as conceived and written in very slovenly fashion, and altogether inadequate to the occasion. If Mrs. Marshall always wrote like that, she was very inferior as a littérateur to the two ladies she ventured to criticise.

A little bird whispered to me a short time ago that Mr. John Murray thought of publishing more novels in the immediate future than he had issued in the recent past, but that his aim would be to take care that he published none that were not absolutely good. If this be so, the resolution is eminently creditable. Simply appalling is the amount of mediocrity (not to say rubbish) in the shape of fiction that even the most reputable publishers will place before the public; and it would be a positive benefaction if certain firms would make it clear, by the moderate measure of their output, that they would always favour quality in preference to quantity. I see that the new novel announced by Mr. Murray is called Lesser Destinies, and deals with "many aspects of life in the East End."

Canon Ainger's monograph on Charles Lamb—which is to be reprinted as part and parcel of the "de luxe" reproduction of the Canon's edition of Lamb's works—dates from 1882; but he revised it in 1888. He may now have revised it once more. The Works were edited by the Canon in the following order: The Essays of Elia, 1883; Mrs. Leicester's School, and Other Writings, 1885; and Poems, Plays, and Miscellaneous Essays, 1888. To the last-named year belongs the Canon's collection of Lamb's Letters (in two volumes). There can be no doubt that these five volumes are very neat and handy. The Canon would, perhaps, have done well had he connected the letters by a thread of biographic narrative.

We are all of us glad that Dr. George MacDonald has found himself well enough to come to England this year. It so happens that Mrs. Oliphant has just made public, in one of her letters (addressed to Mr. John Blackwood in 1863), that it was she who introduced David Elginbrod to the late Mr. Henry Blackett, whose firm published it at her "urgent recommendation." David Elginbrod was Dr. MacDonald's first novel, though it had been preceded by his romantic tale, Phantastes. Apart from Phantastes, he was known, when Elginbrod appeared, only as a writer of verse. It was Messrs. Hurst & Blackett who published, two years ago, Dr. MacDonald's latest novel, Salted with Fire.

Some of the reviewers of Miss Harraden's story, The Fowler, have been saying that the Theodore Bevan who plays the title part in it is a most improbable personage. Now, suppose it should prove that there is a living original from whom Bevan was directly drawn—what then? Gossip has it that the prototype of Bevan exists among us.

A Ripe and Rushing Life.

The Life of William Morris. By J. W. Mackail. 2 vols. (Longmans, Green & Co.)

Few people will have envied Mr. Mackail the task entrusted to him of writing a Life of Morris. Apart from the thorny difficulties which beset him, was the certain fact that he could not please all readers. On the one hand are the Socialists, mostly contemptuous of Morris's art; on the other are the art-lovers, wondering why he ever mixed himself up with Socialism. In the middle are a few who know that Art and Socialism alike were the outcome of an intense, passionate craving for active work, a hatred of all that was sordid and ugly, and a desire, strong as a gospel, to leave the world more beautiful than he found it. With this dominating aim in view, Morris became, as successive vistas of activity opened before him, architect, painter, poet, decorator, weaver, printer, and craftsman in many arts. Finally the vast field of social reform engulfed him, and to his other activities he added those of lecturer, preacher, and revolutionary.

By a curious anomaly Morris was the son of wealthy parents, and except from choice need never have worked for his living. That choice, however, drove him like the gadfly of the goddess, and nearly persuaded him to the Church. From this isolation he, and his bosom friend at Oxford, Burne-Jones, were saved by a variety of causes then first beginning to operate on the impressionable youth of the country.

The secularisation of mind, the widening of interest and outlook beyond the limits prescribed by Anglo-Catholic ideals, towards which the influence of Chaucer and Brown-ing, like two great windows letting in the air and day, contributed so potently, were coming over him. . . . Art and literature were no longer thought of as handmaids to religion, but as ends to be pursued for their own sake, as a means of realising life.

A dream which at first possessed him of founding a retreat for kindred souls to inhabit leaked away and was replaced by a "brotherhood" of literary, poetical, and, above all, artistic impulses. At this period was organised the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine, a lineal inheritor of the Germ, started five years previously under pre-Raphaelite auspices. Soon, through the admiration of Burne-Jones for Rossetti, Morris linked hands with the pre-Raphaelites themselves, and fell under the sway of that dominating personality. Abandonment of the Church had led him on to architecture; now he became a painter, for Rossetti insisted upon it. So he made the world richer by one sweetly sensitive picture, "Queen Guenevere," and so he came to participate in that rich and reckless outpouring of wasted genius, the decoration of the Oxford Union. One night, as all know, he and Rossetti went to the theatre at Oxford, and there they saw the lady who became Rossetti's wife, and whose magnificent beauty inspired him for most of his finest creations. Morris was only twenty-five when he married. His energies had hardly yet begun to find an outlet, but his powers were at their height. He put them all into the building and decorating of a house which should be the most beautiful house in the world—the well-known Red House at Upton. Here his children were born, and here he spent five years, the happiest of his life. The furnishing of the Red House revealed to Morris that there was no handicraft being worked in England that could satisfy an artistic nature. Beds, furniture, utensils had all to be designed and specially made, and thus came about the formation of that amateur firm of carpet-weavers and decorators known now all over the world as Morris & Co. Here is an account of one of the first board meetings, related by Mr. Faulkner, one of the partners:

I don't know if you have heard of our firm before; if not, I may as well tell you that it is composed of (Madox) Brown, Rossetti, Jones, Webb, Morris, Marshall, Faulkner; that it commenced with a capital which might be considered an infinitesimal of the second order; that it has meetings once or twice a fortnight, which have rather the character of a meeting of the Jolly Masons than of a meeting to discuss business. . . . Our firm has arrived at the dignity of exhibition at the Great Exhibition, where we have already sent some stained glass, and where they obtained a medal for "imitation of Gothic patterns," and shall shortly send some furniture which will doubtless cause the majority of spectators to admire. The getting ready of our things has cost more tribulation and swearing to Topsy (Morris) than these exhibitions will be worth.

The increasing business of the firm and a long bout of ill-health caused Morris to abandon the Red House and move up to London, whence, after things had begun to go satisfactorily, he removed to Kelmscott, on the borders of Oxford and Gloucestershire. By this time (1871) the bulk of his poetical works had seen the light. Mr. Mackail quotes from Canon Dixon a delightfully naïve account of Morris's first outburst into verse under the influence of the friends he had gathered round him at Oxford:

One night Crom Price and I went to Exeter and found him with Burne-Jones. As soon as we entered the room Burne-Jones exclaimed wildly, "He's a big poet!" "Who is?" asked we. "Why, 'Topsy'"—the name given him on account of his mass of dark curly hair, frequently shortened to "Top." We sat down and heard Morris read his first poem, the first he had ever written in his life. It was called "The Willow and the Red Cliff." As he read it I felt it was something the like of which had never been heard before. It was a thing entirely new, founded on nothing previous. . . . He reached his perfection at once. Nothing could have been altered in "The Willow and the Red Cliff," and in my judgment he can scarcely be said to have exceeded it much afterwards in anything he did.

To the praise lavished on his virgin effort (afterwards destroyed) Morris replied characteristically: "Well, if this is poetry, it is very easy to write"; and, in truth, poetry never gave him much trouble. Mr. Mackail quotes some of his early poems, which were never published; and a fragmentary, but more important, selection from the cycle of Troy poems, which were left unfinished. One gem, the weird and melancholy arming song of Paris, was afterwards transformed, and reappears in "Ogier the Dane"; but we cannot refrain from giving it here in its original form:

Love, within the hawthorn brake,
Pray you be merry for my sake,
While I last, for who knoweth
How near I may be my death?

Sweet, be long in growing old!
Life and love in age grow cold;
Hold fast to life, for who knoweth
What thing cometh after death?

Trouble must be kept afar,
Therefore go I to the war:
Less trouble is there among spears
Than with hard words about your ears.

Love me, then, my sweet and fair,
And curse the folk that drive me there.
Kiss me, sweet, for who knoweth,
What thing cometh after death?

Of all the legends he handled the story of Troy was the one which probably most fascinated the mediæval mind of Morris, and Mr. Mackail records his delight at finding among writers of the Middle Ages the same ideas that haunted him of the vague mystery and tragedy of the ending of that ten-years' war. His conception of Troy is mediæval—a sort of Bruges. The knights go forth singly into the lists, as in Froissart, or look down from the walls on

Our great wet ditches where the carp and tench,
In spite of arblasts and petrarice,
Suck at the floating lilies all day long.

The Troy poems are composed in a vivid, dramatic manner, which marked the earlier life of their author. When he came to publishing epics, he had settled down to the even, slow narrative swing of "Jason" and the "Earthly Paradise." Of his attitude towards his own poetry Mr. Mackail says: "No great artist was ever less self-conscious or more free from vanity." "It was a matter of simple duty with him, in a poem as in a design, to do everything as well as he could. It was not with him a matter of inspiration—he never used either the word or the idea—but of sheer honesty and seriousness of workmanship. . . . He never spoke of poetry as involving more than the craftsman's qualities." This explains, and is in part explained by, the fact that so much of his work was based upon ancient themes, which he either translated, like the "Odyssey" and the Icelandic poems, or paraphrased like the story of Jason.

Morris's literary tastes were too miscellaneous to discuss here. Ranging from "Jorrocks" and "Tom Sawyer" to Borrow and Dickens in prose, he had ever a keen appreciation of breezy humour, and many of his own favourite phrases were catchwords derived from the archana of this class of literature. In poetry he worshipped Browning.

Morris's descent into the region of revolutionary politics seems at first sight a matter requiring explanation. Why should an aristocrat of birth and means—fully conscious of both, yet except at unguarded moments never revealing his consciousness even to intimate friends—stray down into those circles of the discontented poor whose notion of righting society is to wrong those better off than themselves? For the answer to this we should have to look back at the state of London slums and the industrial market twenty or thirty years ago with the same frank, inquiring eyes that Morris looked out from; see how its squalor and vileness would have jarred on the dreams he had of a world beautiful with art; and then take into consideration his impulsive nature, his contempt for difficulties, his glorious optimism, and his superabounding energy. Socialism as he found it was a fearful and grievous disappointment. The petty jealousies and quarrels of the leaders, the frothiness and cowardice of the masses, disgusted his very soul, and to his friends he poured it out. But to have laid the burden down would to him have appeared as cowardly as the conduct he condemned, and so he went on, sacrificing time and money as if neither were of the least account, preaching in stuffy halls and under pelting skies, until his health, always threatened, broke down beneath the strain. Had everything been known which this book makes clear, how different would have been the feelings with which even the unimpressible middle-classes would have received him. It is the fate of great men that their acts are judged and their motives unknown. Hence, if their acts are not popular, they are isolated and thrust back on themselves. Morris himself was too self-reliant to mind this or complain of it; yet at times he, too, craved for sympathy, and was almost childishly pleased at finding it in unexpected quarters.

Here this review must end. It is all too short to deal with a tenth of the many activities in which Morris expended himself during the fifty years of his busy life. It has not mentioned his devotion to the antiquities of his native land, his crusade against ignorant and destructive "restorations," his experiments in weaving and dyeing, his enormous influence on the arts of decoration and furniture-making (influence which was recognised abroad far earlier than here), his revival of the arts of illuminating and printing, the important work of the Kelmscott Press, and a hundred other matters of greater or less interest to mankind. Finally, there is the personal element: the fiery, gusty temper which destroyed door-panels and expressed itself in furious beating of head against wall; the carelessness of dress, vehemence of language, generosity of temperament, bluntness of manners. Above all, there is the fountain of humour, delicately caught and reproduced in these pages, worthy record of a crowded, brave, glorious, and most valuable life.

Autobiography of a Child.

Autobiography of a Child. (Blackwood. 6s)

THE true autobiography of a child—that is to say, the history of a child written by a child—would be a precious document for the thinker, but, from the literary point of view, quaint, dull, without perspective, or charm, or poetry. This last summer in Devonshire it was given me to read the story of a family of children, as written by three little cousins between the ages of seven and thirteen. The plainest matter of fact reigned therein: nurse and the various pets were themes of absorbing interest; not a giant, not a fairy, not a feature of tragedy or comedy varied the recital. I remember also an infant poetess of six who, taken from her Midland town to the seaside in North Wales, commemorated this great occasion in an ode, very properly addressed to her grandmama. She had a passing word for the mountains and the sea; but the real thrill and tremor of the divine afflatus seized her at sight of the mountain sheep with curly horns and long tasselled tails. She wrote:

The mountains and the sea
A stranger's eye engage.
But, oh, the horned mountain sheep
A stranger's eye amaze.

And all our persuasion could not induce her to depart from this redaction. I believe that in most cases of the sort we grown-up people would find the children's accent put on details to us most unimportant, while what we consider the great interests of life would rise up far out of their tiny field of vision.

Needless to say, the book before us does not fall into this category. It is, in fact, the memoirs of a child written by that child grown to middle-age—written by a woman with a retentive, passionate Celtic memory, which lets pass never a kindness nor a slight; and yet with a breadth of judgment, a tolerant reasonableness, which constantly corrects her violent impressionability. Her own unhappy childhood is seen through the mist of poetry, remembrance, regret, and sweet self-pity with which most persons over thirty regard their earliest years. It is, as Goethe said such books should be, "Wahrheit und Dichtung," truth and poetry. It is a tragic story, the history of a vivid, sensitive, proud, headstrong, dreamy little girl whose mother does not love her, who is sometimes ill-used, and sometimes resentful, but for whom, none the less, "Life is a story, ever broken, ever clouded, with radiant hours amid its many sadnesses, quaint and adorable surprises ever coming to dry the tears of blank despair and solitude; an Irish melody of mirth and melancholy."

Angela is the child of a beautiful and clever Scotch woman settled in Ireland, happy in a second marriage with the man of her heart, and eager to forget the miserable early union to which the child Angela owes her birth. A nervous impatience of the poor baby, a natural strain of harshness in her fine cold temper, lead the mother to a severity which estranges her little girl for ever. Such a nature as Angela's requires for its education the subtlest mingling of discipline and liberty. The authority which governs it should appeal first of all to the devotedness, the honour, the hero-worship of its small subject, nor ever arouse the vindictive rebelliousness of a too sensitive nature, aflame for justice, by any act of ill-judged and oppressive tyranny. A cuff and a blow at home, years of neglect at school, alternated in the education of Angela, and the proud little spirit grew up hurt and thwarted, maimed by the cruelty of its initiation into life.

Yet over and over again, by an effect of that curious double vision which is the most remarkable distinction of a remarkable book, the grown-up Angela intervenes and protects the harsh mother from the arraignment of her child. The daughter of five and thirty observes in the mother she forgives qualities which necessarily escaped the observation of the bruised and battered little scapegoat of eight. She sees the fine side of the harsh and violent Scotswoman who made her, after all, so Irish, while correcting in her, too severely, but not without a noble result, the natural deficiencies of the Irish temper.

My mother never seemed to think it possible that any of her children could lie. . . . Extreme sincerity was a part of her character. . . . She was very kind and generous: a woman to turn her back upon a friend in prosperity and court him in poverty. . . . There was nothing of the snob about my mother, I must admit. . . . She was a woman of colossal intelligence, and at all times, whatever her temper, you could put her instantly into good humour by addressing yourself to her intellect. . . . The mother who did not love me was the handsomest creature I had ever beheld.

Angela's baby repulsion to her mother was clearly a case of love, irritable and fierce and hostile because it knows that it is unreturned. An admirable little word-picture places before us this unloving mother: she is on a visit to the Midland convent where her daughter is at school:

How to paint her, as she stood thus valorously free to the raking sunbeams that showed out the mild white bloom and rose-leaf pink of her long, full visage? She wore on her abundant fair hair a black lace bonnet, trimmed with mauve flowers and a white aigrette; and the long train of her white alpaca gown lay upon the grass like a queen's gown. I remember my admiration of the thousand little flounces—black edged—that lay in shimmering lines up to her rounded waist. She was in half-mourning for my grandmother, whose existence I had forgotten all about; and brave and becoming, it must be admitted, were those weeds of mitigated grief. As I approached she turned her fair and finished visage, with the long, delicate, and cruel nostrils, and the thin, delicate red lips, to me, and her cold blue glance, falling upon my anxious and distressed face, turned my heart to stone.

For restraint, brilliance, and a sort of vindictive weight of emotion such a passage may be compared with Charlotte Brontë's record of her schooldays at Cowan Bridge. But the book is not all sad. Angela has the happy Irish temperament, with its dash of devil-may-care and its love of adventure. Much light-heartedness tempers her melancholy; and, on a sombre thread, she strings pearls as quaint as shining and as gay as memory can make them.

The first chapters of the book are charming; the Kildare village rises before us with its flat white high road, its village street, its pond so wide that, sure, it must be heaven on the other side—or else New York, that earthly paradise. Nor is there less character in her presentment of mid-England, with its leafy lanes, rose-scented; its tall steeples, narrow pavements, and sleepy little shops; its comfortable farmsteads hung with ivy; and its endless sweep of fields edged with elms, top-heavy and jagged in their age. Best of all is the Dalkey garden, with its cemetery of the imaginary family of L'Estrange, where layer on layer of little wooden sticks appear the indication of hidden seeds; but, if you stooped to read the legend, this is the sort of thing that would greet your eyes: "Here lies Walter L'Estrange, born such and such, wrecked off the coast of Barbary"; or "Reginald L'Estrange, died on Bosworth Field"; or "Edith, his wife, daughter of Lord Seymour"; while all the lives and adventures of the imaginary dead were chronicled in a big ledger safe upstairs in the playroom. Since the Brontë children invented a whole Indian nation to keep them company on the wild moors round Haworth have any little creatures played a better game than Angela and her sisters in their Irish garden?

This is a book to read, but to read as the author wrote it, not in the least as a record of indisputable facts, but as a prismatic vision, seen through tears, of the fairy tale that childhood must become to a memory as sensitive, as quick in selection, as passionately vivid, as that which has evoked, in gratitude and rancour, this autobiography of a child.

MARY JAMES DARMESTETER.

A Word With Max.

More. By Max Beerbohm. (Lane. 4s. 6d.)

In one of these essays, Mr. Beerbohm says: "Not that I had any special reasons for hating school! Strange as it may seem to my readers, I was not unpopular there. I was a modest, good-humoured boy. It is Oxford that has made me insufferable." Now the time has come—this book proves it—for Mr. Beerbohm to cease to pride himself upon his insufferableness. On numerous occasions he is not insufferable at all; quite the contrary; and when he is, it is the result of premeditation. Normally, Mr. Beerbohm must have an engaging, winning way. With a personality original and attractive "by itself," it seems to us a pity that he should not abandon the exemplars whose influence marks so much of his work—Mr. Wilde on the one side, and Mr. Shaw on the other. Mr. Wilde's gift for paradox and whimsical inversion—as displayed, for instance, in his essay on the "Decay of the Art of Lying"—is masterly: but it is his own; Mr. Shaw's frankness in sparing, in his denunciations, not even himself is continually entertaining: but it is his own. Both manners can be caught by a deft imitator and re-rendered with amusing effect. But whereas we are content to be merely amused by an ordinarily talented derivative writer, we ask of a young man—(Will Mr. Beerbohm forgive us for calling him young?)—of genuine literary feeling and wit that he should be first of all himself. Mr. Beerbohm has such unmistakable powers that we suggest that in future he should—at any rate, in those essays which he republishes and “titivates”—be himself and his best self.

As it is, at the risk of incurring his delicate scorn, we must say that Mr. Beerbohm's new book is, in many parts, not quite worthy. In the exceptions it is very good indeed; but the rest, to use an expressive term, is mere “pop limbo,” marking no advance on his Works. Mr. Beerbohm may reply that when a humorist writes a book and entitles it More he is not to be judged so seriously as we think. But the fact is that Mr. Beerbohm undervalues his worth. His convictions are arrived at deliberately and are dear to him; his intellectuals are at bottom sound; his insufferableness is mere pose. Whenever he forgets that he must still live up to his undergraduate reputation, you see how good he can be. Even Mr. Meredith's Wise Youth had his off moments; why not Mr. Beerbohm? There are passages in this book which go to prove that their author could, if he willed it, write as perfect an essay as any man of his age. In “If I Were Ædile” we find this:

I should keep a very jealous guard upon Berkeley-square. With its perfect tone, its quietude, with Lord Bath's dolphins, Lord Lansdowne's long wall, the old and pleasant anomaly of Gunter's, it is an ineffably distinguished place. Grosvenor-square is so wild a motley that I would make no rules there. But in St. James's-square, that superb example of all that is best, and greatest, and most gloomy in our architecture, I would be a despot indeed. The receivers of money, who have occupied so great a part of it, I would ruthlessly drive forth, and in their empty houses I would reinstate the impoverished noblemen whose ancestors once-lived there. Who cares that the place is insanitary? History haunts it. The ghosts of many centuries gather upon its doorsteps. Every window has the pathos of a frame wherefrom some great picture has been torn. From one Nell Gwynne waved her naughtily-embellished fingers, from another poor Caroline dropped her clumsy curtsies to the mob. At that window yonder, not so long since, sat “The Rupert of Debate,” glowering through his spectacles, and cursing his swathed foot. . . . Yes, I would be a real despot in St. James's-square.

A note sounds there which no one else is striking just now. Style and fine temperament are there too. The circumstance that Thackeray wrote first does not weigh with us; for here Mr. Beerbohm's true self is speaking, and if Mr. Beerbohm's true self has kinship with Thackeray, it is an accident. As a matter of fact, he is often very Thackerayan. Here is another passage, from the paper on Mme. Tussaud's:

Life was a sacred thing—why had it been profaned here for so many years? Whence came this hateful craft? With what tools, in what workshop, who for whose pleasure fashioned these obscene images? Images? Yes, of course, they were images. . . . But why should Garibaldi and those others all stare at me so gravely? Had they some devil's power of their own, some mesmerism? It flashed upon me that, as I watched them, they were stealing my life from me, making me one of their own kind. My brain seemed to be shrinking, all the blood ceasing in my body. I would not watch them. I drooped my eyelids. My hands looked smooth, waxen, without nerves. I knew now that I should never speak nor hear again, never move. I took a dull pride even in the thought that this was the very frock-coat in which I had been assassinated. . . . With an effort I pulled myself together. Looking neither to the right nor to the left, I passed through that morgue of upstanding corpses to the entrance, down the marble staircase, out into the street. . . . Ah! it was good to be in the street!

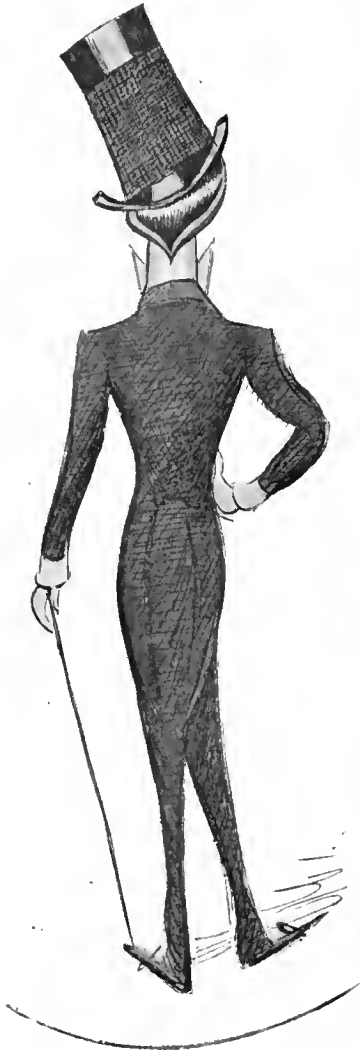

And one more scrap:

Often, since, have I wondered whether a Spartan system be really well for youths who are bound mostly for Capuan Universities. It is true, certainly, that this system makes Oxford or Cambridge doubly delectable. Undergraduates owe their happiness chiefly to the consciousness that they are no longer at school. The nonsense which was knocked out of them at school is all put gently back at Oxford or Cambridge. And the discipline to which they are subject is so slight that it does but serve to accentuate their real freedom. The sudden reaction is rather dangerous, I think, to many of them.

Briefly, Mr. Beerbohm can think and observe and write. He has the uncommon gift of seeing clearly the “other side” of things; he can stand aside impartially and watch contemporary life with the eye of the historian; his fastidiousness, when disciplined, is exquisite; his appreciation of the best is sound. He has no need to stop continually to say: “See how clever I am!”; he has no need to remember any of his predecessors or contemporaries in literature; he has no need to be other than his best self.

“Yet, oh the jester that is lost!” would be, we seem to hear someone urging, the comment which would follow, did Mr. Beerbohm take his art seriously and put on paper only the best of him, instead of the best only fitfully and with his cherished insufferableness as its alloy. But that would be absurd. Mr. Beerbohm's best is of a rare and ingenious humour compact, and the loss would, in reality, be gain. His admirers might change a little in quality: that is all. For ourselves, we do not greatly value mechanical japes. The exercise in facile irony in this volume, called “An Infamous Brigade”—an attack on the firemen for destroying the beauty of fires—becomes very tiring after a page or so. Probably the author had a satirical intention when he first penned it: as a travesty of the methods of a certain school of literature, it is excellent fooling; but such work is machine made. Mr. Beerbohm's account of the popular novelist is also wearisome; and, more, it is cheap. And he does not always know where to stop: an admirable criticism of Ouida is impaired seriously by a parody of her style, so elaborate, and clearly so to the author's own taste that it seems almost as if the criticism were written merely to introduce it. Ouida does not suffer by it; but neither does her eulogist gain.

But we are, perhaps, too critical. If our belief in Mr. Beerbohm has led us on too far, he must take the excess as a compliment.

THE AUTHOR OF “MORE.”

The Comforter of Czars and Moujiks.

Thoughts and Counsels of Father John : Selected and Arranged from "My Life in Christ." By Cyril Bickersteth and Agnes L. Illingworth. (Mowbray & Co.)

THIS little book contains the essence of a larger work, My Life in Christ, which, when presented to English readers two years ago by Colonel Goulaeff, revealed to them the existence and character of this most remarkable Russian priest—the comforter of Czars and moujiks. The size and expense of that volume must have deterred many from acquainting themselves with the life and teachings of this extraordinary man; it was, therefore, a good thought to draw from it a smaller and more orderly book.

FATHER JOHN.

When noticing the larger work, in 1897, we pointed out that there is no great wealth of graceful and illuminative fancy in Father John's writings. Nor are these charged, like Count Tolstoy's, with original cogitations on the problems which vex, and the doubts which enfeeble, modern minds. Father John's message is rarely enforced by, or directed toward, the events and conditions of the day. He is probably not blind to these, but his is the changeless criticism of life which is natural to those who wish only to call men to the life with God. Thus we find the following sentence interjected among maxims on the pursuit of holiness:

The characteristics of the men of the second half of the present nineteenth century are: self-worship, self-government (autonomy), materialism in life, and spiritual scepticism (incredulity).

The solitariness and the tone of this passage are both characteristic of Father John, who is above all things a priest of the Holy Orthodox Church, a shepherd of the wandering sheep; himself being fortressed in his faith as his cathedral of St. Andrew is strong amid the bastions of Cronstadt.

Father John is the Archpriest of that august temple. Thence he issues to the bedside of sick and dying Russia. He soothed the last hours of Alexander III., and he has put many a nameless drunkard on his feet. Wherever he goes crowds follow him, drawn by his saintliness and his long purse, which is filled by the charitable rich to be emptied day by day into the laps of the poor. An "English traveller" explains his unique position as follows:

The real fact is, that Father John is a great mystery. No one knows exactly how his great reputation was first made or when it all began. I think that, wonderful as are the stories about him and the way his prayers are answered, his extraordinary influence in Russia rests less upon this than upon the fact that he represents the ideal which has formed itself in the minds of orthodox Russians as to what a priest ought to be. He is a most beautiful man in every way: perfectly simple and natural, and free from cant; spending his whole life doing good, just taking things as they come from day to day, and bringing sorrow for sin, brightness, and peace with him wherever he goes.

All over Russia Father John is credited with supernatural powers of healing the sick. Yet the Faith-Healers can hardly claim him. Father John does not deny the doctor's power to cure with medicine. Rather, he affirms with unique force the efficacy of prayer. "Ask Him boldly for everything." All that is necessary is faith—the soul's affirmative answer to the question: "Believe ye that I am able to do this?" "We must believe," says this experienced Christian, "that the deeds follow the words as the shadow follows the body, for the word and the deed of the Lord are indivisible, 'for He commanded, and they were created.'" Thus, one priest's store of faith, like the loaves and fishes, feeds the multitude.

We think that the editors of this selection have justly distinguished the main characteristics of Father John's teaching. There is, first, "the vivid realisation of the communion of saints and the nearness of the spiritual world." Here we may note Father John's abounding sense of the value of sacraments, images, festivals, and places as aids to spiritual achievement. "God is throughout the world," he says, "but especially in heaven and in temples." It was surely a little unnecessary for the editors to remark that they "did not feel bound to exclude every expression which we could not reconcile with the doctrinal standards of the Church of England." We should think not! The life and meaning of this book could not be separated from Father John and the Orthodox Church. One reads too, with weariness, the editors' belief that readers "will certainly acquit Father John of idolatry or superstition, when they find how his heart and mind are possessed with the thought of the Majesty and the Immanence of God." This is to put the reader in leading-strings, and to mar his appreciation of such a passage as the following, from the section entitled "Fellow Citizens with the Saints":

I gaze upon the icons in the temple—upon Thy holy icon, my Lord, upon that of Thy most pure mother, those of the holy angels and archangels, and upon the faces of the saints, adorned, resplendent with gold and silver—and think to myself how Thou hast honoured and adorned our nature, Creator and Provider of all! Thy saints shine with Thy light, they are sanctified by Thy grace, having conquered sin and washed away the sinful impurities of body and spirit; they are glorious with Thy glory, they are incorruptible through Thine incorruptibility. Glory to Thee for having so honoured, enlightened, and raised our nature!

Here are Thine Apostles and hierarchs, living images of Thee, the Highest, Who passed through the heavens, Envoy of the Father, Hierarch and Chief of Shepherds; Thy goodness, Thy wisdom. Thy might, spiritual beauty, power, and holiness shine in them.

Here are Thy Martyrs, who by Thy strength overcame terrible temptations and endured fearful tortures; they have washed the garments of their souls white in Thy blood. Here are Thy venerable ones, who by fasting, vigilance, and prayer obtained Thy wonderful gifts, the gifts of healing, of discernment; Thy might strengthened them to stand above sin and all the snares of the Devil; Thy likeness shines forth in them like the sun.

Surely the essential truth and beauty of this passage are self-interpreted to every thoughtful reader.

His openness to spiritual messages from the natural world is Father John's second characteristic. Here is a quaint simile:

It is a remarkable phenomenon in nature that if you put a plant into a large, wide pot or tub it grows very much at the roots; they thicken, they give out many ramifications, but the tree itself does not grow much in height, and only yields few and small leaves and flowers. But if it is planted in a small pot, then the roots are small, but the plant itself grows rapidly in height and yields beautiful leaves and flowers (if it is the nature of the plant to produce flowers). Is it not the same with man? When he lives in full liberty, in abundance and prosperity, then he grows in body and does not grow in spirit, does not bring forth fruits—good works; whilst when he lives in straitness, in poverty, sickness, misfortune, and afflictions—in a word, when his animal nature is crushed—then he grows spiritually, bears flowers of virtue, ripens, and brings forth rich fruits. This is why the path of those who love God is a narrow one.

Other features of Father John's writings will be easily discovered by the reader. In this book, as in the larger work which it represents, we have ancient teaching informed by a unique personality. It is the personality, not the teaching, which will appeal to most of Father John's English readers. For the man as well as the priest is seen behind all, and nothing is more usual than for the one to support the other. Even when the priest warns us that the devil "chiefly assaults the heart through a full stomach," the man confesses, "this is from experience."

Soldier and Squire.

Lumsden of the Guides. By General Sir Peter S. Lumsden and George R. Elsmie. (Murray. 16s.)

THIS is the record of a good soldier and a good squire. Its compilation has been rendered possible by the discovery of the full and interesting letters which Lumsden wrote to his parents during his Indian career. These had been carefully preserved by his mother, and they form the staple material of this book. Sir Harry Lumsden came of an old Scottish family having its seat at Belhelvie Lodge, Aberdeenshire. He was born, however, amid the very different surroundings of a storm in the Bay of Bengal, while his parents were sailing to India in the East India Company's ship the Rose. His father, Lieut. Thomas Lumsden, was a Bengal horse artillery officer of great experience, but Harry reaped nothing from this fact to which his own "grit" did not entitle him. A lost watch story which is told of Thomas Lumsden is too remarkable to be neglected. In 1820 this officer left India for England to be married, and in an adventurous spirit, worthy of the fine Scottish blood in his veins, he travelled overland through Persia, Armenia, and across Europe, having for his companion his cousin, Matthew Lumsden, a learned professor of Persian and Arabic in Calcutta. In the Caucasus the travellers were caught in a great snowstorm, in the midst of which Thomas Lumsden lost a valuable gold watch. Several years later Matthew Lumsden, making a second journey over the same route, greatly to his astonishment, was presented with his cousin's watch by certain monks, who said it had been found on a mountain path. The watch, inscribed "Nil desperandum," is now an heirloom in the family.

The baby Harry Lumsden was sent back to Aberdeen to be reared among the cool Highland hills. And in after life his heart "remembered how" the storms rolled among them, and the trout leapt in the streams below. At sixteen he obtained a cadetship in the East India Company, and was gazetted to the 59th Bengal Native Infantry as ensign. The 59th was one of the best native corps, and Lumsden looked upon the regiment as his home. His brother officers gave him the affectionate nickname

"Joe." A man for whom the name "Harry" is not considered kindly enough must be a very good fellow indeed; and such was "Joe" Lumsden.

It was in 1841, after he had been a lieutenant for nine years, and a political officer on a small scale, that Lumsden received his grand opportunity. It was given to him by Sir Henry Lawrence, who, as the first British agent at Lahore, had gathered round him a choice band of young men—among them Lumsden—"men," he said, "such as you will seldom see anywhere, but when collected together worth double and treble the number taken at haphazard." The need of a small mobile force of men who, at a moment's notice, could act as guides and interpreters to troops in the field was keenly perceived by Lawrence; and it was to Lumsden that he committed the task of raising and training this unique body. The result was the famous regiment of the "Guides," composed of both infantry and cavalry, and filled with soldiers of lion-hearted courage and fox-like intelligence.

Lumsden often found his recruits among his enemies. To use his own words, he sought for "men accustomed to act for themselves, and not easily taken aback by any sudden emergency." There was a man named Dilawur Khan, who had been intended for the Muhammadan priesthood, but instead was going about the country kidnapping bankers and merchants.

Dilawur's capital consisted of his sword, a piece of rope, and a huge bullock's skin, which he could inflate at pleasure, and so carry himself and his guests across the "sacred river." Once there a messenger was sent to settle the sum the firm or family would give as a ransom for his guest. This was Dilawur's occupation. Lumsden, thinking that Dilawur must have rare local knowledge and pluck to carry on such a trade successfully, sent him an invitation to his camp, promising him a safe return to the hills. The very novelty of the invitation took Dilawur's fancy, and to the astonishment of the chief of the district he appeared in camp. Lumsden received him with all courtesy, pointed out that in a short time posts would be so established throughout the country that his calling would be impossible and the risk of hanging great, and ended his moral by proposing to make him a Guide. Dilawur fairly burst into a fit of laughter at the proposal, and took his departure across the border. Six weeks afterwards he voluntarily turned up at Lumsden's tent, saying he had come to join the Guides, but pleaded hard to be excused the degradation of the "goose step"; but Lumsden held out stoutly for the absolute necessity of his being taught the complete art of war, and finally had the satisfaction of seeing the most dreaded man on the frontier patiently balancing on one leg at his bidding.

How quickly Lumsden put his little army-within-an-army into order is seen in many a passage in his letters. Quite early he writes:

My Guides have gained for themselves and for me a good name in the British camp. All the Engineers send for Guides as an escort, when reconnoitring, in preference to regular cavalry. Only think, when I was on duty elsewhere one day, sixty-six of my men rode slap through and through ten times their number in the hope of recovering some camels which the Seikhs had driven off from General Whish's camp. They did not get the camels, but covered themselves with glory in the presence of the whole army.

Lumsden's life with his Guides was one of the greatest activity. He raced about the Punjab, administering law and fighting law-breakers. The whole country was unsettled, and the man at the plough had his matchlock handy, and the cattle of a village went to graze under an armed escort. We make no attempt to give Lumsden's activities their political and military setting. It suffices to remind the reader that they had their part in the early settling of the North-West Frontier under Lawrence and Campbell. The Guides were a small force, but their brains told in every conflict; and in a letter to Lieutenant G. J. Younghusband of the Guides, written only a few years ago, Sir Harry tells how in one attack on an armed Sikh village it was not might, but "swagger," that "did the trick." This was often the case; the force had its own clever methods, and it was one of Sir Harry's regrets in his retirement at Belhelvie that the separateness and distinction of the "Guides" has been largely lost, and its duties assimilated to those of the frontier force in general. Whatever may be said for or against this change, the Guides regiment remains Sir Harry Lumsden's living and palpitating monument; and the story of its raising and education is one of the most vital chapters in Indian military history.

"Joe" Lumsden persistently declined political advancement, and military advancement was strangely withheld from him. Lord Roberts has declared that he never understood why Lumsden was not given the command of the frontier force. As it was, the creator of the Guides settled on his Aberdeen estate, where he flew his hawks and cast his flies with great contentment, though with fits of wistfulness and longing when he heard the East "a-callin'," and realised that a generation had arisen in India that "knew not Joseph." A well-rounded career, at least, was his; and this its record is both heartening and instructive.

In Favour of Toads and Frogs.

The Tailless Batrachians of Europe. By G. A. Boulenger. (The Ray Society.)

THE Ray Society, instituted to publish works too exclusively scientific to be undertaken by ordinary publishers, has issued since 1844 volumes by Darwin, Huxley, and Agassiz, by Dr. Carpenter, Prof. W. K. Parker, Prof. Allman, and many others. Second to none of these is The Tailless Batrachians of Europe, by G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., two parts of which have successively appeared in the fifty-third and fifty-fourth years of the Ray Society's existence. Frogs and toads, which constitute the order of "Tailless Batrachians," may not seem attractive animals to many persons, nevertheless they constitute a group of exceeding interest. Their organisation is very exceptional and their development from other antecedent forms of life is by no means clearly indicated. As yet their fossil remains have not been found below the lowest Miocene Tertiary strata. There they suddenly make their appearance as if they had leaped, fully formed, into life, which, of course, they never did. The intermediate forms have simply become extinct.

But the frog is not only zoologically interesting, it has been most useful to us men, and may be called the martyr of science, experiments made on its nervous system having been of great importance to physiology and so to medical science.

The toad is commonly thought an ugly animal, but familiarity with it will breed not contempt, but appreciation. Mr. Boulenger tells us that its intelligence is greater than that of any other Batrachian; in captivity it soon accommodates itself to its surroundings, understands that a glass partition is an obstacle, and, placed on a table, will not attempt to jump off, while a frog will not hesitate to take a leap from a fifth story balcony. It is therefore easily tamed, answering the call of its master to take food from the hand, or flattening itself down to let him stroke its back.

Mr. Boulenger's work is most complete, and the Introduction gives so full and careful an account of the anatomy, physiology, developments (with metamorphosis), habits, and geographical distribution of the species described, that it is quite well-fitted to serve a beginner as an introduction to the science of zoology. The species which inhabit Europe are represented in coloured plates, both the adult forms and their tadpoles. There are also six folding plates, representing the geographical distribution of all the species, and a multitude of woodcuts depicting points of external and internal structure, and also the attitudes assumed in pairing, which are very characteristic and peculiar. In England only four species are found, and of these the edible frog (found only in the Eastern counties) has probably been introduced by man. Ireland is inhabited by the common frog alone.

The beautiful little tree-frog, though a stranger to us, is found as far North as Denmark and Southern Sweden, and ranges from Japan to Morocco and the Canaries. All male European Batrachians can produce more or less loud sounds, in which some species are aided by one or two external vocal sacs behind the mouth. The midwife toad will emit in the evening a clear, whistling note like a little bell, or a chime when produced by many. Most species croak, and the loudest croakers are the tree-frog and the edible frog, which has thus gained for itself in our Eastern counties the name of the "Cambridgeshire Nightingale." In Southern Europe the tree-frogs when they are numerous make a noise which is simply deafening, and audible miles away.

From the warty skin of the toad, and especially a prominent gland behind each eye, the animal can exude a viscid, milky fluid, which is so irritating that a dog will rarely seize the creature a second time. When on a collecting excursion with a dog the Hungarian naturalist Méhely found a large toad under a stone,

The dog seized it, but immediately let it go with signs of great repulsion; the toad had instantly become covered with a thick white secretion. The dog approached it once more, and then withdrew, sneezing, howling, and rubbing its foaming mouth on the grass. After a few minutes the dog was seized with convulsions, and had to be carried home. On the next day it had a swollen mouth and burning nose. It did not completely recover until the following day.

Mr. Boulenger gives a very interesting and full account of the geographical distribution of these animals, and at the end of the work is a most complete bibliographical index. Indeed, there is no department of knowledge about these animals wanting in this work, which is addressed not only to experts, but also to all persons with any real interest in zoology and in the natural history of their own country.

ST. GEORGE MIVART.

Other New Books.

GREATER WESTMINSTER. BY G. P. WARNER TERRY.

It is a pity that this history of Greater Westminster has the outward look of a sea-side blotting-pad. For between these misleading covers we find much grave matter of value to students and municipal reformers. The timeliness of Mr. Terry's book, which has run serially through the London Argus, is obvious. It is more to the point to say that timeliness and haste have here no connexion. Mr. Terry is the Vestry Clerk of St. Margaret, Westminster, and to his task of tracing the rise and boundary-making of the old city he has brought a conscientious industry. He has also had the advantage of access to original documents, some of which are reproduced in facsimile, while many good illustrations are transferred from the London Argus.

The royal city of Westminster was born in the tenth century, and it perished of fatty degeneration of the heart in 1855. By that time it included so many boards and beadles and commissioners and committee men that good administration was impossible. In the Strand no fewer than nine paving boards presided over the roadway between Northumberland House and Temple Bar. The crash came when Sir Benjamin Hall's Metropolis Local Management Act divided Westminster up into five administrative districts. Then it was that Westminster ceased to cast out its shoe over Covent Garden and St. George's, Hanover-square, and the Savoy Precinct, and other goodly parts of London. But although the royal city was cut up, it remained whole; and though its Corporation ceased to live, it did not die. Asleep in his civic chair sits the High Steward of Westminster, and sleeping with him are the Deputy High Steward, and the Town Clerk, and the High Constable, and the Mace-bearer. "It is doubtful," sighs Mr. Terry, "whether there are still a Clerk of the Markets and a Searcher of the Sanctuary." Doubtful—and the fairy Prince at the door! The awakening is near; the Burgesses, no doubt, will swear "with many words, 'twas but an after-dinner's nap," and the new Lord Mayor "dally with his golden chain." And now we think of it, perhaps the giddy garb of Mr. Terry's treatise is donned for the fête. (London Argus Office. 1s.)

DANTE.

E. H. PLUMPTRE, D.D.

Sooner or later every work is finding its way into paper covers at sixpence, or leather covers at three sixpences. Messrs. Isbister have now added the Divina Commedia and Canzoniere of Dante to the portable classics in the translation of the late Dean Plumptre. The work is to be complete in five volumes, of which the first two are ready. They are issued in soft plum-coloured leather, and have on the back the tortured lettering which now passes for good taste. Except for this blemish the little books are charming. (Isbister. 2s. 6d. per vol.)

BIBLE CHARACTERS.

BY ALEXANDER WHYTE, D.D.

This is Mr. Whyte's third series of "Bible Characters." The first extended from Adam to Achan, the second from Gideon to Absalom. The third begins with Ahithophel and ends with Nehemiah. The breezy, penetrating treatment which was so conspicuous in the first two series is here also. Mr. Whyte does the Old Testament no dishonour by his frank common-sense handling of characters which, just because they are in the Old Testament, many people fail to study in a direct and masculine way. His method is seen in the first paragraph of this book:

I am not going to whitewash and rehabilitate Ahithophel. I am neither to extenuate nor am I to denounce Ahithophel. I shall put myself back into Ahithophel's place, and I shall speak of Ahithophel as I see and feel Ahithophel to have been. I shall do my best to put myself first into Ahithophel's place, and then into David's place, and then I shall tell you exactly and honestly what I see and what I feel, first as to Ahithophel, and then as to David. But to begin with, who was Ahithophel, and what were the facts?

In this spirit each character is grappled with, and one has only to turn these pages to approve the results. Mephibosheth's moroseness and ingratitude, Barzillai's "truly Highland courtesy" and "Highland hospitality," Jeremiah's "exquisite sensibility of soul," Daniel's "note of birth and breeding," Ezra's "commanding and contagious prayers"—these and a hundred other traits are distinguished and expanded. A book that should find its grateful readers. (Oliphant Anderson, & Ferrier. 3s. 6d.)

EDEN VERSUS WHISTLER: THE BARONET AND THE BUTTERFLY.

This is a petty performance. It is melancholy to see so much wit expended upon so poor a business; it is more melancholy to find a great artist descending to such paltriness. (Paris: L. H. May.)

THE REFORMATION SETTLEMENT. BY CANON MACCOLL.

Canon MacColl introduces his examination of the questions with which the Established Church is aflame with a letter to that doughty champion of State ascendancy, Sir William Harcourt. The two men are well matched:

they are both hard hitters; they are abundantly convinced; and they are equally masters of an abrupt, virile style of appeal that is admirably adapted to compel assent from a public whose ignorance of the matter in hand is matched by the lukewarmness of its real interest. Mr. MacColl's book covers all the questions at issue. The extreme Ritualists will probably judge the Canon's version of the Anglican teaching on Purgatory and the Mass to fall short of the fulness of the faith; and Roman Catholics will be surprised to learn that the bishops of Elizabeth's creation were invited to assist at the Council of Trent, especially as the author—owing, perhaps, to the haste with which the book has been written—has omitted the circumstance that such an invitation was extended also to the heads of Continental Reformed communities, and with a like limitation, that they might take no part in framing the decrees. But everyone must be interested in the author's deliberate opinion that the average clergyman, let him loose in the world of journalism, is good for £800 a year. (Longmans.)

THE BRITISH ANTHOLOGY. EDITED BY EDWARD ARBER.

This is the beginning of the great task which Prof. Arber has set himself—to present in ten volumes the British Anthology. The whole series is designed to contain about 2,500 poems and songs of all kinds. The three volumes now before us are published out of their chronological order. Properly, the first should be The Dunbar Anthology (1401-1508), the second The Surrey and Wyatt Anthology (1509-1547), the third The Spenser Anthology (1548-1591). Mr. Frowde has chosen to begin with The Shakespeare Anthology (1592-1616), The Jonson Anthology (1617-1637), and The Milton Anthology (1638-1674). The volumes in each case open with selections from the works of the title poet, and pass on to his contemporaries. Thus Milton, in his own volume, is represented by three sonnets—"Lycidas," "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso"—and then two more sonnets. And he is then found again in the centre of The Jonson Anthology, with "Song on May Morning," "On Shakespeare," "At a Solemn Music," and The Nativity poem and hymn. This double appearance is confusing. The work seems to be intended to appeal rather to the general reader than the scholar. We may return to it when the ten volumes are complete and give it detailed criticism. (Frowde. 2s. 6d. each.)

Fiction.

Silver-Point Realism.

The Awkward Age. By Henry James. (Heinemann. 6s.)

MR. HENRY JAMES is the wonderful artistic outcome of our national habit of repression. He has learned how to make repression a factor of art instead of an impediment. To all real things, even those over whose discomfort Sir Francis Jeune presides, belongs an infinite variety of words and gestures whose presence in a publication "there's none to dispute." But they are legible, and, emanating from the things themselves, they witness uncompromisingly to their existence. For the art of Mr. James such words and gestures are enough. Nay, holding aloof as he does, yet without affectation of prudery, from the frank image of an act-in-itself, and dwelling with the thought behind it, he presents a more significant idea of both thinker and doer than were otherwise to be obtained. The Awkward Age is a complex illustration of his method. It is an urban drama of that fast life which, perhaps as a result of its "fastness," produces an atrophying cleverness that has learned to anticipate naïf opinion of its depravity. The members of the little West-end circle, on whose affinity with US Mr. James seems with astonishing affability to calculate, vie with one another in their appreciation of the old-world chivalrous gentleman who sits like a bewildered stranger at their feasts. They have arrived at the point when everything exists as it is conceived to exist. It is not with the eyes of backbiters, but of psychologists, for instance, that they read elopement in Lady Fanny's eyes. In the anticipatory relish of what, for convenience, we will call "sins" they are such epicures that the sin itself, the act-in-being, would be anti-climax. So we ourselves thought as we read through what the plain but polite Briton will consider a masterpiece of ambiguity. We did not want to know if Lady Fanny eloped with her Captain, or if Vanderbank committed adultery with Mrs. Brookenham. The malaria of their atmosphere was accounted for by that delay in accomplishment which means the incessant re-creation of the same fact on the mental plane. The author gains his effect with the minimum of the kind of information which furnishes a newspaper. He knows it is not necessary for things to happen in the sense of making a noise or a rustle.

The story is a sad one, for it traces the gradual development of a tragic sense of the atrophy of which we spoke in two of the only three generous natures with whom it deals. Mr. Longdon, seeing in Nanda the outward counterpart of the woman he had loved in his youth, would have done anything to unite her with the man she loved. But the latter, Vanderbank—he is a portrait worthy to stand by Sir Claude in What Maisie Knew—is incapable of the sacrifice which a combination of futures demands. He has lights and stirrings, he knows what it is to be dissatisfied, but he is too clever to be mastered by impulse. Moreover, he owes allegiance to the girl's mother—that allegiance which may or may not be prejudicial to Mr. Brookenham. With one of those splendid feats of audacity by which Mr. James turns a sudden glare on the lurking badness which he plays the showman to so debonnairely, he makes Nanda beseech Vanderbank not to desert her mother.

"Do stick to her. . . . I don't believe you thoroughly know how awfully she likes you. . . . I suppose it would be immodest if I were to say that I verily believe she's in love with you. Not, for that matter, that father would mind. . . . That's the only thing I want. When I think of her downstairs there so often nowadays, practically alone, I feel as if I could scarcely bear it. She's so fearfully young."

There are few who dare write such a passage, or venture a pathos so supreme bordering on a vulgarity so abject. In achieving Nanda Mr. James has given us a veritable child of the age. But the "awkward age"? It is not very easy to see where that comes in, except that it was awkward for Mrs. Brookenham to own in public a child of nineteen. As for Mrs. Brookenham she is marvellous; her talk radiates the subtlest shafts of femininity. Not less, however, does she emanate a deadliness to which even the lightest of us may accord a shudder, and incline to accept the last irony which leaves no shelter for Nanda from the miasm of polite corruption, save with one who had loved her grandmother and would fain have married her to another man. Let it be added that the style of this study of life is delicate and incisive as of old. The words are picked, but not with gloves: they hold the distinctive nuances which the refusal to use slang confers on words of ancestry on the lips of ladies and gentlemen. Here and there a wonderful bluntness is allowed. One feels it was heard in the soul—is authentic. Charming bits of landscape, alluring glimpses of a sweeter life, occur as occasion arises. Yes, the book is another "Henry James." Let us thank the proprieties, the conventions of this land, the genius of repression, which have created that need for a new realism, delicate as a silver-point, to which his works make so satisfying a response.

Cruel To Be Kind.

Anne Mauleverer. By Mrs. Maanington Caffyn ("Iota"). (Methuen & Co. 6s.)

FROM the point of view of mere craftsmanship the defects of this novel are many—very many. No reader who has ever studied the nature and beauty of the English language can read a single page of it without wincing. Most English readers, however, know little and care less about the use of their own tongue. If a writer has anything to say, that something will be accepted just as readily in its first form of rough ore as if it had been shaped and polished into a jewel of art; but even in England it is the jewels that endure and are preserved. It is impossible to suppose that Anne Mauleverer will endure.

Mrs. Caffyn has always appeared to write with culpable carelessness: this time she sets us wondering whether even the most laborious care could make her a good literary workman. Again and again there are sentences and constructions that would be surely impossible to any person possessing even the rudiments of literary taste—blots which are to her work what aniline mauves and magentas would be to the colouring of a portrait. She uses words without apparent regard to their values, their associations, their social status, or even their precise significance; she strings clause after clause upon an unhappy sentence until the meaning and the grammar are alike lost in a sheer tangle of knots; her narrative is loose, awkward, and at times confusing. All these things, bad as they are, are curable, though in Mrs. Caffyn's case it is no rash prophecy to say that they never will be cured; but when an author, after years of industrious work, shows no sign of an ear for the melodies that make English prose no less than English verse, then it seems sadly improbable that she can ever teach herself, or be taught, to become even a second-rate literary artist. Such a sentence as this (taken almost at random), from p. 249 of her sixth book, is, to say the least, unhelpful:

In her own way, an elusive, non-insistent way, which, however, many men remembered, and often to their cost, Anne was steadily and consecutively breaking the road to this goal, although, so far, John hadn't a notion whitherward he was being bent, or, indeed, that he was being bent at all, least of all by Anne, whose want of balance, more especially in the matter of the Jesuit priest, was just now affording him matter for grave uneasiness.

Yet if we were to conclude that a book written in such a style must be worthless we should be wrong. In the substance, the matter, the informing idea of Anne Mauleverer, there is nothing poor, careless, or second-rate. Mrs. Caffyn possesses the best kind of penetration—the penetration which sees the depths beneath the commonplace, and her powers of characterisation are remarkable. Not even the faultiness of the execution has been able to spoil the masterly conception of Anne herself. If Mrs. Caffyn had been a French instead of an English writer—if, that is to say, she had lived under a high and stern standard of workmanship—Anne Mauleverer might have been, as it ought to be, not merely a fine, but a great novel; as it stands, it is not even fine. It needs rewriting by some journeyman who knows the trade of literature. No imagination would be required of him, and no creative originality—these are here already—but he must have an ear, and some little feeling for the shape, the character, and the historical continuity of his language. When he had done with it, Anne Mauleverer would be a noble work of art. As it is, it is a lump of rough ore.

"If I, in my own person and daily walk, quietly resist heaviness of custom, coldness of hope, timidity of faith, then without wishing, contriving, or even knowing it, I am a light silently drawing as many as have vision and are fit to walk in the same path."

John Morley, in "Essay on Emerson."

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

TALES OF NORTHUMBRIA.

BY HOWARD PEASE.

Mr. Pease's Northumbrian stories have taken their own honourable place in the fiction of localities. In an interesting preface to these fourteen new ones Mr. Pease notes many changes in Northumbria, but he is bold to write: "Still, in the northern blood, the heritage of the 'raid' and the 'foray' abides, and still, as of old, are the children of the Borderland nursed by the keen wind of the moorland and the sea. 'Hard and heather-bred' ran the ancient North Tyne slogan; 'Hard and heather-bred—yet—yet—yet.'" (Methuen. 6s.)

THE VIBART AFFAIR.

BY GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

Another of this agile author's brisk melodramas. In the first chapter a young barrister defends a husband who had murderously attacked a drunken wife. The young barrister himself has a drunken wife, and is in love with another woman. On returning home he finds his wife in one of her worst stupors. "'Dead! He would be free!' something seemed to whisper to him . . ." And the drama has begun. (Pearson. 6s.)

MR. PASSINGHAM.

BY THOMAS COBB.

A very amusing Society story, starting from the point when Lady Dewhurst calls in Mr. Passingham, M.P., to aid her in breaking off her son's engagement to Zelig Trenchard. No one knows the Trenchards except the Fairbairns, "a very poor recommendation" in Lady Dewhurst's eyes. Passingham's good offices take an unexpected turn; and dialogue flows brightly through all. (Lane. 6s.)

A SON OF THE SEA.

BY JOHN ARTHUR BARRY.

Mr. Barry is an Australian writer and the author of Steve Brown's Bunyip. Here he tells the story of Torre Leigh and his progress from ship to ship all over the world. A salt, vigorous tale of a mariner's life, with glimpses of bush life thrown in and soft visions of the South Sea Islands. (Duckworth. 6s.)

"GOD SAVE ENGLAND!"

BY FREDERIC BRETON.

Being "The story told by Gervase Alard, Baron of the Cinque Ports, to refute certain calumnies." This new book, by the author of True Heart, is a romance of Winchelsea and Rye, love and fighting, French and English, in the fourteenth century, at the time men were preaching "the postils of Sire Wickcliffe and John Balle." (Richards. 6s.)

THROUGH A KEYHOLE.

BY COSMO HAMILTON.

"Overheard by Cosmo Hamilton" is the exact phrase on the title-page, and the dedication is "To Patty, dearest under the sun." On the first page we meet a bull-pup named Gargantua and a lazy modern named Richard Mobsby. On the last page Patty says: "Dick, dearest, dearest, dearest," and Gargantua forgets he is a philosopher. Between is much amusing flippancy. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)

A COUNTY SCANDAL.

BY F. EMILY PHILLIPS.

There is nothing lurid or very unpleasant in this story, despite its title. The action is gentle, and the "scandal," which turns on money matters, does but obstruct in order to sauce the coming together of two lovers. A very pleasant tale. (Macqueen. 6s.)

THE COMMON LOT.

BY ADELINE SERGEANT.

Miss Sergeant's new story tells how Ursula "avowed herself the happiest woman that ever lived, and all the happier since she had merged her ambition and her independence in the acceptance of what she used to call, disdainfully, 'the Common Lot.'" (Melrose. 6s.)

ON GOD'S LINES, &c.

BY RAMSAY GUTHRIE.

These stories deal with mining life in Durham, and they bear the motto:

"And souls flash out like stars of God
From the midnight of the mine."

Blackerton, the immediate scene of the various actions, is appalling at first sight. "My wife stood aghast when she looked at the long, evenly-built rows of colliers' cottages, at the great engine-rooms, the gigantic wheels, and the countless chimneys." (Christian Commonwealth Publishing Co. 3s. 6d.)

BY CREEK AND GULLY.

EDITED BY LALA FISHER.

A collection of stories of Australian life, real and ideal, by colonials and pseudo-colonials, &c., among them Mr. Louis Becke, Mr. E. W. Hornung, Mr. Patchett Martin, Mr. Hume Nisbet, Mr. Douglas Sladen, Mr. Marriott Watson, Mrs. Campbell Praed, and "Iota." (Unwin. 6s.)

THAT DUEL AT CHÂTEAU MARRINAC.

BY W. PULITZER.

Mr. Pulitzer once wrote a book called Chess Harmonies, and the duel in this story is fought out on a chess-board—the prize being a fair German beauty who had looked with equal favour on the two antagonists. A pleasant little effort. (Funk & Wagnalls.)

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE MARQUISE.

BY MRS. LOWNDES.

"And what is the use of a book without conversations?" said Alice. This book is all conversations. It is bright and modern. It opens with three widows, and ends with two engagements and a marriage. (Richards. 3s. 6d.)

A LONG ROAD.

BY E. CONSTANCE.

One of the principal characters in this book is called Mortomroyd—which surely is the first appearance of the name in fiction. The heroine is Ella Wolriche, and in every page of the story we draw nearer to the time when she will become Ella Mortomroyd. Among the other personages is Mrs. Prue, an amusing Grundyan, who sincerely considered that not to be married stamps a girl as a social failure. A light, amusing novel. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

LALLY OF THE BRIGADE.

BY L. M'MANUS.

A story of the war of Spanish Succession and the part played therein by the Irish Brigade under Dillon and Bourke, and their valour against Prince Eugene at Cremona. Captain Lally himself tells the story with spirit and humour. It is not all fighting: love and astrology play their part too. (Unwin. 2s. 6d.)

THE GREAT PIRATE SYNDICATE.

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Another story of future warfare, a variant of Mr. Shiel's Yellow Terror. In the present case a wonderful explosive is used, against which all ironclads are powerless. It is the secret of the hero, who by its aid conquers the world for the Anglo-Saxon alliance. This is, of course, not all: there is the customary female and diplomatic element. New explosives can be very wearisome. (White. 3s. 6d.)

MEG.

BY MAUDE CRAWFORD.

A novel of little happenings, little speeches, and little prettinesses. "'Here we are! Is our tea ready, mamma?'" . . . Meg went downstairs with a dizzy, confused mixture of Jim Sparkes, buses, and chocolates whirling in her brain. . . . Molly, oblivious to all else, was deep in Grimm's Fairy Tales." (Macqueen. 6s.)

THE SECRET OF LYNNDALE.

BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

This story opens in a venerable and useful way. Meg Wellington is travelling down to the Midlands to pay a visit to a family known to possess a scandal. A lady who has been dead three hundred years perambulates Lynndale whenever there is someone under the roof who is a disgrace to the family. A readable, melodramatic novel. (White. 6s.)

In the Key of Green.

In facing, not the problems of life, but the world-hieroglyphics of beauty, I am constantly driven to ask myself: "What would Chaucer, or Shakespeare, or Wordsworth say?" I would know, not what is the right action, but what is the right word? A sunset, a seascape, a flower, an interior, will sometimes set the mind on the very verge of some escaping perfection of description. Thus, on entering my room one foggy evening, I met such an elusive challenge in its fire-lit density. The rich glow shone without illuminating; my shelves and books were dim with vague suggestion in an atmosphere thick with light. I fumbled for the word, the word that should match the impression; Mrs. Browning's "luminous round" lacked colour; Mr. Francis Thompson's "purpurate shine" was ugly; Mr. John Davidson's "ruddy varnish"—that was better—that gave the exact consistency of hue that flickered on my books.

But the fog which began to pour into my room—must I be compelled to define its colour by its most inappropriate resemblance to pea-soup? The comparison between city-stained mist and "soup of the evening, so rich and green," was, to say the least of it, ludicrous; and yet it was in fact this very green that prevented its inclusion in George Meredith's fine fog-parallel "the colour of old bruised fruits." I searched in vain among our extremely awkward colour-circumlocutions. Myrtle-green, olive-green, sage-green, peacock-green, apple-green, cabbage-green; none of these approached the special hue I wanted to define. And what remoteness of allusion they involved—what observation they pre-supposed! Bottle-green—how hideous! Sea-green—how vague! To hunt down the right colour-term would seem to require a unique gift of scent, and I began to wonder how our masters of language had, with such inadequate means, met the colour-problem. Poetry, of course, was full of exquisite colour. I glanced idly round my shelves, and felt, growing in my inner consciousness, a chord of green ranging from the palest to the richest tones. Shelley vanished where the green was almost indistinguishable from light, Chaucer shone from the freshest and middle belt, the shade was rich over Keats, and grew sombre with Wordsworth. By what methods had our poets evolved the green of literature? Into what radiant paint-pots had they dipped their brushes? What dainty devices of balance and contrast had they employed? I remembered J. A. Symonds's Excursion in the Key of Blue: what would poetry yield in the Key of Green—green, the colour of Life, in a far more extended sense than flesh-colour.

The crudest method of indicating shades of colour is to qualify one colour-term by another colour-term. Green being artificially manufactured by the mixture of blue and yellow, we find its shades roughly classified as blue-green and yellow-green. Such composite expressions are linked by the loosest of mechanical combinations: it requires a huge effort of will to fuse them into a single idea. At best they suggest a vague transition-stage of a most uncertain quantity. Yet poets have not scrupled to make use of such. Keats speaks of the sea as blue-green; J. A. Symonds, as grey-green; Mr. Gerald Massey gives sea-colour as rich purple-green—a severe tax on mental co-ordination. Since Browning has an olive-pale sea, one wonders what exact shade Mr. Swinburne's "sea-coloured marshmosses" may be. Then Herrick's primrose is yellow-green—an adjective of constant employment in literature. Where gold and silver are used to qualify green colour, the fusion is easier, owing to the more permeating radiance of these metal hues. We get not only appositeness but illumination in Mr. John Davidson's "green-gold of the oak," and in Tennyson's poplar "all silver-green with gnarled bark."

Again, in common speech, shades of colour are often specialised by the use of such adjectives as light, dark; rich, dim; bright, pale. A long period of currency has worn the images of these somewhat thin, and it is rarely in poetry that much reliance is placed on their stress of emphasis. Walt Whitman, it is true, speaks of the lilac's "heart-shaped leaves of dark green"—but it is the shape rather than the colour that impresses our memory. In another passage he speaks of an oak's leaves of dark green: but notice the copiousness of imagination that links these leaves to Shakespeare's "tongues in trees":

I saw in Louisiana a live oak growing;
Without any companion it grew there, uttering joyous leaves of dark green.

This oak finds kinship, too—kinship of joy—with the sun-steeped oaks of mediæval romance. We read of oak leaves in the Flower and the Leaf:

That sprongen out agen the sunne shene
Some very red, and some a glad light grene.

O cheerfulest of colours! The dark leaves are joyous and the light leaves are glad. The author of "The Seasons" apostrophises green as "gay green!" saluting it curiously as "united light and shade." We read of "dim green depths," of "green, palid and sweet," of "bright green," of "deep green," and many another change that is rung on the degree of light and shade that enters into the colour-composition. But it is evident that no great weight is placed by masters of language on this sole method of description.

To produce a lively impression of colour it is not unusual to lay importance on purity of tone—on freedom from shadow of stain. Fresh and new are the adjectives which best fit this intention. Freshness is the idea which O. W. Holmes hunts after where he speaks of the poplar's "pillar of glossy green." The exquisiteness of the adjective fresh was discovered and exploited in mediæval times: new is our more modern and less adequate equivalent. In Chaucer his Emilie is "fresh"; his daisies are "fresh": in "The Romaunt of the Rose" we read of the grass "so freshe of hewe." To-day the daisies are new—"The daisy's frill a wondrous newness wore." Green is new:

Enormous elm-tree boles did stoop and lean
Upon the dusky brushwood underneath,
Their broad curved branches fledged with clearest green
New from its silken sheath.—Tennyson.

The different spirit in which colour is approached in different literary periods may be illustrated from three parallel passages, dealing with the grass. Chaucer writes of "the smale, softë, swetë gras." In "The Seasons" we read: "the vivid verdure runs And swells and deepens." Mr. Meredith gives us:

. . . . The pine-forest dark
Overbrowsing an emerald chine
Of the grass billows.

In the first, colour is taken for granted; we have absolute happiness of simplicity—a closeness to Nature that almost stirs tears. In the second, "a very supreme viridity or glory of greenness" is achieved by effort of language. In the third, what complexity of contrast, what flashing revelation! How mysterious and intense, how gorgeous and ornate, is the Nature of the nineteenth century! Some of our poets are not far short of the sublime intimacies of Chaucer; others find no stone too glorious for the building of Nature's temple—no fire for her altar too remote.

The description of Nature in terms of jewel-metaphor is a departure peculiar to this age. We seek in this manner to give our words both radiance and substance—the substance of seas and fields and trees, sun and moon-transfused. Our sunsets are built of diamond and alabaster; all the precious stones of Revelations shine in our sunrises; our moon-lit landscapes are cut out of pearls; we walk on emerald, and sail on jade. Emerald has, indeed, become a quite common cognomen for intense or luminous green. Have we not the Emerald Isle, with its shamrock

As softly green
As emerald seen
Through purest crystal gleaming?

Thomas Moore.

Does not Mr. Swinburne, in a phrase that recalls Spenser's "more white than snow," speak of sky-colour as being "greener than emerald"? Our woods hold hidden emerald—"A virgin wood discovered twilight gleams of emerald"; our seas are like "burning emerald"—nay, there is actually an emerald sky above us—

Like clouds suspended in an emerald sky,
The ash and the acacia floating hang Tremulous and pale.—Shelley.

—which simile bears some remote analogy to the "green night," wherein the oranges hang like yellow lamps. Examples might, of course, be indefinitely multiplied; but to show how far astray we may be led in the pursuit of the word, we may give one grating instance from Mr. Gerald Massey, who speaks of the "emerald fingers" of the "arch laburnum."

Comparisons of natural objects to jade and beryl are more infrequent. Mr. John Davidson, who is a very careful colourist, gives us in his last volume:

A green isle like a beryl set
In a wine-coloured sea.

We find a jade-parallel in Fiona Macleod. This writer takes a particular delight in colour-studies, and she has given us many elaborate and beautiful pictures. Her northern waters are every shade of green—"yellow-green," "emerald," "dark bottle-green," and the following passage is interesting as showing the extreme difficulty of specialising shades: "With his hand gripping the gunwale, he swayed for some time to and fro, fascinated by the lustrous green beneath the keel—green in the sunlit spaces as leaves of the lime in April, and in the lower, as emerald lapsing into jade, and then as jade passing into the gloom of the pines at dark."

Despite the marvellous accuracy and life of colour in the above, we feel that an over-minutiae of detail somewhat interferes with breadth of achievement. We detect just the faintest suspicion of midnight oil. There is more of nature and of charm in the simplest unstudied description: in "green secluded vales," in "farms green to the very door," in the "green world" of the daffodils. And, indeed, the secret of colour-definition seems to consist in flashing back upon the adjective of colour some vitality or illumination from the noun it qualifies. The later James Thomson speaks of spring leaves as "green flames"—"green flames wave lightly everywhere." Celts call the sap in the leaves "green fire." Oh, mighty rightness of words—the heart thrills to remember them! "Green wind from the green-gold branches"—how mystic and wonderful! "Green fountains, weeping willows"—how pregnant with imagery! It is impossible to foresee of what magic and extension this method is capable. Think of Mr. W. E. Henley's "The wood's green heart is a nest of dreams"; think of Mr. William Watson's "green heart of the waters"; recall Mr. Swinburne's magnificent metaphor:

The sea's green garden-bed,
Which tempests till and sea winds turn and plough.

The final and most wonderful way of all is to suggest colour, not only without qualifying its shades, but without naming it. As the observation of nature becomes closer and more general, and the knowledge of colour more accurate, the special hue of tree and herb will be merely implied, and more delicate distinctions dwelt upon. Our earliest poets instinctively used this method. In some of the most exquisite nature poems of recent years the word "green" is omitted altogether; yet they are permeated by the sensation of green, sun-steeped or rich in shade. "The Nympholept" is full of green; you feel an almost tangible greenness in these lines of Mr. Watson's:

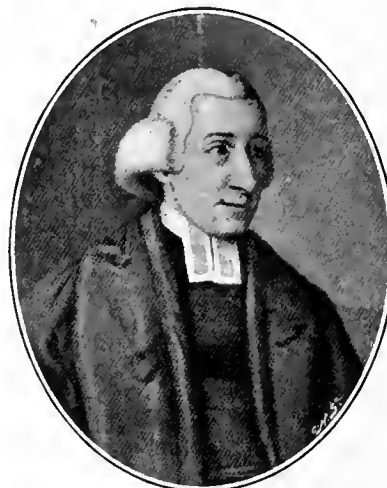

Hoarding the cool and leafy silentness
In many an unsunned hollow or hid recess.

The deer that is pursued of the hunters becomes ever less obvious of characteristic—more radiant and elusive—and it leads us on, ever and further, into the thickets of a more exquisite unknown.

A Schoolboy's Diary.

In the May number of the Gospel Magazine—a number entirely devoted to the honour of Augustus Montague Toplady, the author of the hymn "Rock of Ages"—will be found extracts from a diary kept by the divine when a boy at Westminster School. A more curious document it has rarely been our lot to read.

THE AUTHOR OF "ROCK OF AGES."

One of the first entries states that on Shrove Tuesday, 1751, when the boy was ten and a half (he was born in November, 1740), he wrote another sermon, bringing his total of original sermons to four. Here is a mixed extract from 1752:

My aunt gave me a large black box to keep my writings in. I make vast progress in my book, and have vigorously and industriously endeavoured to do my tasks well. I always pray to my God as I go to my school.—My aunt gave me a seal. My dear mamma gave me a pulpit cloth of white all-a-piece, laced with a broad gold lace.—I always love God, and endeavour to cast away all impurity and all sin whatever. When I was a very little boy I found a pocket-book with clasps, purse, and hinges of solid silver. Before I went to Deptford I had bought out of own money a large strong bookcase, in 1751.

In March he wrote a manual of prayers. Also, the diarist being ill, "my mamma provided me with everything needful, like a kind indulgent parent as she is." On April 7 his mamma told him that he was "as good to her as ten children." He adds the text of the prayers which he was accustomed to offer on the way to school, at school, and on the way home. On April 11 :

My dear mamma, having heard my prayers, cried tears for joy, and said that she hoped I should never leave the right road; and bid me beware cautiously of sin, that God's heavenly grace might be with me. Having thought of some graces I should practise should I survive her: First, I must beware of impatience, that is, murmuring at her death, and despairing of God's lifting me up again; therefore I must keep a heart of thanksgiving and faith: thanksgiving, in praising Him for sparing the life of mamma so long as to instruct me in the right paths; and faith, in reliance on His good providence that He will mercifully assist me, and give me the comfort of His upholding consolations.

On May 16 :

I hear that my grandmamma said that my mother would bring me up a scourge to herself. This is the love of my grandmother, who before my face pretended kindness, but behind my back could stab me, by taking away my reputation with my mother. I went to my uncle Jack's: he never asked me to sit down (very rude).

But worse is to come from Uncle Jack. Aunt Betsey was also a scourge to the boy, and we find him continually affronted by her. Thus on July 15: "Went to Aunt Betsey's, who set forward a most dreadful quarrel, calling me names, &c., &c., &c., &c., &c. . . . Mamma made it up." On another occasion he "received a most abusive letter from Aunt Betsey."

This is a birthday entry :

I am now arrived at the age of eleven years—namely, Nov. 4th, 1752. I praise God I can remember no dreadful crime; and not to me but to the Lord be the glory. Amen. It is now past eight o'clock, and now I think fit to withdraw, but yet my heart is so full of divine and holy raptures, that a sheet of paper could not contain my writings.

On August 15 he records that during the year Coke (the evil son of a Justice of Peace) and several others have "popt off." And now for a difficulty with Uncle Jack, concerning those precocious sermons :

I carried two or three of my sermons to show to my cousin Kitty, as she had often desired me: my uncle took hold of them, and read part of one, and asked: "who's I got them out of?" I told him nobody. He shook his head, and said, "he knew what children can do before now." I still urged that I really did not take them out of anyone, but they were my own. He bid me hold my tongue, and not make it worse by denying it. "You cannot persuade beyond my senses; you know they are not yours, for you have taken them out of Bishop Andrews" (a fine bishop, truly, to make no better sermons than these!). He went on, "If you were my boy I would flay you alive" (a fine friendly expression from an own uncle!) "for doing such things and fetch the truth out of you." "Sir," says I, "it hath been the great care of my mamma, who hath laboured with me night and day, to avoid lying. I hope I scorn it, and I am sure I do in this particular." Well," says he, "I have no business with it."

The year 1753 began unfavourably. On January 27 his Aunt Betsey sent for him, flew at him, and beat him sadly. On the 31st his mamma was in "a very ill temper"; and on February 13 in "a most terrible temper." Aunt Betsey, however, improved: "March 4th. —A whole holiday; preached a sermon before my Aunt, on Isaiah; 16, 17 verses. She gave me a shilling." On March 10 he had a "rash bad hard slap" from his usher. April 29 :

The prayer I said on the last day of April: "Most benevolent Lord of all things, who governs Thy chosen servants with the sceptre of mercy; look on me, O my Lord and my God; dispose my heart every way to what is strictly just and pious; guide me with thy Holy Spirit, so that I may spend the approaching month in equity and purity. Grant, O most merciful Father, that no accident nor casualty may happen to me this new month, but protect and keep me, O God of my salvation. Amen."

This is the next entry, with a welcome little touch of boyishness at the end of it :

May 6th.—Went to the Presbyterian meeting house, but I had enough of it. Oh the beauty there is in the religion which is established (among us); so sweet a liturgy creates devotion in every breast. My aunt gave me a great hunk of cake.

On May 15 he records an escape from drowning the year before. He had been seized by cramp, and would have sunk but for some rushes. "Bob Trimmer told me if I had been drowned he would have got me out. Said I, 'I thank you, but it would have done me more good if you had got me out while I was alive; afterwards my friends could have got me out.'"

In September Aunt Betsey had a relapse. The entry for the 2nd says :

Went to Aunt Betsey's. She is quite out of the way. She is so vastly quarrelsome; in short, she is so fractious and capacious and insolent that she is unfit for human society. Read the Bible; mamma one chapter and I another; and read also the Pilgrim's Progress. Poor mamma is a little out of temper.

On the 8th there is this perfect expression of candour :

Mrs. Stapleton came to our house, whom I treated with a pot of my plum jam. If I had known she would have taken it I would not have offered it to her.

On the 15th he collected some of his old prayers together. On the 16th, the last day of the holidays, he prayed a good while. And then comes a surprise: "October 8th.—Sat up late about my farce, which I intend to show Mr. Garrick, master of Drury Lane Playhouse. It is called 'Cyorone.'" Of the fate of the farce we are not told, but in December he carried an entertainment of his own making, called "The Shepherds' Dispute, or Rural Queen," told in verse, to Mr. Garrick, and was told to call again with it. Finally here are two entries :

Nov. 29th.—Lord Norris promised me to go with him to see the lottery drawn to-morrow.

Nov. 30th.—Was dressed on purpose to go with the dishonourable Norris till twelve o'clock, who promised to be at our house by nine. Fate defend me from such noble-men.

Unfortunately, the whole document is not printed. Toplady, although he was not conspicuous for humour, must have smiled in after life at these early confessions.

Toplady, we might add in conclusion, was editor of the Gospel Magazine in 1775-6, and it was to its pages that he contributed "Rock of Ages." His remains (recently brought to light during the excavations for the new church on the site of Whitefield's Tabernacle in the Tottenham-court-road) have been re-interred in the foundations of that building, beneath the floor of a large room, to which the name Toplady Hall has been given.

The Oak and the Willow.

An oak and a willow grew by a stream, and they quarrelled as to which was the greater and more useful; but no one could decide.

A poet came and praised the oak, but he sat in the shade of the willow; a painter made a picture of the willow from beneath the oak. In time both were cut down. The best of the willow made a cradle, the best of the oak a coffin.

And now who will decide?

Was Bacon a Poet?

MR. SIDNEY LEE will not, we hope, rank us as touched with that Baconian craze, in the quite superfluous criticism of which he spends so much of his valuable time, if we suggest to him some qualification of his statement that Bacon was not a poet. It is true that the only poetry published under the philosopher's name in his lifetime was a small volume of paraphrases from the Psalms made in his sickness. These are not much: but they have a sober dignity of their own: and what more can you say of Milton's paraphrases from the Psalms, or Vaughan's or Sidney's, and Sidney's sister's—excellent or tolerable poets all? Bacon must, however, have written much more poetry than this; for there are references to him as a poet, both by his contemporaries—George Wither, for example—and in his own letters. In one place he certainly seems to include himself among "concealed poets." On this the Baconians put their own interpretation. Probably what it does mean is, that he wrote verse for the delectation of his private friends, which was given to the world, if at all, only under the veil of anonymity. To be a poet has often been thought slightly disreputable for a budding statesman. Who shall say, then, how often the Ignoto of the Elizabethan miscellanies conceals the identity of the author of the Novum Organum? Fortunately two copies of verses have come down to us which bear, on fairly good authority, Bacon's signature; and these we print, in order that readers of the ACADEMY may decide for themselves on Bacon's claim to be called a poet.

I.

The World's a bubble, and the Life of Man
Less than a span:
In his conception wretched, from the womb,
So to the tomb;
Curst from his cradle, and brought up to years
With cares and fears.
Who then to frail mortality shall trust,
But limns on water, or but writes in dust.
Yet whilst with sorrow here we live opprest,
What life is best?
Courts are but only superficial schools
To dandle fools:
The rural parts are turned into a den
Of savage men:
And where's a city from foul vice so free,
But may be termed the worst of all the three?
Domestic cares afflict the husband's bed,
Or pains his head:
Those that live single, take it for a curse,
Or do things worse:
Some would have children: those that have them, moan
Or wish them gone:
What is it then, to have, or have no wife,
But single thralldom, or a double strife?
Our own affections still at home to please
Is a disease:
To cross the seas to any foreign soil,
Peril and toil:
Wars with their noise affright us; when they cease,
We are worse in peace;—
What then remains, but that we still should cry
For being born, or, being born, to die?

II.

The man of life upright, whose guiltless heart is free
From all dishonest deeds and thoughts of vanity;
That man whose silent days in harmless joys are spent,
Whom hopes can not delude, nor fortune discontent;
That man needs neither tower nor armour for defence,
Nor secret vaults to fly from thunder's violence.
He only can behold with unaffrighted eyes
The horrors of the deep and terrors of the skies.
Thus, scorning all the care that fate or fortune brings,
He makes the heaven his book, his wisdom heavenly things,
Good thoughts his only friends, his wealth a well-spent age;
The earth his sober inn,—a quiet pilgrimage.

Our own notion is, that this is by no means despicable poetry. It is not a bit like Shakespeare's, of course; but it has vigour of expression as well as elevation of sentiment. In particular, the second piece has some uncommonly fine lines, and fairly ranks with the other classical poems on the same theme, with Wotton's "How happy is he born and taught," Herbert's "Constancy," Vaughan's "Righteousness," and Wordsworth's "Happy Warrior."

Things Seen.

A Child I Knew.

HE was disciplined in the nursery, petted in the drawing-room, and silently adored in the school-room. There the young governess taught the elder brothers (themselves barely in sight of their teens) and there the little four-year-old boy alighted for a serious half-hour every day. He was told Bible-stories and played (under cunning guidance) with ivory letters. He wore a white sailor-suit, with a large square blue collar down his back for the curls to rest on. Short white socks nestled against his brown legs. His skin was brown, his hair browner, and his eyes brownest of all. He was too pretty to be put on a far-off chair, so he sat astride on the governess's knee and smiled at her closely—and asked questions such as, "Where does God live?"

"Up above the sky," was the conventional answer, "and one day we shall go there too."

"But how shall we be able to climb up?"

"God will help us."

Then (really puzzled and practical): "But how shall we take our boxes?"

"We sha'n't need any boxes."

"But what shall we do for clothes?"

The startling reply: "We shall need no clothes," silenced the prattling tongue. The child's eyes fell. He had caught a glimpse of Modesty.

He liked stories about heroes, and his whole face glowed as he heard of deeds of courage and adventure. His heart leaped out towards a hero, and eagerly he would ask: "Is he dead?" "Yes, long, long ago," the governess would answer with mixed amusement and regret. The radiant face would darken and the sparkle seemed to fade from the eyes. He had caught the first glimpse of Death.

That question was asked more hesitatingly as the weeks went on. At last he seemed to understand that all great and good people were dead. He had learned Acquiescence.

A Critic of Literature.

I WAS staying at Bwlch-fyllin, a village in a corner of Wales. The landlord of the inn, though a native of the place, had spent some years in Liverpool, and posed as a man acquainted with the wider world. In the evening as we chatted he said to me: "I should judge, sir, that you had read a good deal; now, what would you think of the writings of Parry?" I knew Parry as a delineator of Welsh rustic life and character; my questioner was watching me with great curiosity, so I gave a very guarded reply, intimating that I would prefer to have the opinion of an intelligent Welshman as to the qualifications of the novelist in question. The landlord's face assumed a judicial air, and he said: "Perhaps you are aware that Parry places his stories in the little village of Llinkirrie, an insignificant hamlet a few miles from here, and far less important. Now, since Parry has written of that one-horse little place, visitors to this part of Wales have begun to stay at Llankirrie, instead of stopping here at Bwlch-fyllin. Of course, this makes a difference to my trade, but you must not think that for that reason I am biased against Parry's writings. Only I think that if a man is content to write about a miserable little hole like Llankirrie, he can't have anything to say worth reading."

Bwlch-fyllin is credited with 503 inhabitants, Llankirrie with 491.

An Interlude.

A DULL, dry, sunless afternoon in a northern suburb. From my window I look in an idle moment across the way, where behind a hoarding a number of workmen are engaged with hod and trowel on a new block of flats.

All at once the scene is invaded by a brisk photographer with his apparatus, which he plants, with much circumstance, on a favourable patch of ground.

At last he is ready, and twenty men range themselves in front of the camera. Strange transformation! They are no longer workmen only, but men individualised—twenty different faces, some mobile, others rigid, many sheepish, and a few jaunty. They try attitudes, copy each other, are eager and excited. Every man confesses something of his history. They are men with mothers and habitations. I am conscious of their homes, their Sunday suits laid away, their pigeons and their politics. A wave of sympathy ripples over me as I survey These, who were automata, stand up as human beings, vital, uneasy, vain, and rather lovable. There is a sudden fixity in the crowd! Then the photographer is marching away almost before the men have shaken their eyelids, and soon twenty are bricklaying like one.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

SINGULAR delusion of the relatives of an illustrious writer that the sweepings of his desk after death are necessarily of value! Some time ago M. Léon Daudet wrote a really interesting book about his father. In that it was to be presumed the son had reverentially gathered all that remained of Alphonse Daudet—all the fugitive notes and comments on life which, transmitted by the son's hand at such moment, had for us a pathetic significance. Now comes Mme. Daudet with a singularly dull and worthless volume, Notes sur la Vie—the sweepings, as I have called them, of her husband's desk. The book has no literary, human, or documentary raison d'être. It cannot even charitably be described as a pot-boiler, as we are not aware of any pot to boil. The vanity of such a publication is all the more inexplicable as Mme. Daudet is a lettered woman, and should be able to distinguish between what interests her through devotion and bereavement, and what can in decency claim public attention. This volume does not contain a single sentence worthy of Alphonse Daudet. It is all that we are accustomed to imagine that vivid and vital nature was not—dull, trivial, and vapid. Read these notes on London, and contrast them with Mme. Daudet's. Those tell us nothing, are effaced and commonplace; even the visit to Mr. Meredith, which ought to have furnished such excellent copy to a writer like Daudet, is a bit of cheap and fugitive reporting. On the other hand, Mme. Daudet's Notes sur Londres was a piece of delicate impressionism of high artistic value. And the famous Caravane, of which Daudet prophesied so much! Ah, well, we need not regret that he died before it was completed. These opening pages are not of a nature to shorten our hours of sleep with longing. A drearier start could not well be conceived. Think of the lovely pages that have been written of Venice, and turn to the feeble banalities here recorded! No, it was not fair to the Daudet we cherish to publish such worthless stuff. As for the philosophy of the Notes! Well, the Petit Chose, down in his dreadful school, might have drawn from his raw, unhappy youth precepts and proverbs as profound as these trivial utterances of age, only be sure he would have uttered them with far less pretentiousness, and on his infantine lips their freshness would have charmed us. Where, for instance, was the necessity for reprinting this remark, which Daudet has never ceased to weigh upon in every autobiographical volume—a fact we are as familiar with as we are with one of our own peculiarities:

What a marvellous machine for feeling I have been—above all, in my childhood! At a distance of so many years, certain streets of Nîmes, through which I have scarcely passed a few times—black, cool, narrow, smelling of spices; the druggist, Uncle David's house—return to me in a distant concordance, so vague of hour, of colour, of sky, of sound of bells, of exhalations of shops. Must I have been porous and penetrable; impressions, sensations to fill a lot of books, and all with the intensity of dreams.

This is his mood when he is subtle and cynical:

What we say, what we think, and what we write. Three conditions of the same plank, three aspects of the same fact. I say: "Madame is—a drab. All Paris has known her favours." [A free translation of the untranslatable!]. I think: "Where is the proof of my statement in these days of gossip, and universal and repercussed back-biting?" Having to write of this same person in a letter or an article, I write: "Charming woman, kind and intelligent, the honestest creature of the world." And yet I say I am not a liar!

Villa Tranquille is the new novel of M. André Theuriet. Ever since M. Bourget congratulated him in public on belonging to a land, M. Theuriet is rivetted to the mountains and provincial life. To peep into Paris, unless it be on his way to a railway-station, is to destroy the charm. The hero reverses the order of the hero of Boisfleury, also a mountain and provincial study. The latter started in Savoy, and went up to Touraine. Here Robert forsakes Touraine and goes down to Savoy. For the rest the atmosphere and life are the same. Annecy, boating excursions, mountain walks, parties, young people, gossip, slander, flirtation, and unhappy loves. The descriptive passages are pretty and winning, but the psychology is of a very conventional kind. A dreadful, detestable mother who ruins her son from spite; a beautiful, devoted, frail fair one to whom the son clings; a booby of a hero, and an amiable young girl. Without the landscape these would not go far.

M. Henri Rabusson gives us this week another study of a dreadful and detestable mother to match M. Theuriet's, only this one is not content to ruin her son from spite. Because he is a philanthropist, desires to benefit his workmen, and to marry a virtuous young girl not of his world, but of doubtful parentage, the hard and despotic mother has him locked up in a lunatic asylum. Where money and marriage are concerned, I can believe almost anything of the French bourgeoisie. There are practically no limits to the steps she would take to put a spoke in the wheel of generosity for the preservation of family fortune, no measures in her eyes too harsh to prevent an injudicious love-marriage. So Griffes de Chimère may possibly not be an exaggerated picture of an implacable bourgeoisie, who would prefer to have her sane son locked up in a lunatic asylum rather than free to marry a girl without a dowry, and give his workmen an interest beyond mere wage in his factories.

Mon Régiment Russe, by Art Roë, is an elevated study of military matters; refreshing, like an oasis in the desert, are these pages of dignified inspiration and delicate reverie.

Memoirs of the Moment.

Mrs. BRYDGES WILLYAMS, who has given £5,000 to the Prince of Wales's Hospital Fund, is, despite her Welsh name, a dweller in Cornwall and a member of the Jewish community. She is, in fact, a sister of Sir Edward Lawson. But her name has yet another association, the most interesting of all. A bearer of her name—the Mrs. Brydges Willyams of fifty years ago—made Disraeli very happy by opening a correspondence with him, and announcing that, in admiration for his brilliant achievements as a member, by descent of the Jewish race, she intended to leave him such of her fortune as was under her own control. It was a considerable sum, though not quite so large as public rumour said; and it came at a most opportune time to the politician, who never used politics to enrich himself. Lord Beaconsfield wrote to Mrs. Brydges Willyams while she lived a series of delightful letters of political and social gossip, which will no doubt be some day published; and when she died she was buried, by her own request, in the vault at Hughenden which was later to receive all that was mortal of her political hero and of Lady Beaconsfield.

APPROPOS of the Turner pictures at the Guildhall, the old tale of Turner's having assured Mr. Ruskin that he read meanings into his pictures has been again revived. Newspapers, as we know, have made a good deal of talking by reading meanings into the speeches of politicians—against the advice of Lord Rosebery—and there is nothing to prevent a spectator from importing as many interpretations as he likes into a landscape, whether in nature or on a canvas. But that Mr. Ruskin, knowing Turner as he did, should have attributed to him this, that, and the other intention is less than credible, only to be repudiated by the painter, is incredible. The people who tell the story show precisely that want of wit which they attributed to Mr. Ruskin; and as a matter of fact the supposed conversation between painter and critic is purely legendary. The story has been publicly repudiated by Mr. Ruskin in a footnote, and he has applied to it a word rarely found in his vocabulary—"vulgar."

AFTER all that has been written about the health of Leo XIII. by newspaper correspondents who went out to Rome to report his death and did not like to own their personal defeat to the ultimate extent, some interest attaches to a candid and close observer's disinterested opinion. Cardinal Vaughan, who has long known the Pope, and who has had several long audiences during his present stay in Rome, states in a private letter to a friend in London that he has been astonished at the Pope's vigour, both of mind and body, and that he has taken, to all appearances, a new and good lease of life. The Cardinal himself has been reading lately in the papers that he is to be the "favourite" at the next conclave, and, therefore, the next Pope. "What nonsense the newspapers do sometimes print" is the Cardinal's only comment on the much-telegraphed report.

AN invitation went forth last week to the students of the Schools of Art in London. It was a little poster, and it was youthfully and frankly headed "Desecration of St. Paul's." Unity of opinion seems as far off about even a headline as it is about the decoration of the dome, and Sir William Richmond may get all the comfort he can from the objection at once urged by one dilettante student who shied at the word "desecration" as too bold for presentation to a Dean. "I will not sign that, no gentleman could," he ventured. "We shall ask only artists," came the stifling retort. So the first blood was drawn in the home camp before the battle against the Dean began.

Thus has it been from the preface. So it will be to the end of the chapter—till the end, in this matter, let us hope, of the Dean and Chapter. The poster that began with, "desecration" went on to arraign in round terms the vulgarity of the whole scheme of Sir William Richmond's so-called "decorations," and ended with an invitation to the various art schools of London to send representatives to a small preliminary meeting to be held last Saturday afternoon at 20, Fitzroy-square, W., the rooms of a student at the neighbouring Slade School, Mr. A. Rothenstein. The invitation was sufficiently heeded, despite the cricket grounds of a sunny Saturday afternoon.

THERE were speeches, and very good speeches too; and an executive committee was appointed to draw up a protest to the Dean. This it has done, and the first draft, which is marked "under revision," runs as follows:

VERY REVEREND AND DEAR SIR,—We, the undersigned art students of London, beg leave to approach you on a matter which deeply concerns all its citizens, and particularly concerns us who have the beauty of Wren's masterpiece as a continual inspiration in our work and life.

Let us submit that our youth, far from disintitling us to an opinion, gives us a special claim to be heard. It will be ours to live longest under the tyranny of disfigurements which those who are responsible for the "decoration" of St. Paul's unhappily seek to impose on posterity.

Such decorations as these, out of harmony as they are with the building, must disturb that spirit of devotion Wren sought to inspire.

Most emphatically we would protest against the act of desecration which, perverting the original structural lines to a new decorative motive, violates the unity of the fabric and insults the memory of the illustrious architect whose monument it is.

Nothing less than a complete removal of the whole of the lately added decorations can restore to the Cathedral its original beauty. And it is for nothing less than this complete removal that we petition you, having the honour to subscribe ourselves, Very Reverend Sir, your Petitioners.

If this protest, which has already had the approval of many men of letters, is approved by the art students of all the Schools, it will be signed and then carried by the petitioners in procession for delivery at the door of the Deanery.

The Year of Jubilee.

WHEN o'er the land rebellion rolls—

The land of love that owns our sway—

When tumult canopies our souls,

Like vapour that conceals the day,

My strength is this—to you and me

Will come a Year of Jubilee.

Then shall our thoughts be freed from sin,

And all our felon fancies shriven;

The harvest shall be gathered in,

The folk be fed, the foe forgiven,

When full of grace to you and me

Returns our Year of Jubilee.

For so to all true wedded sprites

A fairer pleasure comes of pain,

Because their love renews delights

And turns their harm to health again:

Our strength is theirs—for you and me

Comes back a Year of Jubilee.

And so we must reject the lore

Of rogues who would revile the power

Of love that makes us more and more

The heirs of things beyond the hour,

Where still is stored for you and me

Another Year of Jubilee.

For a Village Library.

THE librarians of New York State have been asked to furnish lists of the fifty books of 1898 which they deem to be most suitable to be added to a village library. The selections were based upon a list of 500 issued by the New York State Library, and an examination of these has resulted in a final "best fifty," which we give, together with the number of votes accorded to each book.

Anthologies.

SIR,—In a recent issue you named several excellent anthologies of British poetry. You may care to be reminded of the two collections made by the late Mr. W. J. Linton, the great engraver, and husband of Mrs. Lynn Linton: (1) English Verse, in five volumes, edited by Linton and Mr. R. H. Stoddard; (2) Golden Apples of Hesperus, privately printed by Linton himself at his Appledore Press, at New Haven, Conn. Linton as poet and critic has been too much overlooked.—I am, &c.,

KINETON PARKES.

The Library, Nicholson Institute, Leek: May 4, 1899.

"Dulce Cor."

SIR,—The Scots Pictorial is rather late in its discovery of the fact that "Ford Bereton" is S. R. Crockett. In 1894 Mr. Crockett said to a New Age interviewer: "In 1885 I published Dulce Cor under the name of Ford Bereton. Only 500 copies were issued, and I see foolish people are offering a considerable sum for a copy. It is a young man's work. I was just twenty-five then." I may add that the etching in the volume is one of Mrs. Crockett by MacGeorge, who did the sketches in the Stickit volume. Mrs. Crockett is the daughter of George Milner, author of Studies on the Coast of Arran.—I am, &c.,

T. S. KNOWLSON.

Wilmslow, Manchester: May 6, 1899.

[Another correspondent, writing to the same effect, quotes Mr. Crockett's own account of the book, as printed in the Idler for July, 1895: "Altogether we were abroad for a year, and during that year I wrote many verses. Perhaps one-third of my book of poems, Dulce Cor, was written during that year. The Ford Bereton poem was written at the foot of the Matterhorn."]

Some Odd Coincidences.

Our Literary Competitions.

RESULT OF No. 31.

LAST week we quoted a coincidence narrated by the late Lord De Tabley in a letter to Sir Mounstuart Grant Duff, and we asked our readers for similar occurrences from their own experience, true and compactly related. A very interesting batch of odd conjunctions has resulted. The most curious is that contributed by Mr. Thomas Constable, but its length is so considerable that it can hardly be held to conform to the condition as to succinctness. We have decided to divide the prize. One half belongs to Mrs. Locker, 11, West Hill, Highgate, for this amusing and artistically satisfactory record of fact:

In October, 1892, my husband and I went to Brussels. On our first day there we noticed that most of the trams carried a large advertisement of Kemmerich's beef-juice (I forget the French for beef-juice). Approaching one of the principal squares we came upon an important-looking equestrian statue. "Whose statue is that?" I asked. To which my husband, by way of a joke, replied: "Oh, that's Kemmerich, the beef-juice man." When we came close enough to read the inscription we found it was Godfrey de Bouillon.

The other half belongs to the sender of the following coincidence (will he please repeat his name and address?):

Many years ago, while paying a visit in Glasgow, I went to a ball there. On leaving the ball-room I took from the attendant in the cloak-room a silk hat which next morning I discovered was not my own. Glasgow has, I have no doubt, at least a hundred hat shops. Without selecting any one in particular I entered one, by chance as it were. While in process of having myself fitted with a new hat, a gentleman came in, and addressing one of the salesmen, he said: "I took the wrong hat from a ball-room last night, and I must have a new one." I crossed the shop to him, saying "Excuse me. Is this your hat?" "Of course it is," said he. "Is this yours, pray?" It was, and thereupon we exchanged hats and civilities, said "Good morning" to the two open-mouthed and disappointed salesmen, and departed.

This is Mr. Constable's remarkable experience :

Some ten or twelve years ago I received a letter with the superscription : "Mr. Thomas Constable, Post Office, Uckfield." I, not unnaturally, opened it—as I had never heard of any namesake within my postal district—and found that it contained a cheque for between £300 and £400, payable to Thomas Constable by Messrs. Layard Bros. There was no date or address at the head of the letter, but the envelope bore a New York post-mark. The letter, in substance, ran as follows : "Dear Tom,—As my boat may go to the bottom, I'll send this by the Europa for fear of accidents. It's all I'm worth, and it will be something for you all if I don't claim it.—Your affectionate brother, J. (or T.) Constable." The letter was written hastily in pencil in an unformed hand that I thought must probably be the hurried writing of my youngest brother James, who had been mining at Kingston, U.S.A., for some years. I was surprised at his method of communicating his little (unsuspected) fortune to me, nor did I know he was leaving Kingston; but I thought it better to take the cheque personally to the bankers in London. I showed them the letter, but they could throw no light on it. They offered, however, to cash the cheque for me. I declined this offer, and took the cheque and letter to Uckfield, where the banker used also to be the postmaster. He seized upon both letter and cheque, saying that the owner of both had just been there in an awful state at not finding them. The next day I had a call from my namesake to thank me for my honesty, and to heap more surprises on me. He had been working for some time on a neighbouring claim to my two brothers at Kingston, knew them both intimately, and gave me their latest news. He was born in my parish, and had sent the letter, which he had facetiously written to himself, to Uckfield as being well known to him in his childhood and youth. He had imagined that as he put "post office" on his letter it would await his return. [T. C., Buxted.]

There follow as many other records as we can find room for :

On July 24, 1890, one of my Queer Stories, "John Spragthorpe, the Ranching Agent," was published in Truth. It was suggested by a telegram of two or three lines in the Standard, announcing that one of two young English farm-pupils had been found dead in America under circumstances which pointed to foul play. The details of the affair did not come out till the trial, some months after my story had appeared, when, curiously enough, the facts were found to coincide so nearly with the fiction that Truth was actually charged with the responsibility of the crime, "which," to quote from a letter of remonstrance written to the editor, "was clearly put into the head of the murderer by reading the story"! Coincidence No. 1.

In 1898 a lady whose acquaintance I had lately made called at my house, and in the course of conversation said : "I have been reading your Golf-Madness, and other Queer Stories, and, of course, in 'John Spragthorpe, the Ranching Agent,' recognise the tragedy with which my son was so nearly connected." I expressed surprise, and she then told me that the fellow-pupil of the murdered man who had barely escaped the same fate, and who, as chief witness at the trial, had been mainly instrumental in bringing the murderer to justice, was her son! Coincidence No. 2.

The day on which this conversation took place proved to be the very day (July 24) on which, eight years before, the story had appeared in Truth! Coincidence No. 3.

CHAPTER I.

In East Bengal I knew (and liked) a Bengali whose face was as rectangular as this page. He was "Special Sub-Registrar of Islamabad."

CHAPTER II.

On a crowded steamer in West Bengal I was approached by a smiling Bengali whose chin was abnormally square, and, vaguely reminiscent, I asked : "And of what district are you, sir, the Special Sub-Registrar?"

CHAPTER III.

The surprised and surprising reply was : "Your honour I am Special Sub-Registrar of Navadwip."

Yet Special Sub-Registrars are not selected because their chins are square. [J. D. A., Ealing.]

Two friends, Mrs. A. and Mrs. B., had lost sight of one another for some years, and Mrs. A. had tried in vain to discover Mrs. B.'s whereabouts. A mail-steamer was wrecked, but the mails were ultimately recovered, and after some delay Mrs. A. received a letter which had been contained in a submerged mailbag. The envelope had evidently adhered closely, when wet, to another letter, and its blank side bore a more or less clear impression of reversed writing. This writing, when held up to a looking-glass, proved to be the name and address of Mrs. B., with whom, by this means, communications were successfully re-established. [I. F. R., Hertford.]

Many years ago, when a lad, I drove to catch the Irish mail express at Rugby, intending to cross to Ireland. My horse "ibbed" when near the station, and I had the mortification of seeing the train go on without me, and I consequently missed the corresponding boat. I went on by a later one, and conversed with a gentleman on board for some time when nearing Irish coast. He asked where I was going to. I said : "Bray, in Wicklow." He said : "So am I, to see my mother." I asked name. He told me. I said : "Then I am your brother!" Tableau. He had been abroad many years with his regiment, and had forgotten his school-boy brother, who, of course, had also lost all remembrance of his elder brother. [G. E. B., Ascot.]

Replies received also from L. E., Bndleigh Salterton; S. R. M., Glendevon; A. B. M., Eastbourne; W. C., London; E. S. B. (no name enclosed), Woodford; G. R., Aberdeen; G. E. M., London; A. E. C., Brighton; S. E. G., Bridlington Quay; H. C. W., London; G. N., Bristol; W. C. F. A., Sheffield.

Competition No. 32.

WE ask this week for an original list of twelve chapter headings to an imaginary sensational novel. They must be explicit enough to be alluring, yet not explicit enough to forestal the pleasure of surprise; and they must carry the story forward to the end. To the compiler of the best list a cheque for a guinea will be sent.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, May 16. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the last column of p. 544 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given : we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

THE DAY OF RECOMPENSE. THE DAY OF RECOMPENSE.

Illustrated by A. TWIDLE.

The SPEAKER, writing of Mr. Hocking's last work, "God's Outcast," says: "Mr. Silas Hocking has long ago proved his merit as a writer of excellent fiction, but we do not remember any work of his in which such special excellence is displayed. This powerful and effective story is likely to meet with the appreciation that is its due, inasmuch as the deep feeling and unforced pathos which distinguish it form a very refreshing contrast with the artificial cynicism of modern fiction in general. As wholesome in tendency as it is interesting in treatment, the book is one to be thoroughly enjoyed by all readers whose taste for healthy novels has remained unspoiled by the neurotic outpourings of younger writers."

FORTUNE'S TANGLED SKEIN : A NOVEL.

By JEANETTE H. WALWORTH.

"A delightful story, founded on a murder mystery, yet by no means of the gory or gruesome order. The writer deserves congratulation on her work, especially for the manner in which she keeps up the excitement without breaking out into the sensational vein. The characters are natural and cleverly drawn, varied in design, they yet harmoniously blend to form a striking picture."—Dundee Advertiser.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

1. NEW SUBSCRIPTION PRICE FOR THE WHOLE WORK.
2. REISSUE IN MONTHLY PARTS.

A NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES; FOUNDED MAINLY ON MATERIALS COLLECTED BY THE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

EDITED BY

DR. J. A. H. MURRAY,

With the assistance of many Scholars and Men of Science.

Already Published:—Vols. I. and II., by Dr. MURRAY; Vol. III., by Dr. MURRAY and Mr. BRADLEY. In course of publication, Vol. IV., by Mr. BRADLEY; Vol. V., by Dr. MURRAY.

The following announcement is made under the authority of the Delegates of the Oxford University Press:—

The OXFORD DICTIONARY, when completed, will consist of from 12,000 to 13,000 pages, contained in Ten Volumes. Of these Volumes, Three have been issued, and the Fourth and Fifth (of which many Parts and Sections have appeared) will be completed in 1900. Half of the entire work will thus be finished with the century; the second half (Vols. VI.-X) will be produced more rapidly than the first, so as to reach the end of the alphabet in 1909.

All the present forms of issue will be continued, and at the original price, which was fixed so low that each page costs the purchaser less than a halfpenny—no more than the page of any other large Dictionary.

But the determination of the extent of the work has made the following new arrangement possible:—

* * * Up to December 31st, 1899, the delivery of the Entire Work, as and when published, carriage paid to any address in the United Kingdom, may be secured by the payment, through any bookseller, of the sum of SEVENTEEN POUNDS (£17) net cash.

This payment will entitle the purchaser to receive, according to priority of application, Vols. I.-III. in half-morocco, and the remainder of the work either in quarterly Sections as published, with the publisher's cases for binding, or in complete bound Volumes, as may be preferred.

* * * Those who have purchased the portion of the DICTIONARY already published, may secure delivery of the remainder on similar terms by a proportionate payment of £9 10s. net cash.

Further, to suit the convenience of those who may desire to commence subscription in instalment for the DICTIONARY—

A new Issue, beginning with the letter A, will be commenced on July 1 next. It will be in monthly parts, each of 88 pages, at a published price of 3s. 6d.

The OXFORD DICTIONARY is the largest work of the kind. Each page contains more reading matter than the page of any other. The Century Dictionary, the next largest, has 7,046 pages, and this number will be nearly doubled by the OXFORD DICTIONARY.

A special feature of the OXFORD DICTIONARY is its wealth of illustrative quotations. If, as a specimen letter, D be examined in the OXFORD DICTIONARY and in other publications, the result is striking.

NUMBER OF QUOTATIONS UNDER "D" IN DIFFERENT DICTIONARIES.

	English Dictionaries.			American Dictionaries.
	Dr. Johnson's.	The Oxford.		The Century.	Funk's "Standard."
Total words recorded under D	2,684	19,051	...	10,705	...	11,181
Words illustrated by quotations	2,136	16,128	...	4,977	...	1,313
Number of illustrative quotations	6,529	85,446	...	12,471	...	1,815

The Times, reviewing that part of the OXFORD DICTIONARY in which this table was given, said "The figures go far to explain the immense difference in scale and thoroughness between the great Oxford work and any other of the kind."

Gradual publication in parts is the necessity of all large Dictionaries, and has the advantage of placing the latest results of research before the public without delay. As each part of the OXFORD DICTIONARY is produced the corresponding part of other Dictionaries becomes obsolete.

The makers of no other Dictionary have had before them the same collections from the wealth of our language. Before the printing began upwards of mainly under the directions of the Philological Society, had furnished three and a half millions of quotations from the works of 5,000 authors, two scholars alone contributing 301,000. It would be useless, if it were possible, to calculate the cost of a Dictionary when its material has been accumulated by the labour of an army of voluntary workers.

1,300 READERS,

IN OTHER REVIEWS THE TIMES SAYS:

"No recommendation of ours is now needed for a work which has been universally recognized by scholars as the first Dictionary which has ever attempted to treat the English language with anything approaching to scientific completeness. In three points at least the Dictionary has no rival. These are:

First—The scientific treatment of etymology;

Secondly—The historical continuity of language;

Thirdly—The precision of reference in the illustrative passages quoted.

It would be hyperbolic to say that it is perfect in these respects—absolute perfection is beyond the reach of human endeavour—but it is nothing more than the bare truth to say that it is incomparably superior to any other work of the kind in the English language."

"As a complete thesaurus of the English language, as an historical survey of the genesis, structure, and development of English speech from its literary infancy down to our own day, the Dictionary is simply unrivalled."

Professor W. W. SKEAT (in the Academy):—"We have only to urge upon all who are interested in this national work that they should buy a copy of any part of it, and they will soon discover that it is worth their while to buy the rest. It is not only extremely useful, but extremely interesting. Many of the longer articles are quite readable, and the illustrative quotations, ranging in date from 1100 to the present date, represent every important author known to English literature during the last eight centuries."

Order Forms and Prospectuses on application.

The Literary Week.

THE Poet Laureate is truly very unfortunate. His latest poem, a madrigal, written for the ceremony at Kensington on Wednesday, has been widely quoted, but only on Thursday did the accurate version find its way into print. The Times then made it public, but with an almost strained impartiality the wrong version was quoted in the report of the ceremony in an adjoining column. The disparities are striking, the errors in the first draft almost ruining the sense. The reason given—rather an artless one under the circumstances—is the distance from England of the Poet Laureate's present residence.

THE late M. Sarcey was a great dramatic critic; but one thinks of him, after all, as the untiring man of letters. His weekly article was a Paris institution. Its absence was an event, an event so rare that in forty years it happened only twice: once, in 1884, when M. Sarcey underwent an operation to save his eyesight, and again when he lay down last week to die. He died in harness, with an unwritten article on his mind. He died a journalist's death, if ever man did. "I must get up," he said to his doctor; "it is absolutely necessary that I should write my article. I will do only a demi-feuilleton, if I must, but I must do it." A few moments later he returned to this fixed idea. "I shall go again and see 'Le Torrent' [playing at the Théâtre Français]. I am afraid this piece is not well understood. It has not been rightly judged." These were Francisque Sarcey's last words; he had no sooner uttered them than he entered on the last struggle.

DR. CONAN DOYLE's letter in the Chronicle complaining of the system which enables one man to review the same book in several places has been the subject of discussion this week wherever literary men have been gathered together. Dr. Doyle fixed on Dr. Robertson Nicoll as his awful example. Dr. Nicoll defended his position with firmness and skill, but without disposing of Dr. Doyle's objection. His contention that people had but to consult Who's Who to penetrate the mystery of his various pseudonyms was not much to the point, since it can hardly be asked of the public that before reading a review they should run to a year book. Where the reviewer is a sound critic and an honourable man such pluralism is not very serious; where he signs his name it is absolutely harmless. But few editors, we may remark, would willingly send a book to a critic whom they knew was writing of the same work for another paper.

WE might add that the suggestion has been made that a critic, provided he is honest, should be allowed to praise a book as often as he wishes to, but to condemn it only once. Merciless logic would probably destroy this proposition, but there seems to be something in it.

THE cult of Omar Khayyam has reached in America the nadir of absurdity. It is now being translated into dance, and New York society rejoices night after night over the antics of Miss Isadora Duncan, who, surrounded by rose petals, pirouettes to the accompaniment of Fitzgerald's stanzas. The performance should be given in the Woodbridge Town Hall. It might there meet with the criticism, in sturdy Suffolk, that it deserves.

THE statement that Mr. W. J. Fisher will succeed to Mr. Henry Norman's position as assistant editor of the Daily Chronicle is not strictly accurate. Mr. Norman and Mr. Fisher have for some time been co-assistant editors: Mr. Fisher now becomes sole assistant editor.

VERY many people will be glad to learn that the Delegates of the Oxford University Press have decided to issue their New English Dictionary by subscription in monthly parts, beginning in July.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "I lately picked up, for the sum of 6d., a Hudibras—edition of 1720—on the fly-leaf of which is the signature of which the following is a tracing:

Sam^r Johnson
Feb. 4th 1747

Can you tell me if this is, or may be, Dr. Johnson's signature? If so it would be of considerable interest, owing to the admiration he expressed for Hudibras."

WHEN an author writes a book to prove something, it is music to him to hear that he has made converts. But the music rarely comes with such speed and volume as it has done to the ears of Canon Malcolm MacColl in the case of his book, The Reformation Settlement. The following is from the Guardian: "Canon MacColl has received letters from forty members of Parliament who had intended to support the Bill, saying that the result of reading his book, The Reformation Settlement, had been to induce them to either vote with the Government or walk out of the House." Disconcerting to the Whips!

MR. GEORGE MOORE'S speech at the Irish Literary Theatre banquet might be called a postscript to his introduction to The Heather Field. As usual, Mr. Moore was not without his shillalagh, and he hit round with vigour. The particular skull which came in for injury was Mr. Kipling's, for in order sufficiently to extol the genius of Mr. Yeats the speaker found it necessary to execrate someone else, and he chose the author of The Seven Seas. In his excess of zeal the value of his eulogy was lost. It is odd how reluctant a certain variety of mind is to realise that things may be different in kind and yet equal in merit. There is no actual need, for example, in praising Esther Waters to abuse, say, Rejected Addresses.

THE readers of Truth have recently been asked to name the twenty best books in the world. A consensus of the replies published in a recent number reveals this selection, in the order given :

The Bible.	Carlyle's French Revolution .
Shakespeare.	The Imitation of Christ .
Homer.	Boswell's Johnson .
Paradise Lost .	Pickwick .
Vanity Fair .	Tennyson.
Dante.	The Arabian Nights .
The Pilgrim's Progress .	Virgil.
Gibbon's Decline and Fall .	Molière.
Ivanhoe .	David Copperfield .
Robinson Crusoe .	The Vicar of Wakefield .

MR. C. KEGAN PAUL'S little book of gentle, thoughtful, poems, On the Way Side, which has just been published by the firm which bears his name, has the following prefatory note :

The verses here gathered together record some memories of pleasant travel, and some graver thoughts reflecting the sentiment of the hours in which they were written. These are not necessarily the expression of permanent opinion, any more than the places in which we sojourned were our real home.

The above lines were written some years ago. Since then ill-health has put an end to bodily travel. The sonnet called "The End of Wandering" indicates a still completer cessation of spiritual vagrancy, one for which I am more and more grateful each day that I live.

This is the sonnet :

THE END OF WANDERING.

Except in thee I find no resting-place ;
 Except in thee I find no help from sin :
 Beauteous thou art without, beauteous within,
 Mistress of virtue, channel of all grace.
 Through clouds for many years I saw thy face,
 And heard thy gentle voice that strove to win
 Thine erring son, but sounded faint and thin,
 As his who calls from topmost cliff to base.

I turned, self-willed, to walk in pathways drear,
 Now dark, now led by gleams, and yet the while
 I climbed unknowing ; all at once is clear,

My Mother meets me with her gentle smile :

"I watched thee long, my son, I bade thee come.
 Here is thy rest, and here thine only home."

THE art pendulum is indeed swinging back when we find a young modern illustrating the British poets, and exhibiting them at a Bond-street gallery. Mr. Byam Shaw is a forceful, if a somewhat amorphous, personality, and an industrious painter ; but we cannot bring ourselves to any great regard for his Academy picture called "Love the Conqueror," or for his illustrations of passages from the poets at Messrs. Dowdeswells'. His taste in literature is commendable and catholic—Shakespeare, Suckling, Browning, Tennyson, the Rossettis, Clough, and Kipling—but there is an early Victorian robustness about some of his illustrations that shocks the trained eye. Does Mr. Byam Shaw really think that his horror on a bicycle gazing furtively at a gaudy sky and a willow-pattern-plate landscape is a pictorial representation of

God's in His heaven—
 All's right with the world ?

Or that his bland and opulent beauty reclining on a sofa in a sumptuous room illustrates Christina Rossetti's

They praise my rustling show and never see
 My heart is breaking for a little love ?

Yet Mr. Shaw can be reticent and artistic when he chooses. There is grace and refinement about his illustration to Rossetti's

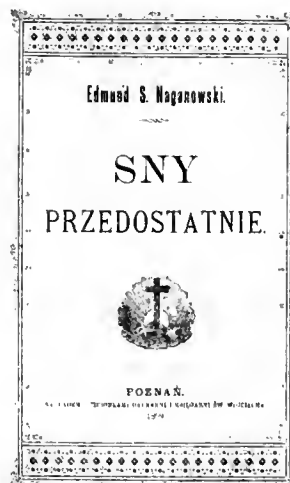

He's drawn her face between his hands
 And her pale mouth to his.

And there is dignity, a dignity that reminds us of Mr. Watts, about his rendering of Browning's

. . . Thus God might touch a Pope
 At unawares, ask what his baubles mean.

But Mr. Shaw needs chastening. He is so clever and so industrious that no doubt before long he will learn the value of reticence, and suggestion, and delicacy. Then he will spare us some of the pictures that adorn this exhibition, which are on all fours with the literary priggism of a passage in which he explained his picture called "The Comforter": "It is quite possible for a man to be fond of a good horse and to dress decently and still have Christ for a friend."

WHO, we wonder, among our readers can guess what is contained in the book of which we here reproduce the title-page? To cut short their suspense, let us state that Sny Przedostatnie is a Polish translation of Mr. Coulson Kernahan's parable, The Child, the Wise Man, and the Devil. The translator has, with the author's consent, taken certain liberties. He has added two original chapters, and has turned the whole into rhythmic prose. The story, we understand, is causing some sensation in Poland.

SIDE-LIGHTS on the war-ridden condition of American literature are offered by the playful Kiote. To be the hero of a girl's novel to-day, it avers, one must enlist and be killed at Santiago. Also it assures its readers that the Kiote is the only periodical now extant which is not printing war matter. "We have no great generals among our contributors."

COUNT TOLSTOI's new story, "The Awakening," which is now appearing serially in this country, was offered to M. Brunetière, editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes, as a feuilleton. While recognising its power, M. Brunetière refused the novel on the grounds of unsuitability of subject. The exalted character of the central idea could not, he said, atone for the selection of so offensive a theme. The theme, briefly, is the moral regeneration of a woman who has been living a life of shame. Probably what most French readers would object to would be the idealism of the book rather than the subject.

COUNT TOLSTOI AT WORK.

EVERY year sees one or more additions to the store of Birthday Books. The latest is The Edna Lyall Birthday Book (Eyre & Spottiswoode) which has been compiled by Miss (or Mrs.) A. F. Dorman. Some idea of the wealth of ideals enjoyed by Edna Lyall's works may be gained by a glance at these pages. If everyone whose name is inscribed therein succeeds in living up to the sentiment on the opposite leaf the world will appreciably improve.

THE first of the monographs on Mr. Kipling has reached us—Rudyard Kipling, by G. F. Monkshood (Greening)—the preface to which contains a kind and reasonable letter from the victim himself on Mr. Monkshood's proposed act of vivisection:

There are so many ways in which a living man can fall from grace that, were I you, I should be afraid to put so much enthusiasm into the abidingness of print until I was very sure of my man. . . .

Please do not think for a moment that I do not value your enthusiasm; but considering things from the point of view of the public, to whom after all your book must go, is there enough to them in anything that Mr. Kipling has written to justify one whole book about him?

THE book, now that it is published, should, however, give its subject pleasure; for Mr. Kipling likes young men and Mr. Monkshood, who seems to be young, is very keen and cordial. His criticisms are often, perhaps, a little too obvious, but they have some shrewdness too. Here is a passage:

The writers that have influenced Rudyard Kipling are, chiefly, William Ernest Henley, James Thomson, Bret Harte, Macaulay, Defoe, Dickens, the compilers of the Bible and Rudyard Kipling. William Ernest Henley "showed him the way to promotion and pay" and helped him to chant "The English Flag" and "A Song of the English"; James Thomson brought home to him the awesome things that exist in "The City of Dreadful Night"; Bret Harte drew his attention to the literary picturesqueness of vagabonds; Macaulay flashed the spark that fired his genius for proper names; Defoe taught him the trick of using minute details and exact terminology to gain verisimilitude; Dickens inspired him to sympathise with the lowly, and to see the humour that dwells in small things; the compilers of the Bible gave him a large share of his diction, and showed him the value of a cunning simplicity, and Rudyard Kipling gave him his irony of the understatement, his flash-light powers, his craftsmanship, his industry, invention, insight, and ability to make a dream come true and a lie seem something else.

ANOTHER example of the unfamiliarity with books in which some booksellers are expert is furnished by a correspondent, who encloses a postcard from a well-known firm, announcing the new publication, by the Vale Press, of "Hand and Soil," by D. G. Rossetti, reprinted from The Gem."

IN the new instalment of her reminiscences in the Atlantic Monthly, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe tells the story of her "Battle Hymn of the Republic." On the way back from a review, it seems, her carriage was compelled to move very slowly, on account of the press of soldiery:

To beguile the rather tedious drive, we sang, from time to time, snatches of army songs; concluding, I think, with "John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the ground; His soul is marching on."

The soldiers seemed to like this, and answered back: "Good for you!" Mr. Clarke said: "Mrs. Howe, why do you not write some good words for that stirring tune?" I replied that I had often wished to do this, but had not as yet found in my mind any leading toward it.

I went to bed that night as usual, and slept quite soundly, according to my wont. I awoke in the grey of the morning twilight, and, as I lay waiting for the dawn the long lines of the desired poem began to twine themselves in my mind. Having thought out all the stanzas, I said to myself: "I must get up and write these verses down, lest I fall asleep again and forget them." So, with a sudden effort, I sprang out of bed, and found in the dimness an old stump of a pen, which I remembered to have used the day before. I scrawled the verses almost without looking at the paper. I had learned to do this when, on previous occasions, attacks of versification had visited me in the night, and I feared to have recourse to a light lest I should wake the baby, who slept near me. I was always obliged to decipher my scrawl before another night intervened, as it was legible only while the matter was fresh in my mind.

At this time, having completed my writing, I returned to bed and fell asleep, with the reflection: "I like this better than most things that I have written."

It is curious to contrast the inception of the song with the conditions under which it was to be sung. The author while composing it feared to light the candle lest she should wake the baby. The mission of the "Battle Hymn" was to cheer fighting men above the roar of cannon and the crack of musketry.

MR. JOHN LATEY, who has conducted the Penny Illustrated Paper for many years, has been appointed editor of the Illustrated London News. Many of the readers of that journal remember with affection Mr. Latey's father—Mr. J. L. Latey—who preceded Mr. Shorter in the editorial chair, and under whose able guidance the Illustrated London News grew into prosperity and influence.

THERE must now be an end of speculation in the public press as to who is Fiona Macleod. The lady who uses that name has protested. "I am much annoyed," she writes to her publishers, Messrs. Constable, "at this continued identification of myself with this or that man or woman of letters—in one or two instances with people whom I have never seen and do not even know by correspondence. For what seems to myself not only good, but imperative private reasons, I wish to preserve absolutely my privacy. It is not only that temperamentally I shrink from and dislike the publicity of reputation, but that my very writing depends upon this privacy. But in one respect, to satisfy those who will not be content to take or leave, to read or ignore my writings, I give you authority to say definitely that 'Fiona Macleod' is not any of those with whom she has been 'identified,' that she writes only under the name of 'Fiona Macleod'; that her name is her own; and that all she asks is the courtesy both of good-breeding and common sense—a courtesy which is the right of all, and surely imperatively of a woman acting by and for herself."

WITH reference to the performance last Monday of FitzGerald's adaptation of Calderon's "Vida es Sueno" ("Life's a Dream"), an extraordinary statement has been going the round of the London press—to the effect, namely, that "this is the first time that a play by Calderon has ever been put upon the English stage." What could the writer of that sentence have been thinking of? There was a period in our theatrical history when nothing was more common than an adaptation of one of Calderon's numerous dramas. George Digby, Earl of Bristol, produced no fewer than three. Sir Samuel Tuke went to the Spanish writer for "The Adventures of Five Hours," and Killigrew went to him for his "Parson's Wedding"; while some of the best things in Wycherley's "Gentleman Dancing-Master" came from Calderon. Assuredly, Calderon has not been introduced to our theatre by "Life's a Dream."

"Books about the books one appreciates make an irresistible appeal." Do they? They may at first; but does not the time arrive when they become a reiterated nuisance? We are promised a volume on Mr. Pickwick's Kent. I have no doubt it will be read by very many with interest, not to say rapture. For myself, I can only testify that I am "real tired" of Mr. Pickwick and everything concerning him. Has not Mr. Percy Fitzgerald written a History of Pickwick, its Characters, &c.? and has he not followed that up with a brochure on Pickwickian Manners and Customs? Is there not a little book of Tales from Pickwick? Indeed, has not the name of Mr. Pickwick been drummed into our ears for many a year gone by? Let him rest in peace, say I; but your Dickens worshipper, I fear, will turn a deaf ear to the prayer.

Mr. Francis E. Murray, it seems, wants people to tell him in what periodicals certain of Mr. Austin Dobson's lyrics appeared before they were published in book form. At first blush you would suppose that Mr. Dobson himself could give the information; but that does not follow. An author is often the worst possible authority about his works. It is only your very vain amateur who keeps annotated copies of the first sprightly runnings of his fancy. Mr. Murray's Bibliography of Mr. Dobson will be very welcome to some of us. It was anticipated in February, 1896, by a long article which appeared in the Bookman, but that article did not profess to go into the minute details which, no doubt, will constitute the main value of Mr. Murray's performance.

No one can object to the promised anthology of Irish Poets. Of Scottish poets the anthologies are numerous; it is only right that their Irish brothers and sisters should be that way celebrated. Hitherto England has calmly annexed such Irish lyrists as she took a fancy to, but there must be no more of that particular injustice to Ireland. Mr. Halliday Sparling led the way with his Irish Minstrelsy; then came Mr. Yeats with his Book of Irish Verse. One may, from a certain point of view, regret these sectional publications, which do but emphasise the fact that the English, the Scotch, and the Irish have markedly different characteristics in literature as in life. But what is the use of trying to disguise or ignore the extent of those differences? Race, like murder, "will out."

At least one of the readers of my notes last week appears to think that I take some pride in not having read any of the works of the late Mrs. Marshall. That is not at all the case; I regret that the opportunity did not come my way, the more so as my correspondent tells me that Mrs. Marshall's stories were read, admired, and praised (especially for their good English) by such excellent judges as Walter Pater, J. A. Symonds, and John Nichol. I am also assured that books by Mrs. Marshall have appeared in the Tauchnitz series, and have been translated into many foreign languages—a fact which shows that she had a very large audience indeed.

I trust it is not true (as stated) that Mme. Sarah Grand is going to call her next novel Petticoats. We have already had from a lady novelist a tale named Petticoat Loose—a title sufficiently disturbing. Anyway, let us pray that the line be drawn here.

The Autobiography of Mrs. Oliphant.

Autobiography and Letters of Mrs. Oliphant. Edited by Mrs. Harry Coghill. (Blackwood. 21s.)

Mrs. OLIPHANT was a survival among us from the ranks of older novelists, though her wonderful energy made her also a novelist of the present. And her life also is a life of the old school, has the quiet domestic savour of the 'forties and the 'fifties. Unfortunately it is both incomplete and fragmentary. Written in the form of a journal, and the earlier portion superadded after the later, it has cost some ingenuity to arrange it—a task the editor has accomplished very well, allowing for the difficulties. Moreover, the last twenty and more years of the author's life are left unrecorded. Her pen broke down when she reached the period of her final misfortunes, and she had no heart to proceed further. The editor has, therefore, added a selection of letters to supplement the autobiography—a task which inevitably they very imperfectly fulfil with regard to the terminal gap.

Such as it is, the record is a welcome one. It has not much of the interest which one usually expects from such a life. Mrs. Oliphant's existence was singularly retired, and such literary personages as she mixed with were mostly of the second rank. Only here and there do we get a glimpse of a Carlyle, a Kinglake, or a Tennyson. She esteemed herself a bad observer; and here, certainly, she does not show the gift of setting a personality on paper or recording characteristic touches. The interest of the book lies elsewhere—in its unaffected portrayal of a typical English gentlewoman's life during the middle century, peacefully absorbed in children and husband. It is a little epic of the domesticities.

Born in Lasswade, her father a Wilson, her mother an Oliphant, the family presently drifted to Liverpool, where she passed the years of her girlhood, and wrote her first novels. Of her mother she gives a loving picture, with her energy, her sarcasm, her power of narrative, only paralleled by that of Mrs. Carlyle. Evidently it was from the mother she inherited the literary temperament.

She had a sweet, fresh complexion, and a cheek so soft that I can feel the sensation of putting mine against it still, and beautiful liquid brown eyes, full of light and fun and sorrow and anger, flashing and melting, terrible to look at when one was in disgrace. . . . She had read everything she could lay hands upon all her life, and was fond of quoting Pope, so that we used to call her Popish in after days.

She dwells on her brother, too, in the childish Lasswade days:

How bright he was then, how good always to me, how fond of his little sister!—impatient by moments, good always. And he was a sort of god to me—my Frank, as I always called him. I remember once weeping bitterly over a man singing in the street, a buttoned-up, shabby-genteel man, whom, on being questioned why I cried, I acknowledged I thought like my Frank. That was when he was absent, and a mother's anxiety reflected in a child's mind went the length, I suppose, of fancying that Frank too might have to sing in the street.

George Eliot has also recorded a child's worship of an older brother, and has told us that if she could have her choice of states she would elect to be "a little sister." Nay, is it not set up for the world's love and understanding in Tom and Maggie Tulliver? But alas! Mrs. Oliphant shows us this same all-deified Frank broken and senile in the final refuge of her house; tended for duty's sake, indifference grown between them, the old love run out through the fissures made by separation, separate troubles, separate loves. So it is; to the brother succeeds (with most girls) the adored school-companion; to the girl-friend, the lover and the husband; to the husband, the child: love always in flux, ever running, for ever changing its channel. So it is, and very sadly so. There is no permanence in these early ties, that seem so strong; they are but preparatory and provisional. Are all ties, indeed, provisional for this world merely, and the ultimate of love in another world? That is too deep a question, and far away from young Maggie Oliphant.

In the maiden days at Liverpool there is one little episode we must quote; for it is an ingenuous glimpse of a girl's feelings at the first conscious dawn of sex.

When I was sixteen I began to have—what shall I say?—not lovers exactly, but one or two people about who revealed to me the fact that I too was like the girl in the poets. I recollect distinctly the first compliment . . . which gave me that bewildering happy sense of being able to touch somebody else's heart—which was half fun and infinitely amusing, yet something more. The speaker was a young Irishman, one of the young ministers that came to our little church. . . . He had joined Frank and me in a walk, and when we were passing and looking at a very pretty cottage . . . embowered in gardens and shrubberies, he suddenly looked at me and said: "It would be Elysium." I laughed till I cried at this speech afterwards, though at the moment demure and startled. But the little incident remains to me . . . like a picture suffused with a soft, delightful light: the glow in the young man's eyes; the lowered tone and little speech aside; the soft thrill of meaning, which was nothing and yet much.

Nothing, truly, and a poor little conventional speech. But it strikes the keynote of this autobiography, which is essentially a woman's story; and they who can find nothing significant in the little home-things which make the life-story of a typical woman are hereby warned from it.

There came an actual engagement at seventeen—a foolish little affair with a dull young man, who went to America, and had a dull little lovers' quarrel with his quick-hearted betrothed, which he did not make up. It broke her heart, which did not much matter at seventeen, when hearts are very reparable; and was worth the cost, to escape from a rash marriage. Finally, she married Francis Oliphant, her cousin, and removed to London, where her mother in no long time died. There she did not meet very notable people—the S. C. Halls being a fair type. Of the alleged original Pecksniff and his wife she writes thus:

Mrs. Hall had retired upon the laurels got by one or two Irish novels, and was surrounded by her husband with the atmosphere of admiration which was the right thing for a "fair" writer. He took her very seriously, and she accepted the rôle, though without, I think, any particular setting up of her own standard. I used to think and say that she looked at me inquisitively, a little puzzled to know what kind of humbug I was, all being humbuds. But she was a kind woman, all the same. . . . He was certainly a humbug of the old mellifluous Irish kind—the sort of man whose specious friendlinesses, compliments, and "blarney" were of the most innocent kind, not calculated to deceive anybody, but always amusing. He told Irish stories capitally.

Of Miss Muloch she relates that the author of John Halifax had an annoying habit of fixing one's eyes in conversation, as though she were trying to read one's soul. Mrs. Browning, she says, did the same when she met her in Rome. It was, thinks Mrs. Oliphant, a trick common to the "intense" school of that day. But with a woman so utterly sincere as Mrs. Browning we can hardly conceive the explanation true.

Then came her husband's illness, and his death in Rome. For a time things went sorrowfully with her; but the woman was of immense elasticity and courage. In the very crisis of her difficulties, the Blackwoods fighting shy of her work, she rallied and produced the first of a series of novels which more than restored their faith in her. Her cheerfulness returned, and we find her joining Miss Blackwood in wicked girlish play upon poor Aytoun—are not his Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers still stock inclusions in all compilations for reciters? Of the second-hand Macaulay kind, but they serve.

Miss Blackwood had asked him to dine with us alone . . . and we flattered him to the top of his bent, she half-sincerely, with that quaint mixture of enthusiasm and ridicule which I used to say was the Blackwood attitude towards that droll, partly absurd, yet more or less effective thing called an author; and I, I fear, backing her up in pure fun, for I was no particular admirer of Aytoun, who was then an ugly man in middle age, with the air of being one of the old lights, but without either warmth or radiance. We got him between us to the pitch of flattered fatuity which all women recognise, when a man looks like the famous scene-painter, "I am so sick, I am so clever"; his eyes bemused and his features blunted with a sort of bewildered beatitude, till suddenly he burst forth without any warning with, "Come hither, Evan Cameron"—and repeated the poem to us. Miss Blackwood, ecstatic, keeping a sort of time with flourishes of her hand, and I, I am afraid, overwhelmed with secret laughter. I am not sure that he did not come to himself with a horrified sense of imbecility before he reached the end.

It is the one instance of a cleverly touched-in little sketch in this volume. One can picture the wretchedly happy Professor, and the two wild-spirited young women. But wild-spirited Mrs. Oliphant was not in herself, though always cheery; and her sketches, from the artistic standpoint, suffer by their ever-present good nature. She sees all men in rose-colour. Another Roman journey brought the death of her only girl, Maggie—a terrible blow to her; and going on to Paris she met Montalembert.

M. de Montalembert struck me as the most delightful, benign, and genial of men, when I saw him first; but afterwards I used to say that he was one of the few men I was afraid of, and that he had a fine way of picking one up as on some polished pair of tongs, and holding one up to the admiration of the world around, in all the bloom of one's foolishness.

There were two candidates for the Academy, and she asked him, rather sillily, whether there were two vacancies or two candidates for one vacancy . . . when he turned to the company and called their attention to the orderly, temperate, English mind, in which there was no rush at a prize, but well-balanced competition of two, as I had suggested. There was a great deal of laughter, in which, of course, any shy explanation of mine was completely drowned.

She is rather hurt over this very harmless little jest, so manifestly devoid of "ridicule," of anything except good-natured banter. She has, in fact, a little shy sense of her own dignity and right-reverence, and betrays an amusing half-grudge against George Eliot's overwhelming superiority in reputation. "If I had but possessed leisure, there might (of course, I don't say there was), there might, perhaps, have been a George Eliot in me," is the sore little feeling sub-expressed—never actually uttered—throughout her autobiography. She has a quaint sketch of poor, forgotten, brilliant, ineffectual Father Prout, with an old lady "about whom he hovered":

A very dauntless, plain-spoken old person in old shiny black satin and lace, and looking as if everything was put on as well as the satin—hair, teeth, and everything else. I don't know whether there had been anything wrong in the connection—it was certainly patriarchal then—they were so old and such bons camarades. . . . It was wicked of me, I fear, but it amused me to think that these old people had perhaps indulged in a grande passion and defied the world for each other. I thought no worse of them, somehow, which I am aware is a most immoral sentiment. . . . She bade her old gentleman sing me his great song, "The Bells of Shandon," which he did, standing up against the mantelpiece, with his pale head, like carved ivory, relieved against the regular garniture de cheminée, the big clock and candelabra. He had a fine face with delicate features, almost an ascetic face, though his life had not been exactly of that description, I fear. He was an unfrocked priest, and I think was one of the Fraser group.

He was, with Maginn and Thackeray—Maginn, the Captain Shandon of Pendennis. It was not till after her return to England and settlement at Windsor that she saw Tennyson.

I have always thought that Tennyson's appearance was too emphatically that of a poet, especially in his photographs; the fine frenzy, the careless picturesqueness, were almost too much. He looked the part too well; but in reality there was a roughness and acrid gloom about the man which saved him from his over-romantic appearance.

In taking leave of Mrs. Tennyson, she went through the "established ritual" made and provided for such feminine occasions.

Tennyson was standing by, lowering over us with his ragged beard and his saturnine look. He eyed us, while these pretty speeches were being made, with cynical eyes. "What liars you women are!" he said. There could not have been anything more true; but, to be sure, it was not so civil as it was true.

Later, in his old age, she saw him under his genial aspect. When the Tennysons having lost Lionel and Mrs. Oliphant her eldest-born, Cyril, her first proceeding was, of course, to sit herself by Mrs. Tennyson's sofa and to cry. Mrs. Tennyson, old and incredibly worn, did not cry, seeming "as if she could weep no more." Of Carlyle she saw little, but was most favourably impressed by him. Of his wife she saw much, and defends her with enthusiasm against the accusations so often made. She will have it that they were more harmonious than biographers allow. She writes in '66 to Dr. Story:

I have had a little visit from Mrs. Carlyle, who is looking very feeble and picturesque, and as amusing as ever; and naturally has been taking away everybody's character, or perhaps I ought to say throwing light upon the domestic relations of the distinguished people of the period. I was remarking upon the eccentricity of the said relations, and could not but say that Mr. Carlyle seemed the only virtuous philosopher we had. Upon which his wife answered, "My dear, if Mr. Carlyle's digestion had been stronger, there is no saying what he might have been!"

Which has meaning for readers of Froude. An even fervid letter comes from Mrs. Carlyle regarding the Life of Edward Irving.

Darling Woman,—I do long to see you, to tell you, not what I think of your book, but what Mr. C. thinks, which is much more to the purpose. I never heard him praise a woman's book, hardly any man's, as cordially as he praises this of yours! You are "worth whole cartloads of Mulochs and Brontës and THINGS of that sort." You are "full of geniality and genius even!" "Nothing has so taken him by the heart for years as this biography!" You are really "a fine, clear, loyal, sympathetic female being." The only fault he finds in you is a certain dimness about dates and arrangements of time—in short, I never heard so much praise out of his head at one rush! and I am so glad! . . . Believe that I love you very much, and try to love me a little.

Which may be put to the credit account of the "bitter little woman," as she seemed to Rossetti. And it means that Carlyle admired Irving, and must have been in an agreeable digestive state. Upon it, nevertheless, we may pause. For the mass of the book can nowise be represented by quotation, being the voluble, outpoured narrative of a mother's joys and sufferings. She saw her husband and all her children one by one taken from her, and was left over twenty weary years alone with her memories. She worked with constant bravery to support not only her own fatherless children, but a stricken brother and his three children. The record of it is touching and taking in a high degree. Quite artless, it has all the sincerity of a woman's talk to herself—even to the lax overplus of words and the little frailties of occasional grammar.

Myth, Ritual, and Religion.

Myth, Ritual, and Religion. By Andrew Lang. "Silver Library." 2 vols. (Longmans. Each, 3s. 6d.)

MR. LANG'S Custom and Myth is already included in the "Silver Library," and one is glad to have his Myth, Ritual, and Religion in the same convenient and inexpensive form. The book is one which most certainly no student of the dim beginnings of cult and worship can afford to neglect. It stands with Mr. Frazer's Golden Bough, Prof. Rhys's Hibbert Lectures, and Prof. Jevons's Introduction to the History of Religion, in the very front rank of recent English contributions to the literature of this fascinating branch of anthropology. Mr. Lang's treatment is, of course, a little discursive; but his main theme is that the mythologies of civilised peoples, and in particular of Greece, contain certain savage elements—and, notably, certain elements of beast worship—which go to show that the races which framed them must have passed through a mental condition exceedingly similar to that of existing savage nations of the present day. This argument he develops with his usual lucidity and wealth of humour, and with much lore concerning both ancient and modern forms of belief. One could have wished, indeed, that he had extended his scope to include those Celtic and Teutonic mythologies which are at once more interesting in their relation to letters, and, as Aryan, more illustrative of Greek problems, than any learning from Egypt or Mexico can be.

However, the interest of the present reprint of Myth, Ritual, and Religion is even less in the importance of its main position than in its relation to the author's recent work on The Making of Religion. In that book Mr. Lang took up a line with regard to what he called the "high gods of low races," which brought him into conflict with the general tendency of anthropological speculation, and caused him to be represented as holding out the white flag to orthodox theology. Briefly, his reasoning was as follows: According to the anthropologists, the idea of God was developed from an earlier belief in spirits, and especially in the ghosts of dead relatives, beheld, or thought to be beheld, by primitive man in dreams, and worshipped by him as protectors or possible enemies: A god is nothing but a magnified dead chief or medicine man. Criticising this view, Mr. Lang pointed to certain tribes in a very backward state of civilisation who yet appear to believe in a god, the maker of all things and the guardian of morality, without having passed through the earlier stages of the evolution posited by the anthropologists. His strongest, though by no means his only case is that of the aboriginal tribes of Australia. The Australians have a supreme being called Darumulun, who is worshipped in the Bora, or tribal mysteries, at which the inculcation of ethical ideas is carefully practised. But the Australians have no chiefs, nor do they worship ghosts. How, then, asks Mr. Lang, can Darumulun have been evolved from the ghost of a chief?

This pronouncement has led to a controversy, which must have given Mr. Lang extreme satisfaction. His facts have been attacked, and the alternative explanation has been put forward that the belief in a Supreme Being, so far as it exists, has been borrowed by savage peoples from Christian missionaries. In rebutting these objections we think that Mr. Lang, on the whole, scores. He seems to us to have made good the proof of the belief on which his argument depends, and the extreme improbability, to say the very least, of its having been of Christian introduction. The mysteries, as he points out, are the very last things that the missionary influence can touch, and it is in the mysteries that the relatively high conception of Darumulun is to be found. Mr. Lang's last word on the subject, so far, is to be found in his preface to the reprint of Myth, Ritual, and Religion, now before us. This contains a long discussion, not on Darumulun, but on a similar supreme being, Ahone, whom the seventeenth-century colonists of Virginia describe as believed in, before their coming, by the native Indians. In the same proface Mr. Lang attempts to show that the views of The Making of Religion are not inconsistent with those of his earlier work. He has, however, attempted to bring them still further into line by altering a passage here or there, and especially by rewriting the two chapters which bear most directly on the religion of the lowest races. His general view of the relation of the two books may be gathered by the following passage from The Making of Religion itself:

We found a relatively Supreme Being, a Creator, sanctioning morality, and unpropitiated by sacrifice, among peoples who go in dread of ghosts and wizards, but do not always worship ancestors. We showed that the anthropological theory of the evolution of God out of ghosts in no way explains the facts in the savage conception of a Supreme Being. We then argued that the notion of "spirit," derived from ghost-belief, was not logically needed for the conception of a Supreme Being in its earliest form, was detrimental to the conception, and, by much evidence, was denied to be part of the conception. The Supreme Being, thus regarded, may be (though he cannot historically be shown to be) prior to the first notion of ghost and separable souls.

We then traced the idea of such a Supreme Being through the creeds of races rising in the scale of material culture, demonstrating that he was thrust aside by the competition of ravenous but serviceable ghosts, ghost-gods, and shades of kingly ancestors, with their magic and their bloody rites. These rites and the animistic conception behind them were next, in rare cases, reflected or refracted back on the Supreme Eternal. Aristocratic institutions fostered polytheism with the old Supreme Being obscured, or superseded, or enthroned as Emperor-God or King-God.

Of course, Mr. Lang must be prepared to face the question, "If the belief in a Supreme Being did not arise by evolution from lower forms of belief, how did it arise?" His answer to this is not, at first sight, very clear, and we have been at some pains to discover what it really is. The old missionary theory of degeneration was, of course, that of "a primitive tradition, originally revealed to all men, but only preserved in a pure form by the Jews." Other peoples, and even the Jews themselves, at certain unhappy moments in their career, obscured this primitive tradition when they "went a-whoring after strange (or more often home-grown, but animistic) gods." Now, this is clearly not Mr. Lang's view. He did not, indeed, in The Making of Religion, renounce it quite as definitely as he might have done. But in Myth, Ritual, and Religion he leaves no doubt. He says: "How this belief in such a Being (a Supreme moral Being) arose we have no evidence to prove. We make no hint at a sensus numinis, or direct revelation." The orthodox theology will not, in fact, except through a misunderstanding, get much support from Mr. Lang. Unfortunately, he is not content to leave the matter there. He might have been excused for doing so. The facts at the disposal of anthropology are not as yet sufficiently numerous or sufficiently tries to justify the confident enunciation of any theory of the origin of religion. Mr. Lang does, however, after all, present a theory, though not a very confident one. He takes it from St. Paul:

As St. Paul writes: "That which may be known of God is manifest in them, for God hath showed it unto them . . . being understood by the things which are made . . . but they became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened." In fact, mythology submerges religion. St. Paul's theory of the origin is not that of an "innate idea," nor of a direct revelation. People, he says, reached the belief in a God from the Argument for Design.

This is from the earlier book. But to the same point Mr. Lang returns in the later one.

While offering no hypothesis of the origin of belief in a moral Creator, we may present a suggestion. Mr. Darwin says about early man: "The same high mental faculties which first led man to believe in unseen spiritual agencies, then in fetichism, polytheism, and ultimately monotheism, would infallibly lead him, so long as his reasoning powers remained poorly developed, to strange superstitions and customs." Now, accepting Mr. Darwin's theory that early man had "high mental faculties," the conception of a Maker of things does not seem beyond his grasp. Man himself made plenty of things, and could probably conceive of a being who made the world and the objects in it. "Certainly there must be some Being who made all these things. He must be very good too," said an Eskimo to a missionary.

Now St. Paul was St. Paul, but no anthropologist. And for ourselves, we would as soon accept the sensus numinis or the direct revelation as believe that primitive man, at the exceedingly early period which Mr. Lang's theory compels us to assume—that is to say, at a period before he began to develop the animistic notions which afterwards obscured the higher faith—had arrived by sheer process of reason at this remarkably comprehensive and abstract conception of a supreme maker of all things. Is it not Paley and the watch over again? Surely the changing phenomena of the universe are the first things which man must have felt called upon to find a cause for. The permanent elements, the vault of heaven and the flat of earth, need no explanation at all. They simply are; and to conceive them as not being and coming to be implies a very considerable advance from the earliest standpoint of nascent ratiocination. That it should have preceded the development of animistic thought really does not seem plausible.

We are not prepared with a counter theory of the evolution of the idea of God to Mr. Lang's, and we fully recognise the difficulty presented by the isolated condition of the savage supreme beings on which he has laid just stress. It is a difficulty which the Aryan religions, wherein the high and low beliefs merge very gradually into each other, do not suggest. But we would ask Mr. Lang whether he thinks that his disproof of the possibility of man's advancing to the conception of god on animistic lines is complete when he has shown that the god cannot be a magnified ghost. Our own notion is that English anthropologists have been a good deal misled by Mr. Herbert Spencer, and that the spirits or personalities in his own likeness with which the savage peoples the world are by no means all ghosts. Some of them are not ancestral at all, but elemental, dimly discerned behind the working of natural forces, the ripple of the stream, the sigh of the wind among the trees, and in the beast folk whose resemblance to himself, as Mr. Lang has insisted, was far more obvious to primitive man than their dissimilarity. There are thus two independent founts of animistic thought; and if the god was got at by way of animism at all, it is surely as a magnified elemental spirit, and not as a magnified ancestral spirit, that we must primarily regard him.

"The Preacher Sought to Find Out Acceptable Words."

A Dictionary of the Bible. Vol. I.: A—Feasts. Vol. II.: Feign—Kinsman. Edited by James Hastings, D.D. (T. & T. Clark. Each 14s.)

WE have briefly noticed these volumes as contributions to theological literature. In doing so we indicated that their treatment of Biblical words was copious and interesting. They yield, in fact, many "Divisions of Purley," using the phrase with reverence. It is our purpose now to glance at some of those words which prompted our remark.

Take the word "ability." In both the Old and New Testaments this word is used of material, as well as of mental, capacity. The first use still survives, but the second has far outstripped it in daily speech. We should scarcely write, as did Ezra: "They gave after their ability unto the treasure of the work threescore and one thousand drams of gold"; "means" or "resources" would be the words now. Yet Shakespeare encourages the old use. Viola says to Antonio in Twelfth Night:

Out of my lean and low ability
I'll lend you something.

In the same sense of wealth ability is used by so late a writer as Goldsmith in the Vicar of Wakefield: "A draught upon my neighbour was to me the same as money, for I was sufficiently convinced of his ability."

"Abroad" has the almost obsolete meaning of not at home, outside the house. Never in the Bible does the word carry the meaning of in (or to) a foreign country, unless we except John's words: "The children of God that were scattered abroad." In Leviticus we have the word used in the narrower sense—"whether she be born at home or abroad." In Deuteronomy we have, "then shall he go abroad out of the camp, he shall not come within the camp"—i.e., he shall go just beyond the camp. Sir Thomas More, in his Merry Jest, has this use very clearly:

Where as she lay,
So sick alway,
He might not come abroad;

—he might not leave the house. The old meaning of admiration—wonder—is too familiar to need mention. Mr. Hastings says that "adventure" is now obsolete as a verb. This is certainly not the case; the word is rather in favour among some of your younger, and perhaps too stylish, writers. It is true that no one would use it with such facility as the writer in Deuteronomy: "The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her son, and toward her daughter." Yet Scott, Wellington, Byron, and Harriet Martineau all used the word without much ceremony. Nowadays the word is used as the verb equivalent of adventure, the substantive, meaning bold and picturesque action.

"Advertise" is all but obsolete in the sense in which Boaz used it to Naomi's kinsman: "And he said unto the kinsman, Naomi, that is come again out of the country of Moab, selleth a parcel of land, which was our brother Elimelech's: and I thought to advertise thee, saying, Buy it before the inhabitants, and before the elders of my people." To-day Boaz would have advertised the parcel of land, not the kinsman. Bagehot wrote in 1872, "Changes bring out new qualities, and advertise the effects of new habits." And Sir William Hamilton said in one of his lectures: "The insect is advertised and put on the watch." "All" is an interesting Biblical word, the precise meaning of which, as Mr. Hastings says, is often missed. It sometimes means "any," neither more nor less: as in Hebrews—"without all contradiction," and in Shakespeare, Macbeth III., ii.—"Things without all remedy should be without regard." Still more archaic is its synonymy with "every," as in this verse from Deuteronomy: "In like manner shalt thou do with his ass; and so shalt thou do with his raiment; and with all lost thing of thy brother's, which he hath lost." All means "altogether" in Nehemiah: "Woe to the bloody city! it is all full of lies"; just as in Caxton: "The lady wente oute of her wytte and was al demonyak." And this is the meaning of all in "All hail": be altogether in health. Quite the most curious one of all in the Authorised Version occurs in the verse:

And a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all to brake his skull.

It is to be feared that the average reader of the Bible thinks that she threw the stone "all in order to" break Abimelech's skull. This is not the meaning. Brake is the past touse, and the "to" is not the infinitive at all, but is the equivalent of the German zer, signifying asunder; and goes with brake to give it emphasis. The meaning, therefore, is that the woman all to-brake it, "altogether broke" Abimelech's skull.

The word "bray," meaning to pound or beat small, is scarcely used now except in frequent quotations of the text in Proverbs: "Though thou shouldest bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." The word survives in the Authorised Version from Coverdale's Bible, where for wheat we have "otomeel"—and humour. In Yorkshire and Cumberland the word means to beat or thrash: "I'll bray thy back for thee." "By and by" is a phrase with a curiously human and perverse history. In Old English it meant immediately, on the instant. Hence we find Latimer in one of his sermons distinguishing it from any word with a future significance: "The clapper brake, and we could not get it mended by and by; must tarry till we can have it done." In 1611, when the Authorised Version was formed, this meaning of the word was passing away, yet not so definitely but that it found its way into the new Bible. Thus we read to this day in Luke: "But when ye shall hear of wars and commotions, be not terrified, for these things must first come to pass; but the end is not by and by"—i.e., not now. And the bloody impetuosity of Salome is obscured to many readers who do not take the word in its old sense of now. Salome "came straightway with haste unto the king, and asked, saying, I will that thou give me by and by in a charger the head of John the Baptist . . . and immediately the king sent an executioner." Archbishop Trench has well remarked, concerning "by and by": "The inveterate procrastination of men has caused it to designate a remoter term; even as 'presently' does not any longer mean 'at this present,' but 'in a little while.'"

The word "conies" has been curiously applied to rabbits. In Essex one often sees notices forbidding people to shoot or take conies. Yet the real conies, the "exceeding wise" animals of the Proverbs, are quite another species, they make "their houses in the rocks"; they do not burrow like rabbits, and their habitats are in the East.

Among words whose supersession one may sincerely regret is the beautiful Bible word dayspring. "Hast thou commanded the morning since thy days, and caused the dayspring to know his place?" asks the Lord of Job out of the whirlwind. And in Luke: "Through the tender mercy of our God; whereby the dayspring from on high hath visited us." Milton has:

The breath of heaven fast-blowing, pure and sweet,
With day-spring born;

and Cowper—"the day-spring's daughter, rosy-palm'd."

It is perhaps unnecessary to remark that Joshua was not setting the children of Israel a literary exercise when he assembled them at Shiloh, and said to them: "Ye shall therefore describe the land into seven parts, and bring the description hither to me." Here "describe" means to map-out, or divide into allotments. In Judges it means to "make a list," to "enumerate," thus: "Gideon, the son of Joash, returned from battle before the sun was up, and caught a young man of the men of Succoth, and inquired of him: and he described unto him the princes of Succoth, and the elders thereof, even three-score and seventeen men." "Describe" is, of course, used technically in the meaning of to form or trace by motion; thus Tyndall, in his notes to his lecture on Light, wrote: "The white-hot particles of carbon in a flame describe lines of light." "Dread" has lost its sense of reverential awe, as in Jacob's exclamation: "How dreadful is this place." The fear that shocks and terrifies is now the meaning of the word, which has consistently gained in intensity. It once meant no more than doubt, as in Chaucer:

For certynly, withouten drede,
A cherle is deemed by his dede.

"Every" occasionally means "each" in the Authorised Version. "Every several gate was of one pearl"; and assuredly in the Second Book of Samuel: "And there was yet a battle in Gath, where was a man of great stature, that had on every hand six fingers, and on every foot six toes, four and twenty in number; and he was also born a giant." This terrible man had no multiplicity of hands or feet, but only a digit more than usual on "each" hand and foot.

"Frankly" means no more than freely in Luke: "And when they had nothing to pay he frankly forgave them both." "Fret" is not much used now transitively. It is so used in relation to disease in Leviticus, "a fretting leprosy"; and by Shakespeare, when Lear curses Goneril:

If she must teem,
Create her child of spleen; that it may live
And be a thwart disnatur'd torment to her!
Let it stamp wrinkles in her brow of youth;
With cadent tears fret channels in her cheeks.

We should hesitate to say with Mr. Hastings that "gazing-stock" is obsolete. "Glisten," a frequentative form of "glisten," occurs five times in the Authorised Version, and its beauty cannot be challenged in the passage: "And as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistening." "Indite" has almost reversed its meaning since 1611. It then meant to dictate, or, at least, to compose. Hence David: "My heart is inditing a good matter . . . my tongue is the pen of a ready writer." The translators of the Authorised Version made the older meaning very clear in their Preface, where they describe the Bible as "a fountaine of most pure water springing up unto everlasting life"; and add: "And what marvaile? The originall thereof being from heaven, not from earth; the author being God, not man; the enditer the holy spirit, not the wit of the Apostles and Prophets."

The old free use of the word "fellow" in the sense of a man or person allowed Tindale to write very quaintly (as it seems to us): "And the Lorde was with Joseph, and he was a luckie fellowe." By 1611 the word could be used with or without contempt; though contempt was the oftener implied, especially when the word was joined to an adjective: "lewd fellows of the baser sort;" and in Acts, "a pestilent fellow."

The Fourteenth Century.

The Fourteenth Century. By F. J. Snell. "Periods of European Literature." (Blackwood. 5s.)

THAT this is not a more satisfactory book is hardly Mr. Snell's fault. The task imposed upon him was, indeed, a hopeless one. To take a section right across European literature, or rather across a series of literatures belonging to European countries in various stages of development, to bring to each of these a competent and, if possible, first-hand knowledge, and to impose upon them all some principle of unity which may assist digestion in the reader—there are few scholars who would come unscathed out of the ordeal. In Mr. Snell's work the cramping and deadening influence of the conditions under which it was produced is particularly evident. He does not fit in the least into the frame so neatly provided for him by his publishers. Obviously his own interest lies in the late mediæval and early renaissance literature of Italy—in Petrarch, Boccaccio, Dante. Given a free hand, he would probably have written a singularly fresh and stimulating study of these. As it is the chapters in which he deals with them, though they suffer from compression, contain some interesting discussions. The following paragraph upon Dante may be taken as a sample of Mr. Snell at his best:

Dante believed in an eternal world topically as well as tropically. Once by the bier of Beatrice he had entered within the veil; and now, when all earthly occupations, all secular interests, had in a sense dropped away from him, the future, the great future wherein the loose threads of time and space—the sundered ties, the temporal losses, the inexplicable failures, the injustice, the ingratitude, the pain—would be unravelled up into luminous consistency, stared him perpetually in the face. Boccaccio tells us that when some women of Verona saw Dante pass, one of them observed, “See you the man that goes to Hell and returns when he lists, and brings up news of those below?” “Forsooth,” replied a gossip, “you must speak truth. Don’t you see what a crisp beard and what brown hair he has through the heat and smoke down there?” The story is not all a parable.

Our commendation may be extended to the chapter on “Chaucer,” who is, perhaps, best treated in connexion with the great Italian masters; but the rest of the book we have read with a growing feeling of irritation. These breathless summaries, loaded with facts from which the general ideas with difficulty detach themselves, and often, as Mr. Snell himself admits, compiled from German Grundrisse and similar sources, appear to us of the very smallest value. The German and Scandinavian literatures are dismissed in a few inadequate paragraphs, and though those of England and the Romance countries are more fully treated, yet we do not feel that Mr. Snell has quite succeeded in bringing out the unity which here at least does exist. He seems to regard that unity as consisting mainly in the transition from court poetry to town poetry; but its correlative aspects as a transition from minstrel poetry to trouvère poetry, and a transition from recited to written and real poetry, deserved more distinct statement and detailed exposition. Mr. Snell seems to us to use some of his technical terms too loosely. Thus “folk-song” means for him not song written by the folk, but song written for the folk by minstrels or trouvères of other grades. This, we submit, is incorrect and confusing. His facts, on the other hand, seem to be generally accurate—unfortunately the least of virtues in this kind of book. Perhaps, however, he will revise the statement that Dante’s eclogue to Giovanni di Virgilio was “the first since the days of Virgil” when he has read Calpurnius, Nemesianus and Alcuin’s (or Bede’s) verses on the Cuckoo. We are unfeignedly sorry not to be able to write more favourably of Mr. Snell’s book: he has evidently learning, enthusiasm, taste, and industry; it is a pity that he has entangled himself in an impossible form.

Other New Books.

NAVAL PIONEERS OF AUSTRALIA.

BY L. BECKE AND W. JEFFERY.

A recondite yet notably interesting chapter in our Imperial history is set forth in this book. Most people vaguely associate Botany Bay and its convict settlers with the beginnings of our Australian colonies; but few have any right knowledge of the circumstances under which those colonies struggled into existence. What do they know, for example, of Captain Arthur Phillip, the virtual founder and first Governor of New South Wales, and of the dynasty of naval officers which he founded—Hunter, Grose, King, Flinders, Bass, and Bligh? The fame and importance of Phillip—a most capable governor and gallant officer—have been so obscured that it was but two years ago that a statue of him was erected in Sydney; and the New South Wales Government had to spend money liberally to discover that Phillip’s bones lie in Bathampton Church, in Somersetshire.

Phillip was entrusted by the British Government with the charge of the first fleet of transports which carried convicts out to Australia. He was not only to take the convicts out, he was to govern them on their arrival. As strange and complicated a mission as ever was entrusted to a British naval captain! There were eleven sail in the fleet, which followed Phillip out of Spithead on May 13, 1787. Poets have sung of the Speedwell and the Mayflower; but who has celebrated in prose or poetry the departure of that black, forbidding fleet, heavy with heavy hearts, and pregnant with Australia? Even at the time the event was scarcely noticed.

The expedition was a big affair, and it seems curious enough nowadays that so little interest was taken in it. There were more than a thousand people on board, and one would have thought that if the departures of the convicts did not create excitement, the sailing of the blue-jackets and the guard of about two hundred marines bound for such an unknown part of the world would set Portsmouth at any rate in a stir. But the Fitzherbert scandal, the attack on Warren Hastings, and such-like stirring events were then town talk, and at that period there were no special correspondents or, for the matter of that, any newspapers worth mentioning, to work up popular excitement over the event.

And so, in a buzz of town talk about other things, the first Australians were shipped away in chains. We hope that this single picture will convey something of the dramatic interest which informs these most carefully wrought pages. We say “wrought,” because the toils of excavation and the woes of rummaging have gone to their making. The authors have spared themselves no labour; they have made light of such tasks as discovering the exact rig of the ship in which Dampier sailed to New Holland in 1698, and the manner in which his crew was fed and dressed.

Phillip’s good government, and the mistakes of his less able successors, are described in detail and with an accuracy which we believe few will challenge. A great man was this Phillip, who could see in his horde of famishing blackguards the makings of a people. “This country will yet be the most valuable acquisition Great Britain has ever made,” was his cool prediction, and time has been steadily fulfilling it. The story here unfolded ends where Australian history is supposed to begin; in reality, it is the fundamental part of that history, and it is set forth with a care and energy delightful to the reader who knows good work when he sees it. (Murray. 7s. 6d.)

DURHAM CATHEDRAL.

BY J. E. BYGATE.

This is the seventeenth volume in the excellent “Cathedral Series.” The distinctive thing about Durham Cathedral is its magnificent situation. Not in all England, and in few cathedral towns on the continent, is there a view to be compared, in its kind, with that which the visitor to Durham obtains when he stands on Framwellgate Bridge. The cool, robust traditions of St. Cuthbert and his Lindisfarne monks lend a wonderful charm to the great pile, which rises sheer with the precipice from the river. The situation was thus described in an old Saxon poem quoted by Mr. Bygate:

This City is celebrated
In the whole Empire of the Britons.
The road to it is steep.
It is surrounded with rocks,
And with curious plants.
The Wear flows round it,
A river of rapid waves.
And there live in it
Fishes of various kinds,
Mingling with the floods.
And there grow
Great Forests.
There live in the recesses
Wild animals of many sorts;
In the deep valleys
Deer innumerable.

Durham has suggestions of early wildness which will never leave it. (Bell & Sons. 1s. 6d.)

ANDREW MELVILLE.

BY WILLIAM MORISON.

This is the twenty-seventh volume in the "Famous Scots" series of biographies. Mr. Morison makes the fair remark that Melville's career will detain only those who are interested in the struggle which gave Scotland its ecclesiastical system. Nevertheless, Melville's services in nurturing and maintaining Presbyterianism in Scotland in the days of its weakness are not his only claim to memory. He was the most learned Scot of his time, and his "massive personality" entitles him to comparison with his immediate, and overshadowing, predecessor, Knox.

Mr. Morison has told Melville's story with a care for accurate history. Of small biographical illumination there is little, for little is possible. But the temper of the man comes out well in the following passage dealing with his relations to the powerful Morton:

When he [Morton] found him incorruptible by his favours, he tried to intimidate him. Calling him one day into his presence, he broke out into violent denunciation of those ministers who were disturbing the peace of the realm by their "owersie" dreams, and setting up of the Genevan discipline; and on Melville turning the attack against himself and his Government, Morton flew into a rage: "Ther will never be quyetnes in this countrey till haiff a dissone of yow be hangit or banished the countrey!" "Tushe! sir!" retorted Melville, "threaten your courtiers in that fashion. It is the same to me whether I rot in the air or in the ground. The earth is the Lord's: my fatherland is wherever well-doing is. I haiff bein ready to giff my lyff whar it was nocht haiff sa weill wared, at the pleasour of my God. I leived out of your countrey ten yeirs as weill as in it. Yet, God be glorified, it will nocht ly in your power to hang, nor exyll this treuthe!"

"Scotland never receavit a graitter benofit at the hands of God than this man," was James Melville's verdict on Andrew. This book owes not a little of its salt to quotations from James Melville's writings. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 1s. 6d.)

THE CRISWICK SHAKESPEARE.

ILLUSTRATED.

"Hamlet" and "The Merchant of Venice" are the first plays to be published in this pleasant new pocket edition, each filling a volume. Introductions and Notes are supplied by the editor, Mr. John Dennis; and illustrations by Mr. Byam Shaw. Concerning the latter, what shall we say? We do not like illustrations to Shakespeare, and although Mr. Byam Shaw's pictures have style and dignity, we would rather be without them. Others will think differently. Certainly, this is a well-equipped edition of the plays, and should be popular. (Bell & Sons. Each 1s.)

SHAKESPEARE'S FEMALE CHARACTERS.

BY HELENA FAUCIT (LADY MARTIN).

To this sixth edition of her well-known work Lady Martin prefixes a preface which she wrote in 1893 for the fifth edition, but discarded. In it she explains her views of the actress's art, and the spirit in which she worked on the stage. Her little essay is faultless in its sentiments. The book is issued in very handsome style. (Blackwood.)

CHRISTIAN ETHICS.

BY PROF. W. L. DAVIDSON.

This little book is a contribution to the Guild Library; and, so far as a subject of this vastness can be satisfactorily treated in so strait a volume, the Aberdeen professor is to be congratulated on a success. We except always the section devoted to the Mystery of Evil. A justification of truculent volcanoes and like inconveniences, based upon the proposition that the world is "the most perfect home for man that is possible under the circumstances," does not carry conviction. (A. & C. Black. 1s. 6d.)

Fiction.

Strong Hearts. By G. W. Cable.
(Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

MR. CABLE gives us in this book three stories of unequal interest. One, "The Taxidermist," is almost as satisfying as we could wish; one, "The Solitary," is good, but not good enough; the third, and the longest, "The Entomologist," upon which, we fear, most effort has been expended, is a disappointment. Mr. Cable starts with an introduction, to prove that his three stories form an organic whole, that the same truth underlies all and is exemplified by all: that religion without poetry is as dead as poetry without religion. But this is of no consequence. The stories, in due time, speak for themselves. "The Solitary" is an exquisite piece of work. Mr. Cable has his delicate art under control, and the unfolding of its blossoms is perfectly disciplined. Our only objection to "The Solitary" is, that the subject is just a little too tremendous for Mr. Cable's power: the struggle of a dipsomaniac to recover self-command. Mr. Cable is conscious of the tragedy, of the fierce battle that was fought, but he does not succeed in re-enacting it. His gifts are better suited to calmer struggles and quainter phases of life. Hence, when we come to "The Taxidermist," we find this urbane and debonnaire student of humanity thoroughly at home. The taxidermist was Pastropbon Manouvrier, a bird-stuffer of New Orleans, and the story tells of his abounding loving-kindness for helpless things. Mr. Smith, the nominal narrator of this book, first made his acquaintance through taking to him a humming-bird to be stuffed.

I was saying to her husband that a humming-bird was a very small thing to ask him to stuff. But he stopped me with his lifted palm.

"My Frau, a humming-bird has de passion—de ecstasie! One drop of blood wid de passion in it —," and he waved his hand with a jerk of the thumb in disdain of spoken words; and it was I who added—"Is bigger than the sun?"

"Bah!" was all he uttered in approval, turning as if to go to work. I feared I had disappointed him.

"God measures by the soul, not by the size," I suggested. But he would say no more, and his wife put in as softly as a kettle beginning to sing—"Ah, ha ha! I t'ink dass where de good God show varrie good sanse."

I began looking here and there in heartiest admiration of the products of his art, and presently we were again in full sympathy and talking eagerly. As I was going he touched my arm—

"You will say de soul is parted from dat lill' bird. And—yass; but —" He let a gesture speak the rest.

"I know," replied I. "You propose to make the soul seem to come back and leave us its portrait. I believe you will."

Whereupon he gave me his first faint smile, and detained me with another touch.

The third story, "The Entomologist," which tells how a foolish, wanton woman was won to wisdom, does not quite "come off." Here, again, as in "The Solitary," Mr. Cable alleges more than he proves; but it has many subtle touches. The hero and triumphant justification of the book remains Pastropbon Manouvrier.

The Fowler. By Beatrice Harraden.
(Blackwood & Sons. 6s.)

THIS belongs to that class of novels in which the leading idea, instead of springing naturally from the environment, is an artificial centre round which the environment has been laboriously constructed. And it shares the general fate of its class—it fails. In common with the general public, we have a special and long-suffering tenderness for Miss Harraden's work, but it would be futile to obscure the fact that since Ships that Pass in the Night she has done nothing whatever of authentic importance, and that even this newest book, carefully finished and comparatively lengthy, is distinctly inferior to her first novel.

Miss Harraden's leading idea is that of a moral vampire who preys upon the "mental and moral individuality" of a woman, with the intention of leaving it in ruins. Theodore Bevan makes a good stage vampire. He was "a little man of rather eccentric appearance"; he looked as if "he could never have been young"; he "smiled cynically"; and he possessed that curious habit which we had thought to be peculiar to Jesuits in militant Protestant fiction—of moving from spot to spot "in noiseless fashion."

The woman whose soul this "fowler" set himself to snare was an exceptionally-gifted young teacher, one of those radiant soaring creatures who succeed in everything without apparent effort. "The afternoon before her Tripos her friends found her finishing off a new dress." Needless to say that Nora Penshurst was "bracketed equal with the first on the list" of that Tripos. Nevertheless Theodore Bevan quickly had her in his power. He estranged her from Roger Penshurst, "her darling old father-friend," and from all her other friends, including Brian Uppingham, a distinguished historian to whom she was really attached. He made her promise to marry himself. And then, chiefly through a careless mistake of Bevan's in the matter of a diary of his private vampire-thoughts, the sinister influence was suddenly shattered. In a long and oratorical speech to him (most of the characters have a leaning to eloquence in conversation) Nora repays him for his wickedness:

"I followed the voice of evil rather than of good, and turned aside from all who loved me and believed in me for you—an evil spirit. For make no mistake about that, Theodore Bevan: in my heart of hearts I have never believed you anything else except an evil spirit. You have rankled in my soul, as all evil things must of necessity. I blame myself bitterly that I did not cut you out at the very beginning. But you interested me; you amused me; you were so different from everyone else, that I thought it would be a new experience to have someone like you in my life—someone whom all other people detested—and so I played with you. No one could ever condemn me more harshly than I condemn myself. I despise myself more even than I despise you. And you know now what I think of you, therefore you may judge what I think of myself. But in spite of you and in spite of myself, yes, in spite of this two years' misery, I shall recover my pride, my independence of spirit, my liberty of mind, my joy in life—all this shall come back to me, and in full measure. I will fight for it as no one has ever fought before.

And he went, and she married Brian. The tale, as a mere psychological fantasy, might pass if it had the least conviction. The trouble is that it never once convinces. It has no genuine imagination. It is not related to life. One cannot believe in it for a moment. It is a marionette show, and the strings are too apparent.

Of course the book contains here and there charming pages. But a few hints of delight do not suffice for a good novel, especially when even these are marred by a serious defect of manner. For there is vastly too much gush in The Fowler, a crude quality of "girliness"—we can find no other term.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE INDIVIDUALIST.

By W. H. MALLOCK.

This is the novel which recently ran serially through the Fortnightly, and was there attributed to "Wentworth Moore." Wentworth Moore was in reality Mr. Mallock, the author of The New Republic and A Human Document.

The new novel is mainly satirical, certain modern developments coming under Mr. Mallock's keen, yet amused, consorious eyes. Elsewhere we quote the preface to the book: (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

WHEN THE SLEEPER WAKES.

By H. G. WELLS.

Mr. Wells's new absorbing romance of the future, its interests and its terrors. This is the story which has been running through the Graphic to the accompaniment of vivid pictures of aeroplanes and aëropiles. (Harpers. 6s.)

RIDAN THE DEVIL, AND OTHER STORIES.

By LOUIS BECKE

Mr. Becke takes us back to the palm-clad Pacific islands, the coral atolls, the smooth lagoons, the trader's flag, the loves of half-castes, and the dramas of mixed marriages. In the background always the blue waters of the Pacific. (Unwin. 6s.)

TWO IN CAPTIVITY.

By VINCENT BROWN.

A subtle and searching analysis of the impress of guilt on two souls. The story opens with unusual bluntness: "Lord Bir, on an afternoon in June, tried to kill his friend Lewis Krehl." But it is not a sensational work: the interest is psychological. (Lane. 3s. 6d.)

"MA MÈRE."

By VICOMTE JEAN DE LUZ.

This story, which has as sub-title, "Sons and Daughters under the Second Empire," is, says the author, founded on fact. It was begun several years ago, but was laid aside for sufficient reasons. It is now finished, those reasons having been removed, and the author believes that good alone can result from shadowing forth one of the sources of the flood of disaster which has recently overwhelmed the French nation. (Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

THE SWORD OF ALLAH.

By T. R. THRELFALL.

A romance of the harem, a judicious Oriental blend of fighting and love, history and mystery. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

HUGH GWYETH.

By BEULAH MARI DIX.

The trend of this story of Roundheads and Cavaliers may be gathered from such spirited chapter headings as "Tidings out of the North," "To Horse and Away," "How the World Dealt by a Gentleman," "In the Fields toward Osney Abbey," "Under the King's Displeasure," &c. The battle of Edgehill is described, and the book is bright with adventure and warm with romance. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE HOUSE OF RIMMON.

By MRS. COULSON KERNAHAN.

This story, by the author of Trewinnot of Guy's, introduces us to a not very happy home in Staffordshire. Mr. Rimmon is a tyrannical father, and the atmosphere of the home is conveyed in his reply to his wife's request that his boy Jubal might go and spend part of his holidays with his friend, Harry Saltring: "I shall not allow him to go. The family is utterly without religion. I've heard they go to theatres, and have dancing in their house. They are Church-goers too, and would win Jubal away from Methodism. They never have family prayers, and I question if they ask a blessing before their meals." (Ward, Lock & Co. 5s.)

TOM-ALL-ALONE.

By AMELIA M. BARKER.

Tom is a London waif in squalid surroundings, but he finds a bond in the street and is honest about it, and rises in the world. In fact, he becomes "sick of making money" and only anxious to solve the mystery of his birth. This endeavour and the onslaught on his hand and fortune made by a calculating young woman are among the ingredients of the story. Where Tom-All-Alone found love is at last revealed, and the moral is that money and happiness, money and sincerity, may lie far apart. (Macqueen. 6s.)

The Art Season.—II.

Mr. Whistler, and Others.

THE second exhibition of the International Society of Sculptors, Painters, and Gravers, at Knightsbridge, practically supports our article of May 6, on the inartistic and distressing arrangement of the Royal Academy's show. The contents of the International differ from those of the Academy very slightly, except in one point, and in that the difference is certainly vast and vital. That difference consists in the proportions of good to bad work. Good stands to bad at perhaps one to two in the International; at about one to ten in Burlington House. We cannot pretend to compare the good parts of the two exhibitions; and to attempt it would be unfair, as the International draws upon a wider field than the Academy. Moreover, personal taste becomes a too potent influence when one would choose between the art of Messrs. Sargent, Orchardson, Swan, East, Tuke, Onslow Ford, Bilbao, Lemon, Hook, Hunter, La Thangue, Clausen, and W. Stott on the one hand, and on the other that of Messrs. Whistler, Pissaro, Renoir, Rodin, Sisley, Claude Monet, Guthrie, Lavery, J. Maris, Kroyer, Couture, and Oppeler. Messrs. Mark Fisher, F. Thaulow, and others, exhibit in both shows. Though I will not divulge it here, yet I am afraid I should not hesitate in my choice. Take, now, the bad parts of the two galleries: the Academy had an unselected jumble of all kinds of poverty in art, of style, of truth, of conception; the bad at Knightsbridge is chosen from among the well-mannered bad, the bad that with a smile of style is still a villain in its values. Thus the points in the superiority of Knightsbridge to be enforced are: (1) the proportion of good to bad; (2) the chosen harmony between the bad and good which makes the bad comparatively harmless; (3) the easy, open, decorative hanging which spares the eye, gives the good picture a chance to dominate, and permits the inferior work to pass uncriticised as pleasant padding. In a word, the International is an exhibition, the Academy a lumber-room.

We must give the International praise in one other, and that an important, matter—its hearty encouragement of illustration and the art of black-and-white. Mr. Whistler contributes a small room-full of new etchings, which seem more fascinating than all but two of his painted exhibits. Some are slight enough, a mere scratch or two, as the marine "Jubilee Reviews," yet none the less studied and elegant in the point of their placing and the equality of their finish. One likes to see a result thus lightly, deftly, and promptly obtained; for a few scratches, alas! can be weighty, meaningless, and even too many for their purpose. But the most agreeable of all Mr. Whistler's contributions are those lovely water-fronts showing, through a rain of fine lines, airy palaces or crumbling storehouses pierced with sombre caves that open on a mystery of gloom. Of these "The Balcony, Amsterdam," "The Pierrot," "Nocturne, Amsterdam," may serve as good examples. Mr. J. Pennell contributes both etchings and aquatints, imaginative in conception and clever in technique, as "The Most Picturesque Place in the World," "Barges," and "Charing Cross Station." Messrs. Klinger, Holroyd, Strang, D. Y. Cameron, and others, also send etchings. Some of the drawings in water-colour, chalk, pen, charcoal, and pencil are admirable, as well as they might be produced by such men as Alfred Stevens, A. B. Houghton, Prof. Menzel, Prof. Legros, S. Kroyer, E. Grasset, W. Nicholson, E. J. Sullivan, A. S. Hartrick, Anning Bell, E. Wilson, F. Mura, and several others.

The sculpture, which includes many fairly good pieces, groups, busts, and works in relief, is notable for two superb examples of the art of M. Auguste Rodin, the most red-hot and imaginative of modern sculptors. That which bears the most evident testimony to the impassioned genius of the artist is unquestionably "Group." This surge of Nereids—with flowing hair, twined arms, clasped hands—rolls, curls, and overhangs like a stupendous wave of voluptuous forms. It is built up with the constructiveness of an architect, modelled with the science of a sculptor, treated with the suggestiveness of a painter.

At Knightsbridge Kroyer the Dane supplies in figure-painting the antidote to the general tendency of the gallery towards a too exclusive pursuit of style. His "Edward and Nina Greig" is portraiture only to be paralleled in its sincerity by Mr. Sargent's work at the New Gallery; and Mr. Sargent's is a less simple and unsophisticated nature than Mr. Kroyer's. That one cannot overlook this vision of a delicate and sensitive eye proves the value of such an exhibition as the International. Hung in the Academy, where it would take rank with the Sargents, I fear that, unlike those great triumphs of bravura style, Mr. Kroyer's portrait picture would be lost amid the millinery of painted fashion plates, the reds and blues of the monstrous Pre-Raphaelite (garden variety crossed with Impressionism), and the loud incidents of the anecdote swollen to the size of the old historical canvas. Mr. Kroyer's naturalism is backed in landscape by the work of men such as C. Pissaro, Claude Monet, Sisley, Mark Fisher, and James Maris. In Figure fine portraits are not rare. We have Mr. Whistler, Mr. J. E. Blanche, Mr. Guthrie, Mr. Lavery, Mr. Greiffenhagen, Mr. Chase, and also Couture, Renoir, Mancini, André, Stevens the Belgian, and perhaps one or two more, whose pictures are executed with respect for the character of the model as well as with some sense of style; but these lists give no adequate idea of all the good work at the gallery either in figure or in landscape.

In this place of pleasantness and quiet one may see, without much fatigue, a good deal of the experiments of modern art and, in particular, several tendencies of the impressionistic school. We would like to be able to contrast with the gentle, far-off, dimly-lit, almost morbidly refined Whistlers something belonging to the school who have followed Velasquez, Rembrandt, or Hals in their intensity of realisation, firmness of construction, and closeness of modelling. We have only the intimately real Kroyer; the strong, bold Mancini; the broad, blazing Renoir. If one picture united all their qualities, we should have the true opposite of the most usual Whistler portrait. Passing through other work we may note all degrees of attention to style or to construction, to elegance of aspect or to intimacy of modelling. Beginning with Mr. Guthrie, Mr. Blanche, Mr. Gari Melchers, Mr. Chase, and Mr. Lavery, we pass to Mr. Furse, Mr. Henry, Mr. Greiffenhagen, Mr. Nicholson, and Miss Beaux; thence to Mr. Gandara, Mr. Neven du Mont, Mr. D. Robinson, to come to Mr. Shannon, and finally to reach Mr. Sauter, Mr. Jack, Mr. Brough, at the extreme end of those who tend to prefer manner to matter. Of course, this arrangement does not pretend to be a list of painters in order of merit.

On the whole, the landscape, or at least the open-air, work interests me more than the bulk of the figures. To begin with, I prefer Mr. Whistler's serene and limpid coast scene and his dim, luminous night at Chelsea, before his figure pictures in this exhibition. If one looks at the fine display of work by the Scottish school, one sees, I think, that the loose poetry of a fine picturesque style which is apt to override construction preserves more of the essential qualities of nature, and does less real harm when exercised on landscape than on figure subjects. We get very tired of Mr. Henry's pleasant colour, summary shorthand of expression, and flat ungraded fields of tone in portraits; whereas we appreciate in the landscape of Messrs. Allan, Grosvenor Thomas, H. Spence, E. A. Walton, Paterson, and others, the advantages of the sacrifice which secures us freedom and grandeur of aspect. Still it may be held that Messrs. G. Boyle, Fragiacomio, Arthur Tomson, A. S. Hartrick, Charles, Leslie Thomson, B. Priestman, Aumonier, Klügel, and Mark Fisher, give us quite as much sentiment as the Scots, together with a closer study of nature. But of course the chief interest of this gallery in landscape lies in the contrasts between the different kinds of impressionism shown in the great works of Maris, Monet, Sisley, and Pissaro. Pissaro, in these early works of his, shows himself the most modestly natural of all. His compositions weave together the lines of large, empty plains with quiet, subtle truth and elegance. His colour inclines to aerial blue, but leaves one in that state of balanced hesitation between the prevalence of local and atmospheric tones which characterises the most usual and the least agitating mood of nature. Sisley's light quivers more evidently, and, whether falling on things near or far, always makes you feel the rainbow dispersion of the reflected sky. It is Monet's pictures in this gallery that most boldly and whole-heartedly express the vibration and iridescence of light. Less even than Sisley does this great luminarist think of composition, ideal beauty of form, or accepted picturesqueness of place. His "Country Road" is a common, unlovely locality, with bushy, blobby trees, made alive with the sparkle and jewelled glitter of morning sunlight. His other landscape shows a steaming sunrise, where the light on the dew becomes the subject of the picture: it is fresh, silvery, frosty; shot with cool purples, blues, and pinks in the shadow; golden and glowing, rosy and orange, in the slanting rays of the warm morning sun. Perhaps not so exciting, so palpably personal, though equally seen and felt, is James Maris's far grander, gloomier, and more mysterious "Dutch Harbour." His light is grave, solemn, even; a rich tissue of gold and brown more in consonance with tradition; representative, rather, of a slowly-received, quietly-growing idea of the world than of a sudden, eye-smiting impression of effect which remains with one for ever unchanged.

Things Seen.

Goliath.

IT HAPPENED the other day to be a guest in a family which maintains the practice of Scripture reading after breakfast. The passage selected was the seventeenth chapter of the First Book of Samuel; and presently I was awakened from what I fear was becoming an inattentive reverie by the words: "And there went out a champion out of the camp of the Philistines, named Goliath, of Gath, whose height was six cubits and a span." The words took me back to a class-room in a great boarding-school.

There it was my privilege to sit for several years under a worthy teacher, who, Sunday after Sunday, brought the Bible narrations before us with just that blend of "verbal inspiration" and "new criticism" which he thought prudent. Dangerous work he found it, I fancy, for there were inquiring minds among us. But the story of Goliath always passed pleasantly. Whenever it recurred, as it did about once a year, L—— would discuss the giant's stature with great moderation, and by reckonings of the Hebrew cubit, encourage us, with a kind of gracious latitude, to believe that, after all, Goliath need not have stood more than nine feet in his stockings. So interested was he in his annual measurement of the Philistine, that he invariably assisted his argument by climbing, with no small pains—he was an elderly man and tall—to the top of his high four-legged stool, where he stood for some time at an amazing altitude. I came to watch that annual ascent with a kind of rapture. L——'s lavender-blue Sunday trousers stood the test so well. His long blue frock-coat seemed the creaseless perfection of human clothing. His cravat was irreproachable, and his silvery hair crowned the edifice. Only once a year—only when Goliath was in the lesson—could I study this sartorial splendour to advantage. And, do you know, it runs in my mind that Goliath recurred about May in each year, which is the time when new suits are donned; and I like to believe that L——, who had his harmless vanities . . .

A Healing.

THE decision must be made, the path chosen, that night; but that night (so it happened) his vitality was low, his judgment clouded, and his nerves in that condition that the dropping of a paper-knife set him trembling. He tried to decide, but his mind would not work sanely, and so, in a shiver of dread, he rushed into the streets.

Hurrying on, always on, he came soon to the opera house, where the bills announcing "Tristan und Isolde" arrested him. "I know nothing of music," he moaned. "Wagner is a sealed book to me"; and, his mood being perverse, it followed that in a few minutes he had bought a ticket and was tearing up the steps that lead to the gallery. As he climbed higher and higher, the music found him, and he paused, framing the thought that those great, grave harmonies affected him as if some cool, fond hand had rested momentarily on his brow. At which he wondered, for he knew nothing of music. Then the gallery doors opened, and the hot, stifling air encompassed him. He found a seat in the remotest corner. His only thought was: "How long can I endure this? For I know nothing of music, and the conditions are unbearable." Yet he remained, and the music rushed to him as from some God-driven fountain. "I know nothing of Wagner," he thought, "so it's idle for me to listen. Soon I will leave." But he remained, for his attention was caught by a German who stood facing the stage with his hands clutching the gallery railings. As the great, mystical love-duet of the second act proceeded, the German, quite unconsciously, swung slowly round as on a pivot, moving his hands as he did so till they clutched the railings behind his back, and a little spurt of blood issued from where his nails dug the flesh. Another, a greybeard, thin-faced and ashen, sat motionless as a statue, with chin tilted in the air; but his eyelids flickered and his lips moved tremulously. The man who did not understand music said to himself: "Oh! this heat! I meant to have escaped from this long ago. I—I——," but he waited while the wonderful music wailed through the darkened house. He waited, and he forgot himself and the transitory troubles that beset him. He waited, and the dead music maker made him of his company. More: his brain grew clear, his blood cooled and ran temperately, his heart sang in assonance to the music he did not understand. And it all happened in spite of himself. He was hardly conscious of his healing. Long afterwards (time had ceased) he found himself in the street walking calmly, firm of foot, clear of purpose, with these lines running to the echo of the music he did not understand:

Remember my words, I may again return;
I love you; I depart from materials;
I am as one disembodied, triumphant, dead.

* * * * *

That night he made his decision. He was glad that night! And the music went through his dreams.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE influence of women is not a Disraelian myth, even in such an undramatic affair as the cessation of a Sunday paper. Pilate's wife's dreams are repeated through the ages; and the persuasion which has mainly led to the discontinuance of the Sunday edition of the Daily Mail is one which naturally does not appear in the list of reasons officially printed. Yet at their very head should be placed the scrupulous opposition of Mrs. Alfred Harmsworth to any infraction of the observance of the Day of Rest.

THE members of the Lawson family, if they had such scruples, would naturally apply them to their Saturday issue. Nevertheless, as they are renowned caterers, and as they are catering mainly for Christians and not for Jews, it is almost certain that they, too, will withdraw themselves from the ranks of seven-day journalism as soon as they can make their rather complex arrangements. For although it is to be expected that the withdrawal of the Sunday Mail will increase their sales and lessen their competitive expenditure, the gain is not thought by competent judges to be such as will tempt Sir Edward Lawson to defy a public opinion that extends its boycott to the week-day editions of the Telegraph, and, in the case of the Mail, made its effect felt on the circulation of the other publications of the Messrs. Harmsworth.

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY, in his Reminiscences, speaks of the love of Cardinal Manning for Ireland as the more remarkable in that he had not a drop of Irish blood in his veins. But that is hardly the fact. Cardinal Manning, as his friends must all remember, was particularly proud of recalling that his grandmother's maiden name was Elizabeth Ryan, and that she was the child of Irish parents. Mr. McCarthy may be further interested to have his memories of Manning supplemented by a little story he himself has not told, nor, probably, even heard. It was not the habit of the Cardinal to send out cards for his receptions; but having been told that Irish members stayed away from them—at a time of some political tension in their relations with Englishmen—because they did not know they would be welcome, he sent out to them formal invitations. One of these, sent to Mr. McCarthy himself, elicited a letter of excuse, elegantly polite in its wording, but, unhappily, addressed to 8, York-place, the former residence of Cardinal Wiseman, which his successor had abandoned years previously for the great house at Westminster on which he had spent a large portion of his patrimony. The letter was forwarded, of course; but the old address was a trouble to the Cardinal, who was made to feel how far he was removed from the common round. Similarly, at a later date, he kept on his table for some time a letter which had been addressed to the right house indeed, but, by a slip of the pen, to "His Eminence Cardinal Newman." The writer—Mr. Aubrey de Vere—was a friend of both the Cardinals; but his venial fault, like that of Mr. McCarthy, gave momentary play to the tremulous sensitiveness of a nature that in such matters had all the alertness of "a lover or a child." He had renounced the world in his youth and foregone the ambition to impress upon society his own delightful personality. That renunciation was deliberate and complete; but odd moments came to him in age when he seemed to be taken aback by the consequences.

A GREAT many references have been made to the late Lord Wharnccliffe's Yorkshire property, with its view from Wharnccliffe Castle, which Lady Mary Wortley-Montagu always said she considered the finest she had seen in all her wanderings over the world. A humbler property he held in Cornwall has been overlooked; but visitors to Tintagel Castle will remember that the village inn proudly proclaimed his proprietorship by flaunting the Wharnccliffe arms. A greater sportsman than he looked, especially than he looked in recent years, the late Earl was one of the small hunting-party whose adventures are recorded by Sir Samuel Baker in The Rifle and Hound in Ceylon.

Art Students and St. Paul's.

THE feeling evoked by the decoration of St. Paul's has taken, in fact, the form of a great vote of confidence in Sir Christopher Wren. Very welcome is such devotion to the memory of a man who gave London nearly fifty of her churches, and who, owing so much to his own genius, owed so much also to opportunity. It is curious to recall at this moment that the first design of Wren's for St. Paul's was one vastly different from that which was actually put into stone. He wished it to be a building expressive of Protestantism; and it was the strength of the Roman Catholic party, with the Duke of York as their convert as well as the Cathedral's largest benefactor after the King, that carried the day in favour of the cruciform design, which should reproduce St. Peter's in a spirit not so much of antagonism as of admiration, a spirit rewarded by the production of a dome that is held by the best judges of Europe to have the superiority over that in Rome in everything except in size. Most of those who are now agitating against Sir William Richmond's devices believe in the beauty unadorned of the interior of the dome. But two or three proposals of an alternative decoration have been presented to the Dean. Mr. Howe, whose letter to the Times was the signal for the uprising, has a plan of calling in Mr. Sargent and Mr. Abbey. Then, again, a number of architects have banded themselves together to devise a decorative design which they are going to ask the Dean's permission to affix tentatively to the walls. Attractive as some of these proposals sound, the Dean will do well to beware of them. If the dome can be restored to its unvarnished simplicity all will be well.

WE have authority for making the welcome announcement that the chocolate stencilling round the base of the dome will at once be discontinued by order of the Dean.

ALL the same, the art students who lately met to protest against the decorations are pushing forward with their petition, a draft of which, "under revision," has been sent by them to a limited number of persons of authority in matters of taste. To the Slade School belongs the honour of taking the lead; and the students were delighted to draw nearly their first ink from one of their own professors. This is Prof. Fred. Brown, who writes:

Another visit to St. Paul's, with the object of examining Sir W. B. Richmond's latest additions under the dome, more than confirms my previous impression. I left more than ever convinced that a great wrong had been done to a noble building. I feel, therefore, entirely in sympathy with the general tone of indignant protest pervading your petition to the Dean of St. Paul's; while your energy and public spirit deserve the support and approval of all who are interested in art. I had no intention of taking part in your proceedings; but as you have expressly asked me for my views on the matter, as head of the school in which your petition originated, I feel bound to express my entire approval of the spirit of your action, and my complete agreement with you on the desirability of removing, at all costs, every scrap of the decoration in question.

ANOTHER correspondent of the students has the impress of Mr. Andrew Lang upon each line of his letter:

I have never seen the decorations in St. Paul's; the interior of that remarkable building is usually black fog.

seems, therefore, as safe a place as any for modern decorative art: which, in the interior of St. Paul's, must cause the least possible annoyance to the smallest possible number of citizens. Sir W. B. Richmond being my most intimate friend, I do not think you can expect me to encourage you in a proposal rather sweeping, and not wholly flattering to himself. Remember that he is your fellow-being, and has probably been an art student. A Presbyterian myself, I can still look with sympathy on the work of Wren, but, of course, only from the outside. Any proposal which your friends may make for removing most of the pictures from our modern galleries, and all the statues except those of the Stuart dynasty from our streets, will meet with my enthusiastic approval. They excite the gaiety of (foreign) nations.

MR. J. M. BARRIE, not having seen the decorations, can only be a witness to common report, for he says that, from "all he hears," the "excellently-worded protest is justified." Neither has Lord Rosebery seen the decorations, but, in an autograph letter to the students, he supplements this confession by a valuable statement of his "clear view that this is a national matter, affecting a national monument, and not one, therefore, that can be treated as a confidential transaction between the Dean and Chapter on the one hand, and the subscribers on the other." Prof. York Powell writes from Christ Church, Oxford, to say that if he were an art student he should be delighted to sign the petition. Sir Walter Besant expresses a similar readiness, "because it is dreadful to think of St. Paul's being decorated so as to destroy the spirit of devotion Wren sought to inspire." Mr. Bernard Shaw does not suppose a popular outcry against the decorations raises any presumption against them. "The average Englishman," he says, "thinks colour disreputable, and would support Richmond heartily if he put a starched collar round the dome and a tall hat on the ball." All the same, he declares it to be "a real objection" against Sir William Richmond that he sprang from a school of "men who made it an article of their artistic religion to disparage Michael Angelo, to ignore Brunelleschi, and to ridicule Wren." With such a tradition, he is not likely, therefore, "to preserve the character of St. Paul's."

MR. LAURENCE HOUSMAN wishes the petition a success, which he "despairs of getting save by ways of scandal such as Mr. Kensit has devised for protestation inartistic in its aims." Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson, while averse from the task of throwing cold water on the works of artists who have done their best, and unwilling that any disrespect should be shown to Sir William Richmond, says that he cannot avoid, in replying to the students, the confession that he "detests the decorations under the dome." Among other art-critics whose opinion the students have received with welcome are Mr. Humphry Ward, who is glad that "the young men and women who study art in London are a body who care for these things"; Mr. Claude Phillips, who expresses "warmest sympathy"; and Lady Colin Campbell, who holds that "the whole scheme of stencilling and lettering and of tawdry tinsel mosaic is utterly indefensible."

Folly.

A WORM once envied the beauty of the rose and the gaiety of the butterfly, so it buried itself in the earth rather than share the sunshine with them.

The rose was plucked and carelessly flung away; the butterfly was caught and stripped of its wings; but the buried worm went on envying.

Wisdom.

A WOMAN was deformed and ugly, but she dressed herself in flowing garments, and said: "I am the New School." Soon she had many disciples.

Mr. Mallock Explains.

MR. W. H. MALLOCK's new novel, The Individualist, is published this week. We shall review the volume in due course, but in the meantime we reproduce the Preface wherein Mr. Mallock replies to certain charges that have been brought against the book:

"When portions of this novel, in a more or less connected form, were appearing under a pseudonym in the pages of the Fortnightly Review, an important monthly journal went out of its way to suggest that certain of the events and characters were close copies from life. If the author, this journal said, did not mean his description of Startfield Hall as a description of a Settlement founded by Mr. Passmore Edwards, and if he did not mean his description of the earnest persons connected with it 'as an exposé of the jealousy, littleness, and special weaknesses' of a certain well-known lady (whose name I will not reproduce) and her friends, 'he has taken every measure in his power to produce that mistaken impression on his readers.'

Observations of this kind it is not always possible, or indeed necessary, to disprove. In this case I feel that an answer is desirable; and it happens to be exceptionally easy. Startfield Hall was suggested to me by a chance paragraph in the Liberty Review, the organ of the Liberty and Property Defence League. The paragraph mentioned the establishment of some new 'Settlement,' and quoted a few words used by one of the lecturers, who described the upper classes as 'roaring with delight over the prospect of any new war.' This was the only foot it provided out of which to construct this particular Hercules; and as to the personalities, and even the names, of the founders and supporters of the enterprise, I am to this day in complete ignorance of them. If their names were mentioned in the paragraph, they meant absolutely nothing to me.

Next, with regard to the character of Mrs. Norham in The Individualist, which the critic regards as a 'lampoon' on the lady already referred to, my answer is even more conclusive. If Mrs. Norham's character can be said to have an original outside this novel, the original is to be found in a Dialogue written by myself for the Nineteenth Century in the year 1880. Mrs. Norham there appeared as the wife of a Broad Church private tutor, who took pupils in a cottage on the banks of Derwentwater. That her character as there described is identical with her character in the present novel will be seen by the words with which she begins the dialogue. 'I have decided,' she says to her husband, 'to resign the sub-editorship of the Agnostic Moralist. I am, of course, aware it was myself who made the journal, and that it will inevitably suffer by my withdrawing my support from it. But for many reasons I think this the right course to pursue. The editor, Dr. Pearson, was getting anxious to have the chief management—a most incapable man, forever preferring his own opinion to mine; and I really found at last there was no working with him. However, I was resolved that the rupture between us should have no bitterness, so I have done my best to make the next number a helpful one, and have insisted on contributing the whole matter myself. There will appear in it, my dear, inter alia, these two new papers of mine on 'Functional Amusement' and 'The Cellular Character of the Individual.' Mrs. Norham (though I think these were the days before 'Settlements') was represented as endeavouring to diffuse culture among the masses by painting pictures herself for them, one of which bore the title of 'A Fugue in Four Colours.'

This sketch was made by me in 1880; and, so far as my own knowledge goes, the lady to whom the critic alludes was wholly unknown, till seven or eight years later, for any of these views or enterprises which have led him to suppose Mrs. Norham's career to be intended as a 'lampoon' on hers. But it does happen that I could point out in my early Dialogue two marked, though minute, features which reappear in writings of this lady's, published long afterwards. Just, however, as it would be the height of absurdity to suppose that this lady was an imitator of me—she probably never read the Dialogue just referred to—so it is equally absurd to argue that I have attempted any personal reproduction of her. Anyone who attempts to draw a typical character or a typical series of events is sure, if he achieves any success whatever, to produce a picture containing a number of touches which somewhere or other have their counterpart in reality; but this will not be because his characters resemble individual men and women, but because individual men and women of similar temperaments and opinions have always a number of traits in which they resemble one another."

Correspondence.

Marvell and the Key of Green.

SIR,—I have been much entertained by your contributor "E. W.'s" voluntary "In the Key of Green," but also a little disappointed. For I fully expected him to work up to that greenest passage in all literature, in which Marvell describes the garden where Stumbling on melons, as I pass

Ensnared with flowers, I fall on grass;

and where his mind sits in its solitude:

Annihilating all that's made
To a green thought in a green shade.

Now I am almost tempted to doubt if "E. W." knows his Marvell; and, indeed, if he does, what business has he to misquote the "golden lamps in a green night" of the Bermuda oranges? Yet Marvell "sees green," perhaps, more than any other poet. For him

No white nor red was ever seen
So amorous as this lovely green;

and his shepherds appropriately cry:

Let's not, then, at least be seen
Without each a sprig of green.

Did I not detest statistics, I would count for you the number of times which the adjective "green" occurs in the slender blue-green volume which—happily—excludes his satires. But take the lines upon the gardens of Appleton House, "the nursery of all things green," with their surrounding woods, "the columns of the temple green," "a green, yet growing ark," which as they Nature's cradle decked,

Will, in green age, her hearse expect;

and the meadows, like "green silks but newly washed," full of the "green spires" of grass, into which

The tawny mowers enter next,
Who seem like Israelites to be
Walking on foot through a green sea.

Unfortunately, the generation after Marvell took to seeing things "verdant" or "virid" instead of "green," and naturally soon became unable to see them at all.—I am, &c.,

Was Bacon a Poet?

SIR,—The contributor of the article "Was Bacon a Poet?" to your last issue quotes the lines beginning—

The man of life upright, whose guiltless heart is free, and ascribes their creation to Bacon.

In an anthology of "Lyrical Verse," from Elizabeth to Victoria, selected and edited by Oswald Crawford, the same poem is quoted as the production of Thomas Campion.

In Arber's English Garner, vol. vi., p. 391, the poem is printed as an anonymous production, in a collection of Lyrics, &c., edited by Richard Alison in 1606.

Among such diversity of opinion, having, in this remote neighbourhood, no means of access to complete editions of the above authors, I should be greatly obliged if some of your readers would endeavour to settle this question of apparently disputed authorship in one of your future issues.—I am, &c.,

"Lead, Kindly Light."

SIR,—With reference to the correspondence which appeared in your columns during February on the subject of Newman's hymn, it would be of interest to know if the version used by the Roman Church is the same as the author's original version. Some years ago, while travelling on a P. & O. steamer, a lady who was going to Australia gave me the following, which she called the "Roman Catholic" version of the hymn, and which I understood her to say had been written by Newman after he joined the Church of Rome. The hymn itself and the initials at the end, however, show that he cannot have been the author of it.—I am, &c.,

THE PILLAR OF THE CLOUD.

Oh, Kindly Light, how well thy guiding ray
Hast led him on;
With steady beam, thro' all the rugged way,
It led him on!

Thro' thirsty deserts to the boundless sea,
From Egypt's bondage into liberty.

Step after step, as he himself had prayed,
It led him on;
The future veiled, the near path smoother made,
Thus led him on—
Till doubt's prolonged Gethsemane was done,
And reason, faith, heart, intellect were one.

And, gentle Master, thou thyself since then Hast led men on,
By silent prayer, and with thy magic pen,
Where thou has gone—
England's true Moses in these latter days,
But first thyself to tread the new, strange ways.

Oh, still for long and happy, honoured years
Lead thou us on;
Till the shades vanish and the day appears,
Lead thou us on—
Till on thy loved and venerable brow
Gleams the full crown whose first rays dawn e'en now.

"Life of William Morris."

SIR,—There is a slip of mine in the review of Mr. Mackail's book which you published in your last issue. The sentence describing the visit of Rossetti to the Oxford Theatre, on page 525, inexcusably confuses the names of Rossetti and Morris in a way that, for the sake of personal feelings, I will not further particularise. While I am making this correction, I should say that according to Mr. Mackail it was not Morris and Rossetti at all, but Burne-Jones and Rossetti who went to the theatre on the occasion in question.—I am, &c.,
YOUR REVIEWER.

May 13, 1899.

SIR,—May I be pardoned for taking exception to your reviewer's attitude toward Socialism in his otherwise excellent review of Mackail's Life of William Morris? Almost at first he says: "On the one hand are the Socialists, mostly contemptuous of Morris's art." He may not be aware there is no following with as great an average of artists and art-lovers. It is the discontent at to-day's surroundings, and the Hope of a World made beautiful, makes Socialists. He was disappointed; and so were many I know: but man embraces any "ism," and is not disappointed.

Your reviewer should really be more careful. "Why should an aristocrat of birth and means . . . stray down into those circles of the discontented poor, whose notion of righting society is to wrong those better off than themselves?" With such a subtle flash of ignorance does he wrong those who are better off than himself in the knowledge of what Socialism is.

But I forgive your reviewer; he is so entirely at sea. What I do protest against is this hollow journalism now so prevalent. Either William Morris was the sane, blunt, joyous man we knew, or half fool, half rogue, strangely joined with those "mostly contemptuous of his art," and given to such pretty notions of righting society! We must blame Ruskin, who helped him on the road to crime. And what shall we say of those sinful ones, his late comrades in iniquity — Walter Crane, Bernard Shaw, Edward Carpenter, Graham, and many others?

Let us be honest. If we admire William Morris, and abhor his Socialism, let us say so. If we do not understand Socialism, let us say so. But do not let us impugn the understanding and sincerity of the dead by explaining away, or faintly excusing as eccentricity, what he in full, sober judgment approved of.—I am, &c.,

GEORGE SCARLETT.

8, Iliffe-street, West Newington, S.E.: May 13.

The Pronoun "She."

SIR,—Of this most important and difficult word there are current three etymologies, each supported by scholars of repute, yet in the last part of the New English Dictionary (sub-voco "He") Dr. Murray only gives one explanation of it.

It is possible that he may not be aware of the existence of the other two. I have myself only just discovered that one of them, which came to me as an original idea, had appeared in print twice before I published it; I am, therefore, the last person to deny the extreme ease with which such an item may be overlooked. This makes it all the more necessary to collect together, in a medium of universal circulation like this, the heads of what has been done with regard to this word up to the present day.

The etymology which Dr. Murray treats as a chose jugée is that which identifies "She," not with the corresponding Anglo-Saxon pronoun heo, but with the Anglo-Saxon article seo. It is by far the oldest. I have not traced it beyond the first edition of Johnson (1757), but that will serve to show its antiquity. Among the moderns, Prof. Skeat once supported it (see his Dictionary and Principles of English Etymology), but he has lately recanted, and in Notes and Queries for 1897 (vol. xi., p. 158) propounded an Icelandic derivation, which he apparently believed to be original, but which had already been put forth by two Germans, Dr. Wuerzner (1885) and Dr. Kluge (1889), in opposition to that approved by Dr. Murray.

Leaving these doctors to disagree, we come to the third suggestion as to the origin of the word. My own public championship of it dates from Notes and Queries for 1896 (vol. x., p. 152). I have since discovered that Sarrazin had previously advocated the same view in the Englische Studien. The real credit for the notion is due to neither of us, but to that greatest of phoneticians, the late Alexander J. Ellis. It will be found in the first volume of his Early English Pronunciation (published in 1869).

Each of these three rival theories is based upon observation of the way consonants are affected by palatalisation. The root of the whole matter is the initial SH of the pronoun "She." How to account for it? (1) Dr. Murray thinks Anglo-Saxon seo (the article) passed through sio into sho. (2) Prof. Skeat thinks Icelandic sia passed through sha into sho. (3) Ellis thinks Anglo-Saxon heo (the pronoun) passed through hio into sho.

The crowning glory of the Ellis theory is that it identifies "He," "She," and "It" with the Anglo-Saxon pronoun he, heo, hit, whereas the other two destroy this continuity. To those who are not accustomed to phonetic study, the change hio to sho may seem revolutionary; but there are not wanting parallels in names of places in the north of this island. Shetland is certainly the Icelandic Hialtland, and Shapinsha (one of the Orkney group) is certainly Icelandic Hialpandisey. I am indebted for this last illustration to Sarrazin.

Last, but not least, the spellings ghe, gho, for "She" (in the Ormulum and "Genesis and Exodus") can only be explained this way. Dr. Murray and Prof. Skeat would find these hard nuts to crack if they tried to crack them, but they have not done so.—Yours faithfully,

JAMES PLATT, JUN.

Competition No. 33.

This week we set our readers a poetical exercise. The following lyric by the eighteenth-century French poet De Leyre is described by Gustave Masson, in his collection La Lyre Française, as "a masterpiece of taste and feeling." We will give a prize of One Guinea to the contributor who makes the best rendering of De Leyre's lines into English verse:

LE ROSIER.

Je l'ai planté, je l'ai vu naître
Ce beau Rosier où les oiseaux
Viennent chanter sous ma fenêtre
Perehés sur ses jeunes rameaux.
Joyeux oiseaux, troupe amoureuse,
Ah! par pitié ne chantez pas;
L'amant qui me rendait heureuse,
Est parti pour d'autres climats.
Pour les tréfors du nouveau monde
Il fuit l'amour, brave la mort.
Hélas! pourquoi chercher sur l'onde
Le bonheur qui trouvait au port.
Vous, passagères hirondelles,
Qui revenez chaque printemps,
Oiseaux voyageurs, mais fidèles,
Ramenez-le moi tous les ans.

Announcements.

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK & Co. have issued a very attractive list of Spring announcements, with illustrations from the books catalogued. A feature of the list is the large number of new three-and-sixpenny novels. This firm seems to have discovered a way of producing a volume which in print, paper, and illustrations suggest six shillings, at the lower price. Mr. Guy Boothby's novels, each illustrated and published at five shillings, make a brave show. They number ten in all, Pharos the Egyptian being the latest. The reissue by this firm of Whyte-Melville's novels at three-and-sixpence is proceeding steadily, and six of the novels are already in print. The list also abounds in gift-books, birthday text-books, books of cookery and gardening, standard poets, &c. &c. Prominent among the more literary items is the fast growing list of "Nineteenth Century Classics," of which Mr. Clement K. Shorter is the editor. A new shilling edition of Jules Verne's works and cheap editions of Charles M. Sheldon's popular religious stories are also noticeable; while the long list of "Ward, Lock & Co's Shilling Guides" has received several important additions, other books being in preparation.

MESSRS. ELLIS & ELVEY announce another volume of the "Siddal Edition" of D. G. Rossetti's poems, to be issued early in June. The new volume will be entitled Ballads, and will contain the three poems: "Rose Mary," "The White Ship," and "The King's Tragedy."

THE serial rights of Mr. Neufeld's adventures have been secured by the Wide World Magazine, and the narrative will appear month by month, commencing in the June number. The first instalment, under the title In the Khalifa's Clutches, or My Twelve Years' Captivity in Chains in Omdurman, is prefaced by a "Personal Impression" of the author by Sir George Newnes.

NEXT week Mr. Laurence Housman will publish, through Mr. Grant Richards, a volume of poems, to be entitled The Little Land: With Songs from its Four Rivers.

MESSRS. HURST & BLACKETT will publish next week a new work, entitled An Idler in Old France, by Tighe Hopkins, author of The Dungeons of Old Paris.

Being an Attempt at Appreciation by G. F. MONKSHOOD. With a Portrait of Mr. Kipling, and an Autograph Letter in Facsimile. Crown 8vo, crimson buckram, gilt top, 5s. net.

"To those who do not know their Kipling well, the book will be at once a guide and friend, while even the most ardent admirer of the Anglo-Indian writer will find new meanings and new points for admiration.... It is, in fact, a work well done, and will be valuable not merely as a biographical and literary appreciation of a great writer, but as a book of reference in things relating to him."—Lloyd's.

MR. T. H. S. ESCOTT'S NEW BOOK. A TRIP to PARADOXIA, and other Humours of the Hour. Being Contemporary Pictures of Social Fact and Fictional Fiction. By T. H. S. ESCOTT, Author of "Paradoxical Forces of the Period," &c. With a Portrait of the Author. Crown 8vo, art cloth, 5s. net.

"Lively and amusing. The book makes pleasant reading." Black and White.
"A bright, witty and amusing volume, which will entertain everybody who takes it up."—Schools.
"An entertaining skit, bright and eminently readable."—Observer.

"Readers who delight in satire and sarcasm will find much to delight them.... All sides of contemporary life are touched upon with a lightness and sureness to which the author has long since accustomed us in his earlier volumes."—Sunday Times.
"Extremely piquant and entertaining."—Glasgow Herald.

THE LADY of the LEOPARD A Powerful and Fascinating Novel. By CHAS. L'EPINE, Author of "The Devil in a Domino." Crown 8vo, art cloth, 3s. 6d.

"A remarkable book.... We are plunged into a delicious and tantalising romance. Incident follows incident like a panorama of exciting pictures. Fertility of imagination is everywhere apparent, and the dénouement is artfully concealed till it bursts upon the reader with a suddenness that fairly takes away his breath."—Public Opinion.

"To be highly recommended. It is exciting, and the interest is well sustained. The motive of the book is psychological, while its element is strongly psychical. The moment when the soul of the lady is interchanged with the soul of a leopard is thrilling.... Will be welcomed, has merit and should win a public."—Sun.

THE HYPOCRITE. A Modern Realistic Novel of Oxford and London Life. Third Edition, with a new Preface. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

"The book is clever and original, very brilliant, very forcible, very read.... It is perfect in its way, in style, clear, sharp, and forcible, the dialogue epigrammatic and sparkling.... Enough has been said to show that 'The Hypocrite' is a striking and powerful piece of work, and that its author has established his claim to be considered a writer of originality and brilliance."—Daily Telegraph.

"* TO THE PUBLIC.—'The Hypocrite' has been boycotted by Messrs. Mudie as being unfit for circulation in their libraries, yet it has been highly praised by the Press as being a powerful sermon and a moral book."

THE RESURRECTION of HIS GRACE: a New Sporting Novel. By CAMPBELL RAB-BROWN, Author of "Kissing Cup's Race." Crown 8vo, art cloth, 2s. 6d.

"A grotesquely improbable story, but readers of sporting novels will find some amusement in 'The Resurrection of His Grace.'"—Saturday Review.

"A sporting romance which is indisputably cleverly written.... The book is full of interesting items of sporting life, which, no doubt, are fascinating to lovers of the turf."—St. James's Budget.

"An ingeniously horrible story with a diabolically clever plot."—Star.

ANNA MARSDEN'S EXPERI- MENT. An Interesting Story with a Novel Plot. By ANNA WILLIAMS. Crown 8vo, art cloth, 2s. 6d.

"The hand that wrote 'The Silver King' has by no means lost its cunning in pointing broad effects of light and shadow. The description of life in Broadmoor is, we fancy, done from actual observation. It is quite new."—Family Rev.
"A story which holds our attention and interests us right from the first chapter. The book is as exciting as even a story of sensation has any need to be."—Black and White.

"The author's descriptive powers vividly portraying the lovely spots by the winding Trent, while the rich dialect of the district is so faithfully reproduced as to become not the least feature of an exciting tale."—Manchester Courier.

RUSSIA. By HERFORD B. GEORGE, Fellow of New College, Oxford. With many Maps and Plans in Colours. Cloth, 12s. 6d.

The main purpose of this book is to present a full and clear account of the greatest and most disastrous military undertaking in history, without entering too deeply into technicalities uninteresting to the ordinary reader. The cause of the war and the peculiar relations between the European Powers, some of them Napoleon's nominal allies and others his sworn enemies, are also dealt with, and are illustrated from sources hitherto unpublished, including papers of Metternich in the Austrian archives.

The Literary Week.

AFTER the May meetings the Congress of Publishers. We are not at liberty to name the subjects which will engage the Congress, but among them will be an account of an institution peculiar to Holland—viz., classes for training boys to be publishers. There is a strong desire to see the United States and Holland brought within the pale of the Convention of Berne, on which international copyright rests, and this subject will receive attention. On the last day of the Congress (Friday, June 9), the delegates, numbering 200, will be entertained by the Master, Wardens, and Court of the Stationers' Company. We are also informed that Mr. Murray has received the permission of the Queen to conduct the delegates to Windsor Castle, where the royal library—not usually shown to the public—will be opened to their inspection.

THE Queen's birthday produced a little burst of song, among the singers being a poet whose voice is now too seldom heard—Mr. F. W. H. Myers. Mr. Myers's first stanza has a fine rhetorical swing:

To her beneath whose steadfast star
From pole to pole, in lusty play,
Her English wander, forcing far
Their world-ingathering way:
Outsoar the Caesar's eagle flight,
Outrun the Macedonian reign,
Flash from the flamy Northern night
Speech to the Austral main.

As a piece of literary dove-tailing, Mr. A. C. Benson's new stanza, appended to the late Bishop of Wakefield's hymn "O King of Kings," is masterly.

THE Sunday papers came and went like a short-lived epidemic. Both of them—the Sunday Daily Telegraph and the Sunday Daily Mail—are to be in some measure restored to life in the form of Saturday budgets, which people may keep for Sunday reading if they wish to. But their Sunday publication is done—a fine testimony to the power of the public voice.

SUNDAY having been saved, Saturday is trebly threatened; for the Daily News, which opposed the new Sunday papers with consistent energy, is not going to stand idly by and watch its rivals developing Saturday. It announces a special illustrated penny Saturday publication of its own, under the title: the Daily News Weekly. We do not wish to say anything discouraging about legitimate journalistic enterprise, but really the prospect of three new Saturday budgets is rather disturbing.

YET there is one class of people, at any rate, that must look with favour on the new papers—those who have a commercial connexion with the Arts. There lies before us, for example, the balance-sheet of a company which makes process-blocks for illustrated periodicals. The profits have risen from £1,637 in 1889, when the company was formed, to £4,628 last year.

M. JUSSERAND'S Shakespeare in France was published just too soon to take note of Madame Sarah Bernhardt's extraordinary performance of "Hamlet," which is now exciting Paris and has indirectly almost caused the death of one of the actress's principal admirers, M. Catulle Mendès. The translators, MM. Morand and Marcel Schwob, have made certain cuts, among them being the famous speech of Polonius to Laertes, without which Polonius cannot be fully apprehended by the audience. The number of scenes has been reduced to fifteen. We are glad to see that Madame Sarah Bernhardt will include "Hamlet" in her next London repertory.

IN succession to M. Sarcey, M. Gustave Larroumet, who is ex-director of the Department of Fine Arts, is writing the dramatic feuilleton in the Temps. M. Larroumet contributed a warm appreciation of M. Sarcey to the Figaro last week.

AT the next meeting of the Dante Society, the Italian Ambassador will read a paper on "Dante as a Business Man." This opens out an attractive vista of subjects. May we suggest to other lecturers that they should consider the claims of Sir Thomas Lipton as a Mystic.

Count Tolstoi as a Sprinter.

FIONA MACLEOD'S protest against speculations concerning her identity would seem not yet to have reached Hampstead. A correspondent informs us that in the catalogue of the Public Library of that parish is the following entry:

Robins (E.), Miss F. Macleod. "The Open Question."

A WRITER in Le Journal has discovered to his surprise, and doubtless to the surprise of his readers, that the adoption of the phrase "high life" by Parisians was anticipated by Victor Hugo. In Toilers of the Sea the master wrote: "Un jour, une belle dame de la 'high life.'" It will be observed that Hugo endows "high life" with the feminine gender, following the French la haute vie.

THE centenary of Thomas Hood's birth occurred on Tuesday—he was born on May 23, 1799. In selections he will be read probably as long as any English poet not of the first rank, and much more often than several who are of the first rank but who lacked his power to touch the heart. His best short lyrics, "Ruth," "The Death Bed," and "'Twas in the Time of Roses," have an enduring simplicity and tenderness. His excursion into the grimly picturesque—"The Dream of Eugene Aram"—is very good indeed; and in the sardonic, in "Miss Kilmannsegg" and the "Ode to Rae Wilson," he touches a high mark. But probably in the distant future it will be "The Death Bed" by which Hood will be known. Of his comic work people are already tired. Fun which is dependent upon puns cannot long make an appeal. No return to it is possible. But Hood's best puns were almost miraculous.

THOMAS HOOD.

IRONISTS must always expect to be misunderstood. Mr. Whiteing's satire, No. 5, John Street, was last Sunday referred to in a sermon in the Abbey by Canon Robinson, who failed with extraordinary completeness to take the author's point. Said he of Mr. Whiteing: "He leaves much out of sight, but he sees what he sees; and he is amazed and horrified, and he cries for a Redemption. His 'Epilogue' is Christianity without the name. It could not have been written if Christianity had never been; though he writes as if he were wholly unconscious of what Christianity is. He cries for a Prophet to proclaim the truth of Brotherhood. He cries for a Church to realise Brotherhood in a visible and tangible form. Has he never read the Gospel? Has he never read the Acts of the Apostles? Has he never read St. Paul? Has he never seen that the Prophet and the Church, and the Philosophy of both, fill the pages of the New Testament?" We fancy that Mr. Whiteing has read all these. It is possible that his familiarity with some forms of inoperative Christianity inspired his Epilogue.

THE sale of the Wright collections of portraits and autograph letters will occupy a whole week, beginning on June 12. The catalogue which Messrs. Sotheby have issued is in itself a very worthy and unique volume. We quote three short extracts. This is Dr. Goldsmith:

Mr. Goldsmith's best respects to Mr. Craddock, when he asked him to-day, he quite forgot an engagement of above a week's standing, which has been made purposely for him, he feels himself quite uneasy at not being permitted to have his instructions upon those parts where he must necessarily be defective. He will have a rehearsal on Monday, when if Mr. Craddock would come and afterwards take a bit of mutton chop it would add to his other obligations.

This is Dr. Johnson (September 29, 1784):

It is a great pleasure to a sick man to discover that sickness is not always mortal, so for age, yet living for a greater age. This, however, whatever Rochefaucault or Swift may say, though certainly part of the pleasure, yet not all of it. I rejoice in the welfare of those whom I love, and who love me, and surely should have the same joy, if I were no longer subject to mortality.

And this is David Garrick:

The little ingenious Mr. Garrick and the ingenious little Hogarth will take the opportunity of the plump doctor's being with you, to hie away to the Rev. Rigdum Funnidos, Old Alresford, there to be as merry, facetious, mad, and nonsensical as liberty, property, and old October can make 'em. Wants no kickshaws, nothing but laugh and plumb-pudding.

MARK TWAIN is intending to return to America at the end of this year and settle in Florida. He will be in London for a short time in the summer and then stay in Scotland for a while. He has lately been at work on a book which is, he says, a portrait gallery of the remarkable people whom he has met from his childhood upwards, including, like Chambers's Biographical Dictionary, monarchs and desperadoes, poets and lawyers.

BUT this new book is not to see the light of day for one hundred years; which is writing for posterity with a vengeance. The portraits therein, Mark told a Times representative, are drawn solely for his own pleasure in the work, and with the single object of telling the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, without malice, and to serve no grudge, but, at the same time, without respect of persons or social conventions, institutions, or pruderies of any kind. These portraits of men and women, painted with all their warts, as well as with every attractive feature which has caught his eye, will not be written in the style of Mark Twain's books, which their author anticipates will be forgotten by the time his gallery is published. Any humour they may contain will be entirely unsought. It must be inherent in the subject if it is to appear in the portrait.

IN Mark Twain's own words, "a book that is not to be published for a century gives the writer a freedom which he could secure in no other way. We have lost a great deal in the past through a lack of books written in this way for a remote posterity. A man cannot tell the whole truth about himself, even if convinced that what he wrote would never be seen by others. I have personally satisfied myself of that and have got others to test it also. You cannot lay bare your private soul and look at it. You are too much ashamed of yourself. It is too disgusting. For that reason I confine myself to drawing the portraits of others." Mark Twain is simply doing of deliberate intention very much what Pepys did by accident.

THE humourist would seem to have more faith in the permanence of books than Mr. Wells has. In the glimpses of the future given in his new story, When the Sleeper Wakes, we see printed stories superseded by elaborate kinetoscope pictures, in which the characters move and speak. Mr. Wells's list of the books of this generation which will be preserved two hundred years hence is interesting. He fastens on Mr. Kipling ("The Man Who would be King"), Mr. Conrad ("The Heart of Darkness"), and Mr. Henry James ("The Madonna of the Future") as three authors whose fame will endure at any rate as long as that. But not in books—in double cylinders.

In an age of odd and seemingly irrelevant revelations nothing more odd has come under our notice than the pamphlet entitled A Psycho-Physical Study of Zola's Personality, with Illustrations: his Physical and Mental Peculiarities, Nervous System, Finger Imprints, Morbid Ideas, &c., which reaches us from Chicago. Zola, whose passion for truth governs his life, expresses himself interested in the document; but exactly how it is valuable to others we cannot determine. That the mental idiosyncracies of a man of notable intellect may be worth putting on record we can believe; but his "anthropometrical measurements"! Thus: length of left foot, 262 mm.; width of right ear, 31 mm.; sitting height, 890 mm.

M. ZOLA AS A CHILD.

Thus is a little better:

Another morbid idea is arithmetical mania. He says this is a result of his instinct for order. When in the street he counts the gas-jets, the number of doors, and especially the number of hacks. In his home he counts the steps of the staircases, the different things on his bureau; he must touch the same pieces of furniture a certain number of times before he goes to sleep.

From this desire to count arise superstitions; certain numbers have a bad influence for him: if by adding to the number of a hack he obtains a superstitious number, he will not hire the hack; or if he is obliged to, he fears some evil will befall him, as not to succeed on the errand he is upon. For some time "3" was a good number; to-day "7" reassures him: thus in the night he opens his eyes seven times to prove that he is not going to die. But the number 17, which reminds him of an important date that fate has willed, disturbs him.

We reproduce from the pamphlet a photograph of Zola as a child. And for the benefit of any English novelist who may wish to be the subject of a similarly exhaustive inventory we may add that the author's name is Arthur MacDonald.

THE first number of the Chord, a new quarterly devoted to music, lies before us. The little work proceeds from the Unicorn Press. The contributors belong to the new school of musical criticism, among them being Mr. Vernon Blackburn and Mr. J. F. Runciman. Tchaikowsky finds in "Israfel" a glowing eulogist.

MR. BURNAND's chapters of autobiography in the Pall Mall Magazine reveal two unexpected circumstances. One is that Mr. Meredith gave him his first start as a literary man—but how is not explained; and the other that that excellent chapter in Happy Thoughts describing the hero's difficulties in the library of the wrong Frazer's house, had foundation in fact in the library of Thackeray's house. A Punch dinner was "held" under Thackeray's roof, and afterwards the great man asked Mr. Burnand to get him a book from the shelves. Mr. Burnand did his best, but he could not dislodge the volume. It was a dummy. Thackeray then asked him to try in the next room for it. "Certainly," I said, eager to show my readiness, and to put myself on the best possible terms with the great man. So I turned to go to the door in the direction he had indicated. No door; all books. Then, on looking round, it seemed to me that there was no door: books everywhere. Yet we must have entered by some door, out of the dining-room; and here we were! and others had gone out by another door; but where? Were we in a room without any doors? 'I'll show you,' he said; and then, intently enjoying my puzzlement, he put his hand in among the books in the case—all dummies, every one—and, turning a handle, opened the door leading into the dining-room."

AUTHOR and publisher can be at variance without rancour, perhaps without knowing it. The prospectus of a new book of verse called An Epic of the Soul illustrates this difference. Says the author: "This cycle of eighty short poems, of a new form, records the experience of one who has sounded the depths of doubt and despair, and emerged into light on the further side." Says the publisher: "Printed in best style, on feather-weight paper, with deckle edges, and bound in white vellum, gilt top, with title on back and on cover in gold."

LISTS of errata can be amusing. A little pamphlet collection of stories reaches us from America with a quite disproportionate list of errata at the end. Here are some:

- Page 7, line 22, "depths" should be "debts."
- " 12, " 28, "streak" should be "stream."
- " 17, " 20, "loud, maddening" should be "land-maddening."
- " 22, "To Mary E. Wilkins" should be "C."
- " 23, line 27, "irritableness" should be "inevitableness."
- " 25, " 37, "did not know" should be "did know."

WE erroneously stated the price of Messrs. T. & T. Clark's Dictionary of the Bible in reviewing the first two volumes last week. The volumes are 28s. each; not 14s.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Some little time ago you had a competition for books that are wanted. Might I suggest the desirability of a dictionary of early printers—say to 1600 or 1650—giving their trade marks, peculiarities of style or matter, and more important or rare works? Possibly such a work exists (? in French); if so, I should be much obliged if you could tell me of it."

PERHAPS the curious fate of Lord Curzon's unpublished book is not generally understood. It was ready when Lord Curzon was appointed Viceroy, and its forthcoming publication was announced in the Times. The paragraph was seen in "high quarters," and an intimation was given that the appearance of a book on India by the Viceroy of India was not desirable. The fact that Lord Curzon's book referred to travels on the frontier in years gone by did not prevail; and the result was that Lord Curzon gave instructions that publication should be put off indefinitely, and sailed for India. The book now lies in type. "The next step," says the New York Critic, "will probably be the taking down of the type, unless, indeed, Lord Curzon cares to rent it until he ceases to be the Indian Viceroy, five years hence."

To the "William Black Lifeboat Memorial Fund" the sum of £330 has now been subscribed. The Committee has lately been strengthened by a number of American literary men, and all over the United Kingdom the interests of the Fund are in good hands. The figure of £2,000 is aimed at.

JULÈS CLARETIE says that a "well-informed" diplomatist said to him recently: "There are four people in the whole of England who do not wish for a war with France: the Queen, Lord Salisbury, Mr. Balfour, and sir John Morley."

Bibliographical.

THE centenary of the birth of Thomas Hood has brought with it a gratifying, yet rather amusing, amount of erudition on the part of the daily and the weekly press. The fuss made is a little diverting, for as a rule we have heard little of poor Hood. He is not among those from whom the literati habitually quote. The "Song of the Shirt" and "The Bridge of Sighs" are naturally voted trite; and there has never been anything to show that the average writing man had ever read the "Midsummer Fairies" or the Sonnets. In the Golden Treasury Hood is represented by three pieces only—"The Bridge of Sighs," "Past and Present," and "The Death Bed" (which, in his first edition, Mr. Palgrave deprived of its third verse!). Mr. Austin Dobson, too, when he came to "select" Hood for Mr. Ward's English Poets, chose only "The Bridge of Sighs," "The Death Bed," and "A Parental Ode" as representative examples of Hood's work. From the critics, in fact, Hood, as a poet, has never received any assistance worth speaking of.

If Hood's verse, both "serious" and "comic," is not well known to the lieges, it certainly ought to be. Books, of course, are usually bought as furniture or for decorative purposes; still, a good many people probably have dipped into the many editions of Hood's rhymes which have been produced within the last decade or two. It is quite a long time—some fourteen years—since Messrs. Routledge put the "serious" and the "comic" verse into their cheap and handy Pocket Library. About the same time the Poems were included in Messrs. Cassell's Red Library. There were other editions in 1890, 1891, and 1893, the last-named year witnessing a reprint of Hood's novel, Tynney Hall. Two years ago Messrs. Warne included Hood's verse in their Albion Library, and Messrs. Macmillan gave to it two volumes in their "Eversley" series. Last year, again, Messrs. Routledge issued cheap editions of the Poems. By the way, Hood in Scotland, which has just been re-reviewed, came out originally in 1885.

More than one reference has been made these last few days to Landor's tribute to "the witty and the tender Hood." It is, of course, by no means the only tribute of the kind. There is Leigh Hunt's in "The Feast of the Poets":

... a right poet also was Hood, and could vary
His jokes with deep fancies of Centaur and Fairy.

There are Lowell's lines "To the Memory of Hood," and W. C. Bennett's in his Verdicts:

Thou by whom equal humour and pathos were shown,
Thou heart with a tenderness all woman's own,
Thou finest of spirits thy througed age has known!

Very enthusiastic, too, is Gerald Massey's testimony to his brother bard:

The world may never know the wealth it lost
When Hood went darkling to his tearful tomb,
So mighty in his undeveloped force.

The announcement of a new book by Mr. Hamlin Garland—to be published in this country, which he has just visited for the first time—reminds one that his work is already pretty familiar to English readers. We have had, for instance, in tolerably quick succession, his Little Norsk, his Spoil of Office, his Prairie Songs, his Prairie Folks, his Main-Travelled Roads, his Crumbling Idols (essays on art, literature, and the drama), his Rose of Dutcher's Coolly, and his Wayside Courtships—all within half a dozen years or so. This seems to indicate a certain measure of popularity on this "side."

I see Dr. Andrew Wilson has been quoting in the Illustrated London News some stanzas which he "thinks he is right in attributing to the late Lord Neaves." Lord Neaves certainly did write "The Leather Bottel," but not quite as Dr. Wilson quotes him. Of the three stanzas which Dr. Wilson prints, the first two differ pretty considerably from the authorised text as given in "Songs and Verses, Social and Scientific," to which the readers of the Illustrated London News may be advised to make reference.

In the June number of the Cornhill, a writer reproduces from "The Shotover Papers" (Oxford, 1874-5) two stanzas of the Swinburne parody entitled "Procuratores," and beginning:

O vestment of velvet and virtue!

He adds: "The author of this parody was, I believe, Mr. Ivan Müller, then of New College." This is quite true; and "Procuratores," along with other verses by Mr. Müller, may be found, with Mr. Müller's name appended to them, in a volume, published by Routledge, called Comic Poets of the Nineteenth Century.

Reviews.

Liddell of "Liddell and Scott."

Henry George Liddell, D.D. A Memoir. By the Rev. Henry L. Thompson. (Murray. 16s.)

IN the Oxford of ten years ago Liddell loomed large. The memory of a distinguished Vice-Chancellorship, the prestige of "the House," the already ancient fame of the great Lexicon, gave him a position and authority second only to that of "little Benjamin, their ruler." And even in a mostly celibate society the fine bearing and handsome demeanour of the man, which the portraits we reproduce abundantly illustrate, added to the impression. For sixty-two years, from his matriculation in 1830 to his resignation in 1892, with the exception of the decade which he spent at the closely related foundation of Westminster, Liddell's career was bound up and identified with the fortunes of what is in some respects the doyen of Oxford colleges—Christ Church. Mr. Thompson's memoir is naturally somewhat academic and reserved, but it furnishes the material for a fairly lifelike portrait, differing in great joy to the Sixth Form boys of Westminster to find a weak point. Story had it that on such occasions Liddell would say: "I can't think what Mr. Scott meant by saying that." And an audacious wag once showed up to the headmaster the following epigram:

Two men wrote a Lexicon, Liddell and Scott;
Some parts were clever, but some parts were not.
Hear, all ye learned, and read me this riddle,
How the wrong part wrote Scott, and the right part wrote Liddell.

Between 1833 and 1846 Liddell became successively Tutor of Christ Church, Reader in Greek, and Whyte's Professor of Moral Philosophy. In the latter year he married and was appointed by Gaisford Headmaster of Westminster. Here he did good work, for the school had fallen into the hands of incompetent ushers and sorely needed wise steersmanship. During his tenure of office Liddell found time to write an excellent History of Rome. He was not sorry, however, on Gaisford's death, to come back to Christ Church as Dean, and with the exception of the inevitable work on the Lexicon, the rest of his life was devoted to the service of the College and the University.

THE LATE DEAN LIDDELL AT DIFFERENT PERIODS OF HIS LIFE.

more than one way from the traditional Liddell of undergraduate legend.

The reminiscences of his early life which Liddell himself preserved do not paint his schooldays in bright colours. At his first school an ingenious form of torture was in vogue:

We little boys were made to sit at the long desks with our hands over our eyes, and certain big fellows, having needles fixed in little balls of sealing wax, blew these missiles through pea-shooters, so as to pin our ears to our heads.

Charterhouse, to which Liddell went on, was almost equally rough. The boys seemed to have "pigged it" a good deal, and to have learnt less than might be expected from the reputation of the headmaster, Dr. Russell, who was something of a faddist. Liddell, personally, after three years' experience, still dates his letters from "Beastly Charterhouse." At Christ Church, and under that really great scholar Gaisford, he found himself more in his element. The Lexicon, in which his colleague was Robert Scott, afterwards Master of Balliol, was begun soon after he took his degree, and was completed in about ten years. But he was at work upon it, revising and improving, up to the end of his life. It was really a credit to English scholarship, and, in a letter written shortly after its publication, Liddell records with some pride how the famous Dindorf had now relinquished his intention of doing similar work. Of course it is not infallible, and it was a

On the inner life of Liddell Mr. Thompson is, perhaps, more chary of throwing light than could be wished. In his youth, like most of his contemporaries, he came under the influence of Pusey and Newman. He writes as follows of the great opponent of the Tractarians, Dr. Arnold:

Arnold came, saw, and, of course, did not conquer. I am sorry to say that his physiognomy by no means counteracts the extremely unpleasant notion I had been led to form of him from the "Malignants" article. A more savage, truculent expression than that day sate upon his brow I think I never saw.

This naïve fashion of painting your adversary as a devil is not uncharacteristic of theological controversy, but the portrait will come as a surprise to the readers of Stanley's Life of Arnold. In another letter of the same date he appeals to Vaughan, afterwards Professor of Modern History: "I hope you have already signed a petition against admitting Dissenters to the Universities. If not, you will find one either at Rivington's or Hatchard's, whither instantly repair, and enrol your name among all the good and wise of the land." These polemical utterances are singularly at variance with Liddell's later attitude on the question of University Reform. The real fact is, that with Liddell the Tractarian phase was even more transient than it was with Mark Pattison, or with Froude. The bent of his mind was not theological, and his interests, outside scholarship, were mainly concerned with matters of art. Of the Martyrs' Memorial he very characteristically writes:

There are, and will be, many difficulties about it, arising from the disturbed state of the theological opinion, both generally in the country and particularly at Oxford. However, I hope the thing may be got successfully forward. If so, when the architectural question of what is to be comes to be discussed I shall take a very lively interest in the business.

This detachment from theology, and indeed from speculation generally, seems to have lasted throughout Liddell's life. Abstract ideas had but the slightest attraction for him; he was at heart a "practical" man. Mr. Thompson quotes some interesting extracts from letters written after his resignation of the Deanery to Sir Thomas and Sir Henry Acland:

I fear I share Mountague Bernard's opinion that, after forty, Metaphysics become distasteful. I have so long discontinued any study of Speculative Philosophy, and am so ignorant of what has been said or written by moderns, such as Herbert Spencer, Lotze, &c., that I could not give any judgment worth a farthing. I fear the present generation care little for such things, and that any attempt to popularise them would meet with small encouragement. I only wonder at your energy in continuing to pass speculative thoughts through the filter of your brain.

And, again:

As to faith, I suppose you mean that the old provinces of faith are being invaded by conviction of new facts inconsistent with their maintenance. Must this not be so. It is a question whether, after a certain age, it is worth while, as a matter of duty, to go into such questions. I, for instance, do not feel the least inclination to read the Gifford Lectures by (I forget his name), if he attempts to solve transcendental questions by abstract reasonings. The history of religion must be interesting. The philosophy of religion may be barren and provoking.

We have referred to Liddell's taste for art. He was an excellent draughtsman, as some examples from the Christ Church Common-Room blotting-paper, gathered up by a friend after a committee meeting and reproduced by Mr. Thompson, show. He was a close friend of Mr. Ruskin's, who in a well-known passage of the Præterita speaks of him as "one of the rarest types of nobly-presenced Englishmen, . . . a man sorrowfully under the dominion of the Greek ἀνάγκη—the present Dean." Ruskin regretted that one who could draw should give himself up to business and lexicons. And Liddell, in his turn, describes the Ruskin of undergraduate days as "a very strange fellow, always dressing in a great-coat with a brown velvet collar and a large neckcloth tied over his mouth, and living quite in his own way among the odd set of hunting and sporting men that gentlemen commoners usually are." Mr. Thompson prints two long and interesting letters from Ruskin, written in 1844, and replying to criticisms of Liddell's upon Modern Painters.

Dean Liddell's is a worthy figure to stand in the long line of rulers of the "House," which includes such names as Fell, Aldrich, Atterbury, Jackson, and Gaisford. A certain sternness and austerity of demeanour which marked his relations with undergraduates was due to shyness and reserve; and in later life became softened—so his biographer declares—into something approaching geniality.

The Prince of Critics.

"JULES JANIN, who has been dubbed the prince of critics, would be completely unknown to the present generation if he had not called the lobster, which he had only seen after it had been boiled, 'the cardinal of the seas.'"

The Hymn and the Hymnist.

The Hymn Lover: an Account of the Rise and Growth of English Hymnody. By W. Garrett Horder. Second Edition, Revised. (J. Curwen & Sons.)

Hymns and Hymn-Writers of the Church Hymnary. By Rev. J. Brownlie. (Henry Frowde.)

Of the two books cited above, the second is a series of brief notices, critical and biographical, of the hymn-writers whose work appears in the Presbyterian Church Hymnary. It is well done, and very useful within its necessarily limited scope. At the same time, the Church Hymnary casts so wide a net that Mr. Brownlie's book is really more comprehensive than the mere title would lead one to expect. Mr. Horder's work, on the other hand, is really a history of English Hymnody, and well deserves the second edition into which it has gone. The criticism is good, and it does excellent service by its copious quotations of hymns good but little known.

There is a general and a conventional sense of the term "hymn." In the general sense it may signify elaborate poems, including litanies—poems quite unfit for congregational use. The Orphic hymns, for example, are litanies. Of the purely poetical class we may take Catullus' hymn to Diana. A free translation of the first stanzas will show how unfit it would be for general use:

Diana's servitors are we,
We girls and boys in chastity;
Diana, boys in chastity
And girls go we a-singing.
O rich-haired Leto's progeny,
Great offspring of great Jove on high,
When did the olives canopy
Thy Delian forthbringing;
The mistress of the heights to be,
And have the woods in sovereignty,
And groves' recessed secrecy,
And streams' unravished springing.

That is no hymn in our narrower sense. In the accepted conventional sense, a hymn should be a metrical composition addressed to a higher power than man, and at the same time characterised by certain special limitations. It must be a song, in the strictest sense of that word—singable and sufficiently brief. It must, like all songs, be in a metre light and unintricate enough for musical setting; and, above all, it must be direct enough in expression for popular comprehension. This last qualification explains why there are many successful hymns, but few good hymns.

Hymns, in our signification, are almost, perhaps quite, unknown in pagan religions. The Orphic hymns, we have said, were litanies; so were the Egyptian hymns to Osiris and others as they have reached us; they are a string of the god's titles and attributes. The reason is that there was no public worship except on festival anniversaries; the services were and are conducted by the priests and their assistants in the privacy of the temple—often at night. The multitude might go in if they pleased and make their solitary individual prayer; but there was no organised public ritual, therefore no congregational prayer. So it is to-day in India. As for Buddhism, it has no prayer; a man may meditate on divine things, and try to make himself better thereby, but there is no help from the devas, who are at most but powers of the universe. You might as well pray to the Lord Chief Justice to keep you out of Clerkenwell. It is a religion of pure self-help and unbending fate.

From the Hebrew psalms is the origin of Christian hymnody. Yet the Assyrian hymns show whence the Jews got the model of their psalms. Read but this:

My Lord, in the anger of His heart, has punished me;
God in the strength of His heart has taken me;
Ishtar, my mother, has seized upon me and put me to grief.

God, who knoweth that I knew not, has afflicted me;
 Ishtar, my mother, who knoweth that I knew not, has caused darkness.
 I prayed, and none takes my hand;
 I wept, and none held my palm;
 I cry aloud, but there is none that will hear me;
 I am in darkness and hiding, and dare not look up.

This is sufficiently Hebraic; but the hymn in its modern conventional sense was developed in the Middle Ages; and the finest hymns ever written are unfortunately in Latin. English hymns really begin with the seventeenth century. Then later Dr. Watts inaugurated the prolific period of hymn-writing, and yet later in the eighteenth century the two Wesleys flooded the land with hymns and hymn-writers. Finally, about the middle of this century, there has been a fresh outbreak of hymns, the result of the diffusion of modern poetry; and this still continues. The hymns of the seventeenth century are few, and, with the exception of an occasional piece, such as Bishop Ken's Evening Hymn, they have been surpassed in popularity; but in quality they are among the best of the language. They have a terseness, a freshness of idea and expression, which more recent writers too often miss. Let us quote one, not only because it is fine in itself, but because it is the work of a famous master of English prose, whom few people are aware to have left any verse at all. We mean the Evening Hymn of Sir Thomas Browne:

The night is come, like to the day,
 Depart not Thou, great God, away.
 Let not my sins, black as the night,
 Eclipse the lustre of Thy light.
 Keep still in my horizon; for to me
 The sun makes not the day, but Thee.
 Thou, whose nature cannot sleep,
 On my temples sentry keep;
 Guard me 'gainst those watchful foes
 Whose eyes are open while mine close.
 Let no dreams my head infest
 But such as Jacob's temples blest.
 While I do rest, my soul advance;
 Make my sleep a holy trance:
 That I may, my rest being wrought,
 Awake into some holy thought;
 And with as active vigour run
 My course as doth the nimble sun.
 Sleep is a death;—O make me try,
 By sleeping, what it is to die!
 And as gently lay my head
 On my grave as now my bed.
 How'er I rest, great God, let me
 Awake again at last with Thee;
 And thus assured, behold I lie
 Securely, or to wake or die.

This is probably the germ of Bishop Ken's well-known Evening Hymn, and it seems a model of what a hymn should be. The simplest may understand it, the most cultivated delight in it. We need only point to the few true hymns of George Herbert or of Herrick, whose reputation is established; but we may note one or two excellent hymns by John Austin, which are but now emerging from an undeserved neglect. "Jerusalem, my happy home," belongs to this time, and is anonymous—like many good things, from Westminster Abbey downwards.

John Mason preceded Watts, also in the later seventeenth century, and one very fine hymn of his is quoted by Mr. Horder. He, too, is regaining his due place nowadays. Of Watts we need not speak, or the Wesleys. All of them were epoch-making as hymn-writers; and if Watts be somewhat overrated as regards the intrinsic value of his work, that cannot be said of Charles Wesley. After them the soil yields scanty fruit. There is an occasional hymn deservedly remembered, such as Toplady's famous "Rock of Ages." But, on the whole, it was a fallow period, down to the middle of our own century.

Then came the influence of the great modern poets. Cowper had, indeed, written, with John Newton, the celebrated Olney Hymns, but he produced no followers. Now everybody was writing verse, and hymnody shared in the revival. Thomas Kelly, James Montgomery, Bishop Heber, lead off the way. Montgomery is really an apostle of the present-day hymn, and the excellence of his work needs no comment. Heber did good service also in raising the standard of taste. And then comes Keble, with The Christian Year, and we are in the full tide of the revival. To mention individuals is impossible, so numerous are those with claims to attention. Let us consider the general character of present-day hymnody, and quote a few of the less-known specimens.

Modern hymn-writing is much more refined than that of the eighteenth century—aims much more at artistic merit. It is also more various in form and metre. But, on the other hand, it tends to diffuseness. Compared with the seventeenth century this is very noticeable. Keble himself, with all his merits, sadly lacked compression. His friend Newman beats him here; compression is the great merit which makes amends for much defective in the artistic finish of Newman's verse. Yet, in an occasional stanza, Keble can be striking and compact. Mr. Horder justly cites the following:

Two worlds are ours: 'tis only sin
 Forbids us to descry
 The mystic heaven and earth within,
 Plain as the earth and sky.

That is admirable and rememberable. But if this fault mar Keble, what shall we say of Faber, whom Mr. Horder lauds to the skies? His translations are his best; and doubtless some of his original hymns are less faulty than those which are most popular. But those hymns, such as "O Paradise!" are almost more than diffuse, they are gushing. Only a richer imagination than Faber possessed as a poet could carry off such loose flinging of one's emotional arms abroad. Diffuseness, either emotional or gently sentimental, is the characteristic fault of the modern hymn. There are exceptions. Such is an excellent hymn by Anstico, which the reader will find on p. 167 of Mr. Horder's book. But we quote in preference Samuel Greg's really fine hymn on the Transfiguration—finished, compact, direct in utterance, without triviality:

Stay, Master, stay upon this heavenly hill:
 A little longer, let us linger still;
 With these three mighty ones of old beside,
 Near to the Awful Presence still abide;
 Before the throne of light we trembling stand,
 And catch a glimpse into the spirit-land.

Stay, Master, stay! we breathe a purer air;
 This life is not the life that waits us there:
 Thoughts, feelings, flashes, glimpses come and go:
 We cannot speak them—nay, we do not know;
 Wrapt in this cloud of light we seem to be
 The thing we fain would grow—eternally.

"No!" saith the Lord, "the hour is past,—we go;
 Our home, our life, our duties lie below.
 While here we kneel upon the mount of prayer,
 The plough lies waiting in the furrow there!
 Here we sought God that we might know His will:
 There we must do it,—serve Him,—seek Him still."

If man aspires to reach the throne of God,
 O'er the dull plains of earth must lie the road.
 He who best does his lowly duty here,
 Shall mount the highest in a nobler sphere:
 At God's own feet our spirits seek their rest,
 And he is nearest Him who serves Him best.

Dean Stanley imitated this hymn, but certainly fails to equal Greg. His hymn is much more artificial—flamboyant, in fact.

The name of Neale is eminent as a translator of the mediæval and Eastern hymns. He stands with Faber and Casswall as the three who have done the most valuable work in such translation. Neale especially is remarkable for the number and general felicity of his renderings. But with Bonar, Rawson, Gill, Ellerton, and a hundred others each having his right to consideration, the modern field is too crowded for separate reference. Yet take these hardly known lines by Sarah Williams, compact, sincere, and clear, which we may thank Mr. Horder for quoting :

Because I knew not when my life was good,
And when there was a light upon my path,
But turned my soul perversely to the dark—
O Lord, I do repent.

Because I held upon my selfish road,
And left my brother wounded by the way,
And called ambition duty, and pressed on—
O Lord, I do repent.

Because I spent the strength Thou gavest me
In struggle which Thou never didst ordain,
And have but dregs of life to offer Thee—
O Lord, I do repent.

Because I was impatient, would not wait,
But thrust my impious hand across Thy threads,
And marred the pattern drawn out for my life—
O Lord, I do repent.

Because Thou hast borne with me all this while,
Hast smitten me with love until I weep,
Hast called me as a mother calls her child—
O Lord, I do repent.

There is a hymn by Mrs. Charles, also excellent in a different way; antithetical, but having the same unfeminine quality of compression. And that is what we need. The national quality of our extensive hymn literature is terseness, firmness, gravity, dignity, weight. The more we aim at restoring that quality, the better the prospect for the future. We have gone far enough in the direction of modern freedom—too far. "License they mean when they cry Liberty" should not be true of hymn-writers.

A Budget of Kindliness.

Reminiscences. By Justin McCarthy. 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus. 24s.)

MR. MCCARTHY has a good word for everybody. Out of the friendships, the rivalries, the innumerable acquaintances of forty-seven years he distills not a drop of gall. Faults and weaknesses which have acquired a traditional acceptance have no lodgment in his memory. Thackeray an inordinate admirer of rank, a snob worthy of his own collection of snobs? "So far as I knew or could observe Thackeray, I had no reason to believe that he had any defect of the kind. I had known him to be on the most friendly terms with men and women who had nothing whatever of rank or station to recommend them to his notice." Mr. McCarthy tells, with admirable point, a story of a real tuft-hunter who claimed to be of good family, and who "was always boasting of the fact and telling you of his high connections, bringing out the names of his first cousin the marquis, and his second cousin the duchess," &c. This man made the acquaintance of Thackeray, and was proud of it. One day, says Mr. McCarthy,

I met him at the Garrick Club, and he suddenly began to talk to me about Thackeray. "Now, look here," he said, "you always refuse to believe that Thackeray worships the aristocracy. I'll give you a convincing proof that he does, a proof that I got only this very day. Do you see this cigar?" He held one out between his fingers, and I admitted that I did see it. "Well," he said, "that cigar was given to me by Thackeray; and do you know what he said when he was giving it to me?" I had to admit that I could not form any guess as to what Thackeray might have said. So he went on with an air of triumph. "Well," he said, "Thackeray's words to me were these: 'Now, my dear fellow, here is a cigar which I know you will be delighted to have, because it is one of a box that was given to me by a marquis': Now what have you to say?" I had nothing to say. I could have said: "I really didn't know that Thackeray was as well acquainted with you as all that," but I controlled my tongue, and the conversation dropped.

Under the warm rays of Mr. McCarthy's recollection the men and women of yesterday show the best sides of their characters. George Eliot, an "overbearing" hostess, "filled with intellectual pride"? "I can only say that the opinion I formed of George Eliot's manner as an intellectual hostess was, curiously, the very reverse." Cardinal Manning acrid in his talk of eminent men? "I cannot say that I myself ever observed any peculiarity of this kind." Yet even to the Cardinal's trivial detractors Mr. McCarthy is kind: "I think Manning could not always resist the temptation to throw in some brief descriptive remark, which showed in the lightest and most passing way that he thoroughly understood some one or two of a great man's little weaknesses." Browning "a mere chatterer in society, and a devotee of rank and fashion"? Not as Mr. McCarthy knew him:

As to Browning's manner of talk. Was it only the idle chatter of society? I have met a great many brilliant talkers in different countries in my time. I do not know that I have ever met a talker more brilliant, or who could, when he pleased, go more deeply into the heart of a subject than Robert Browning. I shall never forget an account which he gave me once of his early recollections of Edmund Kean's acting. Browning, of course, was very young when he saw Edmund Kean, but he had carried away in his mind a perfect picture of the great tragedian's style and manner; and I must say that with all I had read of Kean nothing ever impressed me with such a comprehension of his genius and of his style as did that rapid description by Browning given, not to the company in general, but to me at a London dinner table. There was not in his description the slightest straining after effect, not the faintest suggestion of the clever talker talking to show his cleverness; it was simply the outpouring of a man filled with his subject, and anxious to make his listener feel as he felt; and the subject itself was started by the merest chance, and without any premeditation whatever on either side.

Just as triumphantly does Freeman emerge from these most entertaining pages. Many of Freeman's visitors had been led, like Mr. McCarthy, to think of him as an overbearing man, brusque in his manner to intellectual inferiors. Mr. McCarthy found in him only "a sort of rough heartiness." Freeman, as everyone knows, was a grand talker, humorous, exuberant, and prodigiously well informed. Mr. McCarthy makes his literary industry concrete and interesting:

I was particularly interested in the working arrangements of his study, which he showed and explained with a certain degree of natural pride. One important part of the arrangement consisted of a very long, narrow table, stretching midway down almost the whole length of the long room. The convenience of this arrangement consisted in the fact that he could have all the particular books he was likely to require for each day's work laid out, on their backs with open leaves, along the table, so as to spare him the trouble of incessantly running to his shelves and taking down each time a new volume, and then, when he supposed he had done with it, putting it back into its place and out of his way, only perhaps to find, a few minutes later, that he wanted to refer to the book again, and must drag it from its shelf anew. Freeman himself expatiated with great delight on the advantages of this plan, and showed how the books that he wanted for each day's work could find ample space to lie outspread without encroaching on each other. . . . He dwelt with amusing and humorous exaggeration on the pricelessness of his method, and on the extraordinary vagueness of mind which induced so many authors to pile one book upon another.

It is hardly necessary, though it would be absurdly easy, to adduce other instances of our author's generous estimates of the daily side of men and women of note. Perhaps we ought not to call them generous; they must be temperamental. What McCarthy looked for he saw; what he saw he records. And so with anecdote and talkative ease we move on through the vast crowd, and are presented to Huxley, and Mill, and Mr. Spencer, and Tyndall, and Jefferson, and Bright, and Cobden, and Parnell, and Mr. Sexton, and Lord Randolph Churchill, and Gladstone, and Carlyle, and Dickens, and Lowell, and Holmes, and Trollope, and Reade—and to many, many more: even to Mr. Meredith, and Mr. Kipling. It may be that some readers who love a shindy, and lust for a little detraction, will find Mr. McCarthy's pages too smooth and benevolent. They may contend that justice is dull without its miscarriages, and that charity vaunts itself if it never faileth. For such there is a grain of comfort: Mr. McCarthy almost hustles Charles Kingsley. It is a surprise, but it is so. For while allowing that Kingsley had an honest heart, and "tried to do the work of a man," Mr. McCarthy says: "I hardly remember, in my practical observation of politics, a great public question of which Charles Kingsley did not take the wrong side." And again—is it really Mr. McCarthy?—"Nothing for long years, I think, has been more repulsive, and in its way more mischievous, than the cant about 'strength' which Kingsley did so much to diffuse and to glorify." Here, and here only, this broad and gliding stream of memories stays its rippling music, and seems as though it were about to roar in in a strait channel.

Even the shindy is not quite lacking, for, in lieu of one of his own making, Mr. McCarthy treats us to a gay passage of arms between Charles Reade and Charles Mathews:

Reade's hot temper once got him into serious trouble with so awkward an antagonist as the late Charles Mathews. As most of the elders will remember, Charles Mathews was not only the most brilliant light comedian of his day upon the English stage, but he was a master of bright talk and keen sarcasm. He was performing at one time in Drury-lane Theatre, then under the management of Mr. E. T. Smith, a very well-known personage of that day. Charles Reade had once written a play called "Gold," which, it seems, was acted at Drury-lane Theatre, but which I confess I never saw, never read, and, indeed, never heard of until the occurrence of the little controversy I am about to record. Reade, one night, presented himself for admission at the door of Drury-lane Theatre and was refused; and, thereupon, he wrote the following letter to Charles Mathews:

Garrick Club, Covent Garden: November 28.

DEAR SIR,—I was stopped the other night at the stage door of Drury-lane Theatre, by people whom I remember to have seen at the Lyceum under your reign.

This is the first time such an affront was ever put upon me in any theatre where I had produced a play, and is without precedent unless when an affront was intended. As I never forgive an affront, I am not hasty to suppose one intended. It is very possible that this was done inadvertently; and the present stage-list may have been made out without the older claims being examined.

Will you be so kind as to let me know at once whether this is so, and if the people who stopped me at the stage-door are yours; will you protect the author of "Gold," &c., from any repetition of such an annoyance?—I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

CHARLES READE.

Mathews's reply must be counted immortal:

T. R., Drury-lane: November 29.

DEAR SIR,—If ignorance is bliss on general occasions, on the present it certainly would be folly to be wise. I am therefore happy to inform you that I am ignorant of your having produced a play at this theatre; ignorant that you are the author of "Gold"; ignorant of the merits of that play; ignorant that your name has been erased from the list at the stage door; ignorant that it had ever been on it; ignorant that you had presented yourself for admittance; ignorant that it had been refused; ignorant that such a refusal was without precedent; ignorant that in the man who stopped you you recognised one of the persons lately with me at the Lyceum; ignorant that the doorkeeper was ever in that theatre; ignorant that you never forgive an affront; ignorant that any had been offered; ignorant of when, how, or by whom the list was made out, and equally so by whom it was altered.

Allow me to add that I am quite incapable of offering any discourtesy to a gentleman I have barely the pleasure of knowing, and, moreover, have no power whatever to interfere with Mr. Smith's arrangements or disarrangements; and, with this wholesale admission of ignorance, incapacity, and impotence, believe me, faithfully yours,

C. T. MATHEWS.

It is impossible not to envy Mr. McCarthy his innumerable fine contacts with men and women whose names will not quickly die, and with men and women who had their unimportant day. But our admiration of the qualities Mr. McCarthy depicts extends to those he possesses. For, certainly, this is a budget of kindness.

The Vext Philippines.

The Philippines and Round About. By Major G. J. Young-husband. With Illustrations and Map. (Macmillans. 8s. 6d.)

THE Philippines were discovered in 1521 and at once became a bone of contention. For though by the award of the papal Solomon the world had been divided, east and west, between Spain and Portugal, it was not always easy to determine where east left off and west began. In the end Spain had the better of the dispute, and settled down steadily to misgovern the Filipino race for the next 300 years. With a brief interlude: for from October 6, 1762, to February 10 of the following year the islands were British property. The Government of George III. handed them back, like small change across the counter, under the terms of the Peace of Paris; and the Spaniards put up a morry monolith to celebrate their triumph and the prowess of Simon Anda.

The insurrection of 1896 is attributed to three causes. They are: (1) the system of extortion practised by the Spanish officials; (2) the unequal incidence of the burden of taxation; and (3) the gross lives and intolerable tyranny of the clergy (with the honourable exception of the Jesuits). With the leader of the insurrection, the self-proclaimed first president of the Philippine Republic, the author had the privilege of an interview.

Aguinaldo is a young man of only twenty-nine years of age, stands about 5 ft. 4 in. in height, is slightly built, and was dressed in a coat and trousers of drab tussore silk. He is a pure Philippine native, though showing a slight trace of Chinese origin; of dark complexion, and much pock-marked. His face is square and determined, the lower lip protruding markedly. On the whole, a man of pleasant demeanour, even-tempered, and with strong characteristics. Slow of speech, and perhaps also of thought, his past career has hall-marked him as a man of prompt decision and prompter action.

Against the insurrection the Spanish authorities took stern measures. Martial law was proclaimed, and at Manila 169 persons suspected of disaffection were thrust into a dungeon that had its one air-hole boarded over to keep out the rain. Fifty-four died in the night, and the survivors were shot in the morning. Such drastic remedies proving ineffectual, General Polavieja was superseded; and on Christmas Day arrived Primo de Rivera with his pockets full of money—$2,000,000. He distributed it among the insurgent leaders, except some two-thirds, which went by way of commission in other directions; then "with great pleasure" he announced to the authorities at home that "the principal leaders of the insurrection had laid down their arms and cheered three times for Spain, the King, and peace," upon which he made his smiling way home. A pacification arranged upon this basis was not likely to last; and under Davila the old methods were employed to suppress a new rising. And then a side wind from Cuba brought Dewey in search of the Spanish fleet.

When Major Younghusband arrived at Manila on October 10 of last year the place was in the hands of the Americans, and the newcomers were busy in cleaning up after three hundred years of neglect, corruption, and squalor. The author's outspoken description of the domestic habits of its former occupants for the last three centuries leaves no doubt as to the horrors of the task which the new municipality found themselves called upon to undertake. Indeed, that the place should not have been laid desolate long since suggests that the boastful bacillus is, after all, but a feeble folk. (But that is not sufficient to justify a self-respecting major in such a comment as this: "Poor old Peter up aloft must have a heavy job with the Dons before they are fit for admission through the golden gates.") The force in occupation has already four newspapers of its own, and Major Younghusband often "found the paragraphs and advertisements very amusing":

"Holy Gee!" exclaims one organ, "200 new subscribers in one hour! Walk in, boys; beer ain't in it with newspapers! Dump down your dollars, and secure an intellectual feast for one month anyhow." But the beer man is not to be defeated, for on the back of the same paper he holds out most inviting suggestions of celestial bliss to those who drink his beer, thus: "Beware of microbes! The little demons that down a strong man! There's NO MICROBES in S——'s beer, and don't you forget it. If by accident a microbe should fall into S——'s beer, he would reform and become an ANGEL. Who would not be an Angel?"

Together with their spirit of journalistic and commercial enterprise, these citizen soldiers have brought with them, from the sacred presence of their "souvenir girls," that spirit of chivalry by which their nation is distinguished among the nations of the earth. From these unwashed tatterdemalions Mrs. Younghusband received a kind of homage as she passed along the streets. Various of them from whom she accepted aid in her quest of photographs were proud men that day. And a remarkably successful search it was.

Of the native population the author has but a low opinion. He ranks them below even the Dyaks of Borneo. His recommendation, therefore, as to the future government of the islands is that the Americans should adopt a system of forced labour, modelled upon that which, with excellent results, the Dutch employ in Java; for, says he, by way of justification of the proposed infringement of the principle of free labour, "compared with the European or American standard of intelligence and civilisation, the inhabitants are but as infants alongside a grown man." As a preliminary step—oblivious, apparently, of the scorn he poured out upon poor Rivera's policy of doles—he recommends, as likely to prove cheapest in the end, the buying off of Aguinaldo and other leaders of the insurrection.

Upon the whole, the book, as a bit of journalism, is bright and readable. Major Younghusband has a sharp eye and a nimble pen; and by his military training and wide experience he is qualified to judge both of the nature and the circumstances of the problem. It is one upon the solution of which, at the present moment, a good deal is thought to depend.

A King's Favourite.

Piers Gaveston. By Walter Phelps Dodge. (Fisher Unwin. 12s.)

WE agree with Mr. Dodge that his study of "one who had been practically Dictator of England" forms an interesting and valuable "footnote to history." Politically, Piers Gaveston was a butterfly crushed on the wheel of the long struggle between the King and the Barons of England. Personally, he is a brilliant and picturesque figure on the mediæval page. Mr. Dodge's careful portrait of the man, drawn from the contemporary records, will afford useful material for the future historian of the fourteenth century.

Piers Gaveston was in all probability the son of one Arnold de Gaveston, a Gascon knight in the service of Edward the First, whose tomb has been quite recently identified with that in the cathedral of Winchester formerly supposed to belong to William de Foix. The lad was brought up in the household of the young Prince Edward of Carnarvon, "upon whose affections in tract of time," says Dugdale, "he so much gained by humouring him in such sensual delights, whereunto youth is naturally inclined, that he guided and governed him according to his own vile humour." He seems to have been from the beginning an unscrupulous adventurer; but he had the temperament that fits for courts, was handsome, witty and accomplished, and easily acquired an influence over the weak and luxurious prince. The accounts of the comptroller of Edward's household show that the two led a gay and luxurious life, travelling to the Scottish wars with a lion and a troupe of Genoese fiddlers, and a sumptuous equipment which included "three silver forks pur mangier poires" for the especial use of the dainty Piers. Edward, however, had his father, one of the greatest of English kings, to reckon with, and these boyish revels were broken in upon by a stern order excluding Gaveston from the princely Court. He found his way back, but soon led Edward into fresh trouble. Apparently the two broke into the Bishop of Chester's park. Edward is said to have been imprisoned, and Gaveston was certainly banished from the realm. In a few weeks the old king was dead, and one of the first acts of his successor was to recall the favourite and to make him Earl of Cornwall. He became, says a chronicler, "noble, liberal and gentil in summe fashions, but often ful of pride and disdayne, of the which the nobles of England tooke great dispite." The King married him to his niece, the "elegant virgin," Margaret de Clare, and from 1307 to his final fall, in 1312, he was practically the chief man in the country. This period was, however, broken by intervals during which the growing anger of the Barons compelled Edward to go through the form of sending him into a brief and perfunctory exile. During one of these periods he was made Governor of Ireland, and, as he was by no means a coward, achieved real success in arms. It does not appear that Gaveston made any attempt to upset, for the King's benefit, the constitutional settlement arrived at by Edward the First. The problems of government interested him little. His desire was only to live wantonly, and to feather his nest for the inevitable day of disgrace. He succeeded in sending some £100,000 out of the country to a place of security, and induced the King to give him not only his father's royal jewels, but also a sum of £32,000 set aside for the succour of the Holy Land. The hostility of the nobles to him must be ascribed partly to the strain which his extravagance and greed put upon the finances of the country; partly to the fact that he was a foreigner, and filled the Court with Gascons like himself; and partly to the insolence with which he personally treated them. His French wit found a ready butt in the great dignitaries of the Council. He gave them all nicknames. Thomas of Lancaster was "the Buffoon," the stout Earl of Lincoln was "Burst-Belly," and the swarthy

Earl of Warwick "the Black Dog of Arden." Now, an English noble cannot stand ridicule, and at last Gaveston's victims took the matter into their own hands. In 1311 Ordinances were passed by the Parliament, taking the government out of the King's hands, and once more expelling the favourite. These were reluctantly signed by Edward, and Gaveston left England. After Christmas he had the audacity to return. The Barons raised an army, and Gaveston surrendered to them at Scarborough Castle. Plodges were given him which his captors had no intention of keeping. It does not seem certain that he ever got a trial. He was beheaded "by a certain Briton" at Gaversyk, near Warwick, and buried by the Dominicans of Oxford. An inscription on a rock marks the place of his execution, and someone has erected an unnecessary monument. Mr. Dodge sums up his narrative thus:

So died Piers Gaveston, faithful to his King, but faithful to naught else. Forgetful of his station and its duties, execrated by many, he remains, in spite of grievous faults, a fascinating personality. There are few instances in history of such wasted opportunities and talents so misused.

This appears to us to be taking a common chevalier d'industrie somewhat too seriously. The graces of the ante-chamber and a certain knack at the sword-play are hardly sufficient to make up "a fascinating personality." Station or duties, in England at least, Gaveston had none, except such as he had wormed himself into; and, although there may be something to be said for the fidelity of Edward to his favourite, the fidelity of the favourite to Edward was but that of the horse-leech to the vein.

Other New Books.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, 1795-1895.

By RICHARD LOVETT.

This work, consisting of two very thick volumes, is the record of a century's work by the greatest missionary society in the world. The author has had a long and wearisome task. He says with much frankness: "Friends of the Society have from time to time expressed to him their gladness in anticipation of the volumes. If their joy in studying them is but a tithe as keen as his in saying farewell to them he will be amply repaid for all his toil."

An enormous and impressive budget! The pedigree of the London Missionary Society goes back to 1788, when Carey began his endeavours to rouse the Baptists. Five years later he succeeded, and was himself sent to India. The seed thus sown fell on good ground. Meetings were held, pamphlets written, and there was running to and fro. At length, on September 22, 1795, at Spa Fields Chapel, belonging to the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion, more than two hundred ministers assembled to constitute the new society, which was called "The Missionary Society." Mr. Lovett recounts the origin and the early aims and administration of the Society with great care, and then proceeds to detail its work in Polynesia (whither its first missionaries went), South Africa, Matabeleland, Central Africa, and Madagascar. This closes the first volume. The second is devoted to India, China, and some almost forgotten missions in Canada, Malta, Mauritius, &c. Lastly, the later home administration of the Society, from 1821 to 1895, is carefully described. With justice we are reminded that the work of the Society has been frequently interwoven with great political movements, and that "the work of Vanderkemp, Philip, Moffat, and Livingstone in Africa has profoundly influenced the colonial policy of Great Britain toward native races."

One, and that a trilling, criticism we shall make. Mr. Lovett says that "the first quarter of the eighteenth century was one of the worst periods in the religious history of the English people." True, but Mr. Lovett adds: "Men like Swift and Sterne could find a place in the Anglican Church." Which is not a felicitous remark. It remains to say that this book is indispensable to every student and well-wisher of missionary enterprise. Its numerous portraits of missionaries are an interesting feature. (Frowde. 2 vols. 17s. 6d.)

CROMWELL AS A SOLDIER. By LIEUT.-COL. T. S. BALDOCK.

We have here the fifth volume of the "Wolseley" series. The military side of Cromwell's genius is hardly recognised by the ordinary Englishman; yet in Germany it has found a student in Captain von Hoenig, whose biography of Cromwell is so good that it was at first proposed to translate it for this series. It is well, however, that Captain Walter James decided to commission an English military expert to write a new and original study of the fighting Cromwell. Lieut.-Col. Baldock has spared no pains to make his book complete. His subject is, indeed, one to inspire an ardent industry. Who could write carelessly of Cromwell—above all, of the Cromwell who, being himself an untrained civilian, turned farmers and shopkeepers into soldiers, into the finest army of his age, and led it through campaigns of organised victory? In his last chapter Lieut.-Col. Baldock gives us a masterly summary of Cromwell's whole military achievement. We have space for only a short extract from the pages in which Cromwell's self-acquired generalship is under discussion:

Even when surrounded by all the turmoil of a cavalry fight Cromwell never lost his presence of mind or his control over his troops, and in conducting a campaign he never lost grasp on the situation of affairs. With unerring judgment he suited his strategy to the conditions of the case. He knew when to dare, when to forbear. Possessing the utmost confidence both in his army and in himself, he seldom stayed to count heads if the circumstances of the case were favourable to attack. And his blow was struck with his full force—no uncertain sparring, no half measures. Yet he was no rash, reckless Hotspur, driving headlong against his enemy whenever met. When in 1648 he advanced to meet Hamilton's invading army the fate of the Parliament was trembling in the balance. All England watched with eager eyes the result of the conflict. Defeat or even delay meant the ruin of the Independent party. Opposed by odds of two to one, Cromwell, without a moment's hesitation, flung his small force against his enemy's flank and rear, forcing him to fight a decisive battle. When in 1651 Prince Charles brought another Scottish army across the Border Cromwell knew that the danger was comparatively small. Having brought the Prince to bay by a vigorous pursuit, he deliberately waited till all avenues of escape were closed before advancing to the attack. So, too, in the Dunbar campaign, so long as Leslie refused him a fair chance of fighting, he restrained his impatience for battle. But the moment the opportunity offered for closing with his enemy, no thoughts of inferior numbers checked the swiftness and force of the blow.

The book, like its fellows in the "Wolseley" series, is admirably produced, with maps and index. Decidedly it will fill a gap in English libraries. (Kegan Paul. 10s. 6d.)

A BRITISH RIFLEMAN. EDITED BY LIEUT.-COL. W. VERNER.

This book is a very striking human document. The twenty-seven letters it contains reveal to us the private and soldierly qualities of Major George Simmons, a British officer who passed through the Napoleonic wars. It is also a valuable record of the early work of the regiment of Rifles (the 95th) which saw more fighting in the Peninsula than any other in the British Army. To the Peninsula young George Simmons went in May, 1809. His first letter to his parents was written at Hythe, and it began:

The long-wished-for day has come at last. I am this morning marching, with as fine a body of men as ever left England, for Dover, where we embark. I believe a great army will accompany us. Our destination is a profound secret, and as I am not inquisitive it gives me little concern; I daresay I shall soon enough see some diversion. The rumour goes, Austria or Portugal. Our men are in very high spirits, and we have a most excellent band of music and thirty bugle-horns, which through every country village strikes up the old tune, "Over the hills and far away."

The young fellow who wrote this was not, as might be imagined, joining the army solely for love of glory and gunpowder. George Simmons was a steady-minded youth in a large family, and he took his commission in the Rifles with the idea of supporting his parents and assisting the education of his brothers and sisters. As Lieut.-Col. Verner remarks, such an enterprise would be laughable nowadays; but in those days it was practicable to an unselfish and vigorous young fellow like George Simmons. And so we have in these letters, so long withheld, a wonderfully human mixture of statements and emotions; accounts of wounds, and comments on sister Ann's spelling; opinions of generals, and advice to his parents to see to Charley's Latin. In his direst extremities George managed to send money and good counsel to his people at home. Of stirring battle-talk there is plenty. Thus after Badajos:

I saw my poor friend Major O'Hare lying dead upon the breach. Two or three musket balls had passed through his breast. A gallant fellow, Sergeant Flemming, was also dead by his side, a man who had always been with him. I called to remembrance poor O'Hare's last words just before he marched off to lead the advance. He shook me by the hand, saying, "A lieutenant-colonel or cold meat in a few hours."

No portrait of Simmons is given—perhaps none exists. (A. & C. Black. 10s. 6d.)

RAMBLES WITH NATURE STUDENTS. BY MRS. BRIGHTWEN.

Mrs. Brightwen's new book is divided between the months. Out of her abundant and delightful knowledge, she tells her readers what birds and buds and insects and flowers to look for in their country rambles. She pleads for Eyes against No-Eyes. And she tells her readers to put aside the idea that nature is remote and inaccessible. Her own residence, the centre of all her minute studies, is but twelve miles from Charing Cross, and she justly points out that there is a peculiar pleasure in finding treasures in unlikely localities. Thus, Mrs. Brightwen writes:

Having on one occasion to wait a whole hour on a pouring wet day at Bedford railway station, I determined to see if I could collect anything to while away the time. Things looked very unpromising outside the station; new houses in the act of being built, heaps of sand and mortar, and plenty of mud everywhere, seemed hopeless enough; but a bare patch of common, across which ran a newly gravelled road, caught my eye; there might be possibilities in the gravel, so I made my way to the new road, and before long I had the pleasure of finding there several rare fossils, pieces of chalcedony and jasper, a shell impression, and sundry other treasures; so, in spite of rain and wind, my waiting hour passed, not only without weariness, but in positive enjoyment.

There we see the true naturalist. For each month a number of observations are suggested. An admirable little book for mothers wishing to guide their children to the love of nature; indeed, an admirable little guide for all who are weary of bricks and mortar. (Religious Tract Society.)

MY ROSES AND HOW I GREW THEM. BY HELEN MILMAN.

Miss Milman (Mrs. Caldwell Crofton) is known for her pretty book In the Garden of Peace, and by certain short stories of children. Here she is more practical. The little manual, however, does not fill any particular place, for the author's knowledge of roses is limited to a very few varieties, and those almost entirely tea-roses, and her counsel has not the practical ring which one looks for in a horticultural guide. Miss Milman states that she wrote this work because all books on the subject are "very long and difficult to understand, and so technical." She has not, we fear, superseded them. (John Lane. 1s. 6d.)

A COCKNEY IN ARCADIA.

BY H. A. SPURR.

This is a work of resolute facetiousness. To us it never succeeds in being funny; but that is, perhaps, because we have been spoiled by better things. Upon a virgin palate it may strike gratefully. This is the kind of humour:

Just look at that bee, bumbling and grumbling round and round the shrubs. See him go to a cup, and, with unsteady legs clinging the while to the surrounding furniture, drink off its contents at a gulp, then clamber recklessly over leaf and stalk until he can get another drink. The shocking condition of his nerves can be seen by the trembling of the leaves. Note, please, how he lurches across the way, sideways and staggering, to have "just another cup."

"Hallo, Clemmy, my boy!" you can hear him stammer with a hiccup, to a passer-by in as disgraceful a condition as himself; "mornin'. Jus' (hic) going t'bizness."

"No'sense," says Number Two; "if you don't take weaklass whiskynwor before beginning day's work (hic), when do you take weaklass whiskynwor?"

And they go off together to the nearest blossom.

Late in the proceedings of a smoking concert selections from this work might, we can believe, be popular. The book is illustrated in a becoming manner. (George Allen. 3s. 6d.)

INTERLUDES, THIRD SERIES.

BY HORACE SMITH.

Every now and then it is Mr. Smith's agreeable custom to collect his stray verses and pertinent thoughts into a slender volume. Three such volumes already exist—Interludes, First Series; Interludes, Second Series; and Poems. Now we have Interludes, Third Series. The new book is as sage and genial as its forerunners. The essays on "The Employment of Leisure" and "The Possibilities and Vicissitudes of Man" are wealthy in good stories and historical parallels. Most of Mr. Smith's verses are reprinted from Punch. His parodies are sometimes very happy, this treatment of "Who is Sylvia?" being one of the best we have met with:

THE LAY OF THE BIMETALLIST.

Who is Silver? What is she,
That all our swells commend her?
Very bright and fair is she—
The heavens such grace did lend her,
That adopted she might be!—
That adopted she might he!

Then if Silver plays such tricks,
Or Gold is always changing,
So that none their price can fix,
From par to premium ranging,
Let us both together mix!—
Let us both together mix!

Altogether, Mr. Smith's volume makes for pretty amusement. It is an excellent example of work done by a gentleman who writes with ease. (Macmillan.)

THE "TEMPLE" EDITION OF THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

To this convenient and dainty series The Talisman and The Betrothed have just been added. The frontispiece of the former is a view of John Knox's house in the Canon-gate, Edinburgh, in which, says the editor, it has been proved that Knox could not have lived. In the latter we have Raeburn's 1808 portrait of Scott. (Dent. 1s. 6d.)

Fiction.

The Mandate. By T. Baron Russell.
(John Lane. 6s.)

THERE is much merit in this novel, which is as good as sincerity, dexterity, and high literary conscientiousness can make it. Mr. Russell is a realist, and he has an artist's careful regard for the dignity of fiction and of his native tongue. We look upon him as at the beginning of a career, with his imagination scarcely yet at full heat and his style still in the making. That he has distinguished promise, and that that promise will not be sterilised by the mere carelessness which seems to be so rife in modern letters, is quite certain.

The "mandate" is hypnotic. Mr. St. Kelvin, a financial journalist, and his wife, were an ill-assorted pair: the husband a mere glutton, the wife a refined woman of strong individuality. Horace Massie, novelist and critic, was a man of culture and delicacy who could and did appreciate Mrs. St. Kelvin. At the journalist's request, Massie tried the experiment of hypnotising him, and succeeded. Presently Mrs. St. Kelvin was on such terms with her husband's acquaintance that she could ask him to "suggest" hypnotically to St. Kelvin that the latter should give up alcohol. The plan succeeded to a marvel, and St. Kelvin was saved from being a drunkard. But, missing the accustomed stimulus, his nerves fell to pieces; he grew morose and violent, and ill-treated his wife till she was compelled to leave him. By this time the lady and Massie had avowed to each other a mutual passion. St. Kelvin discovered that Massie had "influenced" him, and demanded ferociously that his influence should be removed. Massie complied; he put the man into a hypnotic trance and lifted the ban against alcohol. He did more; he said, "You will die to-morrow," and St. Kelvin died. Then Massie married Mrs. St. Kelvin, but the Nemesis of remorse was upon him, and continual hallucinations of St. Kelvin's presence drove him into lunacy.

The plot, so stated, appears luridly melodramatic, but it is treated with fine restraint and admirable truth to life. The characterisation is firm, original, and within the modesty of nature. There are no inexpensive "effects." Indeed, Mr. Russell, in one crucial place, boggles at his own deeds. Having brought about St. Kelvin's death, in a manner perfectly convincing, he proceeds to suggest to the reader that perhaps that death was after all a mere coincidence. Such artistic timidity, we need hardly say, is gravely wrong, and it imperils the whole force of the book.

In conclusion, we should like to warn Mr. Russell against certain mannered familiarities towards the reader. What is to be said, to take an instance, of an author who addresses us thus: "I have mentioned, probably, Massie's instinctive repudiation of friendship"? The adverb is an impertinence—minute, but inexcusable.

A Semi-Detached Marriage. By Arabella Kenealy.
(Hutchinson & Co. 6s.)

DR. ARABELLA KENEALY'S new book is a problem-novel naked and unashamed. What will happen when a husband and wife elect to keep separate establishments, meeting each other occasionally as impulse dictates? The question is somewhat distant from the actuality of life, but it was capable of serious treatment, and we quite believe that the author meant to treat it seriously. She has, however, so obscured the main issue with accidental circumstances that the effect is, practically, to destroy it. Between Sir Latimer Cozle and Celia no sort of marriage, semi-detached or otherwise, could have been successful. Sir Latimer displayed himself as a cad from the start, and in failing to perceive his deficiencies Celia acted not as a woman, but as the conventional heroine of fiction. Further, the mechanism by which Celia is freed from Sir Latimer and enabled to marry her late father's partner in the dynamite business is, to be polite, antique. Such a terrific coincidence and such apt melodramatic punishment as are here employed have become impossible even in library fiction.

Not that we would class A Semi-Detached Marriage with library fiction. It is surprisingly good in places. The early relations between Celia and the partner are admirably clever, and the elaborate ritual of precaution practised in the dynamite factory is several times used with real ingenuity and excellent dramatic effect. The style is alert, piquant, and clever, especially in portraiture. Here, for instance, is a little picture of Celia:

Celia, having breakfasted early, descended the steps of her handsome home and, seating herself in her neat dog-cart, drove off briskly, with that disregard for the nimble limbs and entirety of her groom characteristic of smart driving.

She wore a loose coat and a tight skirt, and a general air of emancipation. Nevertheless her hair was dressed charmingly, and the pretty crape toque, perched amid its ruddy coils, together with the knot of mourning chiffons at her throat, proclaimed the fact that her emancipation did not stand for mannishness.

Her cheeks were painted with the red of resolution, the curves of her mouth were straightened in a line of firmness, though they parted at intervals upon a breath which in spite of her panted from an agitated bosom. Her eyes radiated sparkles as of pleased anticipation struck on a tinder of diffidence. She drove with a somewhat nervous hand and appeared to be in a hurry, though, in point of fact, she had abundance of time.

Celia is attractive; so is the partner; but Sir Latimer is offensive without being alive. The other characters are neatly sketched.

Following a deplorable and inexcusable modern custom, Miss Kenealy takes a scene from the middle of her story, sticks it at the beginning, and labels it "Prologue." Why? This particular scene should occur somewhere after p. 165, and to put it elsewhere is merely to mystify the reader.

Unholy Matrimony. By John Le Breton.
(John Macqueen. 6s.)

THE hero of Mr. Le Breton's novel was an East End curate named David Collier, who married a barmaid because on the occasion of a school treat he and she had lost themselves together and missed the last train home. Rose took to drink, brought about the death of their child, and with an inebriate's sullen obstinacy set herself to ruin David's career. He was forced to leave the Church, and became a minor clerk in the shipping firm of which the principal members were his own father, his brother, and one Richard Gurdon. The last was an old man, the passion of whose life was his daughter Anne. Anne and Rose are brought into contact to the detriment of the former, and then Gurdon, in a mood of murderous resentment, takes Rose out to sea in a boat, and that is the end of those two and of the book. What happens to Anne and David is not stated, but the reader may guess.

Unholy Matrimony is a sombre story, with a prevailing atmosphere which discloses the influence of Mr. George Gissing upon the author. Regarded technically, it is a creditable and even meritorious performance; but it has weaknesses: the worst of these lies in the opening crucial incident. That affair of missing the last train, with its consequences of scandal, has been a stock feature in English fiction for forty years. Some novelists (for example, Mrs. Humphry Ward) have contrived, by a lavish expenditure of ingenuity, to make it pass muster. Mr. Le Breton has not done so.

The book is well written, with the exception of the dialogue, which lacks verisimilitude. Here is one instance from scores :

I have been intending to have a quiet talk with you for some months past ; but then, again, I have tried to hope that, after all, it might be unnecessary, and I could not bear to darken your young life.

The modern father, even when announcing total ruin, does not talk to his son in that way. Of course the average novel is made up of such conversations ; but Mr. Le Breton's is not an average novel. Mr. Le Breton has aimed at truthfulness, and it appears to us that he has genuine possibilities.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

GERALD FITZGERALD.

BY CHARLES LEVER.

A belated story by the gay Irish novelist, the author of Harry Lorrequer. The publisher accounts for the delay by the fact that the tale was running as a serial in the Dublin University Magazine at the time of the editor's death and the transfer of the periodical, and Lever's wish to save trouble and complications led him to disregard republication. But why he did not include it in his collected works some years later is not known. Gerald Fitzgerald is a Jacobite story, with Italy for background. (Downey & Co. 6s.)

I, THOU, AND THE OTHER ONE. BY AMELIA E. BARR.

A love-story by this popular writer. Mrs. Barr has gone chiefly to Scotland for her local colour, but here we have Yorkshire and the dales. Here is a sentiment from this pretty homely idyll : "'Mothering' is a grand old word for a quality. God can teach man as well as woman." The book is illustrated. (Unwin. 6s.)

THE DAY OF RECOMPENSE. BY SILAS K. HOCKING.

The latest fruit of Mr. Hocking's prolific pen is a love story, with adventures, a missing heir, and various little villainies. But at the last "Kitty sang, while Roger turned over the leaves." (Warne & Co. 3s. 6d.)

CROMWELL'S OWN. BY ARTHUR PATERSON.

Mr. Paterson, who once used to describe ranche life realistically, seems to have taken to historical romance. His new book is a novel based on Oliver Cromwell's private and public life, and it opens in June, 1640. The religious and military sides of the Protector's character are brought into relief. (Harpers. 6s.)

A GENTLEMAN FROM THE RANKS.

BY H. B. FINLAY KNIGHT.

A bright story with a flavour of soldiering. The heroine, Georgie Lepel, is a very engaging young person, full of surprises, and her adventures and misfortunes dominate the book, which bears as its motto Mr. Kipling's stanza :

Then I come 'ome in a trooper,
'Long of a kid o' sixteen—
Girl from a convent at Meerut,
The straightest I ever 'ave seen.
Love at first sight was 'er trouble,
She didn't know what it were ;
Au' I wouldn't do such, 'cause I liked 'er too much,
But—I learned about women from her.

(A. & C. Black. 6s.)

NORRINGTON LE VALE.

BY J. G. LYALL.

The author of that very horsey and rollicking book, The Merry Gee-Gee, noticed by us some months ago, has broken the "violent but well-intentioned promise" which he then made not to "inflict," &c. But as the public were kind, and the author was not on his "Bible oath," he "wafts" this racing novel to his readers. Another horsey, rollicking work it is, in which moneylending and racing go hand in hand with better things. (White & Co. 6s.)

MARIANNA, AND OTHER STORIES. BY GEORGETTE AGNEW.

In the Prologue, Paris. A distracted mother lays her baby daughter at the door of a convent. The love story which explains and expands this action is sunny reading. The characters are young and are both French and English, and the smell of roses and the chime of convent bells accompany the action. Two other stories follow ; but Marianna is almost long enough to stand alone. (Burleigh. 6s.)

DEFENDER OF THE FAITH.

BY FRANK MATHEW.

The Defender of the Faith is Henry VIII., for this is a historical novel. On the third page the Duke of Northumberland is seen on his way to arrest Cardinal Wolsey ; and subsequently we meet Anne Boleyn, here called Bullen. The author, who has for the time being abandoned his Irish subjects, confesses to having read up a number of contemporary documents ; and he gives three illustrations after Holbein. (Lane. 6s.)

FRIVOLITIES.

BY RICHARD MARSH.

Mr. Marsh's métier is melodrama, but to "Those Who Are Tired of Being Serious" he offers these twelve short stories. In the one we have chanced to read a green-grocer's man acts as a waiter. He imagines that all high hats are collapsible, and carefully squeezes some dozen or two silk "'igh 'ats" flat by pressing them against his chest. This story would hardly dissipate one-twelfth of our own seriousness ; but there are better things in the book. (Bowden. 6s.)

A LASS OF LENNOX.

BY JAMES STRANG.

This novel is laid in the Vale of Lennox, on the West Coast of Scotland. Love and murder and ministry. "The carrion crows of gossip perch patiently on every house and cottage ridge in the Vale of Lennox. Their food comes oozing up the chimneys with the smoke." The story is well packed and alive, and the dialect, though plentiful, is not difficult. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

ROBESPIERRE.

BY ANGE GOLDEMAR.

This is M. Sardou's play novelised. M. Sardou approved the design ; and the novel will be read with pleasure for its own sake, and because it makes an excellent guide to the play at the Lyceum Theatre. (C. A. Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

A DASH FOR A THRONE. BY ARTHUR W. MARCHMONT.

The hero, Count von Rudloff, is a dead man. That is to say, his death has been announced and his funeral conducted with the pomp of a German court. He had struck his future emperor, and had begged his friend, Dr. Mein, to give him death, and the doctor had deceived him and the world. With this initiatory complication we set out on a tale of political adventure, intrigue, treachery, and love. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

LESSER DESTINIES.

BY SAMUEL GORDON.

A novel of East End life by the author of A Handful of Exotics. The hero, who is not a hero except by reason of occupying a prominent position, is Joshua Jupp. "What I looks for in a man fust go," says Josh, "is shivlry ; open hand comes second, and the rest of the vartues can toss for it." Joshua himself is neither chivalrous nor open-handed—and hence the story. (Murray. 6s.)

Francis Adams.

SOME five years after his death the posthumous Essays in Modernity of Francis Adams are at length published. The volume waited, I understand, for an Introduction by Mr. Frank Harris, who was intimate with its author; but apparently it waited in vain, and the long delay has been futile. This is a pity, for had it been issued promptly the book might have gained the attention which its intrinsic merits deserve. Now, I fear, it will obtain but scant regard. The general public cares little to be reminded of names which it has forgotten. As for the other public, the public which is not "general," possibly it may be induced to make the appearance of these Essays the occasion of a last glance at a wistful and tragic figure already dipping below the horizon of fame. For the most ardent admirers of Francis Adams—and with some he was a creed—must reconcile themselves to the fact that, despite his superb promise, despite his passionate endeavour and noble sincerity, despite the esteem and praise of distinguished critics, his fate will be oblivion. Posterity reckes nought of promise or of distinguished critics: it will take nothing but actual masterpieces as the price of its notice. And Adams, through little fault of his own, achieved no masterpiece. A short poem here and there in Songs of the Army of the Night; a few excerpts from Tiberius, his poetical drama; marvellous chapters in that extraordinary first novel, A Child of the Age—these are fine; these might live if they had something to live with, as a small coal will live in a fire. But they are alone, and their own heat is insufficient for them. It seems incredible that all the high and desperate artistic energy of Adams should result, ultimately, in nothing. Yet so it will be; there is no extravagance like Nature's.

High and desperate—these are the adjectives which his energy deserves.

Bury me with clenched hands
And eyes open wide,
For in storm and struggle I lived,
And in struggle and storm I died—

he wrote before he was six-and-twenty. He knew that he could not last, and his activity was feverish accordingly. Proud in his bitterness, scornful of the fate which pursued, he defied the forces arrayed against him. He had his brother's disease, and he had seen his brother expire in agony. "With me," he said, "it shall never come to that." He kept his word, and shot himself when that approached; and a coroner's jury sat upon his corpse. He was incapable of compromise—there lay his chief characteristic. Either he loved or he hated, fiercely. Some things he both loved and hated. Upon England, for example, he heaped every epithet of abuse which his ferocious fancy could invent; and yet, in that impassioned lyric "England, the land that I loved," he answered the question whether he could love her again in some of the grandest lines ever written to a native land:

Never, till expiant
I see You kneel,
And, brandished, gleams aloft
The foeman's steel!
Ah, then to speed, and laugh,
As my heart caught the knife:
"Mother, I love you! Here,
Here is my life!"

He was of the invincible temper which perishes for a cause, the great soul for which no sacrifice is too great. It seems to me, who never knew him, that he must have forsworn art in favour of reform, in one sudden and tremendous determination. That he began solely with the aspirations of the artist, is fairly certain. In the preface to Songs of the Army of the Night he refers to himself as "one who was (unhappily) born and bred into the dominant class, and whose chief care and joy in life was in the pursuit of a culture which draws back instinctively from the violent and the terrible." Before he was eighteen he had conceived an English Comédie Humaine, and written the first instalment of it, the book now called A Child of the Age, a work so surprisingly excellent that later on, even in his coolest moments of self-criticiser, he was wont to call it "damned good." And then, shaking under the most powerful impulse of his life, he turned aside from that ambition and sprang head foremost into "the violent and the terrible." With him regret was impossible, though he could see well enough the pathos of his act—pathos arising from his racial inability ever to become one with "the army of the night." Read his verses "To a Unionist," full of satisfaction and yet of unsatisfied longing:

If you only knew
How gladly I've given it
All these years—
The light of mine eyes,
The heat of my lips,
Mine agonies.

If you only knew
How little I cared for These other things—
The wide clear view
Over peoples and times,
The search in the new Entrancing climes,
Science's wings
And Art's sweet chimes.

Oh, my brother, you would not say:
What have you to do with me?

But you would take my hand with your hand,
O my brother, if you only knew;
You would smile at me, you would understand,
You would call me brother as I call you!

In this, the most intimate and the saddest of all his poems, is displayed, I imagine, the real tragedy of Adams's career. His sacrifice was never accepted by those for whom he made it. Nor could it have been, seeing that every instinct of his and of theirs forbade such a coming together. He could vanquish difficulties, even disease, one might say even death, but he could not get over his birth. That remained, and when he yearned to become a brother, he was doomed never to be anything but a friendly alien. At the back of his brain that thought must always have lain in wait for him. One wonders whether he clearly foresaw at the beginning, before he had taken the step, that it would lie in wait for him. Probably so; and if so one's respect for him increases, and in the contemplation of such a splendid and heroic failure one may properly forget the loss which Art sustained when he took up the cause of labour. In Art he could not have failed: he was a born artist, and he was a born critic; he had the critical balance, the critical distaste for extremes; and one can be sure of this, though the bulk of his work is marred by the very defects of violence and terror. Tiberius, which he held to be of his best, is distinguished by an exquisite restraint; and the essays on Tennyson, Swinburne, and Kipling in his posthumous volume show the dispassionate, clear-seeing vision which underlay a character apparently tempestuous and wayward.

A frightful existence, judged by common ideals! But one does not pity it. Pity! The idea that he had our pity would have fatally disturbed him. He stood too high for pity; and high as he stood, he looked higher. Let me finish with the closing sentences of Democracy: a Dialogue:

"Oh, no," he cried, "I don't falter, I don't repent—I, with the narrow ideals and the bewildered vision of a desperate hope and a despairing faith. Onward, onward, and upward! Who am I? What am I? What does it matter? The idea is the greatest of our time—the hope the most superb, the faith the most intense. That is enough for me."

Then suddenly:

"Look!" he said, stretching out his hand, his eyes lit, his mouth smiling.

At one steady impulse the sun had surged above the clear horizon line, and soared, huge, round, blazing and glorious, into the thrilling blue of the heavens. . . .

Symbol trite yet magnificent!

E. A. B.

A Great Journalist.

WE translate a portion of an article on Francisque Sarcey, from the pen of M. Theuriet, which appeared in the Journal of last Friday:

"Les jeunes are becoming ferocious. They have not even waited till Sarcey's bier was lifted to speak their minds, and declare that he hated 'all that is generous and heroic,' and that he ignored the literature of his time.

But who says too much says nothing; and all this wrath savours of spite. The truth is that, in his long career as a critic, Sarcey always showed himself a genuine man of letters, who loved beautiful works, and who strove to understand them even when they disconcerted him at first sight and were repugnant to his palate. His mind was truly French; it was all for clearness, for the light of nature; he detested the jargon that is foisted on the public under the name of "artistry." He wanted the French language to keep those qualities of frankness, brightness, logic, and of wholesomeness that are its glory and raise it above its rivals. He had a weakness for a well-constructed play, and therein he was not wrong. He did not believe in foreign importations, and he only half liked 'the fogs of the Ibsen drama.' Despite the admiration of snobs, he did not believe that these dramas were masterpieces. . . .

M. Sarcey did not hesitate to go back on his opinion if he feared he had been misled. When, after seeing a new work several times, he perceived that his treatment of it had been less than just, he would admit his error with a fine good humour that disarmed the grumblers. That, it will be admitted, was not the mark of a spirit that lacked largeness and generosity. But, it is said, his mind was closed to purely lyrical poetry. He admitted it himself with perfect modesty. But a dramatic critic who has exclusively lyrical sympathies would be a dangerous and untrustworthy judge. At the theatre lyricism is the exception, and the majority of dramatists would have good right to bring against such a judge the accusations levelled by certain poets at M. Sarcey.

As to M. Sarcey's style. It was what it ought to have been, neat, firm, agile, familiar; with flashes of humour that relieved it and seasoned it with Gallic salt. It recalled the manner of the eighteenth century writers, but it had more flow and archness. It was Sarcey. It was healthy, natural, quick, and honest like the man himself. For this critic, who was so smitten by the theatre and good writing, was before all things a good fellow and a loyal journalist. He loved his profession, and, in order that he might have the fullest liberty in his calling, he disdained all trammelling honours and those worldly-satisfactions which restrain the expression of the naked truth. He did not aspire to be an Academician, or a légionnaire, or a member of any literary society. His sole pleasure was the play; his sole care to satisfy the literary need of the week."

Things Seen.

The Queen.

THE rain had fallen. I arose, passed through the town, and into Hyde Park. The drops still glistened on the tender green of the many trees, and as I walked the sun cast dancing lights on the sward. Then I met the crowd—their backs—for their faces were set towards the ribbon of road along which the Queen would pass. At first the stragglers, nursemaids and their charges, then those who were timorous of the heart of the crowd, and beyond, the black mass—dense, surging, impinging on the ribbon of road. A long line of waiting carriages stretched on my right, for the traffic was stopped till the royal procession should have passed, and there, seated there, was one I knew. "So you saw the Queen on Tuesday!" I said. "And were you nervous?" She shook her head. "It was delightful. I really kissed her hand. As I advanced she looked so tired, I felt quite sorry; but after I had kissed her hand I looked up, our eyes met, and she smiled. It was thrilling. I was en rapport with the Queen. Oh, it was a great moment. And you," she added, "have you seen the Queen?" I nodded and smiled, for the green of spring was on the trees, the sun was shining, and the gift of life was plain. I said: "It was at the opening of the Imperial Institute. They had given me a seat high up in the high marquee. There I stood—the occasion was too exciting to sit—and for an hour watched the alluring panorama. The place was a blaze of colour. The uniforms, the garments of the Indian princes, the flags, the gay decorations, the dresses of the women—captivated the senses. And all the while a band played joyously, and voices rippled in laughter and talk, and the roar of the multitude outside drummed through all. But it was the eye that captained the senses that day. Never has my vision been so surfeited; and as the place filled, and the Body Guard, ranged themselves on either side of the throne, I felt that the appearance of Her Majesty must form a kind of anti-climax, for the tale was told, the eye could hold no more. Whatever of pride, of birth and splendour, of show and richness the world could produce, was there. The ripest stage management could do no more. Then a roar from outside broke into my reverie, trumpets fan-fared, the doors were thrown open, and on the threshold appeared a little old lady in black, who walked with difficulty along the path that led to the throne. In deepest black—a little old lady—quite simple, the simplest body there—Victoria R.I. Oh, it was immense—the effect! The idea! Think of it!"

Enigma.

THE gate opened into a small paddock, and I leaned on it and looked in. It was filled with young creatures: there were colts, gay and graceful, trotting across the grass and flinging their heels for joy of living; there were calves, with mild eyes and moist muzzles, sedate and comfortable; there were hens in the midst of little coveys of yellow chickens. Everything was young and beautiful and rapturous. While I leaned over the gate there drifted into the paddock at the far end a little idle boy. He had a dirty face and dirty, torn clothes. His hands were in his pockets, his look was sullen, and as he passed among the animals he frightened them with shrill noises. And it seemed odd that he alone of this company had a soul.

AM HA!—"When Miss Rhoda Broughton publishes a novel, the right sort of reader cries 'Ah ha!' and prepares to be entertained. The Game and the Candle is good enough for me, and for the French, who give Miss Broughton her proper place among our novelists."—Mr. Andrew Lang in "Longman's."

Sancho the Proverbialist.

It was Taine who said that there was no volume which he could not reduce to a page, and that page to a sentence, and that sentence to a word. This was extravagant; but there is something in it. Most of us, for example, know of certain obscure books which, in their original form, have had their day, but may by the exercise of compression be made serviceable for a second brief existence. A correspondent, for example, writes:

"Your recent Sancho Panza competition, and the paragraph this week about the Rev. A. B. Nicholls, lead me to note a sort of 'coincidence' that I have among my books, in the shape of a dingy little volume, entitled 'Sancho; or, the Proverbialist. Second Edition. 1816.'

The story of Sancho the Proverbialist is anonymous, and was written to show 'that a large proportion of the most popular maxims are exceedingly unsafe—that many of them have a strong tendency to create a sordid and selfish character; that our principles of action are to be sought in the Bible; and, finally, that if anyone desires to be singularly happy he has only to pray and to labour to become eminently good.'

The hero of the story is brought up by an old aunt, Winifred, an admirer of the Deists, and 'passionately addicted to proverbs.' Sancho is named after 'at least one half of the title of the illustrious squire of Don Quixote—he being, next to the oracle of Delphos, the greatest originator and promulgator of those sententious sayings in which her heart delighted.' When Sancho is sent to school Aunt Winifred fits him out with a basket of cakes, and a guinea, that is wrapped in a paper inscribed with the priceless maxim: 'Take Care of Number One.' He determines to let his schoolfellows see that he is a boy with a guiding principle, and proceeds to enjoy a solitary banquet of cake before their hungry eyes, while he supports his own dignity, and his aunt's proverb, by devouring three times as much as he would have done under 'less arduous circumstances.' But soon he is surprised 'to hear, as a sort of watchword, the inelegant phrase of "greedy brute" vociferated on every quarter'; they set upon him, thrash him, and carry off the cakes in triumph to the playground. He next exemplifies his maxim by beating a very small and feeble boy. Finally, 'Number One' covets his neighbour's penknife, and is detected in the act of acquiring it unlawfully. The master sends him back to Aunt Winifred with some uncomplimentary remarks on her system of education. Her faith in proverbs remains unshaken, however, and Sancho is sent to another school, with a new proverb to supplement the operation of Number One: 'Do at Rome as they do at Rome.' His careful observance of this rule leads in due course to 'the very honourable appellation of Sneak' being conferred upon him by general agreement. The time comes for him to go to the University, and his worthy aunt presents him with a moral code, consisting of four proverbs on religion: 'Many men many minds,' 'Seeing is believing,' 'Never too late to repent,' 'The nearer the Church the further from God'; two on character: 'Nullum in veni abest,' &c., which she translates: 'Where prudence is no divinity is absent,' 'An honest man's the noblest,' &c.; and two on the choice of friends: 'A warm enemy makes a warm friend,' 'He is nobody's enemy but his own.' One of his first proceedings on reaching the University is to select a friend accordingly. This acquisition is notoriously idle, vicious, rowdy, dishonest, extravagant, and heartless; but, then, he is also said to be 'a fine fellow, a spirited fellow, a real good fellow, a good-hearted fellow, the best fellow in the world, and (bringing him within the code) "Nobody's enemy but his own!"' The other proverbs are similarly reduced to absurdity. About one-third of the book is devoted to burlesque of this not very artistic sort, and the remainder to expounding the needfulness of religion and the Church of England in particular. Who is the author?

Kipling (Limited).

[A SYNDICATE, it is said, has been formed in America to get complete control in that country of all Mr. Kipling's writings. In commenting thereupon a contemporary asks, Why not Kipling (Limited)? Why not, indeed? The prospectus, we imagine, might run somewhat on the following lines.]

PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to acquire and traffic in all the writings—prose, verse, or private letters—of the celebrated author, Mr. Rudyard Kipling. Mr. Kipling, who is at this moment the most famous writer now living, is still young, and there is promise that he has before him a considerable period of active productivity.

KIPLING (Limited).

The Company proposes to acquire not only Mr. Kipling's future works and the work on which he is at present engaged, but also everything that may already exist. Negotiations are now afoot for the acquisition of letters written by Mr. Kipling as a child, for copy books containing his earliest attempts at pothooks and hangers, and for a vast amount of other immature penmanship. These will be from time to time facsimiled in the illustrated papers and in due course sold by public auction, at (the Company feels convinced) a greatly enhanced figure.

KIPLING (Limited).

The Company will be vigilant that no Imperial crisis shall pass without poetic comment from Mr. Kipling's pen. It trusts also that it will be successful in inducing Mr. Kipling to give to these political poems a form which shall be easily parodied: thus providing for increased publicity.

KIPLING (Limited).

The Company is delighted to observe that not only are there now before the public two or three monographs on Mr. Kipling's work, but others are in preparation. The Company also views with much satisfaction the circumstance that the action now being brought by Mr. Kipling against an American firm is not likely to be heard for eighteen months. This ensures a continual succession of articles and paragraphs in the public press—during the early stages of the Company's career.

KIPLING (Limited).

Arrangements have been made with the Biograph and Mutoscope Company to take living pictures of Mr. Kipling in a variety of daily actions, such as sitting down to his writing-table, alighting from a steamer, reading press notices, conversing with a recruiting sergeant, and filling in his income tax. These pictures will be exhibited in all the leading cities of England and America, both on the screen and in the penny-in-the-slot machines.

KIPLING (Limited).

In addition to such ordinary literary work as novels, short stories, and verses, Mr. Kipling, it is hoped, will agree to write every year no fewer than six strictly private letters on debateable public questions, which shall, in due course, find their way into the public press.

KIPLING (Limited).

A private wire will be affixed between Potsdam and the Company's offices, to facilitate the transmission of telegrams to Mr. Kipling from the German Emperor.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE Duke of York is about to pay a visit to Lord Clifford of Chudleigh; and there seems to be an echo of ancient days in the announcement. A very close bond united two of their forerunners; for the Duke of York, afterwards James II., and the first Lord Clifford of Chudleigh, were both of them "reconciled" to the Church of Rome at about the same date—a date at which that "reconciliation," so easy to-day, meant proscription, fines, imprisonment, and, if Titus Oates so willed it, death itself. When the Test Act was passed in 1673, men who had suspected the Duke of York and Lord Clifford of being secret Papists had their suspicions confirmed: the Duke of York sacrificed his command of the Navy, and Lord Clifford—despite the entreaty of the King—resigned his post as Lord High Treasurer. As to Clifford, even his friend Evelyn was taken at last by surprise. "I am confident," he wrote, after many talks with Clifford, "that he forbore receiving the Communion more from some promise he had entered into to gratify the Duke than from any prejudice to the Protestant religion." But, a little later, Evelyn knew the truth, for "the test ousted Clifford of the place of Lord Treasurer of England, and of being any longer a Privy Councillor; who, though a new convert, generously preferred his conscience to his interests." There are a number of documents at Ugbrooke Park bearing on these intimate relations between their ancestors.

A VERY different link between the Cliffords and the Royal House is more familiarly remembered—that, of course, of the intimacy between "Fair Rosamond" Clifford and Henry II.

UNDER the somewhat mixed heading of "The Queen's Favourite Authors and Animals," a daily paper makes the confidence that Her Majesty is an admirer of the Brownings, numbering among her particular pets the verses Miss Barrett wrote at the time of the Accession, "She wept to wear a crown." That admiration, had it been expressed sixty years before, would have given a rare pleasure to the invalid woman in Wimpole-street, who, seven years later, found it in her heart to write of Louis Philippe in a letter to a friend: "He is the noblest king, according to my idea, in Europe—the most royal king in the encouragement of art and literature, and in the honouring of artists and men of letters. Let a young unknown writer accomplish a successful tragedy, and the next day he sits at the king's table. See how different this matter is in our own Court, where the artists are shown up the back stairs, and where no poet, even by the back stairs, can penetrate unless so fortunate as to be a banker also." The allusion is to Rogers, of course, who, all the same, had to lend his Court dress to Wordsworth before he died. "What is the use," asks Mrs. Browning in conclusion, "of kings and queens in these days except to encourage arts and letters?" The answer is her own, and is unsportsmanlike. "Really," she says, "I cannot see. Anybody can hunt an otter out of a box—who has nerve enough!" So to authors and animals one comes round again by chance at last.

WHILE naming the Brownings, a record may be allowed of a little saying which seems worthy to take its place among the rich store of those recently published to their names. At the time when the son of the poets was beginning his public career as a painter, the surviving parent was full of anxiety as to the effect of his first exhibits. "People expect so much from him, poor fellow," said Mr. Browning to the present writer, "because he had a clever mother."

THE Oratory at Brompton, which has this week kept with semi-private festivities its golden jubilee, is one of the largest churches in London, but it is also, in its way, a centre of activities that have counted something in literature as well as in religious life. Just fifty years ago the Oratory was planted in London—first of all in King William-street, Strand—by Faber, who had already dabbled in verse, had taken the Newdigate prize at Oxford and, when he took orders in the Anglican Church, had called forth from Wordsworth the remark: "He may be right, but England has lost a poet." Newman, though staying in Birmingham, at the Oratory he had founded there, delivered in King William-street a course of lectures which brought Charlotte Brontë and Thackeray, for the nonce, into the congregation. The removal to the present site at South Kensington was soon effected; and there, at popular services each night, are sung those hymns of Faber which find echoes in churches of all denominations—such hymns as "O Paradise" and "The Pilgrims of the Night." There, too, are treasured in the library of the Fathers the manuscripts of devotional books, such as "All for Jesus," which Faber wrote at the speed of one a year, and which, besides becoming the most popular works of their class among his English-speaking co-religionists, have been translated into nearly all the languages of Christendom.

THERE is this sentence in a letter written to a friend by Tennyson in 1852, just after his appointment to be Poet Laureate: "Charles Weld sent my poem to the Times, but the Times ignores it." Never mind, a fault can be repented of and repaired, for on the Queen's birthday the verses of the present Poet Laureate had their heading as the attraction of the Times' poster!

THE prediction, made last week, that the Daily Telegraph would speedily follow the Daily Mail in the withdrawal of its Sunday edition, has been rapidly fulfilled. It is a great victory, partly, no doubt, for the people called Sab-batarians, but most of all for the Six-workdays' party. The Observer and the Sunday Times go on, unmolested by threats, boycottings, or hostile resolutions. They had a fight, no doubt, when two papers were sent forth by millionaires to be not merely their rivals, but the rivals of each other. For that fight they are now likely to be rewarded by the patronage of a certain number of persons who have now learned to read a Sunday sheet.

MR. F. C. GOULD'S "Political Natural History" series in the Westminster Gazette contains some happy drawings and legends. This week we have "The Great Seal" (Phoca Halsburya). Beneath the caricature is this legend: "The Great Seal, although so called, is really small; but he is round. He is very intelligent, and is extremely kind to all his kin. It does not matter whether the water is hot or cold; he is always cheerful."

Correspondence.

St. Paul and Sir Alfred Lyall.

SIR,—I fear lest, like Robespierre, I become embêtant avec mon Être suprême, among savages and barbaric peoples. The least unlikely theory of his origin, as I think, is that of St. Paul. Having the idea of "making" and of "a maker," many races hit on the idea of a maker in general, though to that idea they were far from constant. It is only a guess, like another; and the problem can never be settled, because we can never know what man's mental powers really were when he hit on a conception which is not monotheism, but may be the germ of monotheism.

However, I may call a more recent witness than St. Paul, and a witness who has paid more attention to anthropology than did the Apostle: I mean Sir Alfred Lyall. In the second volume of his Asiatic Studies (just published), Sir Alfred speaks of Miss Kingsley's observations on the African god "who originally created the world and all that it contains," but who is now otiose, as is usual in barbaric theology. Sir Alfred says: "He is evidently the Final Cause invented to explain phenomenal existence, as a house implies an architect." He is not a deified ancestor. "We must accept Miss Kingsley's conclusion . . . that West Africa has not deified ancestors" (ii., pp. 245, 248). Thus St. Paul and Sir Alfred Lyall seem at one on this point: "things made" suggested the idea of a maker. How early, in what mental condition, the idea arose we cannot know; but certainly savages far more archaic than Miss Kingsley's West African middle barbarians have the idea. Miss Kingsley's observations, of course, only corroborate those of Wilson, Mungo Park, and many other explorers. A number of these witnesses may be found in Waitz and Gerland's Anthropologie (vol. ii.), and in Mr. Max Müller's Hibbert Lectures (pp. 106-113). Sir A. B. Ellis, reporting similar African facts, leans to the theory of borrowing, against which, in this case, I have argued in The Making of Religion. As to the origin of the belief, Sir Alfred Lyall, St. Paul, and myself are agreed, in opposition to your reviewer. I do not say that man evolved the idea of a maker "before he began to develop animistic notions," though this may have been the case. Nobody can know that. But man certainly, in known cases, has the idea full-blown, before he has begun to worship ancestral ghosts. We should try to confine ourselves to facts: as to what lies behind the facts, we are left to "the taste and fancy" of the theorist, who may select a "magnified elemental spirit" instead of "a magnified non-natural man," like Baiame in Australia. Orthodoxy has little to gain, if I am right, except another proof that science has, once more, been in much too great a hurry, both as to her theory of the origin of Theism, and as to her "cock-certainty" that she is acquainted with the limits of human faculty.—I am, &c.,

A. LANGE.

A Hard Case.

SIR,—I do not demand your sympathy, but I ask for it in all humility. A gentleman who, I believe, hails from California is possessed of a very ready wit. He loves children; so do I. He writes nonsense; so do I. He is fain to have kinship with the Fairies; I am already one of their best friends; free of their craft.

Sometimes, in various periodicals, I sign my name; so does he. We have even clashed in the same issue of the same paper. His name—one must be courteous in these matters—is GELETT BURGESS. Mine is horribly similar—GILBERT BURGESS.

I recently wrote some signed art criticisms in a daily paper concerning the pictures that should never have been painted at the Academy and New Gallery. To him, in many quarters, was accorded the discredit. He, telling monstrous child-tales in a paper devoted to the interests of women generally and fashion-plates in particular, has made a great success. But part of this has been accredited to me.

What am I to do?

Shall I go to California and become a humorist under his name, or shall I persuade him to stay in this country and become a critic under my name?

I respect him; but I fear him, seeing that he gets the credit of all my worst work and I get the credit of all his best. And he is bound to have his revenge.

Perhaps you, sir, can arrange a meeting between us, so that we may be able to effect a compromise. For instance, a bond might be drawn up thus: I, in future, will sign Harold Brown; he, in his turn, will inscribe himself John Smith.—I am, &c.,

GILBERT BURGESS.

"Was Bacon a Poet?"

SIR,—In regard to your article on this subject in Mr. J. Addington Symonds's essay, Elizabethan Song-Books, occurs the following: "Thos. Campion, with his religious and philosophical soul, was abundant in such strains of poetry. I will select one little piece, which illustrates the loose, but genial, manner of translation common at that time. It is modelled upon Horace, and has generally been ascribed, but without sufficient reason, as I think, to Lord Bacon." Then follows the poem in question, commencing: "The man of life upright."—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 33.

Last week we asked for an English version of the following poem of De Leyre:

LE ROSIER.

Je l'ai planté, je l'ai vu naître
Ce beau Rosier où les oiseaux
Viennent chanter sous ma fenêtre
Perchés sur ses jeunes rameaux.

Joyeux oiseaux, troupe amoureuse,
Ah! par pitié ne chantez pas;
L'amant qui me rendait heureuse,
Est parti pour d'autres climats.

Pour les trésors du nouveau monde
Il fuit l'amour, brave la mort.
Hélas! pourquoi chercher sur l'onde
Le bonheur qui trouvait au port.

Vous, passagères hirondelles,
Qui revenez chaque printemps,
Oiseaux voyageurs, mais fidèles,
Ramenez-le moi tous les ans.

In spite of the allurements of Whitsuntide, a great many of our readers have attempted this translation. Altogether a high level of excellence has been reached, although we cannot quite say that any translator has added a new poem to the English store, to do which should, of course, be the aim of all who turn foreign verse into another language. It has been very difficult to decide, but, altogether, the following version by A. J. Elliot, 12, Wrenshaw-road, St. John's Wood, N.W., seems to be the most satisfactory:

THE ROSEBUSH.

I planted it, I watched it grow,
That beautiful Rose, where all day long
Birds from its tender boughs below
My window warble amorous song.

For pity's sake, you jeyous quire,
Ah, sing not in these love-lorn times.
When he who is my heart's desire
Has sailed away for other climes.

He flies from love, and death would brave
In treasure-quest new worlds to roam—
Alas! why seek across the wave
The happiness he found at home?
Ye roving swallows, who return
So loyally each springtime here—
Your constancy, ah, bid him learn,
And bring him to me every year!

We quote some of the more unconventional translations:

THE ROSE-TREE.

I planted and I watched it spring,
My fair rose-tree my green rose-tree;
Where birds now, perching, come and sing
Under my window—sing to me.

Hush! joyous birds that throng my tree,
In pity, peace, ye loving hands!
Once we were happy, I and he—
My love, who's gone to other lands.

For the New World's wealth he braves
Death, and from true love turns to roam.
Alas! why seek upon the waves
The happiness which lies at home?

Oh! swallows that with every spring,
Faithful, tho' fugitive, return—
Oh! bear him with you—each year bring
My lover back, for whom I yearn.

[A. G. L., Inverness.]

THE ROSE TREE.

I planted it, and watched it grow—
The rose-tree at my window—now
The gay birds perch on each young bough,
And make sweet love in music flow.
O birdies birdies, sing not so!
Be pitiful!—my grief allow!
My love—my all of bliss, I vow—
For gold to far-off climes must go!
Alas! though he hath wealth eno',
He flies from love the wave to plough—
To darksome death, maybe, to bow—
And leaves his bliss in port to woe.
O birds of passage—swallows dear!
Bring me him home with you next year!

[R. M. L., Liverpool.]

I planted yonder rose-tree fair,
I've watched its young shoots spring,
And birds beneath my window there
Come carolling.
Thrice happy birds! Love's quire, be still,
In pity cease your strain;
He who with joy my heart would fill
Has crossed the main.
He seeks the New World's golden lure,
Flouts love, and e'en death braves,
Ah me! with bliss in port secure,
Why roam the waves?

O swallows leal! who, each springtime,
Return, your wanderings o'er,
Still year by year from that far clime
My love restore.

[M. T. P., Chester.]

Competition No. 34.

Translations seem so much to the mind of competitors that we ask this week for a version from the German. Heine has been called untranslatable: none the less, let the impossible be attempted or triumphed over. We offer a prize of one guinea for the best translation of this song from the Buch der Lieder:

UND WÜSTEN'S DIE BLUMEN, DIE KLEINEN.

Und wüsten's die Blumen, die kleinen,
Wie tief verwundet mein Herz,
Sie würden mit mir weinen,
Zu heilen meinen Schmerz.

Und wüsten's die Nachtigallen,
Wie ich so traurig und krank,
Sie liessen fröhlich erschallen
Erquickenden Gesang.

Und wüsten sie mein Wehe
Die goldnen Sternelein,
Sie kämen aus ihrer Höhe,
Und sprächen Trost mir ein.

Die alle können's nicht wissen,
Nur Eine kennt meinen Schmerz:
Sie hat ja selbst zerrissen,
Zerrissen mir das Herz.

At least two English translations of this poem already exist; our contributors will not, of course, make any use of these.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, May 30. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the second column of p. 592 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

Announcements.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. propose to issue in the autumn a limited édition de luxe of Canon Ainger's well-known edition of the works of Charles Lamb, together with the memoir which appeared in the "English Men of Letters" Series. The whole work will be carefully revised by the editor, who will be able to incorporate some important new letters, and also make interesting additions to the notes. Arrangements have been made with Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. to include the letters from Lamb to Charles Lloyd, which they published last year in a volume edited by Mr. E. V. Lucas.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS will publish Mr. W. Edwards Tirebuck's new romance, The White Woman, at the end of May.

MISS E. M. CLERKE, who contributed some of the translations contained in Dr. Garnett's recent work on Italian literature, has in the press a volume entitled Fable and Song in Italy, tracing out the evolution of the chivalric poems from the street ballads, the repertory of the itinerant minstrel craft.

THE second series of Dr. Edward Moore's Studies in Dante will be published at once at the Clarendon Press. The dedication of the book was accepted by Mr. Gladstone in the last year of his life. The Clarendon Press is also preparing for early publication a large-type edition of the Divina Commedia, reprinted from Dr. Moore's "Oxford Dante."

MESSRS. HURST & BLACKETT will shortly issue at a popular price a new work entitled China and the Chinese, translated and edited from the French of Edmund Planchut by Mrs. Arthur Bell. (N. D'Anvers.)

EARLY LONDON THEATRES

(In the Fields). By T. FAHMAN ORDISH, F.S.A. Fully Illustrated, with Old Maps and Sketches.

Full Mail Gazette.

"Mr. Ordish's book is a serious and all-important contribution to archaeology, and deserves, and will doubtless obtain, a warm welcome. LIGHT FROM THE EAST;

OR, THE WITNESS of the MONUMENTS.

By the Rev. C. J. BALL, M.A.,

Member of the Council of Biblical Archaeology.

This comprehensive work furnishes the chief results of recent Oriental research and discovery. It brings together for the first time, within the compass of a handy volume, a large number of cuneiform and other texts and translations, also accurate reproductions of hundreds of Babylonian, Egyptian, Assyrian, North Syrian, and Phœnician antiquities. Translations of hundred texts made specially for this work contain many suggestive references to the Old Testament.

The Illustrations are chiefly photographic from the Monuments themselves; the exceptions are Drawings by Mr. W. H. Rylands, F.S.A., Secretary to the Society of Biblical Archaeology.

Demy 8vo, 124 pp., price 3s. 6d.

THE STUDENT'S DEUTERONOMY.

A Corrected Translation, with Notes and with References in full to the Preceding and Later Texts.

By the Rev. Canon GIRDLESTONE, M.A.,

Late Principal of Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, and formerly Head of the Translation Department of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

The object of the Work is to make the Translation more accurate and less cumbersome; to call attention in the Notes to certain linguistic, legislative, and archaeological peculiarities in the text; and to illustrate the Speeches by two sets of References—(a) passages in the four previous Books of the Bible to which the Speaker refers, or of which he makes use, and (b) passages in the later Books of the Bible which refer to the Speeches. Upwards of 200 of the former texts, and 300 of the latter, are printed in full on a specially wide margin.

THE PRODIGAL'S BROTHER.

By JOHN MACKIE, Author of "The Devil's Playground," "Sinners Twin," "They that Sit in Darkness."

"SKETCH."—Mr. John Mackie's experience as an explorer, and stock-keeper in the lonely Never-Never Country of tropical Australia, as a gold-digger in Queensland, as one of the mounted police in North-West Canada, has enabled him to impart much actuality and local colour to the scenes of his romances."

THE PRODIGAL'S BROTHER.

By JOHN MACKIE.
ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"The author is evidently an ardent lover of nature. Moreover, he has probed into the depths of the human consciousness, and can give lifelikeness to the characters he depicts. . . . Thoroughly real, thoroughly human. . . . A splendid sequence of thrilling and heart-stirring events. We heartily congratulate Mr. Mackie on his manly and picturesque work, and wish it the widespread circulation it deserves."

THE PRODIGAL'S BROTHER.

ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.—"Original in its setting, and vigorous and breezy in treatment. . . . The story is capably told, natural, realistic, and healthy. . . . The climax, though tragic in some of its bearings, is written with commendable restraint and a fine appreciation of the heroic element that comes out at times in every species of humanity."

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

MAURUS JÓKAI'S POWERFUL ROMANCE.
 Crown 8vo, art linen gilt, 6s.

THE NAMELESS CASTLE. By

MAURUS JÓKAI, Author of "The Green Book,"

"Black Diamonds," &c.

BLACK and WHITE.—"A capital story, but then Maurus Jókai writes only capital stories. It is a pleasure to read a novel like this where the author seems to throw himself wholeheartedly into his story, and gives never so much as a single glance at the public."

BOOK-MAN.—"An enthralling romance of adventure and intrigue. The dominant heroine is almost as clever, as unscrupulous, and as fascinating as Dumas' famous creation. . . . The story is told with infinite delicacy and charm; it stands out a clear and lovely idyll against the tangled background of plot and counter-plot. . . . The threads of intrigue and of feminine psychology are here interwoven with marvellous skill."

THE NAMELESS CASTLE. By

MAURUS JÓKAI.

NEWCASTLE DAILY LEADER.—"The publishers of this volume are doing us inestimable service to English readers in making the works of Maurus Jókai accessible; for Jókai is beyond all question one of the greatest of European writers." The ACADEMY.—"Full of robustness, colour, and excitement, and Jókai's persistent charm."

"In his hands the knack of graceful impertinence is raised by dint of sheer mastery to the dignity of a serious art; there are moments, indeed, when he brings it within measurable distance of the sublime. The Literary Week.

NEXT week we shall publish with the ACADEMY a special Supplement devoted to books of travel, guide-books, &c. In it will appear a number of suggestions by well-known writers on the ideal summer holiday for brain workers.

MR. MEREDITH TOWNSEND, co-editor and co-proprietor with the late Mr. R. H. Hutton of the Spectator since 1861, is now retiring into private life; and no journalist has better earned his rest. Mr. Townsend has been continually in harness since 1848, when, at the age of seventeen, he joined the staff of the Friend of India, subsequently becoming sub-editor, editor, and proprietor of that paper. He left it to return to England, in 1861, and join Mr. Hutton on the Spectator. From that time until the present Mr. Townsend has worked steadfastly as a critic of men and affairs, and a shaper of public opinion. Mr. Townsend is the best type now living of the old-fashioned journalist: hard worker, powerful thinker, tenaciously faithful to his paper, a firm believer in anonymity, and equally firm in insisting on the line which divides his own profession from literature. Mr. Townsend has never reprinted his articles: they were written for the Spectator, and in the Spectator they must be sought.

THE reorganisation of the Spectator will now be complete. That is to say, the paper will henceforth be entirely in the hands of the younger men. Mr. St. Loe Strachey, who was born the year before Mr. Townsend joined the staff, is, however, so well grounded in the old traditions that subscribers under the old régime need feel none of the apprehension suggested by Dr. Robertson Nicoll, who has of late kept almost too jealous an eye upon the Spectator's development.

APPROPOS of Mr. Townsend and Dr. Robertson Nicoll, we are offered in the British Weekly an instance of the dangers that beset Sir Oracles. Mr. Townsend, in his Cornhill article on Mrs. Oliphant, is very dogmatic in his praises of that lady at the expense of other authors. Dr. Nicoll, with some reason, objects. But then, not content with tempering Mr. Townsend's excess, he proceeds to a perverse and unnecessary dogmatism of his own. Dr. Nicoll quotes eight lines by Mr. Yeats as being "worth all the poetry Mr. Kipling has ever written or ever will write." These are the lines:

Had I the heavens' embroidered cloths,
Enwrought with golden and silver light,
The blue and the dim and the dark cloths
Of night and light and the half light,
I would spread the cloths under your feet;
But I, being poor, have only my dreams;
I have spread my dreams under your feet;
Tread softly, because you tread on my dreams.

We are fully as conscious of the beauty of this passage as Dr. Nicoll can be; but there is nothing impressive in the spectacle of a critic crying in the market-place that roast beef can never be whipped cream.

GOOD prices were realised at Sotheby's for the copies of R. L. Stevenson's works which he gave to his mother and which have just come to the hammer by order of her executors. A Father Damien, Sydney edition, with MS. corrections and the author's autograph, £40; Not I, and Other Poems, £22; Moral Emblems, with the two advertisements, £30 10s.; one of these advertisements (very humorous) £6; and eleven copies of The Pentland Rising, £75 5s. These family copies of Stevenson fetched altogether £610 14s. 6d.—a figure which gives those most interested in maintaining Stevenson values no cause to grumble.

MR. J. B. BROWN, of Selkirk, who has received a grant of £150 from the Royal Bounty Fund, was born in 1832, and a number of years ago was a frequent contributor (over the signature "J. B. Selkirk") to Blackwood and the Cornhill. In 1862 his Bible Truths and Shakespearean Parallels was published; seven years later he gave to the world a volume of poems; his Ethics and Aesthetics of Modern Poetry appeared in 1878; and Yarrow, and Other Poems in 1883. In a review of the last-named volume in the ACADEMY, it was stated that, "If there be any man who could read 'Death in Yarrow' unmoved, we neither covet his imperturbability nor feel disposed to congratulate him upon that godlike gift." Over this volume Mr. Andrew Lang admits "that I have shed tears"; and by the National Observer "Death in Yarrow," "Retreat in Yarrow," and the "Song of Yarrow," were characterised as "spotless, all of them." Mr. Brown has for some years been a sufferer from chronic rheumatism, and his friends and admirers are endeavouring to raise another £150, in order to make the testimonial worthy of the recipient.

MR. TCHERKOFF, Tolstoy's agent in this country, has reason on his side in the protest he makes against the treatment of Tolstoy's new novel in America. We do not know what arrangements were made between the Cosmopolitan and the author, but if no right to excise was stipulated for, the author is entitled to feel aggrieved at the excisions which have been made. But according to Mr. Tcherkoff the liberties taken by the Cosmopolitan do not end at the excision of passages, but go on to alterations and modifications of a nature quite unnecessary from even an extreme puritanical standpoint. Tolstoy does not mince his words nor choose his incidents with too much regard for family reading; but the editor must have known this before he accepted the serial. In this country the novel has been printed as it was written.

THE series of sixpenny copyright books to which Messrs. Newnes have just added The Ordeal of Richard Feverel offers extraordinarily catholic reading. Every taste is considered. Side by side we find Sherlock Holmes and What Would Jesus Do?; Ships that Pass in the Night and Departmental Ditties; She and Robert Elanere; A Yankee Boy's Success and The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture. And now comes Mr. Meredith's masterpiece.

FROM Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., the American publishers, comes a handsome catalogue of publications, with a frontispiece containing a group of portraits of the six great American authors with whom the firm had "long-each with a concise biographical notice. As specimens we quote those appertaining to the three James' :

James, Henry. (2 June, 1811—18 December, 1882.)

Born in Albany, N.Y., of Scotch-Irish parentage. He was graduated at Union College in 1830. His father's death left him in independent circumstances, and he gave his time to the study of theology, first at Princeton and then abroad. On a second visit to Europe, in 1843, he became acquainted with the doctrines of Swedenborg, and he adopted them in the main, though he had no sympathy with the New Church as an ecclesiastical body. He lived many years in New York City, and for some time in Newport, but after 1866 made Cambridge his home. He made frequent visits to England, and enjoyed the acquaintance of Carlyle [? Carlyle] and other thinkers there, as well as of the Transcendentalists in America. He wrote a number of books on theological and metaphysical subjects.

James, Henry. (15 April, 1843 —)

Born in New York City; son of Henry James, supra. He was educated chiefly in Europe and at the Harvard Law School. He began to contribute to the magazines in 1865, and he has made literature his profession. Since 1869 he has lived abroad, chiefly in England, and his present home is in London. He has made two or three visits to the United States during this time.

James, William. (11 January, 1842 —)

Born in New York City; son of Henry James, senior, supra. He took the medical degree at Harvard in 1869, and his official connection with the University began in 1872, when he became instructor in physiology there. He was then, successively, assistant professor of physiology, assistant professor of philosophy, and professor of philosophy, and since 1889 he has held the chair of psychology. He received the degree of Ph. D. and Litt. D. from Padua in 1893, and that of LL.D. from Princeton in 1896.

The catalogue is, in its way, a biographical dictionary of American authors.

THE success of the Daily News edition of Dickens is a proof of the place which the novelist still holds in the people's hearts. Sir John Robinson has been telling an interviewer about the number of letters received from subscribers and the affectionate tone of them. "They refer to Dickens more as a loved friend than as a man whom few, if any, of them can have known." It is also noteworthy that the edition has drawn not a single letter of objection, "as if the author were regarded as almost too sacred for petty and malignant criticism."

IN connexion with the Thomas Hood Centenary, Mr. Algernon Ashton, the Old Mortality of literary men, suggests that No. 17, Elm Tree-road, St. John's Wood, being the house wherein "The Song of the Shirt" was written, and the house wherein the poet died, a tablet should be affixed to it. The project is for the Society of Arts to consider.

APROPOS an article last week on an old book, Sancho; or, the Proverbialist, a correspondent informs us that the author was the Rev. John William Cunningham, born 1780, died 1861. He wrote also several works on foreign missions, &c.; but the most popular of his writings was The Velvet Cushion, first published in 1814. This work, our correspondent adds, might be worth reprinting at the present time, as it gives an account of the different sections of the English Church since the Reformation, from an Evangelical point of view. One of the characters in the tale, "Berkely," is a portrait of the Rev. John Venn, vicar of Clapham, under whom the author was curate.

IN spite of the appearance of Joseph John Gurney in the pages of Lavengro, one does not exactly expect to meet with George Borrow in a work entitled Quaker Campaigns. Yet in a book of that name, by Mr. William Jones, a member of the Society of Friends well known all over the world, the sturdy figure of "Six-foot-three" is seen. Mr. Jones is great grandson of Jonathan Hughes, the bard of Llangollen, whose grandson it was, Jonathan Hughes the third, who showed Borrow the bard's chair at Pengwern Farm, and whose conversation is reported in Wild Wales. In later years, says Mr. Jones, the famous chair was disposed of at a sale of farm effects, and thus lost for ever to the bard's descendants. Dr. Knapp, however, we doubt not, could find it again.

It has been generally held that, beyond five unquestioned signatures of his name, we have no specimens of Shakespeare's handwriting on which to pore in reverence. But Mr. A. Hall, of Highbury, has just laid before the public, in facsimile, a lengthy specimen of handwriting which he submits may be Shakespeare's. It is from the play "Sir Thomas More," which Mr. Dyce edited in 1844 from the original MS. The author of "Sir Thomas More" is not down. He doesn't know what he is talking about!" We hope that Mr. Austin's opinion will not subject him to a challenge.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Dial says some hard things about poets. The poetry of the future, he holds, will be written by women. Not that men will cease to be poets, but they will cease to let anyone know it. Because: "Our age is practical. The sensibility that men used a hundred years ago to pride themselves on is nowadays looked on as a weakness—in men at least. Prose is felt to be the essentially masculine form of expression, and the known; but the history of the play is less obscure. It is known that it was submitted to the Master of the Revels, who disapproved of it on the ground that its motive was suggested by a civic outbreak of the London apprentices. The examiner wrote: "Leave out the insurrection wholly, and the cause thereof," &c., &c. Thus there were large gaps to be filled, and Mr. Hall's suggestion is that Shakespeare, who was then engaged in copying and tinkering plays, filled them out of his own head, and in his own handwriting. Mr. Hall has selected two passages which had both been written out on separate scraps of paper and pasted over the deleted matter. We reproduce eight lines out of the thirty-nine reproduced by Mr. Hall in his brochure. They read as follows:

Why, this is cheerful newes: friends goe and come:
Reverend Erasmus, whose delitious words
Express the very soule and life of witt,
Newly toke sad leave of me [and] with teares
Trubled the silver channell of the Themes,
Which, glad of such a burden, prowldie sweld
And one her bosom bore him toward the sea:
Hees gon to Rotterdam; peace goe with him!

The questions raised by Mr. Hall are for experts to answer; but the riddle is an interesting one, and we hope it will not be lightly "given up."

MR. L. F. AUSTIN, who, through the changes on the Illustrated London News, still, we are glad to see, contributes the weekly "Note Book" article, comments amusingly on the recent French duel. "Personally," he says, "I incline to the opinion that Hamlet was not fat and scant of breath, but lean and long-winded. How otherwise could he have spouted those soliloquies? Moreover, Ophelia calls him 'the glass of fashion and the mould of form,' which is not consistent with corpulence. Perhaps Shakespeare wished to distinguish between the standpoints from which a man is seen by two women—a querulous mother and an adoring sweetheart. Mothers, you know, can say disagreeable things of their sons. The mother of a very eminent peer, listening to one of his speeches in the House of Lords, remarked: 'I wish my poor boy would sit more prosaic the prose the more masculine it is felt to be. The old lurking popular notion that there is something unmanly, or unmasculine, in the make-up of the poet has gained ground." . . . People accept a poet "grudgingly as a man, an all-round manly man, only on condition that his poetry is essentially good strong prose, virile prose cut up in lengths, like Mr. Kipling's. Their gorge rises at the notion of a big, brawny, bearded he-creature like Tennyson, with the frame of a coal-heaver and the face of a buccancer, chirping about 'Airy, fairy Lilian,' crooning cradle-songs, or caterwauling in erotic strain over love and the moon."

THE critic does not mince his words. But his argument is not sound. Men will continue to write poetry in spite of any growth of silly popular prejudice; only, possibly, if the prejudice becomes too strong they may resort to hiding their identity. And while the tendency of woman is to be masculine, she is not likely, if the prophet's reasoning is accurate, to do anything so unmanly as write verse.

THE Sixth Annual Report of the Kilburn Public Library, just issued, gives a list of the occupations of the new borrowers enrolled during the past year. These include:

1 Authoress.	1 Horse dealer.
3 Clergymen.	1 Journalist.
109 Clerks.	9 Merchants.
3 Dentists.	1 Nitrate expert.
1 Director.	1 Teacher of telepathy.
1 Farrier.	1 Turncock.
2 French polishers.	1 Valet.

The information stops too soon. We want to know what books the Nitrate expert read.

THE Neapolitan animal painter, Signor Filippo Palizzi, some time ago, although within sight of his eightieth birthday, promised a picture to the Church of St. Peter in his native town of Vasto. The work is now completed. It is entitled "Ecce Agnus Dei," and it depicts John the Baptist pointing to the figure of Christ. The old painter has written in a corner these words: "To-day I complete the age of eighty years and am cheerfully working at the picture 'Ecce Agnus Dei,' which I promised as a gift to the Church of St. Peter in my native town Vasto. I execute the work with great joy, and hope to bring it to a happy termination. I hope that my fellow-citizens will favourably accept it, and that it will remind them of the great affection of their old fellow-townsmen, Filippo Palizzi."

THIS is the pleasant epilogue appended by Prof. Fiske to his new book Through Nature to God:

L'ENVOI.

Yesterday, when weary with writing, and my mind quite dusty with considering these atoms, I was called to supper, and a salad I had asked for was set before me. "It seems then," said I aloud, "that if pewter dishes, leaves of lettuce, grains of salt, drops of vinegar and oil, and slices of eggs, had been floating about in the air from all eternity, it might at last happen by chance that there would come a salad." "Yes," says my wife, "but not so nice and well-dressed as this of mine is!"—KEPLER, apud Tait and Stewart, Paradoxical Philosophy.

A CORRESPONDENT, "J. H. K.," who has been comparing the Sam. Johnson signature in the ACADEMY for May 20 with one of the signatures of Dr. Johnson given in Bohn's edition of Boswell, is of opinion that the one which we reproduced from the flyleaf of Hudibras is not genuine. At the same time, the years intervening between 1747, the date of the Hudibras signature, and the Bohn signature might account for much discrepancy.

MR. EDWARD ALMACK, the author of an elaborate bibliography of the Eikon Basilike, published a few years ago, has issued a leaflet giving particulars of copies of various editions which have been brought to his notice since the publication of his work. This is one entry in the leaflet: "Mr. Hamon le Strange, of Hunstanton Hall, Norfolk, has a copy in old black morocco, gilt edges, with crown and 'C.R.' on the covers, and gives the following interesting particulars:

It has been in the library here since it was purchased on publication. It bears the autograph of 'ALICE LE STRANGE,' the wife of Sir Hamon le Strange, who died in 1656, and also epitaphs in Sir Hamon's hand. According to the Hunstanton Household Accounts of the period, in the hand of Alice le Strange, no less than six copies were bought in the summer of 1649:—'July 1649 for 2 of Our Blessed King Charles his Bookes, one at 2 & 6^d. & one at 3 & 6^d. for 2 of Our Gracious Kinge Charles his Bookes, for his Apothegms & Henderson's Papers 6^s. 6^d. for 2 of our Gracious King Charles his Bookes 4^s. 9^d.'

SIMULTANEOUSLY a sixpenny edition of Adam Bede and an illustrated edition of Scenes of Clerical Life reach us from Messrs. Blackwood. The artist of the latter, Mr. H. R. Millar, has treated the stories sympathetically and intelligently.

Bibliographical.

WE are promised a Life of Mme. Sarah Bernhardt, translated into English from a French original. If this is published during the actress's forthcoming season in London, it will doubtless have a certain vogue here. It so happens that Mme. Bernhardt is one of the few leading players of to-day of whom there has hitherto been no biographical celebration (in book form). There are at least three full-blown memoirs of Sir Henry Irving, in addition to an elaborate account of his first American trip. Miss Ellen Terry was lately "biographed"; Miss Genevieve Ward was "biographed" long since—some eighteen years ago; Miss Mabel Collins has written the Life of Mme. Modjeska; someone has done the same for Miss Ada Rehan; and Mr. Edgar Pemberton has told the story of Mr. John Hare's career. Mr. Hatton has recorded the reminiscences of Mr. Toole; and Sir Squire and Lady Bancroft, as well as Miss Mary Anderson, Miss Emily Soldene, and Mr. Albert Chevalier, have recorded their own. From Mrs. Kendal we have had a book made up partly of autobiography and partly of general discourse. Of Mme. Bernhardt the Life has not till now been written, and for many, no doubt, it will have interest, whether it be a bare record of professional doings, or whether it have in it the spice of anecdote and gossip.

The appearance of a sixpenny edition of Lady Audley's Secret naturally leads the reading man to "reminisce." One recalls the sensation that the story made, nearly four decades ago, in households hitherto unaccustomed to such disturbing literary fare—how the British matron and the British maid found themselves suddenly interested in the literature of murder and mystery. Few novels of our time have made so immediate and deep a mark as this one did. Nor has the public been permitted to forget this distant triumph. I believe I am accurate in saying that Miss Braddon has always announced herself in print as "author of Lady Audley's Secret," although that work cannot be accepted as, in a literary sense, her best. In the same way, Miss Yonge has always described herself, on her title-pages, as "author of The Heir of Redclyffe"; and, no doubt, in both cases the ladies have been guided by a trustworthy instinct.

The Miss Clerke from whom we are to have by and by a book on Fable and Song in Italy is, I take it, the Miss Ellen M. Clerke from whom we have already received two little works on Jupiter and his System and The Planet Venus. This Miss Clerke is not to be confounded with the Miss Agnes M. Clerke, author of A Popular History of Astronomy, volumes on The System of the Stars and The Herschells and Modern Astronomy, and some Familiar Studies in Homer. It is a pity when two writers have names and initials so similar as in this instance. Of initials, I fear, the great bulk of the public takes but little account.

Mr. Andrew Lang informs the readers of Longman's that he has not read the Browning Love Letters. "I do not think that another person's love letters are entertaining, except in breach of promise of marriage cases now and then." But nobody asked Mr. Lang to find the Browning letters "entertaining." Whether they should have been published is at least a matter for argument; but now that they are in type, Mr. Lang, by neglecting to read them, is neglecting an opportunity of understanding more completely than he does two remarkable individualities—deliberately remaining ignorant, in fact, of a notable episode in the history of Victorian literature.

I see we are to have a new biography of that very worthy person, Robert Raikes, philanthropist. The announcement, however, does but carry my thoughts towards a very different Raikes—that Thomas Raikes to whom Count D'Orsay addressed so cruel a mot (recorded by Frederick Locker), and whose Diary, published originally in 1856-7, is a storehouse of interesting matter. Will no one republish that Diary, or, at least, reprint the best bits of it (as R. H. Stoddard did for the American public)? It seems to be not so well known as it ought to be.

The reprint of Philemon Holland's translation of Suetonius has recalled to the mind of a correspondent of the Spectator the epigram aimed at that much-translating gentleman. The correspondent's version of the epigram is, however, not that which is generally accepted. Here is the couplet as it appears in authoritative collections of such things:

Philemon with translations so doth fill us,
He will not let Suetonius be Tranquillus.

Amazing China.

Intimate China. By Mrs. Archibald Little. (Hutchinson. 21s.)

The Break-up of China. By Lord Charles Beresford. (Harper & Bros. 12s.)

AMAZING titles! In each "China" stands for three hundred and eighty-five million human beings. These millions have been hitherto a sort of reserve of humanity, shut in from the rest of the world by a high wall and profound traditions. Deep in the recesses of their vast country millions and millions of men and women have been reared to know no other country, laws, or religion than those to which they were born. And now this enormous cistern of humanity is about to lend its universe of quiet waters to the turbid and angry channels of Western progress. A spectacle more singular and tremendous has never been offered by history. This destiny is the more singular and tremendous because it may be taken for granted that millions of Chinamen, wrapt in their village concerns, know nothing whatever about it.

Even now it is probable that China could "get along" very well without Europe, which it exceeds in area and population. But either as customers or subjects the Chinese are to be dragged into the arena. Their fate depends on many things; but it appears that the real asset, the vital element in China, is the industry and honesty of its common people. These qualities emerge from all the corruption, superstition, supineness, and exclusiveness which are the clouds overhanging the country. By their industry, if by anything, the Chinese will be saved and turned to the service of humanity as a whole. If only their work could be put before them and regulated, these backward children would astonish the world. Ages ago they discovered the principle of co-operation. Mrs. Little tells us:

In a Chinese business, be it large or be it small, pretty well every man in the business has his share; so that you are sometimes astonished when a merchant introduces to you as his partners a set of young men who in England would be junior clerks. Even the coolie wrappering the tea-boxes says: "We are doing well this year," and works with a will through the night, knowing he, too, will have his portion in the increased business this increased work signifies. The way, indeed, in which Chinese work through the night is most remarkable. Men will row a boat day and night for four or five days, knowing that the sum of money gained will thus be quicker earned, and only pausing, one at a time, to take a whiff at a pipe or to eat. They will press wool all through the night, to oblige their employer, without a murmur, if only given free meals while doing the additional work. The truth is, the habit of industry has been so engendered in the Chinese as to be second nature, their whole system tending to encourage it.

It is said—and the figure will serve—that a man may hypnotise himself by looking at his own image in a mirror. This seems to have been China's fate; and the mirror has been left whole so long, and the looking into it has been so steadfast, that it is not clear how or by whom China's trance is to be dispersed. Neither is it clear how the benefits of its awakening are to be shared and regulated. Vast empires have broken up before now; but they have broken up when their strength was expended and their hearts eaten out. They have broken up under the pressure of inferior peoples, animated by the unscrupulous joy and energy of rude health. But China, with its genius for reversing the usual order of things, has conserved its vigour, has refused the contest, and is now like to be the prey of full-grown and superior nations. Europe is stupified by the problem thus presented. Verily, if it be an error in a nation to hold aloof from the human family, China, which has done this thing has been overtaken by Nemesis. "Tui shan, ki tui hu?" ("The great mountain is broken") were almost the last words of Confucius. "Liang muh, ki lwai hu!" ("The strong beam is thrown down") he added. And his last utterance was: "Chi jiu, ki wei hu!" ("The wise man withers like a plant"). One asks, Is the great mountain the Chinese Empire; the strong beam the Manchu dynasty; and the wise man Confucius himself?

These may seem vague and unprofitable questions; but one is thrown back upon them. Even Lord Charles Beresford's book—an exhaustive and businesslike inquiry—leaves one oppressed by the broad enigma. The gallant admiral tells us that China is sound at the core, but that its administration and army are rotten, and that except along the coast there is no security for British trade and not much for life. Now it is only through the army and administration that the Western Powers can operate at present upon the dumb millions of China, and what these authorities are like may be gathered from Lord Charles Beresford's reports. Take two statements:

As the generals, like all authorities in China, only have a nominal salary, they make large profits or squeezes during their command. In order to report an instance, I questioned one of those in command when in Peking. He informed me that he commanded 10,000 men. I ascertained that all he actually commanded was 800. His method is common to China. He receives the money to pay and feed and clothe 10,000 men. If his army was to be inspected, he hires coolies at 200 cash (5½d.) a day to appear on parade. This is well known to the inspecting officer, but he receives a douceur to report that he has inspected the army and has found it in perfect order.

As for equipment, Lord Charles Beresford found twelve different kinds of rifles in use, besides gingals and bows.

A gingal is a weapon between 9 ft. and 10 ft. long. They are different lengths in different armies; some of them are breech-loading, others muzzle-loading. Their weights vary from 40 lb. to 60 lb. Three men are required to handle them. When in action, the gingal is laid along the shoulders of two men, while the third man fires it. I also saw bows and arrows. . . . It seems incredible, but some of the soldiers are still practised in shooting with bows and arrows at a target. When at Peking I saw them practising in an open space near the observatory. Hitting the target is a detail of minor importance; the real merit consists in the position or attitude of the bowman when discharging his shaft.

Bad and mulish as is the administration, it is not the only obstacle to the awakening of China. The solidarity of a people who make the family, not the individual, the unit of society, has to be reckoned with. The family and the trade guild are all-important, and everyone is guaranteed by someone else. As Mrs. Little says: "It is the eldest man who directs the family councils. Thus, when a man dies, the deciding voice is for his eldest brother, not for his eldest son; than which, probably, no custom could tend more to conservatism, for there never comes a time when the voice of youth makes itself heard with authority."

And thus China becomes a huge problem, which one hardly dare survey as a whole, but which will vex and puzzle us in instalments for many and many a day. Alas! for the China of our dreams, the China that pleased us long ago, when the tea-cups were set in the nursery, and the firelight played on the figures and flowers which were the emblems of that mysterious and delightful land. Have our statesmen considered how the occidentalising of China touches English children? What gorgeous myths will be dulled and exploded! What prosaic blight among the pagodas, what a withering of the jasmine flowers, what fading out of lotus lakes and skies immaculate; even the tea-fields will be no more elysian. China will become real. Alas, too, for that dim city life—how one used to see it!—with processions pouring over strangely built bridges, with silken robes, silken flags; with high-borne lanterns, and devilish masks, and images under red pavilions, and weird music controlled by dreadful gongs. For fear was mingled with those dreams, such fear as De Quincey magnifies to awful proportions in his Opium Eater, declaring that he would go mad among the men and scenery of China, among its birds and snakes and crocodiles, and other "unutterable monsters and abortions." Land of childish aversions, land, no less, of little bridges and temples, and cock-boats shining in the soup-plate, or glowing in the rare and splendid lantern! And then, like a comic commentary on it all, the Chinaman in England, alone with his pig-tail, and sighing for a meal of birds' nests—the undefended butt of boys from school! All that is doomed. Our children will not think so of China, for China will become real.

In these two volumes that dream-China is to seek. Only once or twice does it shimmer in Mrs. Archibald Little's pleasant, but, oh, so practical, pages. It is sweetly captured in this rendering of a drinking song, written by a bard of the eighth century, and still a favourite in China:

ON DRINKING ALONE BY MOONLIGHT.

Here are flowers, and here is wine;
But where's a friend with me to join
Hand to hand and heart to heart
In one full cup before we part?

Rather than to drink alone,
I'll make bold to ask the moon
To condescend to lend her face
To grace the hour and the place.

Lo! she answers, and she brings
My shadow on her silver wings;
That makes three, and we shall be,
I ween, a merry company.

The modest moon declines the cup,
But shadow promptly takes it up;
And when I dance, my shadow fleet
Keeps measure with my flying feet.

Yet though the moon declines to tipple,
She dances in yon shining ripple;
And when I sing, my festive song
The echoes of the moon prolong.

Say, when shall we next meet together;
Surely not in cloudy weather;
For you, my boon companions dear,
Come only when the sky is clear.

This has the stillness, the grace, the antiquity of the willow pattern. Although English children are to be given geography where we had "the glory and the dream," it is pleasant to know, on Mrs. Archibald Little's authority, that "to Chinese children life in a Chinese city must be very pleasant." And for these surviving reasons:

There are the great festivals: the Chinese New Year, with all its countless crackers; the Dragon Boat Festival, when each district of the city mans a boat shaped like a dragon, and all paddle like mad, naked to the waist, and with a strange shout that must be very dear to children. Then there are the visits to the graves, when all the family goes out into the country together; and the long processions when the officials are carried through the city in open chairs and long fur gowns, hundreds of umbrellas of gay colours going before them, and their retainers also riding in pairs and in fur coats of inferior quality. All the beggar-children of the city have a high-day then. With fancy dress of various sorts over their rags, they walk or ride or are carried round the city, sometimes as living pictures, sometimes representing conquered aborigines, sometimes even Englishmen in short square coats and tight trousers.

In the spring-time a procession goes out to meet the spring, and sacrifice an ox in the river bed in its honour; and, strangely enough, the day in February on which this is done is always the most genial spring-like day, though after it is over winter sets in with renewed severity. At other times it is the image of the fire-god that is carried round, to show him the buildings he is honoured to protect.

Then, again, one evening there will be about four miles of little lanterns sent floating down the great river in honour of the dead. Or there will be the baking of the glutinous rice-cakes, accompanied by many curious ceremonies. And in it all the child takes his part.

This is pleasant, but it is no longer remote. The Englishman in his "tight trousers," the camera aimed at the fire-god, make all the difference. The picture becomes definite as Western daylight slowly suffuses the scene.

AGAIN Ireland, which is to-day finding its voice in song with a plentifulness to make amends for past silence. One can understand the fascination of Ireland for her poets—a fascination which laid hold even of Lord Tennyson, Saxon though he was, when he wrote The Voyage of Maeldune. The cry of modern poetry is for subject-matter. So many singers, most of them deftly trained in the art of utterance, and most of them with nothing to utter: a hard case, best met by silence, which the modern poets, nevertheless, will in nowise observe. For the Irish poet there is no such difficulty. In Ireland herself, in the treasury of her traditions, her legends, her superstitions, in the remains of her ancient bards, there is a full treasury of poetic material, where every man may dip his hand if he have wit to make use of what he takes from it. It is a treasury seemingly inexhaustible; how many volumes of prose and verse it has furnished forth is an incalculable matter; and all this substance is of a rare picturesqueness, a rare fancy, which prompts to poetry of itself. The merest peasant's tale has a poem in it, "would men observingly distil it out"; and there is now no lack of distillers. Each has his own "private still," unseizable of Excise officers, and the produce pays tax only to publishers, so that to the manufacture of potheen Ireland seems like to add the manufacture of poetry as an indigenous industry. Moreover, she steadily improves in this latter manufacture, and will hardly suffer long the reproach of lagging in it behind England. No longer does she appeal for witness of her bardship to the eternal and most questionable Moore, to come then with a plumb drop straight down on the other Thomas—Davis, maker of second-hand Macaulay ballads, and many other rhymers of more diffuse patriotism and waste sentiment than inspiration. She has discovered her neglected Mangan, she has her modern Yeats, and a throng of other hands from which her ancient poetic wealth is passing into circulation anew.

Mrs. Clement Shorter is already familiar as a maker of ballads in other than the Davis fashion. Here we have a further volume, partly ballads, partly lyrics; but through all run the superstitions and legends of her country: they serve her well. She has none of the dream-quality of Mr. Yeats; her method is very direct and simple; but the legends which form her subject-matter make their own poetry, and are poetic under the simplest treatment—poetic, and often pathetic. The first poem of the volume, "My Lady's Slipper," is not a legend, but purely a story, though, she assures us, a true story; but it has a strong dramatic appeal, though of the saddest. It tells the story of an O'Rourke, who meets his lady-love, married to his rival, and obeys her appeal to rescue her from her husband's ill-treatment. He bears her away to his own house, sees her trip up the stair, and sees her never more. Next day O'Rourke visits a friend whose house joins his own, seeking consolation and advice. The friend, too, has vanished—departed, he is told, on a journey. Years later, when O'Rourke is a grey and broken man, his dog brings him a red slipper: it is the lady's. He follows the dog upstairs, and is led by it to a secret chamber, which, unknown to him, has all these years existed between the two houses. There lie two skeletons—the lost lady and the lost friend. To that hidden trysting-place he had unawares conducted her, and there the two unsuspected lovers had drunk poison together.

Wrapped in death's silence, safe from my scorn ;

He was my friend :

It was his love whom I bore home that morn,

His to the end !

Was it the woman who plotted and spied,

Using my heart

Just for a stone there to step where the tide

Kept them apart ?

Was he a coward, lying lowly to wait,

Giving me blame ?

Vain do I strike him, avenging my fate.

Cursed be his name !

She was my love : did she bid him believe

I for his sake

Cast away honour to stoop and deceive,

Bore him the stake ?

He was my friend : dare I doubt him and know ?

What if it be

Nothing he knew of her coming—the blow

That fell on me ?

Knowing his honour, it might be she came,

Since he was still.

What did she care for my torture or shame ?—

I served her will.

Knowing his weakness under her eyes,

Boldly she flew

Into his arms, hushed his blame and surprise,

If this be true.

Speak to me once, for God's sake, till I know

What was the worst !

My friend, my beloved, did you both plan the blow

Made me accurst ?

Speak to me once, O dead voices, for I

Wait to forgive !

Tell me your secret : the echoes reply—

I alone live.

Only the bark of my dog in the tower,

Glad in his play ;

Red was her cloak, and her face like a flower ;

Hide it away !

Even from this brief description and extract it will be seen how dramatic is the poem. But most, as we say, are based on legends and superstitions. Take this lyric, based on the peasants' fancy that the dead return on All Souls' Eve, and stay if you set a chair and food for them. The other observances alluded to in the poem are well known—some are referred to also in Burns.

THE ONE FORGOTTEN.

A spirit speeding down on All Souls' Eve
From the wide gates of that mysterious shore
Where sleep the dead, sung softly and yet sweet.

"So gay a wind was never heard before,"

The old man said, and listened by the fire ;

And, "'Tis the souls that pass us on their way,"

The young maids whispered, clinging side by side,
So left their glowing nuts a while to pray.

Still the pale spirit, singing through the night,

Came to this window, looking from the dark

Into the room ; then passing to the door

Where crouched the whining dog, afraid to bark,

Tapped gently without answer, pressed the latch,

Pushed softly open, and then tapped once more.

The maidens cried, when seeking for the ring :

"How strange a wind is blowing on the door !"

And said the old man, crouching to the fire :

"Draw close your chairs, for colder falls the night ;

Push fast the door, and pull the curtains to,

For it is dreary in the moon's pale light."

And then his daughter's daughter with her hand

Passed over salt and clay to touch the ring,

Said low : "The old need fire, but ah ! the young

Have that within their heart to flame and sting."

And then the spirit, moving from her place,

Touched there a shoulder, whispered in each ear,

Bent by the old man, nodding in his chair ;

But no one heeded her, or seemed to hear.

Then crew the black cock, and so weeping sore

She went alone into the night again,

And said the greybeard, reaching for his glass :

"How sad a wind blows on the window-pane !"

And then from dreaming the long dreams of ago

He woke, remembering, and let fall a tear :

"Alas ! I have forgot—and have you gone ?—

I set no chair to welcome you, my dear."

And said the maidens, laughing in their play :

"How he goes groaning, wrinkle-faced and hoar,

He is so old, and angry with his age—

Hush ! hear the banshee sobbing past the door."

We prefer these poems to the genuine lyrics, where Mrs. Shorter seems to us less successful than in her ballads, or such a semi-narrative poem as that just quoted. She is on her own ground among the wild and teeming fancies of peasant belief or traditions from the Irish past. Apart from them she is merely an English poetess, not distinguishable from a store of others. And before we quit a book which will certainly find a welcome with all who were charmed by her previous volumes, we will make one suggestion: it is that Mrs. Shorter is not always sure in her metre. There are poems where the versification is needlessly rough—though this is not visible in those we have quoted. It is an occasional blemish which she might look to.

Mr. Binyon's little pamphlet of London Visions betrays more of the intimate stuff of poetry than any save a very few numbers of his still recent Porphyryon. It is as the singer of wayfarings in London streets that so far he has attained to his most unhesitating and most individual utterance. Others, indeed, have not been slow to see certain qualities of material beauty which this grimy city, of all cities, possesses. Mr. Whistler, for instance, taught us long ago something of the atmospheric charm, at morn and eve and night, of a smoke-laden and moisture-laden heaven. Others have sung the exceptions, the rus in urbe, the flaming sunsets along the river, the lilac-buds in the square. This note of visible beauty Mr. Binyon also catches. How sensitive he is to the influences that strike the sense let this fragment of a Thames poem show :

I walked beside full-flooding Thames to-night

Westward ; upon my face the sunset fell :

The hour, and spacious evening, pleased me well.

Buoyant the air breathed after rain, and kind

To senses flattered with soft sound and light

Of many waves that leapt against the wind,

Where, broadly heaving barge and boat at rest,

The River came at flood ; from golden skies

Issuing through arches, black upon the west,

To flame before the sunset's mysteries.

Far-off to-night as a remembered dream,

That different Thames, familiar as a friend,

That youthful Thames, to whom his willows bend

With private whisper : where my boat would come

Heaped with fresh flowers, and down the cool, smooth stream

Follow his green banks through the twilight home.

Far from these paven shores, these haughty towers,

Where wave and beam glorying together run,

As though they would disown those cradling bowers,

And gushed immediate from the molten sun.

But he will be the poet of more than the face of London : of her heart. To interpret something of her humanity, to touch her living pulse, that is the task he has set himself. In the derelict, the waif, the stray, the outcast, he reads the half-effaced legend of a human soul, and would touch the palimpsest into rendering up its secret with the magical lotion of art. And as he seeks and sees, the husk of the commonplace and the sordid falls away, and outlines beautiful in the strength and simplicity of very life disengage themselves. You see a gang of navvies somewhat blasphemously mending the road o' mornings. Mr. Binyon sees a sculptor's vision of ordered and rhythmical motion.

Now, with the morning shining round them, come
Young men, and strip their coats
And loose the shirts about their throats,
And lightly up their ponderous hammers lift,
Each in his turn descending swift
With triple strokes that answer and begin
Duly, and quiver in repeated change,
Marrying the eager echoes that weave in
A music clear and strange.
But pausing soon, each lays his hammer down,
And, deeply breathing, bares
His chest, stalwart and brown,
To the sunny airs.
Laughing one to another, limber hand
On limber hip, flushed, in a group they stand,
And now untired renew their ringing toil.
The sun stands high, and ever a fresh throng
Comes murmuring; but that eddying turmoil
Leaves many a loiterer, prosperous or unfed,
On easy or unhappy ways,
At idle gaze,
Charmed in the sunshine and the rhythm entralling,
As of unwearied Fates, for ever young,
That on the anvil of necessity,
From measureless desire and quivering fear,
With musical sure lifting and down falling
Of arm and hammer driven perpetually,
Beat out in obscure span
The fiery destiny of man.

Or again, you see a tattered street-walker at dawn idly bestirring herself before the policeman comes to clear the benches of unlicensed sleepers; and Mr. Binyon sees an unforgettable thing, Virgilian in its pathos, and as large and serene in the shaping as a Greek bronze:

Then one, a woman, silently arose,
And came to the broad fountain, brimming cool,
And over the stone margin leaning close,
Dipped hands and bathed her forehead in the pool.
Now as the fresh drops ran upon her brow
And her hands knotted up her hair, the ways
Of old lost mornings came to her, and how
Into her mirror she would smile and gaze.

And the curious part of it is that Mr. Binyon is throughout an alien from the life he describes. The London rhythms do not throb in his veins. He lays his finger on their pulses, notes them down with genuine sympathy; and is all the while aloof, an interested observer from another world, where life is not lived feverishly, and things can be viewed sub specie aeternitatis. He carries his poetry with him; he does not find it. Like all true questers after beauty, he projects it from his own imaginings upon objects which do but reflect it back, and is thus a true creator, making what is not as though it were. What romance is there, until it is put there, in some mean dwelling half dismantled by the pick of the housebreaker, such as the foot of Whitehall has presented for months past? And yet, if the poet says so, the romance is there.

So in some street
Stirred with the rushing feet
Of life that glitters and that thunders past,
An aged house, broken and doomed at last,
Ere yet it vanish quite,
Abandons helpless to the cruel light
Spoiled sanctuaries, filled with emptiness,
Where late the weary harboured, and young fears
Were cradled into peace,

And sacred kisses kissed, and private tears
Were dried, and true hearts hid their close delight.
But now the fires are ashes, all is bare,
The torn gay papers flutters old,
And a phantasmal stair
Climbs into floorless chambers, and hearths cold.

You will always see it so in future. It is this gift, of creating permanent and enduring illusion, that is the heart of real poetry. Mr. Binyon indisputably has it, and as he shows signs of strenuously and patiently cultivating his powers, we prophesy a future for him. His is not an insistent talent, does not cry aloud in the streets. Probably he will never be popular, and we fancy that that will matter as little to him, as it could to any man. Which is the right spirit to take poetry in, after all.

There is a good deal of carefully wrought verse in Miss Gore-Booth's book—verse showing tact, a little humour, and a little epigrammatic force. But tact and humour forsake the author at intervals rather too frequent. They forsook her when she styled her work "Poems." There is not a line of poetry in the book, nor much trace of an intention to write poetry. In one piece she says:

I wrote eight verses late last night,
And slept, and lo! a wondrous sight,
There came eight funerals instead
Marching slowly past my bed.
As they went each nodding plume
Swayed and rhymed across the gloom.
In the twinkling of an eye,
The whole procession passed me by,
And every verse—became a hearse
To carry murdered poetry.

This nocturnal experience could not have been her own. For her title to attention exists precisely in the fact that she has not murdered poetry. She has been content to write verse. And verse may be fine—may even be enduring literature—without being poetry. Miss Gore-Booth's verse is not fine, but sometimes it is good, and often it is agreeable. The book is small; it ought to have been smaller. It contains a number of exercises in the obvious which should never have been disinterred from the magazines. For example:

ASPIRATIONS.

Eels in the mud of the garden pond,
Do you ever think of a life beyond,
Do you ever see that the sky is blue,
And wish that the moon was nearer you?
Do you ever sigh when the skylark sings,
And dream of wings?

Such questions have been asked too often, and by this time everyone should be aware that the answer to them is "No."

Further, Miss Gore-Booth has a trick of pulpiteering, which should be checked. Four lines of mediocre verse, alone in the middle of a vast white page, addressed "To the people on earth," are merely comic, reminding one of the famous exhortation to the terrestrial ball to roll on. Miss Gore-Booth does best in the versified fable sort of thing, as this:

AN OLD STORY.

A maiden loved Diogenes,
Well she thought the sage to please;
But he did not understand her,
Treated her like Alexander;
To all her blandishments replied,
"Gracious maiden, stand aside,
When your pleasant talk is done
I would see the blessed sun."
After such cross words as these,
Still she loved Diogenes.

A trifle, perhaps, but neatly done and worth doing. It is when the author seeks to rhyme her meditations upon life, the universe, liberty, and immense ideas of that kind, that she goes wrong, and loses her qualities.

Literature and Fishing.

Fly-Fishing. By Sir Edward Grey. "The Haddon Hall Library." Edited by the Marquess of Granby and Mr. George A. B. Dewar. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

SIR EDWARD GREY would be a good contributor to our "Things Seen." He has the gift of seeing things as they really are, and of conveying what he has seen to the reader. Let us give an instance :

One burn I used to fish which flowed through a wood of high trees down a steep rocky channel. Here it was possible, at least for a small boy, to keep out of sight by walking up the bed of the burn itself, stooping low, jerking the worm up into little pools and cascades above, and lifting the trout out down-stream on to the bank. This was very pretty work. I remember once getting several trout quickly one after another in this place, and then they suddenly stopped taking. One little favourite pool after another produced nothing, and a fear of something unknown came over me; the gloom and stillness of the wood made me uneasy; everything about me seemed to know something, to have a meaning, which was hidden from me; and I felt as if my fishing was out of place. At last I could resist the feeling of apprehension no longer; I left the rod with the line in a pool to fish for itself, and went up to the edge of the wood to see what was happening in the open world outside. There was a great storm coming up full of awful menace, as thunder-clouds often are. It filled me with terror. I hurried back for my rod, left the burn and the wood, and fled before the storm, going slow to get my breath now and then, and continually urged to running by the sound of the thunder behind me.

That is literature of a high order. Although entirely lacking any ornament of phrase, it is absolutely right. It is a revived recollection of a boy, and boyhood has no gaud with its words. Beyond that, it is an accurate interpretation of nature in one of her moods. The atmosphere sickening for a thunderstorm, there comes a moment when sentient creatures are overcome or startled : human beings, lacking oxygen, are sluggish, or have headache; cattle, in fright, cluster under the trees; the sheep move fitfully about in unfamiliar ways; and the trout, which may have been feeding ravenously, drop to the bottom of the water. It was this panic fright which caused Sir Edward Grey to run to the open world, to see what was ado. He would not have fled if all that he were conscious of was that the trout had ceased to feed. He fled because he felt that some mysterious general menace was in the air. It is all very truthfully and prettily put; and, instead of endeavouring to explain the grace of the passage, we will only say that if the boy had waited for the storm, instead of running away, he would have found the trout on the feed again very soon after the first streak of lightning had cleared the air. We ourselves, fishing on a lake, or on some river far from shelter, have often been caught in a thunderstorm from which retreat was impossible, and have found, to our great astonishment, that, although the trout invariably sulk when the storm is gathering, they rise joyously when the storm is in full blast.

It will be observed that we are inclined to be reminiscent over Sir Edward Grey's book. That is the best tribute we could pay to it. Every page in it revives some memory of our own, and that is what the author conceived to be his task. "If books," he says, "are to be written about a pursuit like fishing, it should not be to preach, or to convert, or to dogmatise. Books about sport and country life should be written and read, partly perhaps for the sake of hints, information, and instruction, but much more in the hope that the sense of refreshing pleasure, which has been felt by the writer, may slide into a sympathetic mind." That is absolutely true. Sport is joy; an essay in the literature of joy must naturally, as Sir Edward Grey says, convey some intelligent message; but the informatory character of the essay must be subordinate to its sensuous attractiveness. If the writer is intent on teaching and preaching, he will fail. Cotton failed, although he knew much more about fishing than Isaac Walton knew; Isaac is immortal because, though equipped with but a meagre knowledge of the art of fishing, he was a supreme artist in another sense. Cotton could not write, and strove to teach. Isaac could not teach; but he could write, and it ought to be well known that, "of all the arts in which the wise excel, Nature's chief masterpiece is writing well." Walton seems never to have had more than two or three brace of trout in his creel. A skilled angler, with the equipment of those modern days, could easily, in Walton's time, have had twenty brace on any fresh summer morning. That, however, has nothing to do with the matter. Walton was a master of Things Seen, and the joy he had in seeing things he had the art to communicate by pen and ink. He was a great artist. He was the first great artist of his kind. He was the founder of a school. Since The Compleat Angler came into our hands we have read hundreds of works on Angling. Some small incidental essays—such as those of Mr. Froude, Mr. Blackmore, and Mr. William Black—have been beautiful; but hitherto all the attempts to write a book on Fishing have been a weariness. Sir Edward Grey is the only writer on Angling who approaches Walton.

Elizabeth Again.

The Solitary Summer. By the Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." (Macmillan. 6s.)

ALL who enjoyed Elizabeth and Her German Garden will read this volume, which, in a way, may be taken as a continuation of that pleasant study in egoism. Elizabeth is still mistress of the same garden; she is ingenuously garrulous as ever; nature is still her delight; her chatter has lost none of its freshness; and she has still the power of persuading us, for the moment, that the ideal life is to live through a long summer in a garden with a few books, and that visitors and punctual food are a nuisance.

The pattern of the book is of the slightest. Practically, it is a monologue. A few characters make a few cursory remarks, but they are sketched in so lightly that the even tenor of the narrative (it ambles from May to October) is not disturbed. It amounts to no more than an exposition of the authoress's preferences in flowers, books, and people, and yet it is readable from cover to cover. Elizabeth is blessed with a sunny, open-air temperament, an easy style, and an acceptable sense of humour. She lives in a delightful house, surrounded by a delightful garden, somewhere in North Germany; and, in the opening chapter, obtains her husband's consent to her proposal that they should spend a solitary summer. They shall be free from visitors. The world shall be kept at bay. Her husband is sceptical; but Elizabeth carries her scheme triumphantly through. Here is a specimen of her matter and manner :

The sight of the first pale flowers starring the copses; an anemone held up against the blue sky with the sun shining through it towards you; the first fall of snow in the autumn; the first thaw of snow in the spring; the blustering, busy winds blowing the winter away, and scurrying the dead, untidy leaves into the corners; the hot smell of pines—just like the blackberries—when the sun is on them; the first February evening that is fine enough to show how the days are lengthening, with its pale yellow strip of sky behind the black trees whose branches are pearly with rain-drops; the swift pang of realisation that the winter is gone and the spring is coming; the smell of the young larches a few weeks later; the bunch of cow-slips that you kiss and kiss again because it is so perfect, because it is so divinely sweet, because of all the kisses in the world there is none other so exquisite—who that has felt the joy of these things would exchange them, even if in return he were to gain the whole world, with all its chimney-pots and bricks and dust and dreariness?

Femine, no doubt! Slight and unsubstantial, if you will; but what a relief, amid the solemn and portentous volumes that crowd the reviewer's table, to find a book that aims at nothing more than an attempt to express the joy that a happy, healthy nature finds in the mere routine of a country life. This sunny person, who loves the sunshine and the flowers so well, has also a serious side to her nature. If her moralising be slight, it is none the less true:

No one can possibly love the summer, the dear time of dreams, more passionately than I do; yet I have no desire to prolong it by running off South when the winter approaches, and so cheat the year of half its lessons. It is delightful and instructive to potter among one's plants, but it is imperative for body and soul that the pottering should cease for a few months, and that we should be made to realise that grim other side of life. A long hard winter lived through from beginning to end, without shirking, is one of the most salutary experiences in the world.

The Solitary Summer is a book to read in a garden. Summer shimmers through its pages, and it has power to cheer.

Dr. Daudet.

Alphonse Daudet. By His Son, Léon Daudet. Translated by Charles De Kay. (Sampson Low. 5s.)

THE literary career is not an absolute career: it is always a kind of adaptation. We mean that the literary man can only be understood or explained by relating him to men of a different stamp. One literary man leans to the poet, another to the farmer, another has some of the equipment of a lawyer, a fourth is a soldier at heart. In Alphonse Daudet one discerns the doctor. Again and again this is brought home, and that in ways more subtle and conclusive than by the statement of his son that the notes he made on his fellow-patients at the Lamalou baths astonished the physicians. The prompt note-taking is the significant fact. In Daudet an almost animal quickness of vision and hearing was the servant of a most human and penetrating mind. "When a man stood before him with his face in a strong light he divined him and summed him up with a precision which was like magic; but he was chary of words, and only used his eyes, so soft, veiled, and yet so penetrating!" And again we read:

Very few people duped or abused his confidence, for he knew how to uncover lies with extraordinary sagacity; but even that did not irritate him: "The poor wretch," he often said to us, with his delightful smile, "the poor wretch thought that he was deceiving me; but I read falsehood on his face and divined it from the trembling of a little muscle down there in the corner of the mouth which I know very well; it was made known to me also by the 'winkiness' of his eyes; there was a moment when I was on the point of betraying myself. Pshaw! he's an unhappy creature all the same."

Thus, like a doctor, would Daudet survey a passing specimen of humanity—keenly, kindly, even indulgently, without a shade of professionalism. He examined in order to comfort and hearten. One sees that he could minister to minds diseased. He would often say: "When my task is finished I should like to establish myself as a Vendor of Happiness; my profits would consist in my success." But he did not wait till his task was finished. He assisted men and women with his cheeriness, he brought a wind of health and laughter with him even when he walked on the boulevards, where he fraternised with everybody, offered people drinks, praised the children and bought them toys, plunging into life, playing with the humanities as with pebbles. He was a mighty hunter of facts and explanations. His first question of a stranger or a beginner was: "Where were you born?" He would then forage in his memory for the qualities native to the region.

Changes of temperament along a given river or a given valley excited his curiosity to the highest degree: "The Norman is the Gasccon of the North."—"Lorraine finesse is a clear and sometimes dry observation of men and events."—"You must not confound Provence with the stony South, the Hérault and Languedoc. Provence has a touch of Italy, but Hérault and Languedoc prepare one for Spain."—"The logical imagination of the Touraine country (Rabelais, Descartes) differs profoundly from the intellectual wine of Bourgogne and from the Mediterranean flash-in-the-pan."—"Anger of a woman, anger of the Mediterranean; all on the surface. Ten feet of calm water under one foot of foam!"—"Panurge, the type of the Parisian, has not changed since Gargantua. I have him, exactly like himself, in at least ten of my comrades!"—"The lie in the North, heavy, tenacious and gloomy, is very different from our lie, which runs about, changes a subject, laughs, gesticulates—and ends all of a sudden in sincerity."

This highly developed knowledge of local temperament is interesting in Daudet, whose best work is so Provençal. His belief in the influence of early environment was quite doctrinal; and he loved to see a man revert to his birth-place for literary material, still more to send him packing thither. He would say:

"When some young man comes to me in his arrogant or timid way, with his little volume in his hand, I say to him: 'From what part of the country?' 'From —, Sir.' 'A long time since you have left your home and the old people?' 'About so long.' 'Are you thinking of returning?' 'I don't know.' 'But why not right away, now that you have had a taste of Paris? Are they poor?' 'Oh, no, Sir, they are comfortably off.' 'Then, hapless one, flee! I see you there, undecided, young and impressionable. I do not believe that there is actually in you that energy of Balzac which boiled up and fermented in his garret. Listen to my counsel and later you will thank me. Return to your home. Make a solitude to yourself in some corner of the house or the farm. Stroll back through your memories; recollections of childhood are the living and unpoisoned source for all those who have not the master's power of evoking thought. Besides, you will see. You have plenty of time. Make the people who are about you talk, the hunters and village girls, the old men and vagabonds, and let all that gradually settle in your mind. Then, if you have any talent, you will write a personal book which will have your own mark on it and will, in the first place, interest your comrades and then the public, if you are able, or if you have the chance, to find some odd piece of intrigue, well carried out, to put inside this frame.'"

Daudet did not follow his own prescription—another proof of the doctor in him. But his books do it honour. It is not by his little-Dickens transcripts of Parisian life, his expert surface-readings of boulevard character and the vices of exiled monarchs, that he will live into the twentieth century. It is by his Numa Roumestan and his Tartarin books, wherein you find the man and the poet ousting the doctor, and poetry rounding off keen observation, and humour and pity and laughter flooding the picture. But Daudet chose to live in Paris, and in three-fourths of these pages he is revealed in his Parisian moods. In these he is more intelligible, but less charming to English readers than in his outbursts of Provençal feeling. But the whole Daudet is here; and the book is a fine study in that sensibility which is at once the treasure and the burden of a creative writer. Mr. De Kay's translation is accurate, but we should not call it a highly finished or notably graceful rendering.

Fighting on the Frontier.

The Second Afghan War, 1878-79-80: Its Causes, its Conduct, and its Consequences. By Col. H. B. Hanna. Vol. I. (Constable & Co. 10s.)

THIS volume is described as the first of a "History" of the Second Afghan War, but Col. Hanna uses the word "history" somewhat loosely, as it implies impartiality. This is merely a prolonged pamphlet, an expansion of the controversial tracts with which the author has already favoured the world on Indian Frontier matters. As it is wholly partisan, and in no sense of the word judicial, it can at best only be considered as part of the material of some future historian, and not as history itself.

Col. Hanna's diligence is not to be denied. He has gone through papers, documents, and despatches; but it is easy to see that he has done so with a preconceived bias, and with a determination to find proofs in support of his theories. For Col. Hanna writes from that most extraordinary standpoint, which is happily far less common now than it was twenty years ago, that whatever England does is wrong, that Shere Ali was an immaculate person, and that Russia's word is to be depended upon. So unhappy a point of view naturally leads to strange results. In his preface the Colonel says that a study of the official publications forced upon him the conviction that the war of 1878 had sprung out of no change of attitude on the part of the Ameer of Afghanistan, but out of a change of policy on the part of the British Government. That the Ameer, however, was not altogether satisfied with the proceedings of the retiring school was shown when Nur Mahomed in 1877 declared that the Ameer had lost his confidence in the British Government since Lord Northbrook meddled in the matter of his son, Yakub Khan, and sent presents, without his consent, to the Governor of Wakhan. In reality, Shere Ali, so far from being an injured innocent, was a wily Oriental chief who more fully held his throne by force of arms—all rulers of Afghanistan governing not by right, but by might. In these circumstances it was both impossible and undignified for the Viceroy of India to crouch behind the wall of the Hindu Khoosh and to profess no interest in the affairs of Afghanistan. The life of an Ameer is at the mercy of any fanatic, and whether we like it or not, the turbulent state is, and must always be, a source of anxiety and annoyance to us. It is absurd to argue from the policy of the statesmen who ruled India before the conquest of the Punjab. Then a warlike race separated us from the Afghans; now only a range of mountains lies between us, and turning away one's face will not alter the fact.

But to the Rip van Winkles of India anything is good enough to advance against what has been nicknamed the Forward Policy. As is usual with the opponents of England's mission, Col. Hanna overdoes it; he has painted his picture too monotonously sombre, and discounts the value of his work by his attacks on great Englishmen. He sneers at Lord Roberts, calls Lord Lytton an "inexperienced visionary," girds at Sir G. P. Colley and Sir Peter Lumsden, and decries the gallant Major Cavagnari as "a man of rash and restless disposition and overbearing temper, consumed by the thirst for personal distinction, and as incapable of recognising and weighing the difficulties, physical and moral, which stood in the way of the attainment of his ends as the Viceroy over whom he was thenceforward to exercise so pernicious an influence." The ordinary Englishman will consider that it is hardly in the best of taste for a colonel in the Indian Service to write in these abusive terms of a Viceroy and of great Indian soldiers, some of whom lost their lives in the Queen's service. What India needs is a strong and steadfast policy placed above party politics, and earping works such as this do not in any way help to the realisation of such a desirable end.

Wordsworth's Nephew.

The Episcopate of Charles Wordsworth, Bishop of St. Andrews. By John Wordsworth, Bishop of Salisbury. (Longmans.)

AT Oxford Charles Wordsworth, nephew of the poet, was an elder contemporary of Gladstone, Stanley, Merivale, and Manning. For eleven years he was second master at Harrow. Then came the call from the Northern Kingdom, and he must take his place in the struggling hierarchy of that shadow of a shade, the suffering and episcopal Church of Scotland. He emerges with his book on Shakespeare and the Bible, and in 1866 his Greek Grammar is accepted for general use by the headmasters of England. Again, he is found upon the Revision Committee of the New Testament, very dissatisfied with things as they are going, and only with much ado to be held in leash by Scrivener. But for the most part his hand must be to the parochial hammer (manus ad clavum was his motto, oculus ad celum), and his will bent to the mastery of difficult colleagues. In these matters he showed himself ever sanguine and resolute. Twice he used his casting-vote to secure his own preferment: than which is no better evidence of his moral courage. He was ubiquitous within the wide bounds of his sparse flock, and was beyond hope successful in his set purpose of cultivating friendly relations with the pastors of the national Kirk. Withal he found time for literary work—much of it ephemeral, indeed—of which the bare catalogue stuffs ten pages of appendix. He could keep his friends. The late Cardinal Manning was not an expansive person, but in writing to his "very dear old friend" he is both affectionate and playful. As thus:

And now for your letter. It brings back many happy memories of Harrow. I can see you in your broad-brimmed white hat and green cut-away coat, the admiration and envy of all beholders. It reminds me of how much I owe you in my books; and of your original ingratitude, for you know that I coached you in logic. I have also other memories—as to how, the Bishop of St. Andrews and the Bishop of Lincoln preventing me, the Grape House at Coombe Bank was entered by the roof and robbed.

Of Manning another glimpse appears in a letter written to the Bishop by Dean Merivale:

I liked him [at Harrow], notwithstanding his singular affection. I just now recall to mind how once, in playing cricket, he hit a ball with a very pretty curve to the off; and thereupon, instead of making his run, threw his bat over his shoulder exclaiming: "I say, Merivale, what a mysterious thing a cricket ball is!" And so he has gone on [moralises the Dean], and sibi constat.

Nevertheless, Bishop Wordsworth did not like "perverts"; their books were the "black sheep" of his shelves; the incense offered to Newman "proved that we were living in an age of indifference to truth."

The man must have possessed a store of youthful spirit that still endured while, eyes heavenward, he awaited the end. He was a great skater; it is an accomplishment very proper to the episcopal order—and costume. To Mr. W. Earl Hodgson, with reference to an article on this art, he writes:

I venture to speak with some authority, as I was one of the best—if not the best—of the skaters at Oxford in my day. . . . At Berlin, in the winter of 1833, I made quite a sensation; no one could come near me in cutting figures. . . . I was the first man at Oxford to have a pair of skates made without "the curious up-curling thing in front," . . . and with the blade curved at the heel; which is essential to skating backward with ease and safety. I had the advantage . . . of being equally strong and steady on both feet, which enabled me to do the outside edge backwards as easily as I did it forwards; and I was master of the "cross-cuts" in both. . . . I rather demur to a remark that follows: the curved blade has certainly "much revealed the gymnastic possibilities of skating."

but I doubt whether it ought to "go further." There are such figures as the "Flying Mercury"—one of the grandest of all—which could scarcely be performed without a considerable portion of the blade being in contact with the ice. So in this, as in other more important matters [here we come back to theology] . . . the wisest plan is to keep to the "via media."

In such correspondence, and in such scholarly recreation as the composition of Latin versions of hymns, he awaited the end, "puer centum annorum." It is seven years since he died; and many people will be thankful for this history of his diligent and blameless life.

OUR GARDENS.

BY DEAN HOLE.

Whatever the Dean of Rochester has to say about gardens must be listened to with respect, for is he not the author of A Book about Roses, and do not people travel from afar for a sight of the Dean's garden by the cathedral in the old Kentish town, a picture of which in colours forms the frontispiece to this book? Although, as a practical adviser, the Dean has serious rivals, he is alone in personality: his cheery bonhomie is the same as ever, his pleasant garrulity and discursiveness, his tendency to puns and other quips, his expansive English geniality, reminiscent of the palmy days of the middle of the century, when Leech drew and Thackeray jested. We do not now write like this to intending competitors at a rose show: "If under these conditions, and with these anticipations, you resolve to exhibit; if, like young Norval among the Grampian hills, you have heard of battles, of the Wars of the Roses, and have determined to fight, then let us hope that

Wheresoe'er thou move, good luck
Shall fling her old shoe after.

If you succeed, be thankful. If you fail,

Cromwell, I charge thee fling away ambition;

and remember Luther's message, 'Tell Philip Melancthon to leave off thinking that he's going to rule the world,' and enjoy your roses, large and small, in all their beautiful diversity at home." Dean Hole (who tells us that, like the gardener who was asked his age, he will soon be an "octogeranium") can achieve this style better than anyone. (Dent. 7s. 6d. net.)

A THOUSAND DAYS IN THE ARCTIC. BY F. G. JACKSON.

We have here the record of the Jackson-Harmsworth Arctic expedition, which sailed from the Thames in the Windward in July, 1894. Mr. Jackson describes it more closely as "an unvarnished tale of a thousand consecutive days spent in the Arctic, printed word for word as it was written—while the facts and impressions were fresh in my memory—in our hut or tent, when on sledging and boating journeys in Franz Josef Land." This method has the advantages and disadvantages of the Englishman's famous work on the camel, in the old story. Indeed, for camel substitute bear, and the analogy is only improved. This is the book of the Arctic Bear. Bear-flesh was the all-needed food, and when Mr. Jackson set up his hut, called "Elmwood," in Franz Josef Land he placed the following notice in the forecabin:

NOTICE.

In the event of a bear being seen, information should be immediately given to me, either by night or day. Should I be able to fire a shot at it, 2s. 6d. (two shillings and sixpence) reward will be given for each bear on arrival in London to the person who first brought the information.

The same reward will be paid for walrus on the ice or for foxes.

A written order will be given by me for the payment of the rewards.

FREDERICK G. JACKSON.

N.B.—A rifle will be kept in the cabin for the protection of persons against bears while carrying the information to "Elmwood."

November 18, 1894.

The results of this offer and of Mr. Jackson's vigilance are set forth in the diary with a minuteness which we think is often overdone, and are also tabulated in an enormous "Game List."

Mr. Jackson was tenaciously industrious, and each member of his party was kept employed on special work. The chief result of the expedition was the determination of the geographical limits of Franz Josef Land, which was discovered to consist of numerous islands, divided by rapid currents. These currents kept the ice almost always in motion, and were a source of much danger and difficulty.

Mr. Jackson's dramatic and wholly unexpected meeting with Nansen, on June 17, 1896, is again described, and his greeting to his brother explorer—"By Jove, I'm d—d glad to see you"—is finally authenticated.

We confess we are rather wearied by the growth of Arctic literature. In this field one is tempted to reverse Tennyson and cry: "Wisdom comes, but knowledge lingers." One becomes a little impatient, too, of that minuteness of detail to which the old dangers and the old exposures no longer lend interest. Such an entry as this, in Mr. Jackson's diary, might have been spared the dignity of type: "December 8th, Saturday.—The mate came up to ask if I can let them have a little paraffin, as they have run out at the ship. I gave him ten gallons to go on with." There are many entries of which the same might be said. As a matter of tone, too, we should have preferred that Mr. Jackson did not speak of his companions as "the chaps" or "poor chaps." Of the minuteness of photography we cannot have too much, and these volumes are profusely illustrated. Indeed, outwardly they could not be more satisfactory. (Harper & Bros. 32s.)

FROM HOWARD TO NELSON. BY JOHN KNOX LAUGHTON.

This volume companions From Cromwell to Wellington: Twelve Soldiers. The twelve sailors chosen are Howard, Drake, Blake, Rooke, Anson, Hawke, Boscawen, Rodney, Howe, Hood, St. Vincent, Nelson. Each biography has been placed in the hands of a naval man, and although "there is no pretence at original research," we are enabled to see how the work of early commanders strikes the trained naval intelligences of to-day. We note that Admiral P. H. Colomb, who writes on Nelson, does not countenance the attempt, which has been recently made, to set Nelson's relations with Lady Hamilton in another light. Like most other authorities, he attributes Nelson's waywardness to the unsympathetic character of Lady Nelson.

Almost evidently she was a lady of that calm and equable temperament, governed by utilitarianism and common sense, which has no sympathy with, and is almost incapable of understanding, the waywardness of genius. It is surpassingly sad to think that probably for want of this touch the death at Trafalgar was the most satisfactory ending possible to the wonderful career. We cannot doubt that such a touch would have nipped a mad passion in the bud. Tender and really appreciative letters from a wife he worshipped, reaching him before and after the Nile, must have kept his sense open to the instability and frivolity of Lady Hamilton's nature.

That is the traditional view, which will probably never change. The book contains as many portraits as lives, and is well supplied with maps. (Lawrence & Bullen. 10s. 6d.)

Fiction.

The Individualist. By W. H. Mallock.
(Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

THE title would seem to indicate a novel with a philosophic basis. But, so far as we have been able to discover, there is no philosophic basis to The Individualist. It is the story—or, rather, it is a haphazard series of scenes in the life—of a wealthy young man who was too bored to pluck the fruit of that success which his talents had won for him. What those talents were the reader will never know; for Mr. Mallock is content merely to tell us that Tristram Lacy was clever. He does not, in any form, show us the cleverness. To all appearance Lacy is precisely the ordinary facile pessimist. He moves aimless amid the social splendours of London and the Riviera—splendours which Mr. Mallock describes ingeniously, but with rather too fervent a gusto—as a girl might describe her first ball. By way of contrast, a group of Socialists (whose ignorance of the ritual of drawing-rooms appears to lie heavy on the author's mind) is introduced, and made to run side by side with the clan Lacy. It is characteristic of Mr. Mallock's methods that there should be absolutely no vital connexion between the two sets of characters. It would seem that he has a contempt for the art which he condescends to practise. To speak more directly, the book is exceedingly unskillful. The plot is nearly everything that a plot should not be. In complete lack of cumulative effect, it vies with the picaresque fiction of two centuries back. It does not cohere. It is complex with a complexity quite futile. Its progress is always towards obscurity instead of elucidation; and the climax (if one may use the term) is the mere clearing up of a childish genealogical mystery. The technique of the narrative is clumsy. It is often of the "a-young-man-might-have-been-observed" order—reminiscent of G. P. R. James. Mr. Mallock seems unable to distinguish between the essential and the inessential, and accordingly the story is overloaded with trivial observation. Of sheer maladroitness the introduction of the long extract from a lady's diary, beginning on page 157, is perhaps the most astounding example. Further, the writing is far from irreproachable. Mr. Mallock, to do him justice, makes no pretence of a distinguished style. But he might achieve neatness and literary good form. Such a sentence as, "His figure appeared to swell as he announced himself the proprietor of an acquaintance with her," seems to us to fail in these qualities. We should like to know what is the precise significance of "a sure, but gentle delicacy"; and whether a writer is any longer justified in putting "daughters of Eve" when he means "women." For a change, "daughters of Adam" would be better.

We have brought rather grave charges against Mr. Mallock, and we have not overstated them. But the gravest charge yet remains. He has combined realism with caricature in the same book, to the utter destruction of its verisimilitude and persuasive effect. The curious thing is, that he has (we think) done this unconsciously. His predilections have been too much for his artistic sense. The aristocrats of the story he has portrayed with sympathy, and often with an appreciation finely sensitive. But to the drawing of his Socialists he brings an observation ferocious in its blind hostility. The result is sometimes amusing, but more frequently grotesque. It is difficult, in a hundred passages, to believe that he has not thrown up his rôle of serious novelist and abandoned himself to the wildest farcical satire:

"Well, Lizzie and Louise," said Mr. Bonsfield, nodding cheerfully to them, "both your articles finished, I suppose, by this time? These two," he said to Lacy, "are the brightest little bodies imaginable. One is a Christian Socialist; the other, who is writing some papers on the 'Abolition of Class Distinctions,' devotes herself in London to introducing among the female employees of the Post Office a proper independence of manner when dealing with the general public. Look, Mr. Brandon—that man's our tailor-poet. A capital head of hair—eh?"

The tailor-poet is called Squeech. Mrs. Norham, the lady novelist, is unaffectedly preposterous from beginning to end, and we wonder that Mr. Mallock did not emphasise his attitude by calling her Mrs. Barebones FitzSerag, or some such name. The whole business of the Auxiliary Motor Syndicate is farce of the crudest description. The semi-religious service in Chap. xxvii. is another instance of mere unbridled facetiousness—facetiousness of which the sole object is laughter. Such sketches would be perfectly legitimate and very funny (they are distinctly funny) in a proper environment—a book avowedly humorous; but as part of a novel pretending to be a serious study of modern manners, they seem to us inept and inexcusable.

Two in Captivity. By Vincent Brown.
(Lanc. 3s. 6d.)

THIS is a strong and moving book. It narrates the tragedy of two guilty lovers in search of ease: how they would have fled from themselves, but were withheld by fear of each other, sheltering beneath soporism and stupefaction and excess until they could compass, without physical pain, their end. Stated thus, the story may seem to be in need of justification; but the justification is in the manner of presentation. For Mr. Brown is one that understands. By a thousand little signs he ranges himself on the side of his wretched many-times-punished sinners, and a novelist who does this is in a position to do more than relate events.

The "two" are Lewis Krehl—artist, sensualist, egoist and hesitator—and Kate, Lady Bir, his love. The power to which they are captive is compact of sensualism, moral anarchism, pessimism, guilt. Mr. Brown has taken an extreme case, but it is full of strokes that tell home. He has overstated, but he knows. Trimmed of exaggeration, this sad, pitiful pair, the product of an agnostic age, are woefully real and credible and pitiful.

The book has faults. There is throughout it a tendency to melodrama, which might well be chastened; Lady Bir is never fully realised by the reader; and it is quite likely in real life that the law would have intervened and locked up the wanderers as lunatics. But these are unimportant matters. What is important is, that Mr. Brown has conceived a terrible moral tragedy, and has developed it so bitingly that it dominates the mind. We quote part of the scene following upon the death of Lord Bir, to which, though Krehl did not actually cause it, he was accessory. Lord Bir lies dead at the foot of a long flight of stone steps; Krehl has sought out Lady Bir to tell her:

"No one can ever know!" he exclaimed. "Kate, our hands are clean. We shall be as one henceforth."

"Call the servants," she murmured. "Call—the—servants."

She would not look at him. In moments she seemed to grow old, deformed.

"We must share the remembrance of this night, Kate."

On a sudden she slid towards the door, but stopped, and, returning to the sofa, reclined upon it in a fainting attitude.

Krehl sat beside her. He kissed her hands and her hair.

"All the future is ours, Kate."

"But this will be with us always," she muttered.

"No, no," he cried in emotional stress. "You speak of slavery, and we have done with that once for all. The door stands open, and love calls. Kate," he said, "I have made a discovery to-night—there is no such thing as conscience. We must be natural, and nature knows nothing of conscience. It is one of the delusions that afflict humanity. I could prove that to you! And remorse—remorse!—that is another name for weakness." His arms were about her. "Ah—ah—we shall be strong together!"

And they shivered in abject wretchedness. She started up and ran across the room. But she got no farther than the door. There, her face towards it, she sank in a kneeling posture, her head bowed low, her hands on the floor.

Krehl raised her tenderly, led her back to the sofa. "He was not fit to live, Kate! And now I must tell you the name he called you—an adulterous rag! 'And,' he said, 'I meant to set her up as a gazing-stock!'"

Her face assumed a shocking tranquillity. She sat rigid. And then the grimace of despair came to her features.

"Now," Krehl said, "I shall go to his room. No one must know that I have been at Bir to-night. You will wait here till I return."

Mr. Brown never loses this fast hold on his theme. We commend to young writers the way in which he marshals his evidence and compels progression.

Ma Mère. By Vicomte Jean de Luz.
(Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

IN a somewhat mysterious preface the Vicomte, after stating that his novel is founded on fact, says that "recent events" have removed the objections to its publication which previously existed. There may, accordingly, be more in the book than will meet the eye of a reader unacquainted with the coulisses of French official life in the sixties. But of this we cannot judge. Regarded merely as a novel, Ma Mère has the mild inoffensiveness of mediocrity. How Yvonne was married from her convent to a marquis; how she loved another man; how she became acquainted with Legitimist intrigues; how the Emperor made dishonourable love to her (perhaps some dreadful secret lies hid here); how her husband was killed in the war; and how she then said to her true sweetheart: "I am yours for ever"—these and similar matters the Vicomte relates with a simplicity which is at once naïve and ineffective. Here is an example of the style:

The Tuileries was again brilliantly lighted. The Empress was giving one of her Petits Lundis. The rooms were thronged with ladies and gentlemen.

"By what miracle, Madame, are you sitting alone, without your usual cortège? Have you dismissed your Court in order to give me, the humblest of your slaves, the chance of telling you how beautiful you are to-night, and how well that simple dress becomes you?"

As the Emperor spoke he sat down beside Yvonne de Bersia, whom we last saw going to change her dress after her wedding lunch. Few would have recognised the awkward, shy convent girl in this much sought after Mme. de Bersia, now one of the most brilliant stars amid the galaxy of renowned beauties at the Court.

Apocryphal of the italicising of the word "lunch," we are reminded that throughout the story the Vicomte uses italics for certain proper names in a curiously erratic way.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE WHITE WOMAN. By W. E. TIREBUCK.

A new novel by the author of Miss Grace of All Souls. It is not in the least like The Woman in White. Here Druida, the heroine, wins her title-colour from the circumstance that the women around her are black, for the story has Africa for background. The central situation is the request of the king of the Dooba tribe that she should become their queen. (Harpers. 6s.)

BEARERS OF THE BURDEN. By W. P. DRURY.

Mr. Jacobs's Many Cargoes has founded a sea library, of which this is the fourth volume, the author being Major Drury of the Royal Marines, and his matter being founded on incidents which in that service have come within his cognisance. The result is a bundle of fourteen breezy yarns. (Lawrence & Bullen. 3s. 6d.)

'POSTLE FARM.

By GEORGE FORD.

This story by the author of Larramys will repay reading. In it we follow two lives from childhood and Devonian rusticity through shadows and passions to a dénouement which we shall not reveal. (Blackwood & Sons. 6s.)

RONALD AND I.

By A. PRETOR.

This is a disjointed story, or series of studies, grim and humorous, fanciful and pathetic, by a new writer. The pleasant mixture is dedicated to Mrs. Thomas Hardy. (Deighton & Bell.)

A PAUPER MILLIONAIRE.

By AUSTIN FRYERS.

The millionaire was Reuben Pownceby-Smith. He came to England in the Livania, and angrily discussed Socialism with a labour orator on board. In England, where no one knew him, he lost the bag containing his money, and straightway was as poor as you or I. The rest of the book details his adventures in London and the hardships he was compelled to undergo. (Pearson. 3s. 6d.)

NOOTKA.

By GRANVILLE GORDON.

A story of adventure in Vancouver—camps and trappers, rifles and Indians, coyotes and stockades, all spiritedly fused. (Sands. 6s.)

THE LUNATIC AT LARGE.

By J. STORER CLOUSTON.

Here we are introduced to the asylum of Clankwood, which "bore the enviable reputation of containing the best-bred lunatics in England . . . beneath one roof were assembled the heirs-presumptive to three dukedoms, two suicidal marquises, an odd archbishop or so, and the flower of the baronetage and clergy." Probably this opening will commend itself to some readers. Others—. (Blackwood. 6s.)

HENRY MASSINGER.

By MRS. ROBERT JOCELYN.

The hero has "the gift of touch, electric power, or whatever it is," and the author—whose output of novels has been large—explains that, so far as this gift goes, the story is founded on fact, her grandfather having possessed, "in a marvellous degree," the powers attributed to Henry Massinger. A large hunting element enters into this story of mesmerism and Mudshire. (F. V. White. 6s.)

THE GODS SAW OTHERWISE.

By F. H. MELL.

A good title. The story concerns the identity and career of Muriel Granton, who, in the first chapter, is asking her solicitor to tell her who she is, even emphasising her question by "tilting herself a little further back in her chair, and crossing her knees to show a finely arched instep," and exhibiting a hieroglyphic mark on her arm like unto the letter B. In the next chapter we meet a poor maniac who with two bites could impress on a soft substance a rude resemblance of the same letter. (F. V. White. 6s.)

THE LITTLE LEGACY, &c.

By L. B. WALFORD.

Eleven short stories, all sunny and social, by the author of The Baby's Grandmother. The titles tell as much: "My Stupid Husband," "Lord Hudibras' Experiment," "Jemima: a Metamorphosis," "A Carrier of Parcels," &c. (Pearson. 6s.)

LIKE THEM THAT DREAM.

By W. B. BIRT.

Those readers who survive Mr. Birt's portentous, allegorical prologue, in which Conscience is described as a vast palace with a Hall of Peace, a Hall of Burning, a Hall of Shame, &c., may enjoy this story of the Cotswolds. It begins: "To stand in the peaceful Market-square of Woldchester on a quiet, moonlight night is a unique and pleasant experience." Pleasant, but surely not unique. (Simpkin. 3s. 6d.)

C. S. Calverley.

"ALL the Muses, as usual, seem to be at Cambridge," wrote Mr. Andrew Lang when reviewing some time ago a volume of undergraduate rhymes. Flattering although, as a Cambridge man, one may feel this opinion to be, in the interests of truth it must be modified. Not all the Muses find in Cambridge their fittest home; serious poetry, one inclines to think, is better done at Oxford, while "light verse," as it is generally termed, does seem to thrive more by the Cam than by the Isis. In fact, when the authorities in time to come institute an Inter-'Varsity Eisteddfod, Cambridge, on public form, should easily carry off the light verse event. Excellence in that particular field of literary art has become a Cambridge tradition, a tradition built up and sustained by such writers as Praed, Sir George Trevelyan, C. S. Calverley, Hilton (whose Light-Green parodies are some of the most brilliant in our language), J. K. Stephen and Owen Seaman. Oxford, despite some admirable work in this medium by, among others, Mr. C. L. Graves and Mr. Lang himself, cannot match such a list as that.

And of all light-verse writers Calverley is surely the king. Some may have approached him nearly in technical skill, others may have had an equal fund of humour; but the perfect union of the two qualities is found in him alone. For the expression of a sparkling wit, free alike from boisterous exuberance and any trace of cynicism, he brought a perfect technical equipment—a classic taste, an unfailing ear, and a consummate mastery of rhyme and metre. The very facility which in Calverley's work constitutes so great a charm is a gift which to some others has proved fraught with danger. Praed's verse, for instance, is delightful if taken in small quantities, but to read much of it at one time is a weariness to the flesh; so mechanical become his stanzas with their recurring cadences, their inevitable antitheses, that you seem as you read to be listening to the music of a well-oiled barrel-organ. But Calverley never offends in this way. His fluency is controlled by his keen sense of style. He works up cunningly to his point, he makes it, and the piece is finished. Praed, having reached his climax, is unable to end, he re-states it over and over again, thence he wanders off to fresh ideas, he adds another five or six stanzas of twelve lines each, until the whole point is forgotten, or washed away in the overflow of facile superfluous rhymes.

Of Calverley's technique, of his wonderful command of rhyme, every page of his Verses and Fly Leaves bears witness.

But why did we two disagree?

Our tastes, it may be, did not dovetail;

All I know is, we ne'er shall be

Hero and heroine of a love-tale!

No disyllable rhyme could be happier or more natural, but to what other versifier would it have suggested itself? Or, take a stanza at random from the historic poem on "Beer":

Coffee is good, and so, no doubt, is cocoa,

Tea did for Johnson and the Chinamen:

When "Dulce est desipere in loco"

Was written, real Falernian winged the pen.

When a rapt audience has eucored "Fra Poco"

Or "Casta Diva," I have heard that then

The Prima Donna, smiling herself out

Recruits her flagging powers with bottled stout.

Doesn't this seem almost to write itself? One would think that to make such verse was as easy as talking—until one sat down with pen and paper, and tried.

Of direct parody Calverley wrote little, but his parversions of Browning and Tennyson make us regret that he did not attempt more in this direction. How excellent, though a little unkind, was his treatment of Miss Ingelow, in "Lovers, and a Reflection":

In moss-prankt dells which the sunbeams flatter
(And heaven it knoweth what that may mean; Meaning, however, is no great matter)

Where woods are a-tremble, with rifts atween;

Thro' God's own heather we woun'd together,

I and my Willie (O love my love):

I need hardly remark it was glorious weather,

And flitterbats wavered aloof, above:

Boats were curtseying, rising, bowing,

(Boats in that climate are so polite),

And sands were a ribbon of green endowing,

And O the sundazzle on bark and bight!

Thro' the rare red heather we danced together,

(O love my Willie!) and smelt for flowers;

I must mention again it was glorious weather,

Rhymes are so scarce in this world of ours!

Cannot you almost hear the author chuckling over these lines as he wrote them? Yes, it is, after all, the radiant, good-humoured fun, the sense of intimate companionship with a man brimming over with honest laughter, that endears Calverley to his readers, few of whom perhaps are even conscious of his amazing technical skill.

No notice of Calverley, however brief, would be complete without some reference to his translations. No one could appreciate the beauties of the classic poets more fully than he, and his own power of writing Latin verse was wonderful. Perhaps one may safely assume that to his close study of the classics he owed that crispness and succinctness of style which are so evident in his English verse. Among the many translators of Horace he is rarely mentioned, and yet, so far as any translations can be adequate, some of his deserve the epithet. His version of Theocritus is curiously unequal, and his Homeric translations, it must be confessed, are not remarkable. He rendered the first two books of the Iliad into rather pedestrian blank verse, neither much better nor worse than Lord Derby's. He also attempted to turn the First Book into English hexameters; and the less said of this attempt the better. But, for the limited number who care for such things, his Latin versions of English poems are a pure delight. Under his magic touch "Lycidas," for instance, seems to slip of itself into Virgilian hexameters. "En iterum," it begins:

En, iterum laurus, iterum salvete myricae

Pallentes, nullique hederæ quæ ceditis ævo.

Has venio baccas, quanquam sapor asper acerbis,

Decerptum, quassumque manu folia ista proterva,

Maturescentem prævortens improbus annus.

Causa gravis, pia causa, subest, et amari deum lex;

Nec iam sponte mea vobis rata tempora turbo

Nam periit Lycidas, periit superante juventa

Imberbis Lycidas, nec par manet illius alter.

Quis cantare super Lycida neget? Ipse quoque artem

Norat Apollineam, versumque imponere versu.

One thinks with shuddering how the ordinary schoolboy would render "build the lofty rhyme"—perhaps "altum aedificare poema," or some equally dreadful phrase!

To conclude. It is pleasant to learn from Cambridge booksellers that there is still a steady demand for Calverley's verses in the place where most of them were written. We may well believe that Calverley will become a classic, and that his verse will be read as long as a union of genial humour and masterly skill have power to charm. Light verse, it is true, is not very popular with the general public, but some there will always be to appreciate it. And of all writers of light verse the greatest is C. S. Calverley.

The Humorist and the Jester.

THE Humorist sat at one end of the library, facing a portrait of a jester. He had confessed to himself that his last book had failed, and he was in a discontented mood. Even the portrait of the jester annoyed him.

He closed his eyes, and thought. Why had the book failed? It was not so funny as his others. True; but what of that? The critics and the public should have accepted it, if only in gratitude for its forerunners.

"A humorist nowadays is treated very unfairly," he said aloud. "He works harder than a bishop or a judge, but he is not rewarded so well. And if he become tired and less funny, he is dismissed in favour of another. A bishop or a judge, on the contrary, may become tired and less serious with impunity."

"Nonsense!" said a voice.

Indignant at the interruption, the Humorist opened his eyes and leaped up. On the floor before him was a jester, and on the wall beyond an empty frame. He looked from the one to the other again and again. At last, convinced of their separate existence, he bowed, and remarked to the Jester: "Did you say 'nonsense'?"

"I did," replied the Jester, returning the bow.

The situation began to appeal to the Humorist's sense of humour. "Shall we sit down?" he said.

"Thank you, yes," replied the Jester.

The two sat opposite to each other. In dress there was a contrast between them. One wore a cap and bells, red and blue doublet and hose, and white shoes; and one a frock coat, grey trousers, and black boots. In face, however, there was a resemblance. Both had the sad mouth and eyes common to those who live by making others laugh.

"And now," asked the Humorist, "will you please tell me why you said 'nonsense'?"

"I shall be delighted. You are a jester, and——"

"No, I am not."

"Oh, yes, you are! It matters not that you call yourself a humorist, and dress like that instead of like this. You are a jester, and——"

"But I am not one."

The Jester smiled, and said: "I will convince you that you are. The difference between the conditions of work of the jester five or six centuries ago and to-day is your difficulty. I will account for that difference. Some years after the invention of printing a certain jester lost his situation. While travelling one day in search of a new one, he overtook a printer, and entered into conversation with him. The printer happened to say he wanted material to print. The jester at once conceived the idea of a book of jests. He mentioned the idea, and the printer thought it good. Before that day ended, they decided to prepare such a book together, and to share the profits. On the next, the jester began to write and the printer to print. The book sold well. Little men, who did not keep a private jester, bought for entertainment. Great men, who did, bought for purposes of comparison. So evident was its success that other jesters became envious, resigned household appointments, and joined with printers. Their books, too, sold well. As often occurs, a supply had created a demand. More and more jesters resigned household appointments. Their incomes did not always improve, but their conditions of work did. They no longer, for instance, had to be in constant attendance on a master, or to wear a motley dress. There came a time when great men found difficulty in hiring jesters; indeed, only those who had been rejected by the printers as of poor quality offered themselves. The inevitable happened. Great men ceased to keep jesters, and read funny books instead. From then until now the jester has worked for the printer only. He has discarded his distinctive dress. He has called himself humorist, wit, satirist, and kailyard novelist. Yet essentially he is still a jester. Have I convinced you?"

For some moments the Humorist remained silent. Then he said: "Yes, I admit I am a jester. And now why did you say 'nonsense'?"

"You were comparing yourself with bishops and judges."

"Why should I not?"

"Because jesters are little men, and bishops and judges great men. Your comparison was nonsense—wild presumption."

For the first time in his life the Humorist felt doubtful of his importance. Struggling against the feeling, however, he said: "A clever jester is the equal of a bishop or a judge."

"Look here!" exclaimed the Jester. "I was once as clever a jester as you. Did I consider myself the equal of a bishop or a judge? No! Then why should you? Answer me that!"

"Our profession has gone up in the social scale," replied the Humorist desperately.

The Jester frowned. "Have I stepped out of my frame for this?" he said. "Do you dare to tell me the unchangeable social scale has changed? The triumph of my career was a jestership to a bishop. Yet you argue—oh, nonsense!"

The Humorist decided to surrender. "I was wrong," he said. "I am sorry."

"That is sufficient," said the Jester, ceasing to frown. "I have spoken strongly, because I felt strongly. At the very moment you expressed dissatisfaction I was envying you."

"Envying me?"

"Yes. Our profession is but a humble one. It is not a great thing to make people laugh. You are treated very well. What can you be dissatisfied about?"

"My last book has been rejected by the critics and the public."

"Because it is not funny?"

"Yes. But they might have accepted it in gratitude. My previous books were funny."

A fit of laughter seized the Jester. So violent was it that it shook him from side to side and set the bells on his cap tinkling. "What do you think," he gasped, "happened to me when my jests were not funny?"

"I don't know."

"Whipping! And if I had pleaded in excuse that I had once made funny ones, what would have happened then?"

"I don't know," repeated the Humorist nervously.

"Perhaps a week in the stocks without food or drink. Perhaps——"

"I am ill," interrupted the Humorist.

"Headache?"

"Yes."

"Ah! often when my head ached I had to stand up and be funny. Yes, I envy you. Why, if I used the same jest twice I was whipped."

"Whipped for that!"

"Yes, and for——"

"I can bear no more," cried the Humorist. "I am ill. Please leave me."

"Cheer up!" said the Jester rising; "you won't be whipped or put in the stocks even if your jests are bad or old."

"Please leave me," said the Humorist faintly.

The Jester walked to the mirror, which hung next his frame, and adjusted his cap and the lace at his neck. Then he said: "Good-bye. Don't forget what I have told you," and stepped into the frame and became a portrait again.

A moment after the change the Humorist awoke. The portrait hung on the wall, motionless and silent. Looking at it, he considered the dream and its lessons. Presently he smiled. He had confessed to himself that he had been born in a pleasant century, and he was in a contented mood.

Things Seen.

Conversion.

I stood in the crowd and watched them change the Guard at St. James's Palace. When the Queen's Colours passed a man near me removed his hat. His face was young and brown and worn.

"What d'you do that for?" asked his neighbour curiously.

"The Queen's Colours. I'm in the Service," he explained briefly.

"Ah!" said the other, "when we gets our way, there'll be an end of all that nonsense."

"I don't think there will ever be an end of it in London," said the soldier.

"Why, it's London as 'll make an end of it first!"

"Not it. You all of you like it, really, you know, though some of you pretend you'd rather listen to a chap perched up on a chair shouting. What are you here for if you don't like it?"

"I was passin', and I watched 'em to despise 'em."

"Well, I hope you've enjoyed it. I have, and I must go. But, take my word for it, in all this London of yours there's nothing better than that. Go to Central Africa for four years and you'll know!"

"Oh, listen to the band!" blared the trumpets as the detachment broke into quick step. The soldier moved off, but the other man stood still, and, jerking a thumb in his direction, remarked to nobody in particular: "I'm thinkin' he ain't so far out neither!"

Interference.

THE sound of a small voice raised in lamentation drew me to the window. A little girl danced on the footpath in an agony of woe, while two small boys, evidently her brothers, played football with her doll. To and fro, from one to the other, flew the straggly, untidy puppet: the inhuman deed was skilfully done, for the doll seldom touched earth. Down the road, with swinging steps, came a "colleger," slim and clean-looking, clad in flannels. He was just about the same age as the football players, but he had evidently been brought up with a proper respect for dolls, and the tears of beauty in distress moved him. He stopped, exclaiming: "I say, what a shame! Give the kid her doll!"

"Who be you?" ironically demanded the bigger of the aggressors, so amazed at this unwarrantable interference that he ceased his sport, and the doll dropped with a dull thud on the pavement. The little girl stooped hastily and seized it, pausing in the very middle of a wail to await developments.

The two boys squared up to one another; various insults were exchanged, when the "colleger," performing what seemed to be two steps of a break-down, cried, "Take that!" and the persecutor of dolls fell over on his back.

The third boy, who had taken no part in the dispute beyond inciting his brother to battle, ran away; the vanquished one continued to sit upon the ground abusing his adversary; but the little girl, taking up her wail just where she had left off, fell upon the squire of dames, and beat him vigorously—with the doll.

He submitted patiently for a full minute; then, red and dishevelled, disengaged himself with an almost apologetic "I say—you know——!"

But he was evidently puzzled.

Memoirs of the Moment.

Mdlle. ROSA BONHEUR had few of the familiar attributes of French women of fame. From first to last she was eminently respectable. The Frenchman who said of the women of France that they must have either four walls or the Four Evangelists, must be frankly imprisoned in harems or must be devotees of religion, did not reckon with the race of Rosa Bonheurs. She gave herself full liberty in her mode of living, sniting her environment to the career which conferred seriousness on her character as well as glory on her name. Respecting herself, she had the respect of all others. No slave to convention, she, nevertheless, was no friend of social or other eccentricities. She wore her usual masculine attire—her short hair and her trousers—because those fashions saved her temper as an animal painter and her time as a woman of inveterate industry. But when girls, even among artists, imitated her she discouraged their pose and laughed not altogether indulgently at their pranks. Mdlle. Rosa Bonheur knew her London pretty well, and, one may suppose from her characteristics, felt very much at home among its citizens. Patriot as she was, and full of honours conferred by France, she ranked as almost the most precious recognition given her the placing of her "Horse Fair" in our own National Gallery—a picture round which a respectful crowd has constantly gathered since the day of her death.

THE Lord Chief Justice of England was once described by a great authority as "a sportsman in the custody of a lawyer." His favourite pastimes have been kept in strait bounds, not by his profession alone, but also by his serious purposes as a politician. All the same, he had the other day a little luck in his diversion as a horse-breeder; for a horse of his own training, the ownership of which was cloaked under a nom de sport, was the victor in a respectable race. The event of this week has recalled the "superb groan" (no other groan has been so adjectived in all our literature) given by Lord George Bentinck when Disraeli told him that a horse he sacrificed to politics had won the Derby. Blue-books in place of the "blue ribbon of the turf"! Lord Russell of Killowen is not likely to groan, superbly or otherwise, if no horse of his should win the Derby; but, if one ever does, a "superb" cheer will certainly express the public admiration at once of his sportsmanlike qualities (at their best and fairest the very qualities that make a judge respected on the bench) and of the balance of mind which preserved the good tradition of sport as the pastime and not as the whole business of existence.

EVERY reason except the right one has been given for the increase in the number of votes recorded on Tuesday at Southport. Over five hundred more Liberals and nearly half that number more Conservatives went to the polls on that day than went there at the last election. And why? The reasons given concern themselves with the exceeding gravities of this public question and that, with the issues of religion even, and with nothing lighter than the extreme personal popularity of the two candidates. The real cause of the increase is not so flattering, perhaps, to the political seriousness of the occasion. The simple truth is, that Tuesday was the first summer day in Southport. "All things that love the sun were out of doors," and, where they happened to be men and electors, they strolled, while passing, into the polling booths to give a vote that was not recorded on a former occasion, when the day happened to be cold and blustering. The British climate, it seems, has been really accurately made responsible for the British Constitution.

MR. LANG and the art students ought by now to have quite made up their little quarrel. Mr. Lang, who is frankly a personal friend of Sir William Richmond first and a critic of the St. Paul's decorations afterwards, has spoken of the art students as pardonably conceited and as having an "egregious plan for removing the decorations." The art students reply to this master of phrasing that what he really ought to have said was their "egregious plan of removing the decorations"—they, like everybody else, asked only for the removal, and have not any particular plan of their own for effecting it, "egregious" or otherwise. It is that "egregious" which has nettled the young men of the Slade School. But what do they really think it means? "Eminently bad; extraordinary" is the definition given in the first dictionary that is taken up. But in Italy they reckon differently. "L'egregia Signora" is a term that imputes particular charms to the lady. The phrase does not indicate a lovers' quarrel even, but a lover's compliment; and as such it makes the most proper footnote to the letters recently exchanged on this subject.

Two laggard letters of importance have been received by the students as to their protest. Mr. Henley and Mr. Robert Bridges, at the time of writing, knew the decorations only by description, but the correspondence in the papers was enough for them. "I like your protest," wrote Mr. Henley. "In fact, I have nought but praises for it. But I fear it will avail you nothing. I fear, too, that unless you can get rid of the 'artist' and his supporters in the Chapter-house, our Paul's is doomed. 'Tis a heart-aching business, of course, and it makes one long for a benevolent despotism."

MR. ROBERT BRIDGES, writing in the same spirit, says: "I have no doubt that your protest is quite necessary, and you have my sympathy beforehand. I do not think that the precedents which classic or Eastern art give us for the decoration of buildings are of much weight. We certainly have come to prefer a greater simplicity. No one would wish the North Transept of Winchester Cathedral to be stuccoed and painted; and I doubt if we should admire a Greek temple as much in its full colour as we do in its plain stone." Passing from this interesting personal expression of taste, Mr. Bridges adds: "I am very glad that you are making a stir. It was the younger men who, some twenty or twenty-five years ago, prevented Burges's horrid scheme for veneering all the interior with jasper and alabaster." Mr. Bridges, since he wrote this letter, has been in town, and has visited St. Paul's, where he found that the descriptions of others, however unfavourable, had ill prepared him for the impression made upon him by the literal defacement of the dome.

THE will of the late Lord Esher will not be proved for some little time. When it is, it will not show him to be the accumulator of the vast fortune which some people have extravagantly put to his credit. On the other hand, he had no outstanding debts, being a most methodical paymaster, his very tomb having been paid for long in advance. When the new Lord Esher married some years ago a lady who had every charm, but had, in her father-in-law's eyes, the overwhelming disadvantage of being a Roman Catholic, an exasperated threat of disinheritance was passed by the father to the son. When, however, the contents of the will are published they are likely to exhibit the dead Master of the Rolls in a more judicial frame of mind.

ONE of the most familiar frequenters of the Reading Room in the British Museum will be seen there no more: a cleric by his face no less than by his attire, and an enthusiast as anyone could discover who caught the light in his particularly shining eye, this was the Rev. Luke Rivington, a member of the family of publishers, and at one time a famous revivalist preacher of High Church principles in the Establishment. A memory of the great nave of York Minster crowded by a Sunday night audience whom he succeeded in thrilling remains, after the lapse of thirty years, with the present writer. That was when High Church habits were hardly those of the cathedrals, and deans with High proclivities selected preachers who combined "sound views" with an Evangelical manner that disarmed criticism. Luke Rivington was just their fancy. At a later date he joined the "Cowley Fathers," and went on the mission to India, whence, however, he returned a member of the Roman Catholic Church. Going out to convert others, he himself was converted. Henceforth his pastorate lay in the pulpits of Roman Catholic churches, principally in London, but also in the provinces. He became a student of ecclesiastical history, hence his diligent days in the Museum. The rôle of historian was not the one best suited to his eager spirit; and a newspaper of his own communion, reviewing a book of his the other day, ventured to hint as much to the intrepid controversialist. One of his last letters was written to request that his name might be omitted from the list of contributors to that paper; and death comes to give a sort of permanence to an emotion merely transitory, a sort of grotesque gravity to an act in itself the most trivial of his blameless and essentially self-annihilating life.

A Monster.

ON the farther side of Blackfriars Bridge there is a spot where the rush for trams at certain hours is so tremendous that a charge of one half-penny is made to the astute folk who, to secure seats, board a car before it completes its Cityward journey. Here, islanded in the current of clerks, dressmakers, fagged fathers, and shop-weary women, a weak-voiced youth was kneeling on the pavement selling boys' literature.

He said, rather wearily: "Something to read, gents? Well, 'ere's a lib'ary! You know the goods. The Boy's Monster Weekly. I have it in monthly parts. Will you just look at that picture; bit of all-right, ain't it? What? 'Back!' cried Rachel; 'do you think Lord Wroxham hinvites Footpads to his Ball?' Does that fit yer? Here's 'Peter Podger and Sam Slocum, the Two Comical Ventriloquists of the old Academy.' Don't go away, sir. I require for this monstrous budget of adventure, includin' of 'The Larst of the Hincas,' 'Daring Dick,' and 'The Danger Signal,' bein' a story of the Hupper Thames—I've the confidence to arsk—sixpence—fourpence-halfpenny—threepence—twopence—three-half-pence!—I arsk a Penny?—thank you, sir!"

I have looked through the Monster, and I do not think that the youth on the pavement exaggerated the variety and luridity of its contents. These, I fear, must be described as a surfeit of sensation. Turning over the leaves in the tram-car, interrupted by the entries of passengers, and assailed by story after story, my final impressions must have nearly resembled the nightmare of a romance-devouring errand-boy. If I give them, it is because in these days of book-hunger it is interesting to inspect every kind of reading that is offered to the public, old and young. This is what I seem to have read:

Peter Podger and Sam Slocum were bad hands at reading up, and entered the schoolroom looking as if they were being led to execution and did not like the idea of it.

"Now, boys," said Mr. Chickeleer, in his most persuasive manner, "in order that you may be prepared for the examination by Mr. Pedagogue, I think it is only right that I should put a few puzzling questions to you by way, we will call it, of coaching you up."

"You must imagine that I am the examiner himself, and that like him I am a——"

A wild laugh, that was almost a shriek, interrupted him.

Then something flashed through the air, and a dagger aimed at his heart buried itself in his left arm.

"Stop!" cried a loud sepulchral voice; "slayer of the innocent—stop!"

Tom Bowden had his head out of one side of the carriage and the judge out of the other.

Neither, however, saw anything, though both heard the voice.

"What is the matter?" cried one tall, well-built man in the dress of a huntsman, who advanced to the front rank with a young girl, dressed as a bayadere, clinging to his arm.

"Why, sir," Smudge replied, "the hoggeups is in the boiler, the rollin' pin is in the oven, the dishes is piled all of a heap on the floor, the covers hang on the hatpog in the hall, the cook's bonnet is on the top of the pump, all the brooms is up the chimney and the pails piled in each other till they reach the ceiling. There never was anything like it, and as for the women, sir, don't you hear them screeching like howls?"

Stifled cries for help from one of the boats in tow could be distinctly heard, but this time the cries were genuine.

"Listen!" said Peter. "I think I heard the cry of fire."

"Fire!" screamed the bargeman, turning deathly pale and rushing to the stern of the tug.

"See, see!"

"Fire!" said Peter excitedly, at the same time following him. "The second barge is on fire. You can see the smoke."

"Great heavens! as I live," said the bargeman, "the boat is on fire, and it is loaded with benzoline."

As usual, however, our hero proved himself quite equal to the occasion.

Sinking upon one knee with a grace that was truly astonishing, considering the weight of his fetters, he knelt at her feet.

She elevated the lamp a little, so that its light fell fully on his face.

"Maiden," he cried, "deem me bold if you will; I come of a bold race. My sires have ever distinguished themselves alike in love and war. Chance threw us together, and my misfortunes have warmed your heart towards me. To perfect yourself in the study of mathematics, you should commence with the ordinary school arithmetic of some progressive series, going from one book to the other as each is mastered. What constitutes a lady or gentleman is not determined by their position in life, but by their manners. Money, dress, or social position can make neither if the parties are not possessed of that innate sense of refinement and good breeding to be found in many cases under the shabbiest garments."

He then took his place behind the throne, and amidst renewed shouts of "All hail to the long-promised messiah!" the subordinate priests advanced and prostrated themselves in turn and in order of precedence before him.

The great body of the Inca nobility followed, and, amidst the wildest enthusiasm, the assembly broke up.

Although the above disjointed narrative does not seem to be the clearest in the world, Moiselet swallowed it all as gospel; he saw well, or thought that he did, that Vidocq had fled with his master's portmanteau, and hidden it in the Forest of Pondy.

Let us hope that when the errand-boy has recovered from this hot-spiced or frivolous diet he will be attracted by nobler viands. As I correct the proof of this article, there lies before me a new sixpenny edition of The Ordeal of Richard Feverel. It awaits the errand-boy, and is truly a "monster" for the money.

Correspondence.

From Samoa to Chancery Lane.

SIR,—I was surprised to notice in your issue of April 22 a few lines of a Samoan letter addressed to myself. It must have gone astray owing to my absence from Samoa at the time when it was written (January 28, 1895). It is from an old friend of mine named Tuimalcali'fano. I presume you would not mind letting me have the letter back, for it can scarcely be of any interest to anyone save myself. Might I ask at the same time how it came into your hands? It seems such a far cry from Falelatai to the editorial offices of the ACADEMY!

In view of the general bewilderment of the public with regard to the Samoan embroglio, it may, perhaps, interest you to know that my sympathies and those of Mrs. Stevenson are entirely with the Germans. The British and American officials tried to force a Protestant divinity student of seventeen on the Samoan people, 90 per cent. of whom first voted and then fought for Stevenson's old friend, Mataafa. The "war" has been distinguished on the Anglo-American side by an inexplicable ruthlessness and brutality, which, when the proper time arrives, will require a great deal of explanation on the part of the naval officers and other officials engaged. Contrary to all expectation, the Samouns changed what was at first regarded as simple "nigger-potting" into a pastime much more serious and deadly for white people. The Germans were throughout the advocates of peace and conciliation, and if the matter had lain with Consul General Rose not a life would have been lost nor a dollar's worth of property destroyed.—I am, &c.,

LLOYD OSBOURNE.

[We have explained to Mr. Osbourne that the letter was lent to us, for the purpose of reproduction, by Mr. Charles Baxter, one of R. L. Stevenson's literary executors.]

Re Burgess versus Burgess.

SIR,—I can only advise my namesake either to consult the fairies, whose friendship he boasts, or to send his portrait to the ACADEMY that the public may beware of imitations.—I am, &c.,

Heine in English.

Our Prize Competitions.

RESULT OF No. 34.

MORE than sixty replies have been received in response to our request for a translation of the following song of Heinrich Heine:

Und wüßten's die Blumen, die kleinen,
Wie tief verwundet mein Herz,
Sie würden mit mir weinen,
Zu heilen meinen Schmerz.

Und wüßten's die Nachtigallen,
Wie ich so traurig und krank,
Sie liessen fröhlich erschallen
Erquickenden Gesang.

Und wüßten sie mein Wehe
Die goldnen Sternelein,
Sie kämen aus ihrer Höhe,
Und sprächen Trost mir ein.

Die alle können's nicht wissen,
Nur Eine kennt meinen Schmerz:
Sie hat ja selbst zerrissen,
Zerrissen mir das Herz.

We have decided to give the prize to Mr. Nigel Playfair, 38, Grosvenor-street, W., for the following version, which has a limpid simplicity unattained by any other competitor. The last stanza is, unfortunately weak; but, on the whole, it pleases us best:

Could the little flowers know
How my heart is filled with woe,
Surely they would weep with me
Comforting my misery.

Could the nightingales divine
All the anguish that is mine,
Of their pity they would give
Healing songs that I might live.

Could they know, my grief would move
Golden stars in Heaven above
From the sky, to speak to me
Tender words of sympathy.

None of these can ever guess;
For the depth of my distress
One alone may sound indeed—
She who caused my heart to bleed.

Among the best of the others are these:—

Ah, could the little flowers know
The wound within my heart,
Their tears in sympathy would flow
To soothe my smart!

And could they know, the nightingales,
My lot the sad day long,
They'd solace it with countervails
Of joyous song!

And could yon little golden star
But know my bitter grief,
'Twould hasten from its heaven afar
To bring relief!

But they, alas! They cannot know:
And none can know—apart
From her, ah me! who dealt the blow—
That broke my heart!

[A. J. E., London.]

Did they but know, the flowers,
The deep wound in my heart,
Their tears would fall in showers,
So they might ease the smart.

Did they but know my sadness,
The weariness and pain,
The nightingales to gladness
Would sing me back again.

Did they but know that river
My soul is rack'd with fear,
The stars would stoop from heaven
To whisper words of cheer.

They know not: I am lonely
In unobserved pain:
One only knows, one only
Who broke my heart in twain.

[A. H. B., London.]

[F. F. (Leicester), the author of the following version, writes: "I don't know a single word of German (or French), but with the assistance of my wife and the aid of a dictionary I managed to 'hammer out' a prose translation, which I have versified."]

Could but the little flowers divine
My heart is rent in twain,
Their tears, I know, would flow with mine,
And ease my bitter pain.

If e'en the nightingales could tell
My unavailing sadness,
To cheer me now their songs would swell
In sweet notes full of gladness.

And if the little stars could know,
From heaven they would descend,
They would understand my woe,
And comforting, befriend.

None, none of these may e'er divine,
One only can, 'tis she
Who pierced this bleeding heart of mine
And wrought my misery.

Competition No. 35.

A sonnet has been sent to us in honour of Her Majesty, but, unfortunately, in opening the letter, the sheet of paper on which the poem is written was accidentally torn right across, and one half was lost altogether. We took steps at once to have that half restored; but, meanwhile, it occurs to us that, both as an exercise in loyalty and as a novel form of competition, we might ask our readers to complete the lines. To the competitor whose attempt comes nearest to the original sonnet a cheque for a guinea will be sent. The rhyming scheme, we should add, is: 1, 2, 2, 1, 1, 2, 2, 1, 3, 4, 5, 3, 4, 5.

Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the third column of p. 616 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

Announcements.

MR. WILLIAM SHARP'S new book, Silence Farm, will be published this month by Mr. Grant Richards. It is a tragic romance, which is mainly a study of a woman, half peasant, half woman of refinement.

MESSRS. GEORGE NEWNES, Limited, are about to publish, under the title of The Book of Cricket, a new series of cricket pictures, in about fourteen sixpenny weekly parts. The illustrations will consist of full-page photographs of every cricketer of note, supplemented by snapshots taken on the field. The descriptive text will be by Mr. C. B. Fry.

THE publication in Great Britain of the Art Amateur will be resumed this month by Messrs. Griffith, Farran & Co.

MR. F. C. CONSTABLE, the author of The Curse of Intellect and Aunt Judith's Island, has a new novel almost ready for publication, entitled Morgan Hailsham. It will be issued by Mr. Grant Richards early in June.

MR. GRANT RICHARDS will also publish this month the first of a series of four volumes of a work by Mr. H. Croft Hiller, entitled Heresies. In this work Mr. Hiller attempts a fresh statement of a thesis of first principles in religion, ethics, sociology, and metaphysics. The author maintains that genuine objective standards for belief by which every important issue may be measured are now available, and one of his objects in writing Heresies is to show what these standards are.

AMONG Messrs. Longmans' announcements we note: Queen Elizabeth, by the Lord Bishop of London. New and cheaper edition. Two new books by the Right Hon. Prof. Max Müller: in the press—Auld Lang Syne. Second series. This will be devoted entirely to recollections of Indian friends and correspondents. The Six Systems of Indian Philosophy.

ANOTHER bookseller's mistake is sent to us by a correspondent. In checking his quarterly accounts he found the item, "More on top of it." Inquiry revealed that on the date given he had purchased More's Utopia.

The Literary Week.

THE International Congress of Publishers began its sittings on Wednesday. We propose next week to deal fully with the proceedings; but, meanwhile, it may be said that one of Mr. Murray's points, in his presidential address, was the danger now menacing literature by the gradual encroachment of journalism upon it. While readers had increased enormously in numbers, said Mr. Murray, their knowledge of what to read remained undeveloped. Hence the inundation of worthless ephemeral matter.

At the banquet at Stationers' Hall on Wednesday evening Mr. Lecky returned to the charge. "The danger to literature to-day," he said, "struck him to be that of over-production, and the condition of modern life was not altogether favourable to the best things in literature. His own idea of the way in which the best books were made was very simple. It was that a man should devote long months to a single task, and to concentrate on it all his energies and devote all his thoughts, and the result would probably be something of enduring value." This is perfectly right, but in order to be able to bear the loss on such kinds of literature publishers must also issue inferior and more saleable literature.

THE most popular books in America during the past month have been:

David Harum. Westcott.
When Knighthood Was in Flower. Caskoden.
Mr. Dooley: In Peace and in War. Dunne.
Red Rock. Page.
The Day's Work. Kipling.
Cruise of the "Cachalot". Bullen.
Aylwin. Watts-Dunton.

Of these all have an English edition except When Knighthood Was in Flower. This is an historical romance, with the love story of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, and Mary Tudor for motive. A play has been made from the book. Of course it does not follow that because a book is successful in America it will be successful here. David Harum is a case in point. The author of When Knighthood Was in Flower is Mr. Charles Major, but he has taken the pseudonym of Edwin Caskoden, an imaginary descendant of the imaginary Tudor Caskoden from whose papers the story is compiled.

WE are asked to say that the statement that Mr. Meredith Townsend has ceased to write for the Spectator is based on a misunderstanding. Though Mr. Townsend has gone to live in the country, he will continue to write for the Spectator as before.

THE publishing firm of Copeland & Day, of Boston, have decided to give up business. English bibliophiles who possess some of the pretty and well-considered books issued from this well-known house will regret the decision.

WITH the first week in October the Speaker enters on a new career, as the organ of a group of young Oxford Liberals, whose political views, unless they have lately changed, may be found in a volume entitled Essays in Liberalism, which was published two or three years ago. Among those specially interested in the new Speaker will be Mr. J. L. Hammond, Mr. Philip Comyns Carr, Mr. Belloc (the author of Danton), Sir George Trevelyan's son, Mr. C. Trevelyan, M.P., Mr. Simon, and Mr. F. W. Hirst. The Speaker may therefore be expected to become more seriously a political organ than it has ever been. Sir Wemyss Reid, the present editor, who is retiring from journalism altogether in the autumn, will retain a proprietary interest in the paper.

M. ZOLA is returned like Ulysses to his home in Paris. That home has been invaded by bailiffs and brickbats in his absence, but, says the special correspondent of the St. James's Gazette, "not a single bibelot has changed its place." The fine cathedral carvings on the staircase stand where they did, and the whole house is spick and reposed. Enter M. Zola. "It is my intention to write a book upon the Dreyfus affair." Of course. Now one thinks of it, that is just what M. Zola would do. The book will be a novel, and it will be the first-fruits of M. Zola's exile. And what of England? Have we interested or inspired M. Zola during his stay with us? "You know," said M. Zola to his interviewer, "that I am above all things a worker, an observer. I took advantage of my forced residence in England to glean as many facts as I could about the industrial conditions of the country, and my notes on the subject will form the basis of a future volume. Industrial questions have always interested me intensely. . . . I have gathered material together for a great book on England." So much for France and England. And then? Then "I shall resume my old habits of regular daily work—nulla dies sine linea—and become again the mere littérateur, without any political ambitions, just the artist absorbed in the accomplishment of an artistic aim." A brave man!

WE regret to hear of the serious illness of Mr. Massingham, editor of the Daily Chronicle. He has been ordered complete rest for three months, and has gone to Norway for that purpose. Mr. Fisher is in charge during his absence.

A LITTLE while ago a book was announced for publication under the title The Choate Jest Book, which was to be a collection of the good sayings of the new "American Ambassador" at St. James's. The publishers have now informed us that in deference to Mr. Choate's wishes on the subject they are suppressing the book.

WE are glad to see the success of The Cruise of the "Cachalot". Mr. Bullen and his publishers must regret that that spirited book was not copyrighted across the Atlantic.

turned. Here is a piece of sheer domesticity, written by Hood on his honeymoon at Hastings to his wife's sisters:

I shall leave Jane to explain to you why we have not written sooner, and betake myself at once to fill up my share of the letter; Jane meanwhile resting her two sprained ankles, worn out with walking, or rolling rather, upon the pebbly beach; for she is not, as she says, the shingle woman that she used to be. This morning I took her up to the Castle, and it would have amused you, after I had hauled her up with great labour one of its giddy steep, to see her contemplating her re-descent. Behind her, an unkindly wall, in which there was no door to admit us from the level ridge to which we had attained; before her, nothing but the inevitable steep. At the first glance downwards she seemed to comprehend that she must stay there all the day, and, as I generally do, I thought with her. We are neither of us a chamois, but after a good deal of joint scuffling and scrambling and kicking I got her down again upon the Downs. I am almost afraid to tell you that we wished for our dear Marianne to share with us in the prospect from above. I had the pleasure besides of groping with her up a little corkscrew staircase in a ruined turret, and seeing her poke her head like a sweep out at the top. The place was so small methought it was like exploring a marrow bone.

MR. SHELLEY gives also two specimens from Hood's letters in later life to children, which are delightfully tintured with nonsense. We quote one of them:

I wish there were such nice green hills here as there are at Sandgate. They must be very nice to roll down, especially if there are no furze bushes to prickle one at the bottom! Do you remember how the thorns stuck in us like a penn'orth of mixed pins at Wanstead? I have been very ill, and am so thin now I could stick myself into a prickle. My legs, in particular, are so wasted away that somebody says my pins are only needles; and I am so weak, I dare say you could push me down on the floor, and right through the carpet, unless it was a strong pattern. I am sure if I were at Sandgate you could carry me to the post-office and fetch my letters.

We hope that a volume of such letters may come.

APPROPOS of new letters of notable writers, the annotated edition of Mrs. Gaskell's Life of Charlotte Brontë, which Mr. C. K. Shorter is preparing, will contain forty or more hitherto unpublished letters from Charlotte Brontë to Mr. George Smith.

GERHART HAUPTMANN.

HAUPTMANN's play, "Führmann Henschel," which has been recently played in German, in New York, with great success, might well be tried here in an English translation. The theme is very gloomy, but that is no objection whatever, provided the human nature of the drama is credible. The hero is a teamster, who, after promising his wife on her death-bed not to marry a certain woman, marries her, distrusts her, believes her guilty of the death of his child and first wife, and finally kills himself as an escape from his suspicions and wretchedness.

APPROPOS of C. S. Calverley, a criticism of whose works was printed in last week's ACADEMY, a good story is told in the Life and Memoirs of the Rev. R. H. Quick, just published. Calverley was examining at Cheltenham. At the proper time he did not appear. There was a dead pause for a long time; nobody knew what had happened. At last Calverley walked in, and remarked to the headmaster that he should have been earlier, but that "after breakfast he had inadvertently lighted a cigar." Yet, as has been pointed out, Calverley omitted the after-breakfast cigar from his ode in praise of tobacco. "Sweet when the morn is grey, Sweet when they've cleared away Lunch, and at close of day Possibly sweetest."

MRS. ATHERTON's lecture on Literary London, which is printed in the Bookman, is sprightly but not very informing reading. The address, says Mrs. Atherton, was prepared for a Washington club where speech is as free as at an afternoon tea: hence in making a transcript for a London periodical she has had to omit many passages. Considering what remains those passages must have been very piquant. It cannot be said that Mrs. Atherton's knowledge of literary London is extensive. She has attended, it seems, dinner at the Authors' Club and the Vagabonds' Club, and has accepted the hospitality of certain tiny flats. But what of the literary Londoners who do not dine together and who do not live in tiny and talkative flats? There is too much readiness in our visitors to assume that where there is most noise there is most activity. When it comes to criticism Mrs. Atherton puts herself out of court. A writer who admits to having read and re-read Mrs. Meynell's essays "without receiving the slightest intellectual impression" is hardly to be taken seriously when she pronounces judgment on Mr. Meredith and Mr. Hardy, Mr. Henley and Lucas Malet.

IN the new instalment of Stevenson's letters in Scribner's there is a criticism of The Egoist, in a letter to Mr. Henley in 1882:

Talking of Meredith, I have just re-read for the third and fourth time The Egoist. When I shall have read it the sixth or seventh time, I begin to see I shall know about it. You will be astonished when you come to read it; I had no idea of the matter—human, red matter he has contrived to plug and pack into that strange and admirable book. Willoughby is, of course, a pure discovery; a complete set of nerves, not heretofore examined, and yet running all over the human body—a suit of nerves. Clara is the best girl I ever saw anywhere. Vernon is almost as good. The manner and the faults of the book greatly justify themselves on further study. Only Dr. Middleton does not hang together; and Ludie Busshe and Culmer sont des monstruosités. Vernon's conduct makes a wonderful odd contrast with Daniel Deronda's. I see more and more that Meredith is built for immortality.

STEVENSON continues:

Talking of which, Heywood, as a small immortal, an immortaleet, claims some attention. The Woman Killed with Kindness is one of the most striking novels—not plays, though it's more of a play than anything else of his—I ever read. He had such a sweet, sound soul, the old boy. The death of the two pirates in Fortune by Sea and Land is a document. He had obviously been present, and heard Parser and Clinton take death by the beard with similar braggadocios. Parser and Clinton, names of pirates; Scarlet and Bobbington, names of highwaymen. He had the touch of names, I think. No man I ever knew had such a sense, such a tact for English nomenclature: Rainsforth, Lacy, Audley, Forrest, Acton, Spencer, Frankford—so his names run.

Ma. COLVIN also prints some very characteristic and amusing verses from R. L. S. to Mr. A. G. Dew Smith, written at Daves in 1880, in return for a present of cigarettes. This passage is particularly good—Stevenson is enumerating the dull features of the place, and comes in time to the river:

A river that from morn to night
Down all the valleys plays the fool;
Not once she pauses in her flight,
Nor knows the comfort of a pool;

But still keeps up, by straight or bend,
The self-same pace she hath begun—
Still hurry, hurry, to the end—
Good God, is that the way to run?

If I a river were, I hope
That I should better realise
The opportunities and scope
Of that romantic enterprise.

I should not ape the merely strange,
But aim besides at the divine;
And continuity and change
I still should labour to combine.

Here should I gallop down the race,
Here charge the sterling like a bull
There, as a man might wipe his face,
Lie, pleased and panting, in a pool.

A VERY able and sympathetic account of the late Dr. Wallace, M.P. for Edinburgh, appeared in Wednesday's Chronicle from the pen of its Parliamentary representative: a specimen of what the obituary notice of an interesting man should be. This description of Dr. Wallace's oratorical manner is very good:

What was it that gave to all these speeches their tone and style—which made them so distinct from anything else one hears in the House of Commons? It was the unique combination of influences that went to make up the speaker's character. First, underlying all, there was the training of the pulpit—the note of the preacher, with his tendency to moralise, to improve the occasion; then there was the intellectual independence and curiosity of the philosopher grafted on the subtlety of the theologian; and over all these strata there was the rich vegetation of this passing world—the epicurean pleasure in life, the passion for a rich phrase or a good story.

"He was," the writer sums up, "the true 'freethinker' of the House of Commons, for his thought was unbiassed by party. . . . The last the House of Commons saw of one of its most versatile sons was as he was carried out by Mr. Burns, crumpled up in his stalwart arms, like a sick child."

ONE of the many stories told of the late Dr. Wallace, M.P., is to the effect that when the editor of a local paper in the North asked him "if he would kindly furnish an article on a 'light theological topic,'" Wallace responded with one bearing the title, "The Relations between the Presbyterian Churches and Modern Thought." When set up the article made forty columns, and it became a puzzle to editor and printer how to get rid of it. They began by using it in pieces, and whenever the printer said to the editor: "We've got no leader," the reply was: "Eh, mon, just sneek off about a column and a quarter o' Wallace." In this way the contribution was being used, first working down from the beginning, then upwards from the end. And, says the Westminster Gazette, "they are at it still."

THE Dante Society has listened with pleasure to the Italian Ambassador's discourse on Dante as a business man. Baron de Renzie, speaking in Tuscan, showed that Dante had a supreme contempt for the business man pure and simple, and that he regarded the commercial rise of Florence with indifference. Mr. Alfred Austin also spoke. It was announced that Signor Scartazzini, the greatest living authority on Dante, might probably be induced to deliver lectures in this country in the autumn.

Bibliographical.

APPROPOS of what Mr. Meredith Townsend says in the Cornhill about the respective literary merits of Mrs. Oliphant and Charlotte Brontë, it is interesting to turn to the judgment on Miss Brontë pronounced by Mrs. Oliphant in one of the last things she wrote for publication—the essay she contributed to Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign in 1897. Therein we find Mrs. Oliphant declaring that the books on which Miss Brontë's "tremendous reputation" is based "are not great books." "Their philosophy of life," she writes, "is that of a school-girl, their knowledge of the world almost nil, and their conclusions confused by the haste and passion of a mind self-centered and working in the narrowest orbit. It is rather the most incisive and realistic art of portraiture than any exercise of the nobler arts of fiction—imagination, combination, construction—or humorous survey of life, or deep apprehension of its problems, upon which this fame is built." Miss Brontë's genius, Mrs. Oliphant admitted, was "unmistakable"; but "the life of which it had command was seldom attractive, often narrow, local, and of a kind which meant keen personal satire more than any broader view of human existence."

By the way, the contemporary which first announced the death of Miss Edith Heraud somehow forgot to mention that not so very long ago she came to the fore again as the biographer of her father, Mr. J. A. Heraud. The memoir was essentially amateurish in style and form, but it had some elements of freshness, containing a few letters by Southey hitherto unpublished.

A correspondent is good enough to inform me of the fact that Miss A. M. Clerke and Miss E. M. Clerke, mentioned by me last week, are sisters. And apropos the two Winston Churchills, referred to elsewhere, it is bad enough that there should be an American Robert Bridges as well as an English Robert Bridges. A man has a right to his name, but it is a right which he might well modify when the public good seems to suggest that course.

In Mrs. Atherton's admittedly truncated discourse on "Literary London" I find this passage: "When a new writer appears whose every sentence glitters, they [a certain group] prostrate themselves before him, be he poet or prose-writer, and hail him as a new genius. That he lacks the first essential of genius, the creative fire, does not worry them at all. That variety must be discovered by Dr. Robertson Nicoll, by the Saturday Review, or by, possibly, the Spectator." Does this last sentence explain how Mrs. Atherton's discourse came to figure in the current Bookman?

We have had of late years so many bookfuls of Reminiscences, Recollections, Memories, and the like, that one wonders how future "reminiscencers" will fare for the titles of their works. Any novelty in that direction deserves to be saluted, and so I take off my hat to Mr. E. L. Berthon, who promises us a Retrospect of Eight Decades. That is good; but even better is the Seventy-one, Not Out, of Mr. William Caffyn, the cricketer, which is at once accurate and apropos.

Mr. Clement Shorter, it seems, is to publish, sooner or later, a bibliographical catalogue of his library, which is sure to be of considerable interest to his brother bookmen. Something of this sort, it will be remembered, was done by Mr. Charles F. Blackburn, some five or six years ago, in a little volume called Rambles Among Books—the said books being those which he had himself collected.

I understand that "Cosmo Hamilton"—the name attached to two short novels which have met with praise of late—is the nom-de-guerre of a son of Mr. H. J. Gibbs, who is not unknown, I believe, in journalism.

Sir John Lubbock on Buds.

On Buds and Stipules. By the Right Hon. Sir John Lubbock, Bart, M.P. (Kegan Paul.)

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK is one of the few men of science who really know how to interest the general public: and in his new contribution to the "International Scientific Series" he has proved himself still as interesting as of old. Unfortunately, however, he has this time chosen as his theme a subject which does not in itself immediately commend itself to the lay intelligence. Most people, I imagine, have very vague ideas as to what manner of wild beast a stipule may be; they are not likely to be attracted at first sight by a discourse concerning so unknown a portion of plant anatomy. But they do know the meaning of the word bud: and I have therefore been kinder to Sir John Lubbock than he has been to his own subject by suppressing the stipules in the title of this article, and giving the buds a proper pre-eminence.

Buds, and especially what are known as "dormant buds," are the vouchers of the plant for future seasons. They are therefore in many cases the subject of extraordinary precaution on the part of the bush or tree which produces them—precautions against frost in cold climates, against the heat of the sun in dry or desert or tropical countries, and against browsing animals or egg-laying insects almost everywhere. The greater part of Sir John Lubbock's excellent and eminently readable treatise is devoted to an examination of these protective devices, many of which turn out to be most curious and unexpected. He shows how in certain tropical plants, such as the begonias, the older leaves arch over and shade the younger leaves and buds, so as to shelter them from the torrid heat of the midday, which would shrivel up and dry their tender tissues. Only in proportion as they become sufficiently hardened to stand the full rays of the equatorial sun do they begin in turn to weave the shade-roof for others instead of sheltering themselves under it. Sometimes, again, it is the apex of the shoot which encloses between its folded outer leaves two or three sets of younger and more delicate leaves, together with the bud which forms the actual growing-point. In the walnut, the base of the leaf-stalk is hollowed out into a sort of cup so as to enclose the bud; in the box-elder, a hump or protuberance actually grows out of the body of the leaf-stalk, and covers the precious hope of the race with a regular umbrella. The immense variety of these protective plans enumerated and illustrated by our observer is extremely striking: as elsewhere in nature, any part which happened to be most convenient in the particular species has been seized upon and modified for the purpose in hand. Sir John mentions among the principal modes of protection an expansion in the base of the preceding leaf, scales which represent modified outer leaves, sheathing stipules, spines, furry hairs, and gums, resins, and mucus. Of all these he gives abundant examples, with numerous figures; his researches into the structure and development of buds, and the varying nature of the scales which enclose them, are probably the fullest yet undertaken.

One curious case, however, very familiar to myself, he does not mention, though I doubt not so careful an observer must at some time have noticed it. The ever-green conifers are specially dependent for their future growth upon the bud at the summit of the principal axis, known to gardeners and foresters as "the leader." If the leader be destroyed, the upward growth of the tree ceases entirely as a rule, though occasionally a lateral shoot will begin to grow vertically instead of horizontally, and so replace the lost leader. This, however, is an exceptional instance; in most cases, when the leader is broken off or killed by frost, it is all up with the vertical growth of the tree. Conifers accordingly take almost extravagant care of these leader buds, and in cold years or on bleak hills you will see the lateral buds and lateral shoots develop three or four weeks before the timid leader, the main hope of the tree, ventures to push off his outer brown coverings. The peculiarity is specially marked in the spruce fir and the beautiful blue-leaved Picea nobilis; but it occurs in other kinds of pine, and on the wind-swept hill where I live—Hind Head, in Surrey—it is common among most of the imported conifers.

Stipules are those little expansions, points, or projections at the base of the leaf-stalk which are present in a great many leaves, and which often undergo peculiar modifications in order to fit them for special functions. Vaucher long ago suggested the inquiry why some species of rock-roses possessed these appendages, while others lacked them. Sir John Lubbock has long engaged in a series of researches to answer this abstruse but pregnant question, and his observations have resulted in the establishment of certain principles of fundamental importance as to the nature and use of stipules in general. They seem to be an ancient portion of the architecture of the leaf which has survived or not in various species of plant according as some sufficient use has or has not been found for it under existing conditions. Sometimes, as in the common edible garden pea, the stipule forms the greater part of the foliar surface, and does most of the work of eating and assimilating carbon which elsewhere falls to the lot of the leaf or leaflets. This, however, though perhaps primordial, is now an exceptional and relatively rare use of the stipules; in most cases they are less expanded and leaf-like in appearance, and are told off to perform some more specialised and derivative work in the plant economy. One frequent use is to protect the buds; and sometimes, when closely allied species differ in the possession or non-possession of stipules, it is shown that where the stipules occur they are needed as a blanket for the bud, but where they do not occur it is because some other organ efficiently performs this protective function. Sometimes, again, the stipules, having lost even this secondary use, are utilised as thorns to keep off animals, or are employed as extra-floral nectaries to attract a body-guard of ants—friendly and well-disposed ants, which repel the attacks of their leaf-cutting congeners. Occasionally they are metamorphosed into hooked spines, which assist the plant in climbing, or they lengthen themselves out into tendrils, or they act as food reserves or tanks for water. All these modifications are admirably traced in detail by our author; and all of them illustrate well that infinite plasticity and multifariousness of nature which astonishes us the more the more we know of it.

On the question of the general philosophy of leaf structure however (if one must be critical), I can hardly believe that the last word has yet been said by Sir John Lubbock. I, for one, cannot see eye to eye with him. He says, in effect, the typical leaf may be considered to consist of four parts—the leaf-base, the stipules, the petiole or leaf-stalk, and the blade. But surely this, though still the accepted official account of the matter, is a view which descends to us from a pre-evolutionary age. Is it not more philosophical—because more historically true—to say that the typical leaf consists essentially of a blade, with midrib; that portions of the blade may be so narrowed down to the bare midrib as to produce a naked petiole or leaf-stalk, either continuously, in which case we have petiole and blade, or discontinuously, in which case we have petiole and leaflets, or petiole, blade, and stipules? Do stipules differ essentially, in short, from leaflets? Are they not just that portion of the more or less interrupted blade which adjoins the base, and has not their special liability to modification for special functions arisen from their position alone, which gives them, so to speak, liminal importance? Do we not see the practical identity of stipule with leaf or leaflet in the Galiums, in the pea, in the pansy, in herb-bennet? Are not the simplest and most primitive leaves composed of blade alone; does not blade merge often into stipules; and do not stipules and leaflets show their community of origin in those numerous cases where blade and stipule are all but continuous? Among monocotyledons, again, do not stipules or analogues of stipules occur most of all in those rare cases like Richardia africana, where the blade has assumed a less ligulate shape, and closely approached the dicotyledonous type? These are questions of the deeper philosophy of leaves which one would like to ask Sir John Lubbock; and I have many more of the same sort, but this, perhaps, is hardly the place to pursue them. Suffice it to say that for the evolutionist, at least, stipules may be just portions of the general blade process separated more or less distinctly from the main mass—sometimes, indeed, very slightly separated—and often modified for special functions, though often also retaining the central and original function of the assimilation of carbon.

I have only touched here upon a few main points in a profoundly interesting and suggestive volume. I can promise that even those who take it up without an idea what stipules are will lay it down with a new-born desire to know more about the fascinating subject with which it deals. Spring is the one perennial romance—the romance that recurs as fresh as ever with every year. This little book is a key to the romance: it gives us the reason of many things we all observe in spring in such a way that what was before delightful, but mysterious, becomes now more delightful because comprehensible and instinct with plot interest.

GRANT ALLEN.

Prophet v. Novelist.

When the Sleeper Wakes. By H. G. Wells. (Harpers. 6s.)

MR. WELLS'S new book does more to lay emphasis on his cleverness than to entertain his readers. It resembles the intellectual pastime of a brilliant man: others may like it if they can, but the fact that its creator has been amused is really sufficient. Mr. Wells is a brilliant man, he is intensely interested in scientific developments, and somewhat interested in social problems. What more natural than that he should try his hand at the game of prophecy? The mistake he has made, we think, is not in prophesying, but in combining a story with his forecasts, and in labelling the result fiction. Because When the Sleeper Wakes thus becomes neither one thing nor the other: the reader who naturally expects another War of the Worlds will be disappointed, the reader who expects another Looking Backward will be disappointed; there is here neither the interest of the one nor the social fervour of the other.

Personally we are Anti-Vaticinators, we care nothing whatever for speculations concerning the future, nor can we believe that such vast changes as Mr. Wells describes could be effected in so short a time; but for good stories, such as Mr. Wells can tell, we have an appetite. Hence we rank ourselves with the disappointed too. But the disappointment does not blind us to the ingenuity which Mr. Wells has exerted to make his book credible and engaging. The details concerning Graham the Sleeper go as far towards persuading us as it is possible to go. Indeed, the first few chapters are practically convincing. The invention of the proverb, "When the Sleeper wakes," and its bearing upon the popular imagination, was an inspiration. And up to the point when Graham's escape from the Council House is managed, all goes well. Thenceforward, however, chaos reigns. To the end of time we shall not be clear as to how he made his entry into the theatre, or, indeed, how anyone could go anywhere in the cable-cradles which are to convey our great-great-grandchildren from one part of London to another. At this stage in his book Mr. Wells is continually making too large a demand upon his readers. We doubt not that he himself visualised everything as he went on, but we completely fail to. The result is chaos. The reader must not be blamed: for he is asked in one moment to realise the new covered-in London of the twenty-second century, with its moving streets and stationary wayfarers, its electric daylight and phonograph newspapers, its gigantic edifices, its flying machines and net-work of cables; and the next instant the whole city is plunged in darkness and remains dark for several important chapters. Darkness in a novel is always confusing, but it is trebly so when the conditions are abnormal. Mr. Wells should have given us a map instead of the bewildering drawings which he does vouchsafe. A map might have saved us. As it is, the most careful perusal leaves the great fight a nightmare.

It is, however, in the middle chapters of the book that the argument is unfolded: hence it is well to persevere. Stated briefly, the Sleeper, by virtue of accumulated interest, has become the richest inhabitant of the world and therefore the master of it (for the new age is plutocratic), ruling through a Council of Twelve, who, while he sleeps, manage his affairs. They have not, however, absolute rule, for Ostrog has the control of the wind vanes, and the wind vanes supply London with air and motive power for all the complex machinery which governs daily life. Both the Council and Ostrog are for grinding the faces of the poor, but for political reasons Ostrog promises them (and they form an enormous proportion of the population) relief and consideration, and "When the Sleeper Wakes" has become, with them, a proverb signifying a variety of millennium. Well, the Sleeper does wake. Ostrog captures him from the Council and displays him to the people. The people rise, attack the Council House, and overthrow the Council. Ostrog then, having won supreme power, turns his back on them and proceeds to a worse tyranny even than the Council. Graham, urged on by Helen Wotton, Ostrog's niece, a relic of practical Christianity in an age of a blank materialism, attempts to defeat Ostrog's power, and in his endeavours the book closes, rather than ends.

If these things were set forth with the straightforward directness which Mr. Wells applied in his narrative of the invasion by Martians, all would be well,

But we have a thousand interruptions in order that the prophet in him, as well as the romancer, may have an innings. We are shown the men of the future eating and worshipping, gambling and working, dancing and flying. We are told about decimals and the new spelling, kinetoscope novels, and pleasure cities, and a thousand other matters of more or less interest, which have no positive relevance to the great adventure in which we are prepared at the outset to be interested. Possibly Mr. Wells's pessimistic speculations concerning the trend of civilisation are right, possibly they are mistaken. We hope with all our heart that they are wrong, although the conditions of the future, its slavery and machinery, are not likely to trouble us, personally. Perhaps it is enough to say of this part of the book that it reconciles us completely to life in the present era and the prospect of death in due course.

Fortunately, however, the romancer vanquishes the prophet just in time; and the end crowns the work—as a story. The last chapter narrates a battle royal in the air above the South London suburbs between the Sleeper, alone in an aeropile, and a fleet of gigantic aeroplanes, bringing the Black Police from Africa to London. The Black Police are coming by the order of Ostrog, and Graham the Sleeper devotes his last energies to preserving his people from their merciless rule. The fight is superb. Exactly how it is waged we cannot determine, or how an aeropile is navigated; but the mid-air sensation is there, as it is there in the earlier chapter describing Graham's first flight:

In a moment he was throbbing with the quiver of the engine, and the shouts dwindled swiftly behind, rushed down to silence. The wind whistled over the edges of the screen, and the world sank away from him very swiftly.

Throb, throb, throb—throb, throb, throb; up he drove. He fancied himself free of all excitement, felt cool and deliberate. He lifted the stern still more, opened one valve on his left wing, and swept round and up. One of the Ostrogite aeroplanes was driving across his course, so that he drove obliquely towards it, and would pass below it at a steep angle. Its little aeronauts were peering down at him. One he saw held a weapon pointing, seemed prepared to fire. What did they think he meant to do? In a moment he understood their tactics, and his resolution was taken. His momentary lethargy was passed. He opened two more valves to his left, swung round, and on to this hostile machine, closed his valves, shot straight at it, stern and wind-screen shielding him from the shot. They tilted a little as if to clear him. He flung up his stern.

Throb, throb, throb—pause—throb, throb—he set his teeth, his face into an involuntary grimace, and crash! He struck it! He struck upward, beneath the nearer wing.

Very slowly the wing of his antagonist seemed to broaden, as the impetus of his blow turned it up. He saw the full breadth of it, and then it slid downward out of his sight.

He felt his stern going down, his hands tightened on the levers, whirled and rammed the engine back. He felt the jerk of a clearance, the nose of the machine jerked upward steeply, and for a moment he seemed to be lying upon his back. The machinery was reeling and staggering, it seemed to be dancing on its screw. He made a huge effort, hung for a moment on the levers, and slowly the engine came forward again. He was driving upward but no longer so steeply. He gasped for a moment and flung himself at the levers again. The wind whistled about him. One further effort and he was almost level. He could breathe. He turned his head for the first time to see what had become of his antagonists. Turned back to the levers for a moment and looked again. For a moment he could have believed they were annihilated. And then he saw between the two stages to the east was a chasm, and down this something, a slender edge, fell swiftly and vanished, as a sixpence falls down a crack.

At first he did not understand, and then a wild joy possessed him. He shouted at the top of his voice, an inarticulate shout, and drove higher and higher up the sky. Throb, throb, throb—pause—throb, throb, throb—"Where was the other aeropile?" he thought. "They, too——." As he looked round the empty heavens he had a momentary fear that this machine had risen above him, and then he saw it alighting on the Norwood stage. They had meant shooting. To risk being rammed headlong two thousand feet in the air was beyond their latter-day courage. The combat was declined.

That is the Mr. Wells we value in sensational scientific romance. He alone can do it with real mastery. But for his speculations we cannot care, except when they are on the grand scale, as at the end of The Time Machine. The laborious reconstruction of London two hundred years hence is no matter for a novelist with such powers of vivid narration.

Irish Literature.

A Literary History of Ireland. By Douglas Hyde, LL.D. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

A HISTORY of Irish literature! What a subject! Vast and absorbing for the student of history, for the philologist, for the Celt lover, for the specialist in folk-lore, for the historian of paganism and early Christianity, for the ethnologist and archaeologist, for the writer on romance, for the Irish patriot! The study of Irish literature pursued ardently by a handful of German scholars, the life-work of a few devoted Irishmen, sneered at by Trinity College, discouraged by latter-day English governments, made penal by Elizabethan and Cromwellian legislators, pooh-poohed by Lord Macaulay, the study of Irish literature opens to us the chief door by which we may penetrate into the non-Romanised pagan culture of Western Europe. The fate of Ireland—to be isolated from the rest of Europe, to be never Romanised, feudalised, never thoroughly conquered, but to preserve right into the seventeenth century the spirit and genius of the early primitive civilisation that prevailed at the coming of Christianity in the fifth century—this fate of the nation it is that gives Irish literature its unique place. Christianity coming in contact with Irish Paganism, and compromising, as is its wont, with its converts, was to assist later at a grand efflorescence of Celtic culture, and the five centuries of Irish literature that preceded the coming of the Normans was devoted to chronicling with immense wealth of detail the life of pre-Christian society, and all the mass of concepts, superstitions, manners, laws, and the arts of aristocratic life, that the world of Europe elsewhere absorbed and overlaid with Romanised culture. Always the Irish remained sufficiently outside the European ring of influence to absorb whatever foreign spirit invaded them, and yet sufficiently near Europe to be torn, distracted, and decivilised by the irruption of invaders with civilisations later and more perfected than their own. Thus Ireland has had to pay the heavy penalty of remaining primitive in spirit and organisation, and her spiritual bitterness it is to have had her language proscribed, her literature denied her, her great men made felons, her civilisation, arts, genius derided by a dominating country which owes its greatness to the three successive waves of conquest—Roman, Saxon, and Norman. Small wonder that the Irish poets called the English settlers churls, for the Englishman came into Ireland in search of gain, scorning all the traditions of an ancient aristocratic system. Irish learning, hospitality, honour, and courage—the four strongest instincts of the race—were but the possessions of "the Irish savages" in the eyes of the English yeomen. And with the passing of the Irish aristocracy, with the confiscation of their estates, with their emigration to the Continent to take service in foreign armies, with the creation of an anti-Irish upper class, the last hope of Gaelic literature's blossoming anew was cut off. To-day the Irish language is rapidly becoming extinct, killed by the "modern" spirit, after thirteen hundred years of Irish letters! This is the melancholy end to the story that Dr. Hyde has traced for us in his Literary History of Ireland.

What are the distinctive characteristics of Irish literature? Is it for an English critic to say? Can anyone go much further with generalities, in view of the immense bulk of the material half-explored and ill-understood, than did the late Matthew Arnold in his cautious and delicate essay on Celtic literature? The fact is, the day, the task, the opportunity is still for the specialist, so large is the field, so intricate are the problems that ancient Irish literature presents to the critic. Dr. Hyde, in his Literary History, has shown great learning, industry, patience, and ingenuity in summarising the conclusions that the ablest scholars have hitherto put forward, and he would be the last man to deny that not till several generations of specialists have come and gone can the literary critic have his say. Yet where Dr. Hyde, himself the chief authority on Irish literature of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, has trusted himself to the deliverance of certain generalities we may safely follow him, and we accordingly quote some of his most interesting conclusions:

I am very much mistaken if, in their early development of rhyme alone, in their masterly treatment of sound, and in their absolutely unique and marvellous system of verse-forms, the Irish will not be found to have created for themselves a place alone and apart in the history of European literatures.

One of the things which has most forcibly struck me is the marked absence of the purely personal note, the absence of great predominating names, or of great predominating works; while just as striking is this almost universal diffusion of a traditional literary taste, and a love of literature in the abstract among all classes of the native Irish. . . . An almost universal acquaintance with a traditional literature was a leading trait among the Irish down to the last century, when every barony and almost every townland still possessed its poet and reciter, and song and recitation, music and oratory were the recognised amusements of nearly the whole population. That population in consequence, so far as wit and readiness of language and power of expression went, had almost all attained a remarkably high level without, however, producing anyone of a commanding eminence.

What, then, are the most striking characteristics of this traditional literature, we may ask, if we shrink from interrogating Irish literature in general as to the secrets the specialist is day by day slowly unlocking? Certainly, an extreme romanticism, an excessive imaginativeness, a love of nature, an intensity of feeling, a passion for elaborate detail, join in its spirit to give its characteristic Irish traits. And thus the literature of the pagan spirit seems strongest and finest when inspired by contact with, or by memory of, its ancient glory: it is, indeed, a traditional literature—the Irish—which has become slowly weakened by the misfortunes of successive ages of invasion, suppression, and the break-up of the tribal system. The finest things in Irish literature are the ancient poems, romances, and sagas. The story of Deirdré and the Epic of the Táin Bo Chualgne—these products of Irish pagan society, does anything correspond to them in European literature? Nothing. They are unique in their flavour, in the spirit of their poetry; delicate and chivalrous, yet wild, free, and savage in the ideals of the society they represent; there is nothing so unspoiled, so romantic, as these in early European literature. And it is evident that the society which originated and cherished this romantic literature for ages had a sense of beauty which is by no means to be found among all “more advanced” European peoples. Just as the life concepts of a primitive society may be much finer than the life concepts of a commercialised society, so the early literature of a race may contain fine ideals which are crowded out by later developments in its history. Thus to-day the wretched democratic newspaper, the issue of a “practical” age, has driven from Irish house and cabin the flower of Celtic poetry, the romances and sagas of the old bards. What Irish peasant poetry was can be learned by anyone who reads Dr. Hyde's delightful translations of The Connacht Love Songs. Delicacy, natural refinement, and passion breathe in every line of these peasant poems. And the “practical” race that has left no music, no oratory, no poetry among the “people”—the practical race that has ever made material prosperity the outward and visible sign of its inward and spiritual culture—that race has never let its love of art and letters be very apparent in man's eyes. But with the Irish, with the “mere Irish,” as Dr. Hyde tells us, “the love of literature of a traditional type, in song, in poem, in saga, was more nearly universal in Ireland than in any country of Western Europe.”

A Poet of Mark.

The Field Floridus, and Other Poems. By Eugene Mason. (Grant Richards. 5s.)

Or Mr. Eugene Mason, whose second appearance this is, let it be said at once that there is the poet in him. Few of the pieces in this volume, The Field Floridus, are without the touch which lifts them above the commonplace. The question one first asks oneself is, Why he set in the forefront of his book “The Two Tentmakers,” which is nowise the best poem in it? But the answer is soon visible when one has read the volume through. It summarises pithily the whole note of these poems—the double skein which is tangled throughout them. Mr. Mason is ever asking himself, in effect, if the Tentmaker Omar be right, or the Tentmaker Paul, or, indeed, both, or, peradventure, neither? He inclines strongly, one would say naturally, to the doctrine of Omar as understood and expounded by FitzGerald; yet every now and again with a glance towards the other, the poetic-religious view of the world, and a half-wish that it might be true. So that one has strange contradictions, pieces full of sensuous naturalism jostling others of religious fervour—the contrast, more accentuated, which exists, with less contradiction, in Rossetti. Nevertheless, Mr. Mason is not likely to be among the prophets. The very power of him is an eye for external, pictorial beauty, with a palette of words capable of glowing representation. Sensuous, in his most striking poems, he is. In one, to our feeling, he gets beyond the boundary, and produces a distressing sensation of the sensual—which may, perhaps, be an accident of art, a slip of excess in handling his colours upon a theme needing a nice sense of abstention. The best example of his most characteristic style is “A Satyr.” There is something of Keats in the colouring; in the way, also, that the theme is felt and imagined, with fulness of illusive phantasy. Mr. Mason has got into his satyr; makes us see through his eyes, and experience through his senses. Let us pick a few stanzas:

Within this chilly woodland place,
This maze of tangled stem and shoot,
In rough green moss I hide my face
And couch upon the sinewy root.
So thick the leaves, so gross the dark,
So thin the day that filters through,
The peering sun can hardly mark
How snug I lie perdu.

So close I lie, that overhead
From bough to bough the squirrels leap;
Shy, furry creatures lose their dread
And o'er my prostrate body creep.
The dryad and the oread pass,
They flit between the aged trees,
Their rustling footsteps stir the grass,
They vanish—no one sees.

At times a hurrying rumour thrills
The startled land at evenfall,
A glow of fire on distant hills,
The murmur of the Bacchanal.
They come, they come! loud grows the din,
The choric song, the tipsy shout,
The conch and beaten tambourin,
Silenus and his rout.

All night, with torches, round the vat
Dance reeling satyrs, drenched with wine;
They rend the kid and burn the fat,
They twist the maenad's hair with vine.
And when the stars grow pale above,
And all things shiver to the dawn,
They mingle in their rustic love
The goat-foot and the faun.

That lives to its finger-tips, and might hang as a minor pendant to the magnificent Bacchic hymn of Keats in Endymion. It is an excellent specimen of a book which has decided poetic mark, and justifies us in expecting from Mr. Mason even better things to come.

A Greater Briton.

The Romance of a Great Pro-Consul. By James Milne. (Chatto & Windus.)

This is not an ordinary biography; Mr. Milne has Boswellised to some purpose: he reports Sir George Grey's talks with himself, describes the man in the flesh, and brings us very near to the solemn and winning personality of his "Great Pro-Consul." "We wrote things," says Mr. Milne, "he inspiring, I setting down, and . . . 'Oh, well,' quoth he, 'let's try and gather together what may be fresh or suggestive in my experiences, and yours be the blame. Whatever you do you must have a certain spirit of action--you know what I mean!--or nobody will look at it. You'll need to whisk along.'" It is, perhaps, in the effort to "whisk along" that Mr. Milne drops into a style which we find occasionally open to objection. It is often vivid, and always terse; but sometimes these qualities are pushed to a point where they result in awkwardness or a trying unexpectedness of phrase. On this fault we will not dwell. It is more to the point to say that Mr. Milne is full of his subject, and that he carves away at his effigy with a certain glowing industry and care which are not lost on the reader.

Sir George Grey sailed from Plymouth in a sailing ship on the day that the Queen succeeded to the throne, and returned, finally, to the same port, fifty-seven years later, in a New Zealand liner. In New Zealand, in Australia, in Cape Colony, Sir George Grey had wrestled with the half-taught peoples; and it was Froude who saw those fifty-seven years as "a romance." Nor could Sir George have been blind to the purple streak in his career. Mr. Milne says:

The poetry of Sir George's nature flavoured his language alike in manner of delivery and turn of phrase. He had a quaint old-world style; it fell slowly, in a low, soothing voice. He might have spent his days in the cloister rather than in the din of hammering up hearths for the Anglo-Saxon. Perhaps it was that he had talked so long to the hills of Oceana, catching their simplicity and music. You were reminded of the measured English of an old and lovable book, just as you grew used to read in his face what he was to say before the words had begun to flow. Never was there a face more quick to reflect the mind, more pliable to humour, more luminous at some stirring idea or deed, more indignant at the bare notion of a wrong inflicted, softer at the call of sympathy.

Mr. Milne remarks that "the chief secret of his personality seemed to rest in his eyes, and it was in them that you met the dreamer of dreams." The frontispiece portrait of Sir George Grey bears this out in a remarkable manner. Mr. Milne continues:

In those depths, blue as a summer sky, were many lights, which caught Robert Louis Stevenson and were comprehended of him. The return observation was: "I never met anybody with such a bright, at moments almost weird, genius-gifted eye as that of Stevenson." Sir George could fire imagination in the most ordinary mortal, carrying him off into enchanted realms. He sailed to strange skies, a knight-errant of a star, and he could tow the masses with him. He lifted them out of themselves, and put a label on their vague yearnings. They had imagination, the instinct upward, and were grateful to have it discovered.

The secrets of Sir George's success are given away royally. His own comment on his "getting always what I wanted in life" was: "It may be because all my life I made it a rule not to let anything turn me aside from what I had immediately in hand. If you set out for a place with some definite object in view, your road should be the most direct one." Referring to his dealings with inferior peoples, he said: "The way to adopt with natives was to show them how to obtain more food. Benefit them in that manner and they will regard you as their friend, and you would have influence over them. I always paid a native for doing unskilled work the wage a white man would have received for the same effort. It was mere justice." The book is full of anecdotes, and the Maori pages are alight with adventure and peril and forlorn hope.

A strong figure, fatherly in its goodness, gentleness, noble in its ripeness—a big, slow man born and sworn to the work of empire-making, loving books and ideas and good talk, but carrying his New Testament with him over land and sea, and reading it—such was Sir George Grey. England easily bred him.

Fiction.

Ragged Lady. By W. D. Howells. (Harpers. 6s.)

THIS is another of those laboriously minute stories of middle-class American life which Mr. Howells spends his life in narrating, and of reading which we, at least, never tire. It is true that at any moment the book can be laid aside in favour of another occupation; but before the end to drop it altogether would be impossible. A sense of guilt would be ours were we to do so, as though a necessary social duty had been omitted, or an acquaintance unkindly treated. And yet the characters are not very interesting, their conversations are not witty, their actions are commonplace. Why, then, do we persevere? The reason is, the author. Mr. Howells is a master, and the master, no matter what his medium, always commands respect or admiration. In selection of material and in arrangement thereof Mr. Howells never falters. The result may be tame enough, in all conscience, when we compare it with a novel by a great ironist like Mr. Hardy, or a great humorist like Mr. Meredith; and yet Mr. Howells is on an eminence too, and, in his comfortable, patient, undeviating way, as fine an artist as they. The book before us is superb art.

We are convinced that if Mr. Howells took his calling less seriously, he would have in a moment ten times more readers than are his now. In Ragged Lady, for example, there are hundreds of openings for the exercise of that dry and genial humour which he possesses in an unusual degree. Another writer would have taken them and made a book of rollicking pleasantry. But Mr. Howells has a literary conscience that will not tolerate any laxity: hence he resisted all such temptations, and the book remains only moderately interesting, and yet an almost perfect story.

Mr. Howells has consciously striven to make himself a great novelist; and one of his steps to that end is the elimination of himself. The reader of Ragged Lady knows nothing of Mr. Howells. He is infinitely obliged to him for presenting the story so clearly, and seeing that nothing in the nature of a hitch shall interrupt the narrative; and that is all. It is this suppression of self, and this choice of plain homespun subject-matter, which conspire to keep Mr. Howells's public in this country a small one. For most of us want in novels something better than life: either an intensity of action and thought beyond normal experience, or normal happenings over which the glamour of a striking personality—the author's—has been thrown. Mr. Howells, by offering neither of these, escapes from everyday affairs, appeals only to two sets of readers, and those not large ones—the readers who admire exquisite craftsmanship, art so perfect as to conceal itself; and the readers who really want a story of commonplace American life.

To us Ragged Lady has more attraction than many of Mr. Howells's books. It contains the portrait, most dexterously and delicately painted, of a beautiful New England girl, Clementina Claxon. The book shows her triumphant emergence from relations with selfish and worldly persons, both at home and abroad. That is almost all that there is to say; and to quote is impossible, for Mr. Howells's stories are not a matter of individual pages and purple patches.

The Philosophy of the Marquise. By Mrs. Belloc-Lowndes. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

THIS brief novel, not too coherent in the matter of narrative, is written partly in letters and partly in dialogue with stage directions. Both methods are clumsy when, as here, they are strained to purposes beyond their limitations. Mrs. Lowndes has tried to combine social sketches with a melodramatic story, and we do not think she has made a success of it. The death of Lord Dovemere and the action of the Marquise de Rabutin appear in a light obscure and puzzling, and, indeed, to present them effectively with such means as Mrs. Lowndes has used would demand a far higher technique than hers. On the other hand, the light social sketches are agreeable and neatly mordant. Once or twice Mrs. Lowndes goes somewhat daringly down into Fleet-street, and each time the result is piquancy. Here is a fragment of a dialogue in which the principal speaker is the Cerberus of that great evening paper, the Trafalgar Flag:

MR. SPOONER (pricking up his ears): Eh, what? What exclusive?

SAMPSON (mysteriously): Ah, that would be telling! You wait for our fourth. No copyright in news. It'll be on every bill this afternoon. Still, we'll have made our scoop first. (Importantly) We've a reputation to keep up. We ain't swells for nothing. This is where we romps in. Lords and ladies pervide our copy, ay, and gets jolly well paid for it, they does.

MR. SPOONER (incautiously): Why, I thought it was a butler who—

SAMPSON (disgusted): A butler! Good Lord, ain't you more of a journalist than that comes to? (With ineffable contempt) A butler! Don't you believe it. A butler spells something very different, I can tell you. All very well for them 'apenny papers, I daresay. No, Mr. Spooner, sir, I am here to see and not see, to hear and not hear. Would you be surprised to learn that a great many exclusives reaches us via the fair sex? Not lady journalists, bless you, no! You gentlemen 'ave nothing to be afraid of there. Not but what they're sharp sometimes. The other day I 'ear one of them saying, "Oh yes," she says, "I 'ave 'eard that printers use dreadful language." "Well," says he (our Mr. Kerr, you know), "they do occasionally swear awful, specially when they've got Sir William 'Arcourt's manuscript. Sich blasphemy would 'orri'ly 'Arcourt," he says very serious. "Ow," she says, "I didn't know you 'ad much of 'is copy about." Mr. Kerr, 'e didn't 'arf like that. . . ."

It is clever journalism, and that phrase may be applied to the whole book.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

BOTH GREAT AND SMALL.

BY A. E. J. LEGGE.

Another lengthy and careful novel by the author of Mutineers. In the first chapter we meet with the Reverend John Felsted, "one of those rare individuals who do not make full use of their intellectual credit," and he remarks incidentally that religious novels are often more novel than religion. The book promises well. (Lane. 6s.)

STUFF O' THE CONSCIENCE.

BY LILY THICKNESSE.

A long, sober, and well-written story of unhappy loves and the mercilessness of fate. The end is unhappy: Roland, who loved Benita, but loved her in vain, because she was another's, retired from office and went a-travelling. (Harpers. 6s.)

TRANSGRESSION.

BY S. S. THORBURN.

The author obligingly places several mottoes on his title-page as a foretaste of his story: "To resist temptation that is virtue." "Husbands love your wives, wives submit yourselves to your husbands." "With the Afghans successful treachery is the whole art of war." (Pearson. 6s.)

ROSE DEANE.

BY EMMA MARSHALL.

A posthumous story by the author of so many popular books. This is another simple domestic tale, quiet and pathetic. (Arrowsmith. 5s.)

THE CAPTAIN OF THE LOCUSTS.

BY A. WERNER.

The second volume in the "Over-Seas Library." The first oscillated between South America and Scotland; this is of Cape Colony. "And you, Mwalimu—if your mates do not forthwith sit down, and lay aside their spears, I will report them to the Mzungu at Nziza, and they shall only receive half their pay." And so forth, all briskly and brightly and vigorously done. (Unwin. 2s.)

THE "SATELLITE'S" STOWAWAY.

BY HARRY LANDER.

The Satellite was bound for Hong Kong and manned by the ruffians who always man ships in modern marine fiction. The stowaway was a young woman named Iverna Cargyl, and on her appearance chivalry was born here and there among the crew. A bright but machine-made story, and very free in its language. (Chapman & Hall. 3s. 6d.)

STARS AND STRIPES.

BY J. M. BAIGENT.

The title is symbolical, but not of America. There are italics on almost every page of this undisciplined narrative, which is a blend of piety and sentiment. The end is peace. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

MORGAN HAILSHAM.

BY F. C. CONSTABLE.

A story, by the author of Aunt Judith's Island, of a clever forgery and its consequences, one of which was the humanising of the heroine. The crime is ingeniously conceived and its detection affords good entertainment, with humorous interludes. (Richards. 6s.)

WILLOWWOOD.

BY ESTHER MILLER.

The title is from Rossetti, and the book is an unsparing analysis of the feelings of a woman who has walked in Willowwood. It is tragic, and the author has read Ibsen, but—"They were wiping up the blood in Rutherford's spare room meanwhile. It was very unpleasant. The man's brains had even spattered the Liberty paper on the walls." (Harpers. 6s.)

Where to Go

Suggestions for Writers by Writers.

IN view of the holiday season, we have collected a few opinions from writers as to the best month's holiday for a literary man, of average means, who has completed a hard year's work and needs rest and change.

PROF. SKEAT.

I conceive that my opinion on this subject is of no use to anyone but myself, and, speaking for myself, I should prefer to remain quietly at home, where rest is assured, and a sufficient change of employment is perfectly attainable. Absence from home often entails ceaseless wandering or else oppressive boredom in some inconvenient lodging.

MR. W. L. COURTNEY.

A married man will naturally choose the month of August, because it will give him some chance of seeing his children. A bachelor, or a married man with bachelor habits, will choose the month of June, when the days are longest and the country most beautiful.

MR. WILLIAM ARCHER.

I know of nothing more delightful or invigorating than a walking tour in the Italian Alps, given fine weather and good company.

MRS. W. K. CLIFFORD.

There is nothing so good as the sea. Take ship and sail to anywhere; a fortnight off and back again. Or potter about the Mediterranean on board a cargo-carrying boat. Either can be done for about £40. Overworked and tired folk should never accept yachting invitations; they involve a sustained course of good manners.

MR. SIDNEY LEE.

I believe in such hackneyed resorts in Switzerland as Zermatt and Maloja, from each of which in past years I have derived benefit. If your holiday-maker be a townsman unaccustomed to violent exercise, any spot on earth in the open country a thousand feet or so above the sea-level, where variety of natural scenery gently invites a stranger to exploration, would serve the turn of the seeker after rest and change. Such spots abound in Great Britain and Ireland, as well as in Switzerland.

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

A cycling tour in Normandy, with as little haste and method as possible.

MR. MAURICE HEWLETT.

I find the ACADEMY's problem of the vaguest. It is at least as much a question of the "when" as of the "where." If the gentleman finishes his year in June he could hardly go to Rome; if in November I cannot recommend the Faroe Islands. Then, though I am informed of his means, I know nothing of his tastes. If they are mine, he will go to the North of England and catch (or try to catch) trout. At the end of a week he will begin to write an immortal work. Personally, I have never found it possible to take more than a week's holiday at a time, and have seldom had that. But then I don't look upon literary work as "hard" work. Hard work, to me, is work which I don't want to do but am compelled to do by circumstances.

MR. FREDERICK WEDMORE.

Assuming, as I may, that he starts tired, let him first lie for a week in the green garden of a friend. Then, if one may suppose him to be so far refreshed as to be equal to the superhuman task of meeting people at breakfast-time, let him visit still—but among persons whom he knows less well. In the latter half of his holiday—the third and fourth weeks of the month to which you miserably limit him—he should forget his health altogether, and go exactly where it amuses him to go, and live exactly with the people with whom it amuses him to live.

MR. ALFRED C. HARMSWORTH.

I would recommend Galicia in North-West Spain. It is but comparatively little known to the modern Englishman. There are excellent salmon and trout fishing, very good cycling roads, and the people are most courteous. Galicia can be reached either via Paris and the Sud Express, or by the Royal Mail steamers, which reach Vigo in, as far as I remember, two days. Historically, Galicia is most interesting, and the Gulliegos are not at all to be confounded with the lazy, unwashed folk of some of the other races of the Peninsula.

MR. BENJAMIN SWIFT.

Let the weary Man of Letters spend the summer beside some lonely sea shore, and try to forget his publisher's existence. Let him bathe in the sea at dawn, and swim and row and sail in it. If he wishes to worship any created thing, let him worship the sun, and live in the open air as in its temple. Let him eat oatmeal, wheaten bread, and fish, and drink mild, soft wine. Above all, let him abstain from the folly of writing, and learn to write less and think more. We are sick of accumulations of mere words.

DR. W. ROBERTSON NICOLL.

If he is very much exhausted, he should spend the holiday in one or other of three Surrey villages, which I decline to name. If he is not too much exhausted, let him go to Switzerland.

MR. L. F. AUSTIN.

Let your literary man take a bicycle to France, having first joined the Cyclists' Touring Club and the French Touring Club. He will find himself in a beautiful country, with the most courteous people and the cheapest inns in the world. He will learn that, although Albion is perfidious, every Englishman with anything to spend is heartily welcome. Let him cycle through Touraine (if he can start at once, for later on in the summer it will be too hot), take many a siesta on the banks of the Loire, and read Balzac.

MR. W. PETT RIDGE.

All literary men are of "average means," and every one of them knows best how to make holiday for himself. Personally, I think he seldom requires rest, and London can furnish all the change of surroundings that he wants.

MR. SILAS K. HOCKING.

Get right away from London or from wherever your work lies. Avoid books, newspapers, and all the cult of scribblers. Live on a farm, or, better still, get on the cliffs of North Cornwall or among the fells of Cumberland, or, even better yet, get on the highlands of Norway or Switzerland. Fish, walk, play golf, or climb the mountains every day. Live simply. Go to bed early, and be very moderate in the use of tobacco. Don't touch strong drink.

Books about Places.

A Retrospect.

SINCE last June, when we devoted a Supplement to guide-book and topographical literature, there have appeared many books of this class. A large proportion of them have been noticed by us; but it may serve a good purpose if we rapidly survey the year's output as a whole.

The first guide-book which reached us last year after our Supplement of June 11 was Mr. T. H. Holding's Cycle and Camp (Ward, Lock & Co.). This was a clever study in cycling economics. The writer had devised an outfit whereby four men could go on a cycling tour at a total expense of £2 a week for the lot. He told how his plan worked in the wilds of Western Ireland, and although his somewhat prosy moralisings marred the book, it was really informing, and that in an original way.

A few weeks later Mrs. Pennell, in her Over the Alps on a Bicycle (Unwin), showed how the Alps may be traversed on bicycles. One recalls her breezy narrative with pleasure; how she pushed her machine up the Simplon even to the blessed Sixth Refuge, and next day "crashed down through the pines, down through the chestnuts, into a land of vineyards and tropical heat, where little more than an hour before I had been shivering." Half trying, half thrilling, the adventures of this Alpine tour were well worth recording by Mrs. Pennell's skillful pen.

These were cycling narratives. Meanwhile, the usual practical guide-books were hatched in the July sun. The Swedish Tourist Club of Stockholm, aided by a Government subsidy, issued its Guide to Sweden. It was a very formal, but also very useful, manual, and it contained a chapter on Swedish art and literature. Illustrated guides to Leamington and Stratford-on-Avon were published by Messrs. Dawbarn & Ward, and a guide to the Westerham district of Kent was issued by Messrs. Beeching under the title of Wolfe-Land. Mr. Edward North Buxton put forth a revised edition of his Guide to Epping Forest (Stanford), to which he had added a new chapter on the management of the forest. In this Mr. Buxton set forth the principles on which he considered the Verderers, of whom he is one, ought to act and do act.

The High Pyrenees (Innes), the joint work of Mr. Harold Spender and Mr. H. Llewellyn Smith, was a notable addition to existing guide-books. The High Pyrenees are not over-run by tourists, and are not likely to be; but one cannot doubt that new travellers will go thither on the strength of this report of a land so remote and interesting. One of the most curious districts covered by the travellers was the "Vallées et Souveraineté Budoré," a tiny state which lies between Spain and France, and recognises both as suzerain and neither as masters.

Mr. A. J. C. Hare added Shropshire (Allen) to the many topographical books he has written. Salopian history, antiquities, and folk-lore were richly represented in his pages. Mr. A. G. Bradley's Highways and Byways of North Wales (Macmillan) was uniform in appearance and plan with Mr. Arthur H. Norway's Devon and Cornwall (Macmillan). Mr. Bradley took his readers into Wales by way of Shrewsbury, and step by step through the great Marches to Beaumaris and Barmouth. The glamour of Welsh history was frequently invoked by the author, and the illustrations by Mr. Pennell and Mr. Hugh Thomson contributed to the charm of the book.

More recently Mr. Stephen Gwynn has contributed a guide to Donegal and Antrim (Macmillan) to the same series. Here Mr. Thomson works alone as illustrator. Mr. Gwynn writes on this district with the enthusiasm of an exile, and his book is more than a guide—it is a genuine contribution to local history, though much of that history is "the vague tradition of a defeated race, and a legend-lore which has never been wrought into poetry." Lonely and storm-beaten, the country is yet an ideal one for the strong open-air tourist, who will always find himself "somewhere between the heather and the sea."

A sound and by no means superfluous piece of work was Mr. John Dickson's study of the ten islands in the estuary of the Forth, of which Inchgarvie, Inchcolm, and the Bass Rock are best known by name. The proprietorship and natural features of the islands are dealt with fully by Mr. Dickson, and the splendid ecclesiastical traditions which cling to Inchcolm, Fidra, and the Bass are revived and corrected. The title of the book, Emeralds Chased in Gold (Oliphant), though poetical—it is Sir Walter Scott's phrase—is perhaps hardly calculated to connect the book with its subject in the public mind.

Mr. James John Hissey's Over Fen and Wold (Macmillan) takes its place with his accounts of other driving tours. It describes one of the least frequented tracts of England—the Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire fens. Mr. Hissey drove from village to village and town to town at his own pace, passing through Stilton, Crowland, St. Ives, Sleaford, and many other small towns whose very names breathe quietness. The plaintive marshlands rolled between, "suggestive of space and freedom, begetful of broad thinking and expanded views." Those who long to see England in its most primitive and unspoiled state rather than show scenery may take the hints here given. Although Mr. Hissey drove, he chooses as the motto of his book Whitman's lines beginning "Afoot and light-hearted I take to the open road"; and the country seems to be the ideal ground for a long walking tour with knapsack and sketch-book.

The last three books we have named are full of love of their subjects, an indispensable condition of success in topographical literature. A fourth book keeps them company, Mr. David S. Meldrum's Holland and the Hollanders (Blackwood). This is a close study of the country and its people. To run to earth the true character of the Dutch people is the task which Mr. Meldrum sets himself, and this he does by considering the people in every light, in town and country, in their homes and parliaments, in trade and education. A feature of the book is the fine eye for physical features and the lie of the land which Mr. Meldrum shows he possesses when describing scenery. The book is all the more Dutch by reason of the fact that it is illustrated entirely from the paintings of Dutch artists. In its scope and method it stands alone. In Loyal Lochaber (Morison Bros.) we have a careful local study. The author, Mr. Drummond-Norie, has addressed himself to the tourist, and has supplied all the popular information about the Lochaber district, the deeds of Lochiel, the terrors of Glencoe, the fortunes of Montrose and Claverhouse, and the drama of "Forty-five," besides much matter relating to Highland heroes of the Napoleonic wars and the Crimea. The only objection to Mr. Drummond-Norie's book, which is abundantly illustrated, is its bulk. The photographs given are excellent.

By the death, a few weeks ago, of Mr. J. Arthur Gibbs a genuine and charming topographer has been lost to us. Mr. Gibbs's book, A Cotswold Village (Murray), published last December, stands out as a sincere and vital piece of work. Here, again, we have ordinary English scenery and country life treated by an author who exaggerates nothing, but finds those lasting charms and that enduring fragrance which are the reward of intimacy. Mr. Gibbs gives us plain Gloucestershire, its grey manor houses, its white-walled villages, the names of its fields, the Cotswold words. September is the best month for the visitor, when the kestrel and the heron are seen flying and wheeling above the hushed autumn lands. A delightful book, a veritable piece of England.

Those who wish to study English village life in any part of the country will do well to put on their shelves two books which appeared last November: Mr. Baring-

Gould's An Old English Home and its Dependencees (Methuen) and Mr. T. F. Thiselton-Dyer's Old English Social Life as Told by the Parish Registers (Stock). Mr. Baring-Gould talks entertainingly about village politics, the church, the village inn, the manor, the village doctor, and the agricultural labourer. With history and anecdote and sage comment he takes us round the English village. Mr. Thiselton-Dyer plunges into the serious private concerns of village life. He produces facts about births, marriages, and deaths; parish scandals and punishments; strange customs and monstrous events. Another English area, the Kent marshes around the little village of Milton-next-Sittingbourne, are dealt with in Drift from Longshore, the latest volume of "A Son of the Marshes." Certain parts of Sussex are also included, and the legend of the Devil's Dyke at Brighton is revived. Mr. Harry Speight's Old Bingley (Stock) was a close and racy study of the Yorkshire township, written by a native, and full of local feeling. Although not a topographical book in name, the Rev. George Miles's work on The Bishops of Lindisfarne, Hexham, Chester-le-Street, and Durham (Wells, Gardner) may be recommended to all who propose to visit the Northumbrian coasts and moors, and particularly to pilgrims to Holy Island. The romance and poetry of Lindisfarne take shape in Mr. Miles's pages. For similar reasons Mr. Marion Crawford's Ave Roma Immortalis, with its delightful photogravures of modern Rome, must be mentioned here.

The "Medieval Cities," series which Mr. Dent is producing, has received several additions, and now includes Perugia, Rouen, Nuremberg, and Toledo.

We may fitly conclude this survey by mentioning three books which have a more distinctly literary flavour than any we have yet named. Sir Archibald Geikie's Types of Scenery (Macmillan) was an attempt to detect the influences of three types of scenery—lowland, upland, and highland—upon the literature of the British Isles. The subject is a very interesting one, and those who wish to inquire into it should procure the reprint of the Romanes Lecture in which this distinguished geologist and man of letters developed his theory.

Although Mr. R. B. Cunningham Graham's book of Morocco travel Mogreb-el-Aksa (Heinemann) is outside the scope of this survey, it is proper to mention it as a narrative of observant and temperamental travel. Reviewing this book in February last we pointed out that "only the journeys of a temperament survive amid the dark continents of past travellers, for temperament creates fresh values, whereas a traveller's mere experience only shakes the world's kaleidoscope." This is the journey of a temperament and the itinerary of a wit. It is full of comparisons between East and West, of ironical and kindly insights. Take this slight digression:

I had a friend who, being for a short time Governor of a province in a Central American Republic, and finding things become too hot for him, collected all the public money he could find, and silently one night abdicated in a canoe down to the coast, and, taking ship, came to Latetia; and then, his money spent, lectured upon the fauna and flora of the country he had robbed; and, touching on the people, always used to say that it was very sad their moral tone was low.

A keen observation, whimsical fancy, and what we have called "a wise epicureanism of sentiment and philosophy," are the qualities of Vernon Lee's Genius Loci: Notes on Places (Grant Richards). Prettier essays in the sentiment and friendship of places could hardly be desired than these. Especially dainty are some of Vernon Lee's Italian pictures. Here is a Mantuan lake:

The pale blue water, edged with green reeds, the poplars and willows of the green plain beyond, a blue vagueness of Alps, and, connecting it all, the long castle bridge with its towers of pale geranium-coloured bricks.

Kensington Palace. By Ernest Law. (Bell & Sons. 2s.)

MR. LAW has described the art treasures of more than one of our royal palaces. Here he assumes the office of general guide to Kensington Palace. This home of British royalty has been for so long out of public view that the recent opening of its interior to the public calls for an authoritative account of the building. This Mr. Law gives us. He has had the sanction of the Lord Chamberlain and the assistance of those officers of State who are connected with the palace. Thus aided, but with qualifications of his own which are all that could be desired, Mr. Law conveys the facts and the atmosphere which are necessary.

Kensington Palace is revealed as the scene of royal domesticities, of days little burdened by statecraft and ceremonial. The palace was originally Nottingham House, and under that name it was purchased by William III. who at once instructed Sir Christopher Wren to enlarge it. William and Mary were quite eager to move into their new palace at green Kensington, and on the day before the news of the battle of the Boyne reached England the Queen wrote impatiently to the King in Ireland: "The outside of the house is fiddling work"; and a day or two later: "I have been this day to Kensington, which looks really very well—at least to a poor body like me, who have been so long condemned to this palace [Whitehall], and see nothing but water and wall." This royal pair were happy at Kensington. The death-bed scene of William the Silent would alone invest the palace with more than common interest. In one of the rooms through which the public now wanders at will the King was told that no earthly power could save him.

He swallowed a cordial, and asked for Bentinck. Those were his last articulate words. Bentinck instantly came to the bedside, bent down, and placed his ear close to the King's mouth. The lips of the dying man moved, but nothing could be heard. The King took the hand of his earliest friend and pressed it tenderly to his heart. In that moment, no doubt, all that had cast a passing cloud over their long, pure friendship was forgotten. It was now between seven and eight in the morning. He closed his eyes and gasped for breath. The bishops knelt down and read the commendatory prayer. When it ended William was no more. When his remains were laid out it was found that he wore next to his skin a small piece of black silk ribbon. The lords-in-waiting ordered it to be taken off. It contained a gold ring and a lock of the hair of Mary.

Queen Anne lived much at Kensington Palace, to which she added Wren's noble Orangery. She also laid out the gardens, wherein she loved to potter. Here she "supped too much chocolate and died monstrously fat." George the First lived like a hermit at Kensington, but added the suite of State Rooms which does so little credit to its architect, William Kent. George II. made the palace gay and populous, though he does not cut a very amiable figure there in the annals of the time. Here is his portrait from Lord Hervey's "treacherous, satiric hand," as Mr. Law calls it:

His Majesty stayed about five minutes in the gallery; snubbed the Queen, who was drinking chocolate, for being always "stuffing"; the Princess Emily, for not hearing him; the Princess Caroline, for being grown fat; the Duke of Cumberland, for standing awkwardly; Lord Hervey, for not knowing what relation the Prince of Sultzbach was to the Elector Palatine; and then caused the Queen to walk, and be re-snubbed, in the garden.

Of Queen Victoria's childhood at Kensington Palace we have a pleasing glimpse in Sir Walter Scott's Journal. On May 19, 1828, he wrote:

I was very kindly received by Prince Leopold, and presented to the little Princess Victoria, the heir-apparent to the Crown, as things stand. . . . This little lady is educated with much care, and watched so closely, that no busy maid has a moment to whisper, "You are heir of England." I suspect, if we could dissect the little heart, we should find some pigeon or other bird of the air had carried the matter.

Leaving royal biography, Mr. Law goes on to examine the palace in detail, pointing out the dates and features of its galleries, staircases, wainscottings, &c., and the changes which have been made in the gardens. He seems to score a point over Mr. Loftie, who in his Kensington Picturesque and Historical says positively that "neither Queen Anne nor Queen Caroline took an acre from Hyde Park." Mr. Law has found in the Record Office an old report of the state of the gardens in 1713, which distinctly refers to "the Paddock joyning to the gardens taken from Hyde Park in 1705, and stocked with fine deer and antelopes"; and another document states the area of the transferred land to have been "near 100 acres." Certainly it is not easy to suppose that Queen Anne, who once proposed to close Hyde Park to the public, would hesitate to appropriate a portion. Mr. Law has made careful catalogues of the pictures in the various rooms and galleries. Here may be seen West's "Death of General Wolfe," the first English historical painting in which the characters are dressed in their proper costume instead of in Greek or Roman armour. In the room called the Queen's Closet are nine paintings of old London. An excellent guide-book, handsomely produced.

Handbook of Warwickshire. By H. M. C. (Murray. 6s.)

This volume worthily completes Mr. Murray's series of English Handbooks. No English county has been more written about than Warwickshire. What a county it is! It has Shakespeare, and it has Edge Hill, and it has Birmingham — and is thus glorious in the annals of literature, war, and commerce. It has legendary towns like Coventry and Banbury; historic castles like Warwick, Kenilworth, and Tamworth; noble old residences like Charlecote and Compton Wynyates; a primeval forest, or what remains of it, like Arden; and it has a great public school at Rugby. Warwickshire is the heart of England, and its annals are the annals of England localised.

Its soil exhales history; there is hardly a hamlet that does not invite a pilgrimage. These historical associations are here dealt with fully, and with the right touches, as when we are told, under "Blacklow Hill," how Piers Gaveston's head rolled down the slope and was picked up by a preaching friar, who carried it under his cloak to Oxford. Small literary matters are not neglected; thus Stockingford's ugly modern church, and its manufacture of blue bricks, are counterbalanced by the entry that "this parish was the scene of George Eliot's 'Janet's Repentance' in Scenes of Clerical Life." Johnsonians are reminded that at Aston Hall, now a public museum, may be seen some relics of Dr. Johnson's connexion with the city:

On the ground-floor is a room called "The Johnson Room." It is fitted up with the panelling and mantelpiece from one of the rooms of Edmund Hector, which formerly stood in Old-square, Birmingham, and contains the tablet which was on the house recording that Dr. Samuel Johnson was often a guest of his old schoolfellow. There are also books, engravings, &c., relating to the Doctor and his friends.

Another literary point worth noting is that Warwickshire, so rich in history, has produced two topographers: Michael Drayton (born at Atherstone in 1563) and the great Dugdale (born at Shustoke in 1605). The Shakespeare matter in this volume is as full as could be desired, and it is interesting to notice that Stratford-on-Avon is awarded as much space as Birmingham. Two good maps, of the northern and southern halves of the county, are supplied in pockets, and there are special maps of Birmingham and district.

Pictorial and Descriptive Guides to Cromer; Penzance, Land's End, and Scilly Islands; Inverness; Eastbourne; Teignmouth. (Ward, Lock & Co. 1s. each.)

THE five guide-books which we have received from Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. are only a twelfth, in number, of the series to which they belong. Better printed guide-books for a shilling do not exist, and the information packed between each pair of scarlet covers is not only very sound, but it is admirably arranged. Appendices, or special chapters, for Golfers, Cyclists, and Anglers are given wherever needed; and historical and literary associations are dealt with as fully as possible, and usually with references to wider sources of information. Thus, dipping into these volumes at random, we observe that visitors to Cromer are reminded that Nelson spent his school holidays at Mundesley, and that along Mundesley sands Cowper often wandered, finding, as he said, "something inexpressibly soothing in the monotonous sound of the breakers." "To lovers of literature," says the editor, "these sands which Cowper trod will be sacred ground." Certainly; but the lover of literature will remember with a smile that in his poem, "Retirement," Cowper poured gentle ridicule on the then growing craze for seaside sojourning.

Only two miles from Mundesley is the village of Paston, the birth-place, so to speak, of the Paston Letters. The editor refers to these in an informing manner, and recalls Herman Merivale's attempt, which he afterwards frankly abandoned, to throw doubt on their authenticity. On the other hand, the literary associations of Norwich, so rich and various, receive but scant mention. In the Teignmouth volume a special note draws attention to the association of Drake and Marlborough with Ashe, of Raleigh with Hayes Barton, and of Lady Nelson with Littleham. Ottery St. Mary, easily reached from Teignmouth, Exmouth, or Budleigh Salterton, was the birth-place of the much-travelled Coleridge. And Ottery's "verdant valley" has not only received Thackeray in his holidays from the Charterhouse, but it is the scene of many of the events in Pendennis, where the name "Clavering St. Mary" is substituted for Ottery, "Barmouth" for Sidmouth, "Chatteris" for Exeter, &c. Budleigh Salterton shows very alluringly in this guide-book, and the circumstance that Anthony Trollope and the late Mrs. Lynn Linton visited it can only be recommendation to the tired literary man. Particularly full and well done, though not materially very interesting, is the literary note on West Cornwall in the Penzance volume. We are reminded that Mr. Eden Phillpotts studied the life of Newlyn for the story of Joan Tregenza as it is told in Lying Prophets. In connexion with the Land's End the visitor is warned not to expect a too dramatic promontory; the warning will be needed only by casual visitors, for Land's End, like all great places, grows on those who linger near it. The editor is happily inspired in quoting from Mr. Ruskin's description of the Land's End this oceanic sentence:

At the Land's End there is to be seen the entire disorder of the surges, when every one of them, divided and entangled among promontories as it rolls, and beaten back post by post from walls of rock on this side and that side, recoils like the defeated division of a great army, throwing all behind it into disorder, breaking up the succeeding waves into vertical ridges, which in their turn, yet more totally shattered upon the shore, retire in more hopeless confusion, until the whole surface of the sea becomes one dizzy whirl of rushing, writhing, tortured, undirected rage, bounding and crashing, and coiling in an anarchy of enormous power, sub-divided into myriads of waves, of which every one is not, be it remembered, a separate surge, but part and portion of a vast one, actuated by eternal power, and giving in every direction the mighty undulations of impetuous life, which glides over the rocks and writhes in the wind, overwhelming the one and piercing the other with the form, fury and swiftness of a sheet of lambent fire.

The tributes paid by literary folk to their summer resorts have not always been unconscious. Here are two stanzas from a poem in which Prof. Blackie recommended Kingussie to tourists to Scotland :

Tell me, good sir, if you know it ;
Tell me truly, what's the reason
Why the people to Kingussie
Shoalwise flock in summer season ?

Reason ! yes a hundred reasons :
Tourist people are no fools ;
Well they know good summer quarters
As the troutling knows the pools.

A feature of Messrs. Ward & Lock's guide-books is the excellence of the photographs they contain. Many really fine specimens of landscape photography might be named. The Old Bridge at Llostwithiol is beautifully given in the Penzance volume in a photograph by Frith ; Barton Broad, by Mr. Payne Jennings, is a gem of the Cromer ; and Valentine's Affric River in the Inverness is beautifully composed.

Handbooks to The North Wales Coast ; The Wye Valley ; The Channel Islands ; Brighton, Eastbourne, &c ; Bournemouth and the New Forest ; The Isle of Wight. (Darlington. 1s. each.)

MESSRS. DARLINGTON'S handbooks are very light in the hand, yet are loaded with pleasant information. Indeed, they may be read anywhere and at any time. In The North Wales Coast we are pleased to light upon the extempore lines which Charles Kingsley, Thomas Hughes, and Tom Taylor wrote at Pen-y-gwryd, taking each his turn with the stanzas, thus :

T. T.

I came to Pen-y-gwryd with colours armed and pencils,
But found no use whatever for any such utensils ;
So in default of them I took to using knives and forks,
And made successful drawings—of Mrs. Owen's corks.

C. K.

I came to Pen-y-Gwryd in frantic hopes of slaying Grilse, salmon, 3lb. red-fleshed trout, and what else there's no saying ;
But bitter cold and lashing rain, and black nor'-eastern skies, sir,
Drove me from fish to botany, a sadder man and wiser.

T. H.

I came to Pen-y-Gwryd a larking with my betters,
A mad wag and a mad poet, both of them men of letters ;
Which two ungrateful parties, after all the care I've took
Of them, make me write verses in Henry Owen's book.

In the Wye Valley we have a special chapter on Shelley's connexion with Nant Gwyllt and Cwm Elan. The following passage will bear transcribing, though hardly for the sake of Shelley's prose :

At Cwm Elan, where his "bedroom was over the kitchen," he received the appeal of Miss Westbrook to elope with her. . . . He was, therefore, much preoccupied in mind ; he was growling, too, in his letters at the postal delivery "like the waves of hell to Tantalus," and at the forty-mile distance of the nearest doctor. Still, the susceptibilities of Shelley's poetical genius a short time later to burst forth in "Alastor" and "Queen Mab" could not but be influenced during this first visit of his by the beauty of the glen. "This is most divine scenery," he writes, "exceedingly grand ; rocks piled on each other to tremendous heights, rivers formed into cataracts by their projections, and valleys clothed with woods, present an appearance of enchantment." "Nature is here marked with the most impressive characters of loveliness and grandeur ; rocks piled on each other to an immense height, and clouds intersecting them ; in other places waterfalls midst the umbrage of a thousand shadowy trees form the principal features of the scenery. I am not wholly uninfluenced by its magic in my walks."

The maps in these handbooks are clear, and many of them pleasantly coloured. Photographs abound, and with these are mingled sketches by the editor which add a personal touch to the pages.

Baedeker's Northern Italy.—Norway and Sweden.—United States. (Dulan & Co.)

THESE now (1899) editions of three Baedeker guides are all wonderful products of this wonderful travelling age. The handbook to the United States reaches the acme of compressed information, of multifarious helpfulness. Many pages elapse before the essential guide-book matter is reached, for Mr. Baedeker provides monographs on American Politics, the Constitution and Government of the United States (this is written by Mr. Brice), Aborigines and Aboriginal Remains, the Physiography of North America, Fine Arts, Sports, Education, and Bibliography.

The Atlantic lines of steamships are enumerated and described, the colours of their funnels being also given ; and here we note with interest the remark that in the old days the competition among the New York pilots was so keen that the pilot-boat often met steamers hundreds of miles from land. This custom died out with the use of steam pilot-boats. When we come to the strictly topographical pages we are in a world of ordered detail. The thin pages turn by hundreds under the finger, and states, towns, hills, waterfalls, industries, and battlefields pass in silent neatness. One can but exclaim on such a marvel of compression. Now and then we have a long, unbroken passage ; thus, the battle of Gettysburg is described with great minuteness and at considerable length, two plans of the field being provided. A feature of the book on which one might dwell at length is its beautiful maps and plans of cities ; we have plans not only of New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia, but also of St. Paul, Denver, Buffalo, Boston, and many other centres.

The Norway and Sweden volume contains new descriptions of the Swedish Norrland, and also gives information for a trip to Spitzbergen. The Northern Italy has, in its turn, been thoroughly revised.

North Wales. By M. J. B. Baddeley and C. S. Ward. Part I. (Dulan & Co.)

THIS volume is the first of the two parts in which the editors deal with the Principality. It comprises the area bounded on the south by the watersheds of the Clwyd, the Conway, and the Dwyryd rivers. The following sensible remarks are made on the mountain and valley scenery of the district :

Except under peculiar atmospheric conditions the wilder valleys of Great Britain are apt to disappoint expectations based on the glowing descriptions that have so often been given of them. Size has a much greater effect on the eye in this class of scenery than in others. A rocky pass which creates a feeling of awe when looked down upon from the rocks that overhang it often fails to sustain that emotion when the standpoint is the valley itself and the crags are viewed from below. Admitting this, we know no valley in Great Britain that is more wildly beautiful than the Pass of Llanberis, while that of Nant Ffracon, when entered at its lower end, almost vies with Glencoe in the uncompromising sternness of its features.

The small part which lakes play in Welsh scenery is alluded to ; and the editors are even led to bestow praise on Lake Vyrnwy (the "Liverpool Reservoir") as "a wonderfully good imitation of Nature," while, of the rest, "the Birmingham Reservoirs, near Rhayader, are the most promising." Intending tourists to North Wales will find this guide admirable. The Welsh place-names are interpreted, and their pronunciation indicated. Post-office and telegraph hours are given, and the time of the arrival of the London papers. As for the general matter, the tourist who consults it runs no risk of missing any object of importance or exceptional beauty.

Transactions of the Hampstead Antiquarian and Historical Society for the Year 1898. (Hampstead: Mayle. 2s. 6d.)

THE Hampstead Antiquarian and Historical Society held its inaugural meeting in April of last year, and its first report is a very creditable production. Hampstead's eighteenth century history, so voluminous and familiar, can still be sifted and examined with profit. A subject of keener inquiry is the evidence of early British occupation. Prof. J. W. Hales, who is a member of the Society, is of opinion that the barrow on Parliament Hill has not been thoroughly investigated, and that British remains may yet be found in the adjacent woods. It is curious that in charters of Edgar, Ethelred, and Edward the Confessor, Hampstead is not only mentioned, but its boundaries are given just as they are recognised to-day. Then there are the Hampstead Ponds, loved of Mr. Pickwick. Prof. Hales justly remarked at the inaugural meeting that times have changed since the idea of investigating the sources of these waters seemed transparently ridiculous. He hoped that the sources of the ponds would be sought for and discovered. A pleasant hill-top society! Meetings, excursions, and hospitality promise to swell its cheery annals, and if the Society intends to print and bind its Proceedings as handsomely as it does this year it will deserve well of librarians and book-lovers. We note that the edition is limited and the copies numbered. Sir Walter Besant is president of the Society, which is worthy of imitation in other districts. The continued rusticity of Hampstead seems to be vouched for in the statement that as recently as two years ago the notice "Beware of Man Traps" was to be seen in the neighbourhood.

Lichfield Cathedral. By Canon Bodington.

Ripon Cathedral. By the Ven. Archdeacon Danks. (Isbister. Each 1s.)

THESE little volumes in white parchment covers are the lightest and daintiest guide-books with which we are acquainted. Each booklet is the work of an authority on the spot and is informed with a certain emotion, without which no performance of the kind has life or charm. Canon Bodington points out that "for ages past all that has been great, noble, good in the life of Mercia has been bound up with Lichfield and its Cathedral. Who can think without emotion of the long line of bishops and others from St. Chad onwards who have toiled and worshipped here?" Is Archdeacon Danks discouraged because Ripon is not famous, or magnificent, has no cloisters fraught with monkish memories, and no old glass save what one window contains? Not a bit of it. "In some respects Ripon Cathedral has an interest and attraction almost unique." One honours these canons and archdeacons for their special pleading. Ripon has been twice a cathedral, and, between times, an abbey, a parish church, and a collegiate church. It has a Saxon crypt of the seventh century. It can show all the styles of English architecture: "here, in a word, is the history of northern England written in stone." And the ground is almost vocal with the war-cries of past ages. Not far away was found "the mummified body of a Roman, his toga still green, his stockings still yellow, his sandals still artistic." After that Cromwell's inevitable "troopers" seem tame, but the altar stone on which a Scottish king's ransom was paid down is an alluring object.

The volumes are well illustrated—Lichfield by Mr. Holland Tringham, and Ripon by Mr. Raiton. They are handy in the pocket and desirable on the shelf.

Hints and Notes for Travellers in the Alps. By the late John Ball, F.R.S. New Edition, prepared by W. A. B. Coolidge (Longmans.)

IN this edition of the late Mr. Ball's standard guide every article has been carefully revised, and some have been practically re-written. Further, two new articles have been added: "Photography in the High Alps," by Mr. Sydney Spencer, and "Life in an Alpine Valley," by Mr. Coolidge. The last-named paper is a piece of compressed erudition, a little gem of scientific inquiry. Doubtless many climbers and tourists have yet to learn the meaning of an "Alp."

An "Alp" may be generally described as "a mountain pasture, specially fitted for pasturing cows in milk," so that cheese can be made on the spot (there are also special "Alpen" for heifers, sheep, and goats). This is the original meaning of the word, which is now frequently used also of the lofty peaks that overhang the mountain pastures. The term used in the Tyrol is "Alm," which some consider a shortened form of "Allmend" (common land), though it is probably but a mutilated form of "Alp."

The village system of the Alps and the regulations under which cows are grazed, and milk, cheese, &c., divided among the members of an Alp commune, are discussed with complete knowledge, and the whole chapter suggests that a more elaborate work on the subject from Mr. Coolidge's pen would be valuable and interesting.

Hours of Exercise in the Alps. By John Tyndall. New Edition. (Longmans.)

THIS book appeared twenty-eight years ago, ran through several editions, and has been out of print since 1873. The present reprint has been edited by Mrs. Tyndall, who has added an index. The tone of the book is genial throughout; but Prof. Tyndall carried a searching and scientific eye with him, so that adventure and observation, instruction and entertainment, go hand in hand in these pages. Perhaps the scientific mind is occasionally a little too evident, as in the sentence: "To my left was a mountain stream, making soft music by the explosion of its bubbles."

Other Guide Books.

East Country Scenery (Jarrold), by Mr. W. J. Tate, takes us to Southend, Leigh, Aldeburgh, Walberswick, Ipswich, Cambridge, Cromer, &c., and may be recommended to those who wish to gather a general idea of the pleasures of mind and eye which East Anglia can offer to the tourist. It is abundantly and prettily illustrated. In Mr. Pickwick's Kent (Marshall), by Mr. Hammond Hall, we are conducted to the scenes which are associated with Mr. Pickwick and his companions. Photographs of the various scenes are given, with the Pickwickian references beneath. Thus Dingley Dell is identified with Sandling, and Cob Tree with Manor Farm, and photographs of these places are given. Even Mr. Winkle's bedroom at the Bull is photographed: "'Winkle's bedroom is inside mine,' said Mr. Tupman"; and sure enough we see Mr. Tupman's room through the open door.

We have received from Messrs. George Philip & Sons excellent district maps, mounted on linen, of Devon, the Bristol and Bath district, and the Truro district. Messrs. Black's Guide to Harrogate and Environs has reached its eleventh edition; it includes the beautiful Bolton and Fountains Abbey districts. Where Shall We Go? issued by the same firm, has reached a fourteenth edition. It may be recommended as a handy adviser to all who are oppressed by the annual enigma. Bradshaw's Dictionary of Bathing Places, Climatic Health Resorts, &c., is for invalids, and is a mine of information about the curative qualities of air and water all over Europe.

Paterson's Guides (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier) may be strongly recommended as handbooks to separate localities in Scotland. They are well mapped and illustrated, and deal severally with Edinburgh, Glasgow, and the Clyde, the southern counties of Scotland, the Trossachs, &c.

In his Cyclists' Guide to the English Lake District (Philip & Son) Mr. Rumney offers a complete set of routes for seeing the best Lake scenery. The district covered is, roughly, a circle of a diameter of about thirty miles. Unfortunately for cyclists, their holidays usually fall in late July and in August, when, as Mr. Rumney admits, the weather is apt to be broken. The early summer is the best time for wheeling in the Cumbrian hills. The routes are carefully described, mapped, and illustrated, and the book combines with its cycling information something of the ordinary guide-book. Mr. Rumney gives good advice when he says that the cyclist should not be too tightly bound to his machine, but should "be willing to take evening strolls, and even whole days 'off' on the fells." A Pictorial and Descriptive Guide to London, 1899 (Ward, Lock & Co.), has been brought up to date in several particulars. The disappearance of Funnell's Inn from Holborn and Gosling's Bank from Fleet-street are noticed, and the alterations at the foot of Parliament-street are made in the sectional map of the district. Cassell's Guide to London has also been noticed by us before. Here we have an alphabetical arrangement, which is a good one for strangers to London. These two guide-books give no intimation that Kensington Palace is now open to the public; but we have no doubt that information on the subject will be supplied next year.

Of climbing literature there has been no great output in the past year, but Mr. T. Fisher Unwin has sent us, among other sterling topographical works, copies of several important works of this character which continue in circulation. We have already referred to Mrs. Pennell's Over the Alps on a Bicycle as a breezy and useful guide to those who intend to discard the alpenstock for the tyre. In Mr. Unwin's list we find Angelo Mosso's Life of Man on the High Alps, Sir William M. Conway's Climbing and Exploration in the Karakoram-Himalayas, Mr. E. A. Fitzgerald's Climbs in the New Zealand Alps, and Leone Sinigaglia's Climbing in the Dolomites. More recent than these is Mr. E. C. Oppenheim's New Climbs in Norway, a bright, well-illustrated account of mountaineering in the Søndmøre district, and more particularly in the little peninsula enclosed between the Novang and Sokely fjords. "It proved a perfect Elysium and a mine of virgin peaks," says Mr. Oppenheim.

In Winter.

Oh! for a day of burning noon
And a sun like a glowing ember,
Oh! for one hour of golden June,
In the heart of this chill November.

I can scarcely remember the Spring's soft breath,
Or imagine the Summer hazes:
The yellow woods are so damp with death
That I have forgotten the daisies.

Oh! to lie watching the sky again,
From a nest of hot grass and clover,
Till the stars come out like golden rain
When the lazy day is over,

And crowning the night with an aureole,
As the clouds kiss and drift asunder,
The moon floats up like a luminous soul,
And the stars grow pale for wonder.

The Wine of Nature.

"UPON world-altitudes," says Mathilde Blind, "God-intoxicated moods fill us with beatitudes."

"God-intoxicated moods." It is a little phrase that holds within its minute compass the very quintessence of the holiday spirit. You remember that Jar which the fisherman in the Arabian Nights found on the seashore? When he unsealed it there rose out of it the huge and terrific form of a Genius. A like marvel, a like mystery, and a most different rapture is contained in, and emanates from, Mathilde Blind's unstoppered words. Out of their littleness we tower to the stature of gods. We expand to the power and the satisfaction of gods. We drink of the wine of nature, draught after deep draught—the woodland wine, stored by George Meredith, when "the sun draws out of hazel leaves a smell of woodland wine"—the "dewy wine" in the musk-rose of Keats; of Browning's golden sunrise-wine, which "boils, pure gold, o'er the cloud-cup's rim." We taste of the crystal wine and the spring wine of a host of lesser distillers. And we are rapt out of ourselves, deliciously frenzied with spiritual exhilaration; drunken, dazed with excess of beauty: and that is what a holiday essentially means—a moment of forgetfulness, when care, responsibility, effort, are lost in the flood of primal joy—an "oasis in the dust and drouth of city life," as Tennyson writes; "a feel of heaven," in what were else all earth, as Pippa calls it.

That is why nearly all right invitations to the country run to the form of Rhapsodies. They are the spontaneous expression of some vivid moment; they are the exaltation that comes from the sense of abounding life. Joy is at the root of them, and the soul of laughter. They bubble up, frank, sparkling, bidding you "quit your books or surely you'll grow double," inviting you to come out and "hear the woodland linnet." Though, indeed, books are not entirely neglected by poets when they do but contemplate a day out. Browning, when he "lay on the grass and forgot the oaf over a jolly chapter of Rabelais," was evidently in holiday mood, as witness his holiday fare, "a loaf, half a cheese, and a bottle of Chablis."

Nevertheless, in the invitations to come out, books are, as a rule, explicitly or implicitly discarded. You are to feel that the open has infinitely more to give than the life within doors. The open, note, not the country; which term has been robbed by the Eighteenth Century of all its mystery and charm, and dressed up into an artificial prettiness that it may be weighed in a scale against a fashionable representation of the Town. The holiday spirit which involves the sense of the open with its infinity, its eternity, its bafflement, its satisfaction—Emerson's "pits of air" and "gulf of space"—this holiday spirit is of recent birth within us. There is fresh air in our oldest poets, but what vast tracts of "country" literature parch for a breath of the open! As we read, we long for that "draught" that Henry James invented, and that he has so painfully excluded from his later works. We weary of those forced defences of country life which reiterate that "content makes all ambrosia," and that health and virtue, as Cowper tells us in his "God made the country" passage, are less threatened in fields and groves than in "London, opulent, enlarged, and still increasing London."

John Gilpin, you remember, is Cowper's account of a holiday. But listen to the modern invitation:

Allons! whoever you are, come travel with me!
Travelling with me you find what never tires. . . .
Allons! with power, liberty, the earth, the elements,
Health, defiance, gaiety, self-esteem, curiosity. . . .

The Song of the Open Road.

The poem has infinitely more: but it has the whole spirit of holidays. It is the very rhapsody of invitation. Edward Carpenter, whose verse has a dilution both of Emerson and Whitman, cries to us:

Come up into the fragrant woods and walk with me.
The voices of the trees and the silent growing grass and waving ferns ascend.

Emerson, Whitman, and—a long way off—Carpenter: they call us to the open—to "inhale great draughts of space"—to "the exhilarated radiant life." An invitation equally modern, equally, though differently, alluring, is given by George Meredith—that divine sort of invitation which is at the same time a challenge. Is there anywhere such poignancy of mystery, such rapture of intimacy with nature—as in his Woods of Westerman?

Quick and far as colour flies
Taking the delighted eyes,
You of any well that springs
May unfold the heaven of things. . . .

But a truce to quotation! It does but mar the orb'd and perfect beauty of the whole. And these woods, enchanted beyond any Eastern tale, this place teeming with a most divine terror, lies at the core of our familiar Surrey.

Enter these enchanted woods
You who dare.

For there are conditions: you must have courage, trust, sanity, sympathy; the robust soul, as Whitman demands the robust and perfect body; but having these, . . . what delight!

Foliage lustreful around,
Shadowed leagues of slumbering sound. . . .

But read, read, and you must needs respond; and whether you refuse or accept the invitation, you cannot but thrill to its call.

If George Meredith stands at the door of the Surrey woods to usher us (warningly) in, Wordsworth has given us a permanent and most irresistible invitation to the Lake District, and Tennyson to our Eastern Counties. The translation of natural beauty into words is in itself an invitation to witness the original; and there is scarce a corner of our island that has not its host to welcome us at the feast. From Clough's Oxford Reading Party in the Western Highlands to James Thomson's Sunday at Hampstead, fervid invitations reach us for shorter or longer periods. Herrick asks us to come a-maying; and Burns to spend the lightsome days at the banks of Aberfeldy. Andrew Lang writes to us to come a-fishing—"to angle immensely for trout," as Praed has it; while Robert Bridges suggests the most supremely delightful boating parties. It is a confilction of sweet voices.

Which way, Amanda, shall we bend our course?
The choice perplexes . . .

—as the author of The Seasons remarks. And Browning asks:

O which were best, to roam or rest?
The land's lap, or the water's breast?

But he helps us by indicating a classification: he gives us the roaming and the resting holiday—that primary division into the holiday that is for tramping and the holiday that is for loafing; and we find that the poets range themselves with manifold enthusiasm into two camps in support of one or the other.

What is the modern cult of the gipsy but a realisation of the joys of tramping under the open sky? "Any stroller must be dear to the right-thinking heart," says R. L. Stevenson, who has written two of the most charming holiday books in our literature. The Romany girl is beloved by Emerson and Matthew Arnold, not to mention George Borrow, and, in another breath, Mr. Watts-Dunton. Indeed, Matthew Arnold, though you would not have expected it, has written one of the most delightful tramping poems we have. And we can hardly imagine any holiday more ideally employed than in tracking the footsteps of the Scholar-Gipsy in the country about Oxford. Where else shall we find scenes that wear so tender and pure a light; where flowers so delicate as those "pluck'd in shy fields and distant Wychwood bowers"?

The mere occupation of tramping has gathered a romance about it, and in our holidays many of us hope to taste something of the enjoyment of Kipling's Tramp Royal:

Speakin' in general, I 'ave tried 'em all,
The 'appy roads that take you o'er the world.
Speakin' in general, I've found them good
For such as cannot use one bed too long,
But must get 'euce, the same as I 'ave done,
An' go observin' matters till they die.

To "go observin' matters." There, perhaps, you have the chief charm of tramping, though to many the mere physical swing and exertion is in itself a rapture. But tramping demands strength and some measure of effort, even in its lesser, delightful forms of roaming, strolling, and sauntering; and there are many, brain-fagged and overdone, who will rather choose that "wise passiveness" which Wordsworth approves:

Think you mid all the mighty sum
Of things for ever speaking,
That nothing of itself will come
But we must still be seeking?

Carpenter, too, when he lay among the ferns, heard their voices go past him continually. Though, indeed, the Loafer Royal does not trouble about voices or knowledge. What he likes to do is to utterly lie down

And feel the sunshine throbbing on body and limb,
My drowsy brain in pleasant drunkenness swim. . . .

Or to take a better example from a poem by Mr. Riley that is a very rhapsody of loafing:

But when June comes—clear my throat
With wild honey! Rinch my hair
In the dew! and hold my coat!
Whoop out loud! and throw my hat!
June wants me, and I'm to spare!
Spread them shadders anywhere,
I'll get down and waller there,
And obliged to you at that!

But the loveliest of all the holidays in literature—the holiday most fraught with joy and with influence—was a holiday of roaming, wherein Pippa passes:

Oh, day, if I squander a wavelet of thee,
A mite of my twelve hours' treasure,
The least of thy gazes or glances . . .
Thy long, blue, solemn hours serenely flowing,
Whence earth, we feel, gets steady help and good—
Thy fitful sunshine minutes, coming, going,
As if earth turned from work in gamesome mood,
All shall be mine! . . .

And Pippa's song is our one supreme holiday song, the song of unshadowed joy, filled to the brim with nature, and with hope, and with youth:

The year's at the spring;
The day's at the morn;
Morning's at seven;
The hill-side's dew-pearled;
The lark's on the wing;
The snail's on the thorn;
God's in his heaven—
All's right with the world.

Things Seen.

The First of June.

AT four o'clock, in a dark office in a narrow London street, a little breeze came through the open window, and called me. An hour later I was striding up the grass hill that rises, raimented with buttercups, towards the Weald of Kent. Soon the woods met me. A copper beech stood out dully amid the shining green march of the vast foliage; trees decked with white blossom offered me their fragrance as I passed; across the valley clusters of gorse flashed their yellow oriflamme; rabbits scurried across my path; a pheasant whirled up on firm wing; patches of tall bluebells moved; dabchicks dived in a pond, the water like a living thing in the temperate wind; a colt kicked out its lanky legs in sheer joy of living, while the mare gazed at her offspring's odd, crimped tail; a busy woodpecker hammered at a tree, and when I paused the air palpitated with the low hum of innumerable bees. All Nature was articulate, gay, and young. Oh, it was good to be with her on the first of June! Overhead a lark twittered in the luminous blue vault, where little, feathery white clouds stood anchored. The hour was fragrant, sweet, and wholesome. It lulled the senses to an exquisite languor, like some opiate of the gods. Then the hill debouched on to a white road, winding between over-arching trees up, up, and lo! at the top a new country lay outstretched—the spacious, pleasant Weald of Kent, aglow with light, stretching through fertile pastures to the haze that hung over the horizon. The day wore on; the bees went home, the birds to nest; bats went in ghostly zigzag through the shadows, and in the quiet sky a great planet beamed mildly. Came up night, with her intricate pattern of stars, and a nightingale singing beneath them. The rest was silence, cut into by the long-drawn screech of an owl. Then sleep in the solemn stillness of the uttermost country—and waking to a new day. So simple!

Trooping the Colour.

WHAT a spectacle! From one window I see a great stretch of shimmering water, punctuated by a rock on which two pelicans stand like statues; beyond, a forest of trees swaying to the near horizon, where houses peep through the greenery; and this is London, the heart of London! I turn to the other window. Suddenly the National Anthem lifts the hats from the dim crowd that sways beneath. Below me is the great, gravelled, water-sprinkled Horse Guards' Parade. Round the square, rigid, immovable as pawns, loom troops—the frame of the picture—guarding the Parade from intrusion. Down one side, in double rank, stand in fine array other of the Guards. At the far end, three spots in the great expanse of ground, are three soldiers, and he in the middle holds the Colour. Suddenly a roar of cheering. Enter the Headquarters Staff—princes, field-m Marshals, officers, and dukes—their plumes waving, their horses pricking delicately over the gravel. Round the ranks of soldiers, in and out, front and rear, march the staff, while the men stand like statues. Then to the brave music of the massed bands the escort for the Colour detach themselves from their comrades and march up the Parade ground. Near the Colour they halt. A lone soldier steps round the escort and advances to the Colour. He salutes. Gravely the Colour is handed to him. He bears it back to his officer. The officer salutes the Colour, receives it, and holds it aloft before the escort. They salute. The band plays "The British Grenadiers." Then follows—but what is this? There is a quick movement in the crowd below, and outside the square of pawn soldiers an undersized, hatless man runs like a hare through the people. A roar of anger follows him, and as he runs the happy crowd (it is June and holiday time) catch at him, tearing his clothes. He runs through them and out again—this breathless, hunted creature. It is one man against the world, while the band plays the "Highland Laddie" march. Then he stumbles, and a policeman grabs him. He is surrounded. Other policemen pounce on him; two more on horseback encompass him. He disappears from life. The incident is over. The show proceeds. The massed bands crash their music into the still air; the people cheer; the officers stand immovable, with drawn swords pointed at nothing; the drum-majors swagger at the head of their bands; the Princess beams from her balcony; the sun shimmers on armour; the plumes of the field-majors wave; but the thing that drums in my brain and haunts my eyes as I return through the radiant streets is the sight of that hunted creature running for freedom. One wretched man against the world, who came to thieve and failed!

Memoirs of the Moment.

THERE are to be changes at Burlington House. The Council of the Royal Academy has decided to enlarge the borders of its galleries. Plans are being considered for the opening-out of a new sculpture gallery, and for the reinclusion of the room devoted of late years to the clay, the bronze, and the marble, in the suite of apartments devoted to paintings. Any attempt on the part of the Royal Academicians to effect reforms will command sympathy; but it must be said, in common candour, that these are changes which are not for the better. Does the instructed art-loving public of England believe that the present premises of the Royal Academy are too small? On the contrary, does not the futility of the greater part of the pictures hung year by year in its exhibitions produce in the minds of many beholders a feeling of indignant despair? The twenty pictures that are fit to be seen have to be searched out from among twelve hundred that are unfit. That is a process of unnatural selection that is tiresome: it inflicts "Academy headaches," and vitiates the faculty of seeing.

UNDER these circumstances, the Council of the Academy would surely do better if they closed old rooms rather than opened new ones; or, at least, made a more judicious weeding of the works offered for their acceptance, and kept a single line of the most meritorious works instead of offering a gaudy patchwork of closely and incongruously packed canvases. That is an old and obvious remedy, which we are weary of repeating. The reply is ready, and it is this—that the bad artist likes his works to have a place in the Academy catalogue, however ill-hung his picture may be; and that the public likes quantity, not quality, in art. Well, it may be so. The ways of the public are difficult to fathom; and ugly facts come to attest to the futility of fastidious fancy. There is a greater proportion of worthless pictures at Burlington House this season than in any shows of recent years; and of this fact the readers of newspaper criticism have been fully informed. And with what effect? Only this—that up to this week the record of Academy attendances has been broken, and that the turnstile has revolved more continuously through the May of 1899 than it did during the May of any previous year.

MR. J. W. WATERHOUSE, R.A., is about to become a dweller in St. John's Wood, where he has taken the studio of the late Harry Bates. The artists' colony under Primrose Hill will feel the withdrawal of the oldest and most conspicuous of its residents; but Mr. Waterhouse vastly improves his quarters by his flitting, and he will be able to finish, with new facilities, for next year's Academy exhibition the big subject-picture which Burlington House this year does so ill without.

A MEASURE of ill-luck has of late attached to the historic title of Shaftesbury—a title to which "the good Lord's" services as a philanthropist ought, one imagines, to have drawn down almost visibly the blessing of heaven. Perhaps the present bearer of the title thinks it has been so drawn down since his engagement to Lady Constance Grosvenor was announced. The future Lady Shaftesbury will certainly bring new honour to her husband's name. Inheriting from her mother, Lady Grosvenor, a love of the poor and a loyalty to public and private duty, and having caught from her stepfather, Mr. George Wyndham, M.P., a zeal for art and for letters, she combines in herself interests and qualities not often found in collusion. She is as good a horsewoman as she is an intelligent reader of books, and her social sympathies, as is proper to her time, are wider than those, for instance, of "the good Lord Shaftesbury," who, all philanthropic as he was, frankly complained that Peel, by not favouring Factory Act legislation, threw him into contact with Bright—a contact, he said, very distasteful to a gentleman!

MR. GEORGE MEREDITH will contribute a poem to an early number of the Cornhill Magazine—in the pages of which was first published The Adventures of Harry Richmond, with Du Maurier's drawings. That was nearly thirty years ago. A decade later was published in the Cornhill the lines "To a Friend Recently Lost"—the friend in question being Mr. Tom Taylor. Yet another piece has appeared in the same magazine—"The Song of Theodolinda."

SOME of the newspapers speak about Sir Alma Tadema, but only at the sacrifice of the hyphen, which the artist has always used. In fact, he took the name of Alma not merely to soften the sound of Tadema, but to get an early place in catalogues among the A's instead of among the T's. People, therefore, must speak of Sir Lawrence, and not of Sir Alma. The knighthood was very much the artist's due; but the formal offer of it was owing to a suggestion made by the Princess Louise, who greatly admires his work, and has given her friendship to his daughter.

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND, the most able and enlightened member of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy of America, is to arrive in London in ten days' time; and Sir Wilfrid Lawson ought to know it. Cardinal Manning was a teetotaler, and took all his purple dignities with him to Clerkenwell Green, where he stood on a costermonger's cart to address a crowd—the most curious eminence ever occupied by a Prince of the Church. But Archbishop Ireland is a teetotaler and something more. He eloquently advocates not only the renunciation of the habit of drinking stimulants, but also the total abolition of the drink traffic.

Correspondence.

The Real Landor.

SIR,—In a notice of Letters of Walter Savage Landor (Duckworth & Co.), your reviewer complained that the injudicious editor—myself—had carefully left out whatever would exhibit Landor in his less placid mood. In a subsequent article, on "Landor and Dickens," the ACADEMY repeats the charge, and adds that it has been admitted. To prevent further misapprehension, I beg leave to say that it has not been admitted, and, what is more, that it does not happen to be true. As I have read the letters in the original—while your reviewer, I presume, has not—I may perhaps be thought to know more of the matter than he can.—I am, &c.,

STEPHEN WHEELER.

Oriental Club, Hanover Square, W.: June 5, 1899.

Shakespeare's Handwriting.

SIR,—The facsimile of what may possibly be Shakespeare's MS., which appears in the current issue of the ACADEMY, calls to mind the suggestion which Tennyson made to the New Shakspere Society for the publication of some facsimiles of Elizabethan and Jacobite handwritings, with the special object of showing what letters would be most easily mistaken by the printers. I do not know how far the Society gave effect to this suggestion, but there can be no two opinions as to its importance.

One of the more obvious points in relation to this subject is the fact that the letter "e" in the handwriting of the time was liable to be mistaken for "o" and "a," and vice versa. We probably have an instance of such a mistake in "Antony and Cleopatra," l. i. 47, where North's Plutarch confirms the correction, "Without some pleasure new," for "Without some pleasure now" of the Folio; and many similar instances might be adduced.

A reference to the few undoubted specimens we have of the poet's signature will carry us a great deal farther, for a cursory glance at once shows us that the letter "p" was liable to be confused with almost any tailed letter, and that non-final "s" and "f" were easily interchangeable. To apply this let us turn to "Romeo and Juliet," III. v. 150-156, where the Folio reads:

How now? Chopt Logicke? what is this?
Proud, and I thanke you: and I thanke you not.
Thanke me no thankings, nor prond me no pronds,
But fettle your fine joints 'gainst Thursday next,
To go with Paris to Saint Peters church:
Or I will drag thee, on a Hurdle thither.

Now, if it should be found that "j" was written with a tail, and if we bear in mind what we have gathered from Shakespeare's signatures, and also the fact that "fettle" only appears to have been used reflexively or intransitively, it may perhaps seem legitimate to entertain the view that the poet possibly wrote, not "fettle your fine joints," but "settle your fine points," which would be peculiarly in keeping with "Chopt Logicke," and with the spirit of the context.

The consideration of what may be called the "ductus scriptarum literarum" in connexion with Shakespeare's text seems hardly to have received the attention it deserves, and I am convinced that the thorough treatment of the subject in accordance with Tennyson's admirable suggestion would lead to many remarkable results.—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 35.

LAST week we printed the first half of an original sonnet on Her Majesty the Queen, and asked for its completion, the prize being offered to the competitor who came nearest to the sense of the author's own version. This is the sonnet complete:

VICTORIA.

"Queenly as woman, womanly as Queen,"
Though foreign were the lips that spake this praise,
Englishmen gladly may accept a phrase
So fit to keep their monarch's memory green.
For 'mid the stress these many years have seen,
Nights of affliction and unquiet days,
This Lady, meeting all with level gaze,
Queenly and womanly has ever been.

Yes, though beneath her sway the realm has spread,
Though gloriously we dominate the wave,
And Britain's flag is honoured everywhere,
This is her crowning pride when all is said:
*'T have been as mother fond, as widow brave,
As Queen and woman great beyond compare.*

The nearest version (and it is quite curiously close) is that contributed by Miss L. S. Gibson, 3, Church Street, Reigate:

VICTORIA.

"Queenly as woman, womanly as Queen,"
Though foreign were the lips which voiced that praise,
Englishmen gladly make their own a phrase
So fit to keep their monarch's memory green.
For 'mid the stress these eighty years have seen,
Nights of affliction and long, lonely days,
This Lady, meeting all that clouds life's ways,
Queenly and womanly throughout hath been.
Yes, though beneath her sway God gives us fame,
Though gloriously we dominate in strife,
And Britain's flag is honoured far and near,
This is her crowning pride, her noblest name
*'T have been as mother, daughter, friend, and wife,
As Queen and woman, tender, true, most dear.*

Among the others are:

Queenly as woman, womanly as Queen.
Though foreign were her race in other days,
Englishmen gladly may entwine the bays,
So fit to keep their monarch's memory green.
For 'mid the stress these eighty years have seen,
Nights of affliction and long, weary days,
This Lady, meeting all with steadfast gaze,
Queenly and womanly has ever been.
Yes, though beneath her sway lie empires vast,
Though gloriously we dare in East and West,
And Britain's flag is honoured far and near,
This is her crowning pride, which yet shall last:
*'T have been as mother in her children blest,
As Queen and woman in her life sincere.*

[J. H. S., Liverpool.]

Queenly as woman, womanly as Queen.
Though foreign were her ancestors, she's ours!
Englishmen gladly magnify her powers,
So fit to keep their monarchy serene.
For 'mid the stress these sixty years have known,
Nights of affliction, anguish, terror, tears,
This Lady, meeting all that quelled all fears,
Queenly and womanly has aye been known.

Yes, though beneath her rule we dwell in peace,
Though gloriously we dare all things we will,
And Britain's flag is honoured 'neath the sun,
This is her crowning pride, that shall not cease:
*'T have been as mother, our example still;
As Queen and woman both—that glory one!*

[T. C., Buxted.]

Queenly as woman, woman passing sweet;
Though foreign were her noble sires, I ween,
Englishmen gladly mark their grey-haired Queen
So fit to keep their monarch's mighty seat.
For 'mid the stress these years of frost and heat,
Nights of affliction, and with sleepless e'en,
This Lady, meeting all with brow serene,
Queenly and womanly drives through the street.
Yes, though beneath her "Prince" rests on his bier,
Though gloriously we do and greatly dare,
And Britain's flag is honoured far and near,
This is her crowning pride, our monarch dear:
*'T have been as mother gentle, loving, fair;
As Queen and woman noble and sincere.*

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

Competition No. 36.

We offer this week a prize of a guinea to the competitor who sends what seems to us the best list of the five living authors who are most underrated.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, June 13. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the second column of p. 644 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

LIGHT FROM THE EAST; OR, THE WITNESS OF THE MONUMENTS.

By the Rev. C. J. BALL, M.A.,

Member of the Council of Biblical Archaeology.

This comprehensive work furnishes the chief results of recent Oriental research and discovery. It brings together for the first time, within the compass of a handy volume, a large number of cuneiform and other texts and translations, also accurate reproductions of hundreds of Babylonian, Egyptian, Assyrian, North Syrian, and Phœnician antiquities. Translations of ancient texts made specially for this work contain many suggestive references to the Old Testament.

The Illustrations are chiefly photographic from the Monuments themselves; the exceptions are Drawings by Mr. W. H. Rylands, F.S.A., Secretary to the Society of Biblical Archaeology.

Demy 8vo, 124 pp., price 3s. 6d.

THE STUDENT'S DEUTERONOMY.

A Corrected Translation, with Notes and with References in full to the Preceding and Later Texts.

By the Rev. Canon GIRDLESTONE, M.A.,

Late Principal of Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, and formerly Head of the Translation Department of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

The object of the Work is to make the Translation more accurate and less cumbersome; to call attention to the Notes to certain linguistic, legislative, and archaeological peculiarities in the text; and to illustrate the Speeches by two sets of References—(a) passages in the four previous Books of the Bible to which the Speaker refers, or of which he makes use, and (b) passages in the later Books of the Bible which refer to the Speeches. Upwards of 200 of the former texts, and 300 of the latter, are printed in full on a specially wide margin.

A THIN COCOA.

EPPS'S

The choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely-flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, or which it is now with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system.
Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—JAMES

EUGENIE, EMPRESS of the FRENCH. By Clara Tschudi, Author of "Marie Antoinette." "We can honestly praise this book, but with the reserve that its appearance should have been postponed. The very completeness of its account of this Empress, the impartial judgment which it passes on her character and actions, the unshakable fidelity to truth with which it sets forth her errors and her weaknesses, are so many reasons for delay. For indeed these things make the greater impression on account of the genuine admiration expressed for her high qualities."—SPECTATOR.

IMPORTANT NEW NOVEL.

LOVE the PLAYER. By Helen V. Savile. 6s.

"Apart altogether from the tragic plot, there is much to admire in this novel. The scenes of Irish life are vividly sketched. The matter of the story is to be commended, so also is the manner. The language is clear and well chosen. Mrs. Savile has produced a well-imagined, consistent, and impressive novel, which will be widely read and with keen appreciation."—MORNING POST.

"The plot is boldly conceived, and the author develops it with skill and strength. The leading character in particular impresses one as a careful study of that worse of furies—a woman scorned."—SCOTSMAN. "The book pens strongly, the first chapter introduces us to a gambling scene at Monte Carlo, the financial ruin of a husband and wife and a suicide, and Mr. Eldridge has revealed an unsuspected power; he can write comedy."—ADVERTISER.

SECOND IMPRESSION OF MR. EDWARD CARPENTER'S NEW BOOK.

ANGELS' WINGS: a Series of Essays on Art and its Relation to Life. With 9 Full-Page Plates, square crown 8vo, elegantly bound, 6s. "In a very marked way Mr. Carpenter stands pre-eminently alone in England to-day. As a critic of life and art he is at once the sturdiest and boldest. It is not the criticism of intellect alone; it is a vigorous personality that projects itself into his work. The one message he is determined may be summed up in the phrase he has singularly made his own, 'To thine own self be true.'"—NEW AGE.

HISTORY of SOUTH AMERICA. Translated from the Spanish by ADNAH B. JONES. 2 Coloured Maps. 10s. 6d. "Accurate and readable. So far as we are aware, we have no completed English work covering the ground occupied. Reading it is, in some respects, like African travel. We come upon cities that have been important, and upon traces of ancient civilisations that move our amazement, and then pass into Saharas practically uninhabited. What is most to be admired is the vigour and impartiality with which our author lashes the Spaniards, and shows their cruelty and treachery in their dealings with the natives. The French come in also for censure, and are ourselves are not spared."—NOTES and QUERIES.

The Literary Week.

LORD ROSEBERRY'S occasional speeches on literary and social subjects are so wise and witty that we are very glad to note that next week will see the publication of a collection of them. The title of the volume will be Appreciations and Addresses, and among the contents will be "Burke," "Burns," "Stevenson," "Gladstone," "Bookishness and Statesmanship," "Scottish History," "Golf," "Eton," "The Happy Town Councillor," "London," "The Work of Public Libraries." Mr. John Lane will publish the book.

THE literary contents of the first number of the new quarterly, The Anglo-Saxon, will be as follows:

Introductory, by Lady Randolph Churchill.
Note on the Binding of the Volume, by Cyril Davenport.
Stories by Henry James and Gilbert Parker.
Notes on the Portraits, by Lionel Cust.
A Poem, by A. C. Swinburne.
A Poetical Drama, by John Oliver Hobbes.
An Essay, by Lord Rosebery.
Articles by Prof. Oliver Lodge and Slatin Pasha.
Essays by E. V. B., C. E. Raimond, and Whitelaw Reid.
Letters of Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire.

Lord Rosebery's essay, we understand, is of a political-biographical nature.

WE have received a long letter from a correspondent who, while confessing that he sails under Mr. W. B. Yeats's colours himself, objects to any comparison between writers so dissimilar as his hero and Mr. Kipling. We cannot print his letter, but there is room for the confession of faith with which it ends: "Give me Mr. Yeats's new treatment of the old forms of poesy—the sun, the moon, and the stars, the day and the night, and his impossible mystical women. Give me these, and you may send the whole fleet of Mr. Kipling's ironclads to the bottom; spike all his guns and dip his colours—his eternal Union Jack."

INDEED, our own letter bag and other indications give unhappy proof that the publication of so much Kiplingana has caused a reaction in his disfavour. Even the Times cannot record his departure for England this week without stating that he was wearing a "close-buttoned overcoat." What should a convalescent wear when starting on a voyage? The Union Jack? And Mr. Doubleday, we notice, now identifies himself with the Kipling family and speaks of them as "we"—"We go immediately to Rottingdean."

THE critical work on Ibsen, by Dr. George Brandes, which Mr. Heinemann has just published, is a book of a new kind; for Dr. Brandes, who has been studying Ibsen for many years, here brings together three distinct essays on the dramatist-poet, written each at intervals of sixteen years. We thus see, as Mr. William Archer says in his introduction, the progress of two remarkable minds side by side: "not a focussed appreciation of the whole of Ibsen and the whole of Brandes, but a contemporaneously-noted record of the ever-developing relations, throughout more than thirty years," of the two men. Dr. Brandes' final opinion of Ibsen is perhaps the most favourable, wherein he differs from Nietzsche, whose return visit to the case of Wagner resulted in the retraction of most of his early praise; and Mr. Swinburne, who, many years after a glowing eulogy of Walt Whitman, wrote a recantation entitled "Whitmania."

THE Ibsen revealed by Dr. Brandes is a far completer figure than it is customary to think of: an all-round humorous, laughing critic of mankind. Turning the pages at random, we come upon this full-blooded passage:

On another occasion, I think it was in 1874, Ibsen was loud in his praises of Russia. "A splendid country!" he said with a smile; "think of all the grand oppression they have!"

"How do you mean?"

"Only think of all the glorious love of liberty it engenders. Russia is one of the few countries in the world where men still love liberty and make sacrifices for it. That is why she holds so high a place in poetry and art. Remember that they own a writer like Turgueneff; and they have Turgueneffs among their painters too, only we don't know them; but I have seen their pictures in Vienna."

"If all these good things come of oppression," I said, "we are bound to praise it. But the knout—are you an admirer of that too? Suppose you were a Russian, should your little boy there," pointing to his half-grown son, "have the knout?" Ibsen sat silent for a moment, with an inscrutable expression, and then answered, laughing, "He shouldn't get the knout; he should give it."

MR. HENLEY, who is (we are glad to say better and again working) in his new quarters at Worthing, begins his Pall Mall Magazine articles in the July number with a commentary on the Hundred Best Books. In the August number he will discourse on the Gadshill edition of Dickens.

THE thing that struck one at the sale, on Tuesday, of Mr. William Wright's collection of editions and relics of Dickens was the extraordinary grip which Dickens keeps on the affections of the English-speaking races. The buyers really represented those races; and in the heartiness and inhesitancy of the bidding one heard a ratification from far and near of the praise and homage long ago rendered to the master. It was splendid to see the prices go up and up. The little comic burlesque by "Boz," called The Strange Gentleman, with the frontispiece by Phiz, and with Phiz's original drawing thereof inserted—the whole looking but a slim grey pamphlet—at once commanded a bid of twenty-one guineas. Only at eighty guineas did the hammer fall. A copy of Pickwick in the original parts, each part inscribed by Dickens to Mrs. Mary Hogarth, fetched £105; a first edition of Oliver Twist, presented to Serjeant Talfourd, £50; a first edition of Nicholas Nickleby, with an autograph letter, £69. A great moment arrived when the original MS. of The Battle of Life was put up. Bidding began at £205, and within two minutes Mr. Sabin became the purchaser for £400. Forster's Life of Dickens, wondrously extra-illustrated, sold for £500. The day's sale produced over £4,000.

SCANDINAVIA'S contribution to the world's store of morbid literature is increased this week by a translation of

HUNGER

COVER DESIGN, BY W. T. HORTON.

by a translation of Knut Hamsun's Sult, under the English title Hunger. We give a reproduction of its cheerful cover. Hamsun is a young Norwegian, a self-taught son of the people, with a profound contempt for everything that is not of æsthetic value. According to "George Egerton," the translator of Sult, he has "produced an absolutely new note in his native language, established a new scale of word values." After Sult he wrote Mysterier, Pan, Redaktör Lyngre, Njord, and Siesta, and has also composed three plays dealing with the life and development of one man. In Sult hunger material and hunger spiritual both have a place.

MARK TWAIN, who is just now undergoing a rigorous course of hospitality from some of the writing clubs of London, has come to a state of mind with regard to compliments which is very refreshing. The ordinary mock modesty and affected confusion displayed by the recipient of praise or flattery is one of the blots on complimentary dinners. Mark Twain will have none of it. It did not embarrass him, he said at the Authors' Club, to hear his works praised. "It only pleased and delighted him. He had not gone past the age when embarrassment was possible, it was true enough, but he had reached the age when he knew how to conceal it. It was a satisfaction to him to hear Sir Walter Besant—who was much more competent than himself to judge of his work—deliver a judgment which was such a contentment to his spirit. Well, he had thought well of the books himself; but he thought more of them now. He should not discount these praises in any possible way. When he reported them to his family they would lose nothing." And so forth. When the time comes to sum up Mark Twain, it will be found that his humour is largely frankness fortified by good sense—a very rare blend.

MR. F. P. DUNNE, the author of Mr. Dooley, has arranged to write a series of articles on English life to appear periodically in this country as well as in America. In an interview with a Chronicle representative Mr. Dunne told the story of the evening paper in which Mr. Dooley first made his appearance—an ill-fated sheet which the gods loved. One day, just before the end, a funeral passed the office with a band playing the "Dead March" in Saul. The editor and Mr. Dunne watched it with emotion and fear. "Can it be," they whispered, "our subscriber?"

FRIENDS of the late Gleeson White will be pleased to hear that a pension for life of £35 per annum has been awarded from the Civil List Fund to his widow, in consideration of his services to the cause of applied and industrial art.

A CORRESPONDENT, W. L. D., suggests that the suppressed "Choate Jest Book," to which we referred last week, will be remembered by bibliographers as the "Inchoate Jest Book."

A CLUB to be called "The Oxford and Cambridge Musical Club," is being formed in London for the purpose of encouraging the practice and knowledge of chamber music, both vocal and instrumental, among its members. It is proposed to secure suitable premises in as central a position as possible. The club is under the presidency of Dr. Joachim, and the provisional secretaries are Mr. H. M. Abel (Oxon. Sec.), 10, King's Bench-walk, Temple, E.C.; and Mr. W. B. Knobel (Camb. Sec.), 32, Tavistock-square, W.C.

THE volume which Messrs. Black have published in connexion with the Commemoration of the Thousandth Anniversary of the death of Alfred the Great takes the form of a causerie by several well-known historians, brought together by an ex-Mayor of Winchester, Mr. Alfred Bowker. The Poet-Laureate, himself an Alfred, contributes a poem, from which we take these stanzas:

Some lights there be within the Heavenly Spheres
Yet unrevealed, the interspace so vast;
So through the distance of a thousand years
Alfred's full radiance shines on us at last.

Star of the spotless fame, from far-off skies
Teaching this truth, too long not understood,
That only they are worthy who are wise,
And none are truly great that are not good.

The other contributors are Sir Walter Besant, who, unmindful of Mr. Austin's poem, applies Tennyson to the Saxon king:

Wearing the white flower of a blameless life;

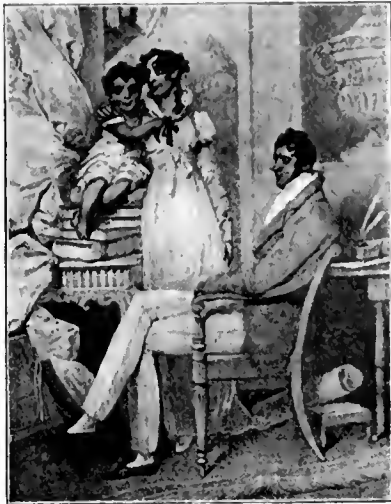

Mr. Frederic Harrison, on Alfred as king; the Bishop of Bristol, on Alfred as religious man and educator; Mr. Charles Oman, on Alfred as warrior; Sir Clements Markham, on Alfred as geographer; Prof. Earle, on Alfred as writer; Sir Frederick Pollock, on Alfred's law; and the Rev. W. J. Loftie, on Alfred and the arts. There seems to have been room for an article by Mrs. Beeton on Alfred as a cook, but it is not included.

MESSRS. BLACK, with business-like instinct, include in their Alfred volume a leaflet containing the biographies of the various contributors from their other publication, Who's Who. A collation of the recreations shows us that when their duties in connexion with the Thousandth Anniversary of Alfred the Great were over the gentlemen turned respectively to riding, gardening, fishing, looking on, boating, travelling, walking in mountains, searching for unrestored churches, making topographical researches, collecting coins, playing Kriegspiel, cycling and fencing. The only contributor who declined amusement was the Bishop of Bristol, who has no recreations.

MR. F. C. BURNAND sends us the following letter of advice apropos our article on holidays for literary men: "Make short sea trips, giving three or four days to each trip. Up one side of England, canal through Scotland, down the other side of England, and back to starting point. 'Trip it lightly' to Ostend, thence to Bruges. To Dunkirk and Rosendael, to Calais and the parts there about, to Boulogne, Paris-Plage, up to Montreuil and back again. Take no journey for which more than a portable bag—portable by someone paid for the purpose—is essential; and, best of all for those who would entirely shake off responsibility, and would obtain the maximum of pleasure with the minimum of cost, get a friend owning a hundred and seventy ton yacht, 'well found,' to take you for a clear month's cruise. If the owner himself won't, or can't, accompany you, suggest to him that he shall place the yacht, crew, and 'rations' included at your disposal, and then, with one or two 'jolly companions,' just go wherever you like. If you're an indifferent sailor, induce a friend owning a four-in-hand to take you on a driving tour through the Midland counties, putting up at the best hotels en route. The above are simple, economical methods, and highly recommended to those whom Providence has not blessed with affluence."

IN the Introduction to the last volume of the Biographical Thackeray is given the interesting family portrait which we reproduce. Says Mrs. Ritchie: "Long before RICHMOND THACKERAY, HIS WIFE, AND CHILD (W. M. THACKERAY AT THREE YEARS OF AGE).

Drawn by Chennery in 1814.

Raphael's wondrous art was known this particular composition was a favourite with artists and spectators, as I think it will ever be from generation to generation, while mothers continue to clasp their little ones in their arms. This special group of Thackerays is almost the only glimpse we have of my father's earliest childhood; but it gives a vivid, pleasing impression of that first home which lasted so short a time. My long, lean young grandfather sits at such ease as people allowed themselves in those classic days, propped in a stiff chair with tight white ducks and pumps, and with a kind, grave face. He was at that time collector of the district called the 24 Pegginnahs." Thackeray would take off his spectacles when he looked at this old water-colour. "It is a pretty drawing," he used to say, but he added that if his father in the picture had risen from the chair in which he sat, he would have been above nine feet high.

UNDER the title Literary Ideals in Ireland a number of articles by various writers have been brought together, with the purpose, we presume, of informing general readers of the meaning of the present Irish literary revival. To these essays we shall return; but, meanwhile, we may remark that the general reader is certainly in need of accurate information concerning the difference between Irish poetry and English poetry. To the ordinary mind an Irish poem is an English poem over which the words "wind" and "stars" have been shaken from a pepper-caster.

THE "Modern English Writers" series, which Messrs. Blackwood & Sons have projected, begins publication this week with Prof. Saintsbury's Matthew Arnold. An interesting analogy drawn by the great critic's critic is worth detaching. With regard to Arnold's essay on Gray in Mr. Humphry Ward's English Poets, Prof. Saintsbury says:

The resemblances between subject and critic were extraordinary. Mr. Arnold is really an industrious, sociable, and moderately cheerful Gray of the nineteenth century; Gray an indolent, reclusive, more melancholy Arnold of the eighteenth. Again, the literary quality of the bard of the Elegy was exactly of the kind which stimulates critics most. From Sainte-Beuve downwards the fraternity has, justly or unjustly, been accused of a tendency to extol writers who are a little problematical, who approach the second class, above the unquestioned masters. And there was the yet further stimulus of redressing wrongs. Gray, though a most scholarly poet, has always pleased the vulgar rather than the critics, and he had the singular fate of being dispraised both by Johnson and by Wordsworth. But in this paper of Mr. Arnold's the wheel came full circle. Everything that can possibly be said for Gray—more than some of us would by any means indorse—is here said for him: here he has provided an everlasting critical harbour, into which he may retreat whenever the popular or the critical breeze turns adverse.

At the end of the volume of Jowett's Letters which have just been published by Mr. Murray, we find a few pages of detached sayings. These, who can doubt, represent the real Jowett:

The Beginning of Genesis.

I am afraid mankind must contrive to do without a first parent.

The Limit of Scepticism.

There must come a reaction towards religion again: the void will be too great.

English Composition.

If I were a Professor of English I would teach my men that prose writing is a kind of poetry.

Luxury and Plain Living.

You ought not to say "What waste!" when you see a gorgeous dinner. You should rather say, "How much better this is than what I get at home!"

Youth and Age.

I hope our young men will not grow into such dodgers as these old men are. I believe everything a young man says to me.

DR. EDWARD EVERETT HALE's work, James Russell Lowell and His Friends, with which we shall deal at length in a future number, helps to amplify the portrait of a good man and fine critic. Many very interesting remarks of Lowell's are quoted, among them one more contribution to the long list of testimonies to a belief in immortality which have been expressed by great minds:

I don't care where the notion of immortality came from. . . . It is there, and I mean to hold it fast. Suppose we don't know. How much do we know, after all? . . . The last time I was ill, I lost all consciousness of my flesh. I was dispersed through space in some inconceivable fashion and mixed with the Milky Way. . . . Yet the very fact that I had a confused consciousness all the while of the Milky Way as something to be mingled with, proved that I was there as much an individual as ever.

There is something in the flesh that is superior to the flesh, something that can in finer moments abolish matter and pain. And it is to this we must cling. . . .

. . . I think the evolutionists will have to make a fetish of their protoplasm before long. Such a mush seems to me a poor substitute for the rock of ages, by which I understand a certain set of higher instincts which mankind have found solid under all weathers.

A NEW paper to forward the cause of the Finnish people has just been started in London, under the editorship of Mr. C. Harold Perrott, B.A. The price is threepence, and publication will be irregular. The first number, which is printed and prepared with unusual care and taste, provides the reader with a clear account of the case for Finland as it now stands.

THE fire at the celebrated American bookstore known as "McClurg's" has temporarily, at any rate, broken up the little company of book lovers who were wont to meet there. The old "Saints' and Sinners' Corner," as their gathering point was called, has, however, been immortalised in some verses by Mr. J. H. Finley, the president of Knox College and a very facile rhymester. We quote the opening stanzas:

Beyond the dread river and hard by the lake
That burneth with brimstone and fire,
There standeth an edifice built for the sake
Of mortals of bookish desire.

'Tis not in high heaven, this book-hunter's haunt,
Nor lies it in Satan's domains,
But midway between them—a moderate jaunt
By slow purgatorial trains.

Here "sinners" and "saints," too, are wont to repair,
When stints for the morning are o'er,
Their bibliognostical notes to compare
And over their treasures to pore.

Queer bibliomaniac spirits are some;
Some miserly bibliotaphs;
Some bibliopoles with a golden thumb;
Some near-sighted bibliographs.

And here through the long labyrinthian aisles,
That open on book-scented bowers,
There wander, abstracted, these bibliophiles
As bees 'mid Hyettus's flowers.

Then follows an account of the fire. If there is ever a new edition of Mr. Lang and Prof. Brander Matthews's Ballads of Books the whole poem should be included.

Bibliographical.

MARK TWAIN'S visit to London, and hearty reception there, turns one's thoughts back to the days when his name first became familiar in our midst. It is not easy to give a date to those days. Apparently the humorist was first represented, in book form, in England by a little collection of sketches headed by "The Celebrated Jumping Frog," in 1867. Then, three years later, came The New Pilgrim's Progress and Innocents Abroad. In 1871 we had from him Screamers, Eye-Openers, a Burlesque Autobiography, and A Pleasure-Trip on the Continent—all through the initiative of the late Mr. J. C. Hotten, and therefore, I should fancy, not authorised by the author. These and other things of Twain's appear to have been collected by Hotten in 1873, and called Choice Humorous Works. MESSRS. Chatto published the Choice Works in 1874, and then we had in 1876 Tom Sawyer, and in 1880 Tramps Abroad, and so forth. Has there been any uniform edition in England of Mark Twain's writings? If so, I am not acquainted with it; and if not, I may add, the sooner we get it the better.

Somehow the name of Mark Twain recalls that of Charles Dudley Warner, perhaps because the two men wrote The Gilded Age together. I see a new novel by Mr. Warner is shortly to be placed in our hands. As a novelist, I should say, he is not particularly well-known in this country, though one of his stories was published here in 1889 and another four or five years ago. I fancy the last book of his circulated among us was The People for Whom Shakespeare Wrote. The first, if I remember rightly, was My Summer in a Garden (in 1871). After this we had Back Log Studies, and Mummies and Moslems, and A Roundabout Journey, and Their Pilgrimage, and so on. A pleasant little book of essays was As We Were Saying (1891), through which a gentle humour ran. But the Summer in a Garden was what first captured the English reader, and it is by that, I suspect, that Mr. Warner will always be most agreeably remembered.

An "elaborate" annotated edition of Macaulay's Essays—that is among the things that the reading world is promised. Can it be that there is to be a revival of interest in Macaulay, at whom the epithets of "shallow," "inaccurate," "rhetorical" have so long been hurled? It is now fifty-six years since the "Essays" were first collected from the Edinburgh's pages and issued in three volumes. In 1850 they were issued in one volume, in 1853 in three, in 1854 in two, and in 1872 in one again. A collection of Reviews and Essays appeared in 1875. Later popular editions are those of 1887, 1889 (in the "Minerva Library"), and 1891 (among Sir J. Lubbock's "Hundred"). Foreigners thought highly of the Essays, and they were translated into Italian (1859-1866), French (1862-4), and Spanish (1880). Some of the Essays have been published separately or in little groups over and over again. Never was anything of the kind more calculated for wide popularity; and, after all, they have an historic, if not always a permanent, interest—a fact which keeps them on the library shelves.

Now that we are to have a complete edition of the poems of R. S. Hawker, it may be interesting to note the details of their original, separate publication. They seem to have come in this order: Pompeii (1827), Records of the Western Shore (1832), Poems (including a second series of Records, 1836), Welcome to Prince Albert (1840), Ecclesia (1840), Echoes from Old Cornwall (1846), The Quest of the Sangraal (privately printed, 1864), and Cornish Ballads (including the Sangraal, 1869). Of course it is not forgotten that Mr. J. G. Godwin edited a collection of Hawker's Poetical Works in 1879, and that the same editor did the same kind of office for the Prose Works five or six years since.

Announcement is made of a new edition of Ulick Ralph Burke's History of Spain from the Earliest Times to the Death of Ferdinand, to be supervised by Mr. Martin Hume, who has himself just written an account of Modern Spain for a popular "Library." Burke, in his turn, edited three years ago The Bible in Spain, and many remember his useful collection of proverbs from Don Quixote, and his historical monograph on The Great Captain. The titles of his novels—Couleur de Rose and Beating the Air—are also remembered, if nothing else is recollected.

Another welcome reprint—that of the sonnets of Mary, Queen of Scots. These appear to have been first printed in England in 1790. There was a collection of her "love-sonnets" in 1824, and of her Poems in French in 1873.

We are to have a new book—Saints' Stories for Children—from Miss Francesca Alexander, one of whose greatest titles to honour, so far, is that she has published her books directly under the ægis of Mr. Ruskin. First came the Story of Ida, in 1883; then Roadside Songs of Tuscany, about fifteen years ago; then Christ's Folk in the Apennines (1886-7). Presumably the new book will not have the advantage of Mr. Ruskin's assistance.

It is rather curious that Mr. Joseph Hatton should have written a story on The White King of Manoa. I remember that, when Mr. Haddon Chambers and Mr. Outram Tristram brought out at the Haymarket their play called The Queen of Manoa, the story of the fabled city had to be told to playgoers before they could grasp the meaning of the play's title. Even then the play was not a success.

Poor Sir Walter Scott! One more playwright has laid hands on him, and in a day or two a dramatisation of Quentin Durward will be performed in a theatre not far from London.

Was Shakespeare a Catholic?

The Religion of Shakespeare. By Henry Sebastian Bowden, of the Oratory. (Burns & Oates. 7s. 6d.)

THIS book, as Father Bowden tells us, is chiefly from the writings of the late Mr. Richard Simpson. Three chapters are pointed out as Father Bowden's own work; the rest is mainly Mr. Simpson's. But this "mainly" does not permit us to distinguish precisely the voice of Jacob and the hands of Esau; therefore, by way of convenience, we shall usually refer to Father Bowden as the author, since he makes himself responsible for the opinions. It is a curious book. Mr. Simpson was a competent Shakesporean, and its scholarship, therefore, is sound. But it is a monument of undaunted special pleading. Its object is to show that Shakespeare—already demonstrated to have been a playor, a lawyer, an archer, a Puritan, and things beyond count—was a Catholic too. It has a point worth noting, an amusing side, and a serious side. We shall take the serious side last, and note first the point worth noting.

This one point Father Bowden—or Mr. Simpson—seems to us really to have made. There is a sense in which Carlyle pronounced that Catholicism "gave us English a Shakespeare and Era of Shakespeare, and so produced a blossom of Catholicism," after Catholicism itself had been abolished so far as law could abolish it. Anything which throws light on Shakespeare's Catholicism in this (nowise Father Bowden's) sense is welcome. It was accountable enough already. The Reformation had been but a few years finally established. During the first eleven years of Elizabeth there were no penal laws, or none to speak of, against the adherents to the old faith: even when the papal excommunication caused such to be promulgated, they were executed according to the temper of the various districts, and with increasing apathy according to the scale of miles from the London centre. The thorough Reformation made sleepy way in many a country district; there, for some time, it was a kind of doubtful twilight, doubtful and dormant, between the old and the new creeds—not yet very differentiated to the rustic eye. Your flower, torn from its root, blossoms excellently in water—for a time; and the old creed, sundered from Rome, seemed still much as it had been in these country places. Here is reason enough for what Carlyle recognises as the Catholic element in Shakespeare: his knowledge of the spirit, ways, ceremonies of the old faith; even his application of much in its ethical and other teaching. England, depapalised, was not yet Puritanised. But Father Bowden does suggest a possible further reason, connected with Shakespeare's parentage. His mother, Mary Arden, came of a still notably Catholic family. It seems quite probable that she should have been herself Catholic; but there is no positive evidence either way. His father is not so probable, but a doubtful quantity. He was a member of the Stratford Corporation during the Marian persecution—likely enough Catholic then. Whether he conformed under Elizabeth no evidence shows. It was quite possible for him to escape conforming, owing to early toleration, and after local lenience. He was presented in a list of neighbouring recusants—under the heading, however, of those who kept from church under excuse of debt, &c. Of course, Father Bowden will have this a mere excuse. But we know that his fortunes were actually falling for some time before; therefore the reason seems fair enough. As to this very failure, sales of property and so forth, Father Bowden contends that it was a device commonly used by recusants to keep their property. They transferred it nominally to others, who really acted as trustees, in order to evade the new laws against the holding of property by Papists. He points, in support, to the smallness of the sums given for considerable quantities of property.

Only an expert could decide whether the sums are really so small as to warrant the suspicion of nominal and unreal sale. Of course, the fact is certain; and such holding of property in the name of others is still practised by Catholic religious communities in the States, for instance—sometimes with the result that the trusted individual absconds with the money (having the windy side of the law) and converts his nominal into real ownership. As for the Spiritual Will of Shakespeare père, it is too challenged a document for a backbone to any case. Result: young Shakespeare was brought up under a probably Catholic mother; and a father dubious, noways demonstrable as fish or flesh, crypto-Catholic or conforming Protestant—one who in the French Revolution might have been suspect; but either way unlikely, it should seem, to have been a Puritan, one of the thorough new-Reforming and iconoclastic spirit. Father Bowden likewise advances the presence in the plays of many Warwickshire recusants' names as showing what company Shakespeare kept in his youth: Gower, Fluellen, Bates, Court, Bardolph, Boult. Now, Gower and Fluellen are honest gentlemen; Bates and Court we should take by the hand wheresoever we met them. But poor Bardolph, bottle-nosed aloofhouse-sign, of the whelks and bubucles; Boult, of the infamous function, unnamable—not of good report those, for Catholicism or the youth Shakespeare. Had not Father Bowden better have left this nest unstirred? Or "one Visor," a knave by confession of staunch and little-scrupulous friend Davy—must he too be considered an intimate of young Shakespeare? For he, too, is identified by vigilant commentators with the Stratford environment. Nevertheless, here, we think, is a plausible light on Shakespeare's early training, further explaining why he was a "blossom of Catholicism" in that spacious—if you will, loose—Carlylian sense.

But in this literal, strict Bowden-sense! Shakespearean commentators with a pocket-theory (there should be a licence to carry pocket-theories or pocket-revolvers, both weapons of uncertain and dangerous use) are adepts in bringing surprising meanings out of a Shakespeare text, as you conjure remarkable oddities out of an empty hat. But this Bowden-Simpson union of forces easily surpasses them: leaves them and the reader gasping. At the very outset we are asked to observe, as a proof of Shakespeare's Catholicism (mark you), how he employs Catholic vestments and ritual as symbols of "things high, pure, and true." Why, think you? Because he makes wily old Henry IV. remark that he kept his Presence like a robe pontifical,

Ne'er seen but wondered at.

A phrase which as much recalls heathen as Catholic sacerdotal pomp, which might be drawn by a modern poet from a modern Archbishop of Canterbury, or from reading; in any case, what a casual, unsignifying image for such a portentous conclusion! Unbelievers employ such daily. The speech of Lorenz about the stars, "still quiring to the young-eyed cherubin," and the rest, must be a proof. We admit it need not have been drawn solely from Montaigne. It was "the tradition of fifteen centuries," as Father Bowden says; and of heathen antiquity before that. Why need Shakespeare have been a Catholic, therefore, because he employed a tradition common to Christian and Pagan? But these are trifles. More remains behind. The monasteries were destroyed through avarice; therefore Simon's tirade against "gold, yellow, glittering, precious gold," must be Shakespeare's protest against the avaricious spirit of the Reformation. Nay, is it not clenchd by the detail that "this yellow slave," as Shakespeare says, "will knit and break religions"? Could you desire more significance, better ammunition for your pocket-theory? The theory is all; a true philosopher's stone, it will convert the unlikeliest-seeming passage into right Catholic gold. Even more curious perversion is that of the Countess's speech in "All's Well that Ends Well," regarding Bertram's desertion of his wife :

What angel shall
Bless this unworthy husband ! He cannot thrive,
Unless her prayers, whom heaven delights to hear,
And loves to grant, relieve him from the wrath
Of greatest justice.

"Helen," supposes the ordinary reader, "of whose gracious virtue the Countess has such an enthusiastic conception." "Helen!" answers Father Bowden. "Nay, nothing less than the Virgin! Prayer to the Virgin!" In such manner, it is clear, our surprised Shakespeare may quickly find himself Catholicised out of his own mouth. Thus, again, when it is said that Desdemona could persuade Othello

To renounce his baptism,
All seals and symbols of redeemed sin, it shows that Othello is represented as a Catholic. Naturally, for he lived in a Catholic country; though we cannot see how the passage demonstrates it. But we are further told that everything of a Protestant or Calvinistic tendency is put into the mouths of Iago or the drunken Cassio—witness the utterance of the festive lieutenant: "Well, Heaven's above all; and there be souls that must be saved, and souls must not be saved"; and again, "The lieutenant must be saved before the ancient." "Calvinism, predestination!" says Father Bowden. It is not meant for humour, reader, as you might well suppose; it is solemn want of humour. We could pile up such amazing and amusing inferences from the poet's text. "Susan and she—God rest all Christian souls!" exclaims Juliet's nurse; and this, with old Gobbo's "My boy, rest his soul!" Hamlet's "Flights of angels sing thee to thy rest!" and a handful of like customary ejaculations, dramatically put into various mouths, are cited as proof that Shakespeare believed in prayer for the dead. Nay, one supreme morsel, and we have done with this extraordinary feature of the book. Portio says playfully to her lover :

"Aye, but I fear you speak upon the rack,
When men enforced do speak anything."

Father Bowden actually demands, with all gravity: "Is not this an expression of contemptuous disbelief in all the evidence upon which so many pretended Papist conspirators suffered the death of traitors in the days of Shakespeare?" Where cannot such an eye spy Catholicism? Could the pocket-theory go further?

For the rest, Father Bowden's first chapter really shows nothing more than that the poet was no Puritan, no conventional Reformation Protestant—which we think undeniable, but it goes no whit to prove him a Catholic. Nay, the author damages his own case by showing that Spenser wrote on similar lines—whom no one, not Father Bowden, ventures to call a Catholic. He goes on to analyse Shakespeare's ethics at length, with much exaggeration and special pleading; seeing in the description of the "solemn and unearthly" temple-sacrifice at Delphi (in the "Winter's Tale") an indirect reference to the sacrifice of the Mass! Stripped of such things, all he proves is that Shakespeare had a lofty system of ethics, especially in regard to love, having affinities with Dante, yea, and Spenser.

It is nearer Catholicism than the conventional Protestantism of his day. We have seen how that should arise, and it no way proves his acceptance of the Catholic creed, any more than in Spenser's case. There was a Renaissance spirit, neither Catholic nor material-pagan, which recognised these high and spiritual ethics. Spenser, for example, is Platonist; and Shakespeare's philosophy might be that of a lofty Greek who had come under Christian influences. Our author has to explain away Pundulph's speech, blessing in the name of the Church any hand that shall take King John's life, by the gratuitous assumption that the poet inserted it through fear of his life, if he left no Protestant bit to please Elizabeth!

There is no real evidence in fine, but stretched assumption, and special pleading. The strongest argument really brought is the absence of attack on Catholicism from the plays, and the fact that the poet, in recasting the old play of "King John," struck out anti-Catholic scurrilities, which merely shows that the poet was a fine artist and a gentleman. It is also remarkable, we might point out, how he distinguishes himself from his fellow dramatists by his handling of the Jew Shylock. Compare it with Marlowe's Barabbas. See how Shakespeare has eliminated mere racial scurrility and humanised his Jew, making the character indeed as much an indictment of Christian persecution as of the individual Jew, made vengeful by incessant wrongs. Nowhere does Shakespeare cast wanton insult on the Jews. Extend Father Bowden's argument and a new solution comes in sight. Was Shakespeare a secret proselyte of Judaism? We confidently await a book to prove it. Surely some faddist is equal to the task!

Eton's Elder Sister.

A History of Winchester College. By Arthur F. Leach.
(Duckworth & Co. 6s.)

THE eminent French ecclesiastic who has lately been studying the English Public School system is reported to have said that Winchester excelled in patriotism: the Wykehamists whom he met, old and young, seemed to him filled with the spirit of civis Romanus sum, "a citizen of no mean city." There are many admirable books upon Winchester College, both historical and personal: it is rich in chronicles and records. But there was room for such a book as the present work by Mr. Leach. It is a concise history in some five hundred pages, which are richly learned and patriotic and sober. Two drawbacks there are to our complete enjoyment of the history. One is Mr. Leach's strange lack of amenity in style and tone when he touches upon Catholicism. Possibly he is not aware that among his living fellow-Wykehamists there are Roman Catholics who will be deeply distressed by his frequent and flippant discourtesy of allusion to their founder's faith. This sometimes leads him into unwarrantable disparagements. Thus, he writes of the illustrious Elizabethan Wykehamist, Stapleton, that he "produced sundry dead controversial works which occupy the disproportionate space of two columns in The Dictionary of National Biography." That biographer knew what he was doing. No less famous a scholar than Dollinger has pronounced Stapleton to be the greatest champion of Catholicism in the whole Protestant controversy up to our times. This is not the man for Mr. Leach to dismiss with a brief sneer. Passing from this painful aspect of the book, we turn to the only other flaw of importance. Mr. Leach is very weak in literary criticism. A writer who can speak of being "unfortunate enough to be compelled to read the Georgics . . . that terrible effort of Virgil's," puts himself out of court. No one would gather from Mr. Leach that Sir Thomas Browne is simply unsurpassed as a master of English prose; and it is exasperating to be told that the Religio Medici is "probably more talked about than read." The same foolish phrase occurs in an amazing sentence upon Otway: "The only first-class poet that Winchester ever produced, but, being a dramatist, no one reads him now." The tender Otway—"Sir, he is all tenderness," said Johnson to Goldsmith—is emphatically not in the first flight of poets; and he is far below Winchester's one great poet, Collins, to whom Mr. Leach assigns a wrong birthplace, and to whose aerial genius he is entirely blind. Mr. Swinburne's essay upon Collins says, in modern style, what Johnson said before him, that Collins is greater than Gray, and among the masters of English music in verse. Browne and Collins are the two literary heroes with whom Winchester, when challenged, can face the field. We find no appreciation of Bowles as a poetical influence; no adequate recognition of young Russell, so nobly praised by Lander; no notice of Ken's writings. The following are ignored altogether: Spence, author of Polymetis, to whose "Anecdotes" we owe so much knowledge of Pope and an host of great men; "Virgil" Pitt; the rather scandalous Bubb Dodington; Flatman, poet, painter, barrister, from whose verse Pope stole; Woodhull, translator of "Euripides"; John Norris, platonist and poet, Henry More's friend, George Herbert's successor; Ambrose Phillips, mocked by Pope, admired by Lamb; the learned, unhappy Lydiat, immortalised in Johnson's line; the delightful and egregious Tom Coryat, of Oldcombe, that notable figure in literature; Serjeant Hoskyns, as much beloved by Ben Jonson and his "sons" as Coryat was ridiculed; that interesting poet Turberville; of earlier date, the eccentric Andrew Borde; the classic Lemprière; Dr. Nott, editor of Surrey and Wyat; Augustus Hare and Richard Ford; these are examples of omissions which a page or two might have supplied. There is no mention of Matthew Arnold's year at Winchester; of Dr. Johnson's visits to Warton at Winchester; of the fact that Cardinal Newman nearly became a Wykehamist. "Ideal Ward" is rapidly dismissed—we are not told, of this great Wykehamical philosopher, that he lived to be acknowledged by Comte and Mill as their ablest antagonist. These are not serious shortcomings, yet they detract from our pleasure in Mr. Leach's work. Among omissions not literary we may note the strange absence of all reference to the Soudanese hero, Sir Herbert Stewart, and his recent memorial at Winchester; to the College Missions, first in London, then in Portsmouth, where Mr. Dolling achieved such wonderful success; to the annual Wykehamist dinner in London, and the frequent similar gatherings in other places, notably India; and to the far-famed Wykehamical motto, "Manners Makyth Man."

Unquestionably, it is in the history of Winchester before the Reformation, and in that of mediæval scholastic foundations or systems generally, that Mr. Leach is at his best and strongest and most at home. Here he has the knowledge of an expert, the interest of a specialist. No blind patriotism leads him to magnify William of Wykeham's achievement at the expense of truth or probability. He thus sums up what Wykeham did for English education, five hundred years ago, in founding Eton's elder sister:

Winchester College, while no novelty in itself, either in being a foundation for secular clerks, and not for monks, or in being a collegiate church with a grammar school attached, or in being a preparatory school for a University college, or even in its designed numbers, or the admission of Commoners and those of the higher ranks, was yet by virtue of its combination of all these characteristics on a grander scale than had yet been seen, a new departure, and the first of Public Schools, as that term is now understood.

Each phrase in this luminous paragraph implies careful research, each is abundantly and, to our thinking, conclusively illustrated in Mr. Leach's earlier chapters. And their conclusions confirm what has always been our view or estimate of the Founder's character. No Wykehamist fails to regard him with reverential gratitude and affection; but can he be regarded as one of the great outstanding mediæval Englishmen who, for good or bad, impressed their genius upon their times? Most wise, most practical, most pious, he is rather a "worthy" than a "genius"—a worthy in Fuller's sense of the word, which was nobler than ours—a man of worth. There is not in Wykeham that stain of strangeness which runs through genius, nothing unaccountable in the last analysis; but he saw the needs of his time, he discerned the best features of existing institutions, and knew how best to combine, transform, accommodate them to his own purpose. No innovator, but a conservative, he improved upon the materials to his hand, and wrought with so prescient a wisdom that his work lasted and abides, and served for a model to like works done after him. Greater men than he have left nothing behind them. Wykeham's generous common sense and liberality of mind will be working and living in his college when the celebration of its millennium shall have come. Winchester, at the lowest ebb of her fortunes, has had in her, latent but alive, the spirit and inspiring sense of historic continuity, and, if the term be not too strong, of national responsibility. You may be proud to be English, proud to be of such or such a family or county, proud to be of such or such a profession; but if you are a Wykehamist, that is not the least of your prizes, and it will never leave you. Mr. Leach admirably brings out the rational source of this instinctive emotion as he passes from age to age; and the public school sentiment is among the best and most vital of English feelings. The corporate life, reaching back into the past and animating the present, which is the soul of nationality, is also the soul of all lesser community, and the Wykehamist has a splendid share of it.

Mr. Leach's later chapters, with their personal reminiscence and happy anecdote, their reproduction of school life, as recent generations have known it, could hardly be bettered. In a book intended not solely for Wykehamists, but for the public at large, he has possibly included too much that can be of little or no interest to the public; but, if so, it is felix culpa. He certainly succeeds in suggesting the wonderful happiness of Winchester, which makes a Wykehamist's schooldays golden to remember, without any of that touching sentimentality which inclines us to glorify even an unhappy past; and we are largely with him in believing that the Winchester of older days was not the home of brutal misery which it has sometimes been deemed. We have had accounts of it, like a doleful song

Steaming up, a lamentation and an ancient tale of wrong,
Like a tale of little meaning though the words are strong;
Chanted from an ill-used race of "men. . . ."

but we believe them, in large measure, to be the complaints of those who were wholly unfitted for a public school life, such as Sidney Smith and a distinguished Wykehamist, whom Mr. Leach does not mention, Anthony Trollope. There have been, from time to time, notably in the last quarter of the last century, and the early part of this, "ignorances and negligences" upon the part of authority: inattention to petty details, which caused real and culpable discomfort. But the ultra-Spartan Winchester of torturings and wailings and starvation is a fiction: the College shared with all other eighteenth century institutions and corporations the discredit of gross lethargic abuses, the accumulation of time; but at no period did the boys regard it as a superior Dotheboys' Hall. A few did: but they were out of place, either physically or by temperament unfit for it.

We have done no kind of justice to the special learning of Mr. Leach: an attempt to do that would fill these columns with minute arguments upon a multitude of archaeological and other topics, for which they are not meant. We will but give thanks for a book, which in most points seems trustworthy and impartial, which is a credit to Winchester, and which brings back to us, not only our own Winchester "days that are no more," but the great five hundred years of her history, which are living yet in the heart and soul of every Wykehamist in all that is best in him. A last word: Mr. Leach proposes to abolish the gown worn by "College men." The present writer is ignorant of the present feeling about that among College men to-day; but assuredly, if Mr. Leach had entered Chamber Court some twenty years ago to make that proposal, College men would have risen as one man.

Mr. Laurence Housman's Poems.

The Little Land. By Laurence Housman. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

THE joy of youth in the fair world and its own fair dreams is surely an excellent good thing, and right glad are we to have it. But with the passing of youth passes also this young love-light on the world: "Pan, Pan is dead." The question is, Will the poet (as poet) die with him, or will Apollo succeed to Pan? Has the poet—in plainer words—such substantive backbone of intellect as will compensate for the passing of youth's fancies and its unpalled perceptions of outward things? For lack of this, much young poetry does, at thirty or so, run out and leave mere lees or total vacuity. It is a hopeful thing for Mr. Laurence Housman that he has intellect—has, as we say, ideas not frequent, alas! in modern verse! His defect, on the other hand, might well be another poet's strength. Fulness of life and verbal gift united with Mr. Housman's thought would make a very fine poet. Mr. Housman lacks a sufficiency of the poetic fervour; he lacks compelling gift of language and sense of form. We could conceive his lines being worded otherwise than they are, very often, and this should not be. His present book has for us a curious feature of interest. He lately published a volume of religious poems quite striking and individual in its best work. Now he gives us a volume mostly of secular pieces, and we confess ourselves mostly disappointed. The opening section is by way of being young and fanciful. But the fancy is too arbitrary, too wilfully ingenious; it is less like the gambols of a tricky spirit than the cutting of fantastic paper-shapes with a pair of scissors. It is a kite too obviously string-tethered, not a bird. The second section, chiefly sonnets, is thoughtful love-poetry, showing a Shakespearean model. But here, again, the thought is too thin, without body, with no strong wing of emotion to lift it. He has caught rather some echo of Shakespeare's worse sonnet-style, with its conceits (in the modern sense) and wire-drawn ingenuities. There are exceptions—this, "Of Holy Obedience," has a grace:

Dear love, but read me right and reckon true
How love of thee hath featured all my mind;
Till in my will 'tis thine that I pursue,
And in my face thy looks I wish to find.
For having eyes that worship at thine eyes,
And senses all to thy clear guidance bent,
Even as a pool takes colour from the skies
So from thy grace hath grace to me been lent.
Yea, by this test I in my own love stand,
And out of mine own self get touch with thee:
Because my hand hath rested on thy hand
Therefore is its poor use grown sweet to me;
And for my lips, since they thy word obey,
Then I love too, but in another way.

This is what Mr. Housman aims at throughout these sonnets; but he does not often so succeed.

In the later portion of the book, however, Mr. Housman touches the religious note, and falls into the mood of questions deep and eternal. The change is no less marked in the quality of his verse; we at once feel the hand we knew in his former volume. It is a curious phenomenon, as we have said. It would seem that Mr. Housman, contrary to the general law, succeeds in religious poetry, and is unsure of touch in more secular verse. Listen to this individual and arresting "Cupid and Christ":

Quick came Cupid near to Christ,
At His feet laid down his bow:
"See, Thy love hath all sufficed!
Burning in its heat and glow.
Mortal hearts grow fired and iced:
Blunted, now, my weapons show.
Take my arrows, let me go!
Vainly now were hearts enticed."
Christ said, "No!"

"Take thine arrows, take them up!
From My feet take up thy bow!
All that thou hast doffed, now dup!
Little will My people know,
How My love hath drained their cup,
Shoot thine arrows, let them go!
On the hearts I cherish so,
Thou mayst yet break fast and sup."
Cried Cupid, "No!"
"Ah!" spake Christ, "and shall their shame
Shorten-in thy little day?
While I wait, 'tis all the same:
If they yet can make thee gay
Have thy pleasure, play thy game!
Little wounds shall lead the way
Where, at last, My wounds may stay:
Flickering sparks may kindle flame.
Run, and play!"
Cupid, as the Other bade,
Took his arrows back, and played.
Every arrow that he sends
Mars a heart the Other mends.
But, ere forth upon that raid,
Once his heart to Christ's he laid,
Murmuring, yet half afraid—
"After, when the playing ends,
When grow well the wounds I've made,
We'll be friends!"

No less excellent are many of the poems in the latter pages. Altogether, a singularly unequal book, in the way we have indicated; yet well worth the attention of all lovers of poetry.

By Cumbria's Lakes and Fells.

Life and Nature at the English Lakes. By the Rev. H. D. Rawnsley. (Maclehose & Sons. 5s. net.)

Sprogues on the Fells. By A. W. Rumney. (Iliffe, Sons, & Sturmev. 6d.)

Annals of the Solway until A.D. 1307. By George Neilson. (Maclehose & Sons.)

PARADOXICAL as it may seem, the test of a book of topographical sentiment is its power to annul the necessity to visit the places it describes. It should, in fact, take us thither, fill our lungs with its air, and make its landscapes real to us. And, in the end, it should leave the impression of a criticism of life with a local flavour. Not many books achieve this standard, but Canon Rawnsley's, at least comes within sight of it. It is full of love and knowledge, and it does for the natural beauty and rural humanities of the Lake District what his earlier book, fresh in the minds of many, did for its literary associations.

There we consorted with poets and essayists, here we have shepherds and Grasmere wrestlers. In the first chapter we learn all about the rush-bearing at Ambleside, on St. Anne's day, when the villagers take, or used to take, clean rushes with which to strew the church floor. Still the procession goes, the band playing furiously; still the "rush-bearing hymn" is sung, and then there are dancing and wrestling and see-sawing and swinging, "till the last light fades from Windermere, and the clouds come down to rest until the moon rises upon Red Scree and Scandale Head."

Always those glorious environments! Always Nature gently dismissing the revellers! It is so at Greta Side on May Day so soon as the dancing and junketting have a little palled. Then the old folks sum up the day with: "It's auld times coom agean, hooiver," or: "It's finest May Day we shall iver see"; and while the villagers disperse homeward, Nature's sinking pageant goes with them. "The westerling sun fills the heaven over Bassenthwaite with gold. Helvellyn lies an unbroken length of half-veiled, half-lustrous light. Skiddaw gleams like 'the flashing of a shield.' The rooks come cawing over towards the Great Wood morrily."

Canon Rawnsley is hail-fellow-well-met with the shepherds on Helvellyn. Behold, it is Shepherds' Assembly, and from all the dales and fells around the shepherds are meeting to exchange sheep that have strayed into alien flocks. The pastures on Helvellyn have no dividing walls or hedges, but every shepherd knows his "heaf," and the very sheep are taught to know, in the main, these intangible boundaries. The few silly sheep which stray beyond them are instantly recognised, and the honour and freemasonry of the shepherds has decreed this Assembly as a means of rectifying matters. Thither you shall see a shepherd trudging for miles with a lamb on his shoulders; and from all sides the strayed sheep are driven or carried by the shepherds, who meet on some noble height—often above the clouds—to make their exchanges, and to talk, and feast, and hearten each other in the shepherd's life. As their song has it:

Well met are the shepherds from Wythburn and Naddle,
From Matterdale, Patterdale, far, far away;
Well met are the sheep who, in spite of the ruddle,
And ear-bit and flank-smit have wandered astray.

Here's luck to the shepherd of misty Helvellyn,
And joy to the shepherd-lad, trusty and brave;
And life to them all, for there's none can be telling
How soon each may rest in a fell-shepherd's grave.

Thus Canon Rawnsley takes us to the heart of Cumbrian life. Nor does he forget to tell us of the little-known effects which the town-dweller—who must make holiday in the summer—rarely sees. There are two fortnights in the year when there are grand "goings on" in the heavens and few to notice them. One is the last week in April and the first week in May; the other is the last fortnight in October. Concerning the October pageant we read:

Truly there is a witchery over hill and dale at this season. Very softly, as the sun comes rolling over Helvellyn, the vapours swim up from Derwentwater, and the white smoky clouds rise out of the trench of the St. John's Vale and disperse themselves in sunny air. The little town of Keswick breathes up almost straight to heaven its quiet fireside story of the morning meal. Then the fires seem to die down, the mist of the vale and the smoke of the village pass quite away, and are forgot; and over all the landscape, from Blencathra to Skiddaw, to the height of Grassmoor and Whiteside, stands for the rest of the day a steady sky of softest, delicatest grey. Towards the afternoon the sky of pale blue becomes flecked with the fleeciery and curliest of cloud-tresses. The raven circles up and barks like a spectral-winged dog from the far heights of heaven. The buzzard wheels and cries in sheer delight for the sunshine and the calm, and as he whirrs down from Falcon Crag the sun strikes through his wings and turns him into molten gold.

We cannot quote the passages which tell how, "with every shade of hue from emerald to ruby, the pomp of foliage swept down to Derwentwater," or how, when sunset came, "Causey and Grisedale glowed like incandescent amethyst, as though they were not solid earth, but mountain masses of red-hot purple vapour," and "the heron called for joy with his sharp nasal twang as he sailed through the sunset," and "the sound of the ceaseless brook in the Great Wood murmured on through the twilight."

Canon Rawnsley does not make the mistake of giving us too much scenery. Against the passages we have just quoted one can put much local practical stuff; for example, his description of the sheep-dog trials at Troutbeck. We have said enough to show that this is a capital book of its kind.

Mr. Rumney's Sprogues on the Fells is a pretty trifle of topography and local lore. "Sprogue" is Cumbrian for a ramble. Perhaps the best "sprogue" is the one in which

Mr. Rumney joined a boundary-riding arranged by a new landowner. There is a deal of humour in such an occasion: the flagman leading the way up hillside and brawling stream, the steward stopping now and then to read documents aloud or quote Chancery suits to his miscellaneous followers whom he persists in addressing as "ancient and disinterested persons." Slight as Mr. Rumney's performance is, it is on the right lines, and its very slightness is a recommendation.

Mr. Neilson's Annals of the Solway is an example of unobtrusive work by a local topographer. Not that Mr. Neilson is a novice. His works on the Roman Wall, the Border Peels, and Annandale are valued by antiquaries. Mr. Neilson has now turned to the Solway, and he has amassed a large quantity of sound and detailed information, which he has set forth in a very modest number of pages. No one who has looked across the Solway from, let us say, Silloth, on the Cumberland coast, can fail to catch some hint of the rough and warlike days which have passed over that bare and often desolate estuary. Mr. Neilson has groped in the darkness of Roman and Saxon times for early facts about the Solway, and if he is often forced to conjecture, he conjectures well. No "Solway" was known to the Romans, but the upper part of the estuary was probably referred to under the name of the Itouna. Only in the thirteenth century does the name of Solway occur distinctly. Camden speaks of a town called Solway, yet no such town name can be traced outside of his Britannia. Mr. Neilson's belief, which he supports with several reasons, is that the Solway was originally a ford across the mouth of the river Esk. A ford was often far more important to inhabitants than the estuary it crossed; and this character of a ford, a meeting-place between England and Scotland, dominates the whole history of the estuary.

Howbeit, long before the thirteenth century the Solway played its part in the religious drama of Northumbria and Iona. Up its chill waters sailed Adamnan, an emissary of the Irish Christian, to interview Aldfrid of Northumbria. To this day we can read Adamnan's impressions of the Tracht Romra (the shore of the strong tide), as the estuary was called. In picturesque and curiously familiar words he wrote:

The strand is long and the flood rapid, so rapid that if the best steed in Saxonland, ridden by the best horseman, were to start from the edge of the tide when the tide begins to flow, he could only bring his rider ashore by swimming, so extensive is the strand and so impetuous the tide.

This impetuosity of the tide is the familiar fact about the Solway. Mr. Neilson, who is a writer as well as a scholar, describes it well:

As one walks along the marsh skirting the river, a quiet, sibilant, but penetrating sound from the sea is the announcement of a wave racing up the Eden. A line of advancing foam breaks gently on each side of the sandy channel. In a few minutes, where before was a narrow current of fresh water with a wide margin of sand, there is a broad volume of brine, and the estuary of the Eden is flowing from "bank to brae." In the winter the scene, impressive under any conditions, is much intensified, especially if the tide is high and there is a southerly gale behind. Then the sea approaches with great speed, gaining as it goes; the wave is white with tumbling foam; a great curve of broken surf follows in its wake; and the white horses of the Solway ride in to the end of their long gallop from the Irish Sea with a deep and angry roar.

The historic catastrophe occurred in the year 1216, when an army of Alexander II. attempted to re-cross the Solway with the spoils of Holme Cultram Abbey. The tide overtook them and 1,900 men were swept away. Mr. Neilson devotes much of his space to the part which the Solway played in the wars of Edward I.

The now tiny and lonesome hamlet of Skinburness was a busy port and a basis of war supplies when Silloth (Sealath) was a barn. An astonishing catalogue of war-ships which operated in the Solway in the year 1300 is given by Mr. Neilsen, whose book, a sound and skilful piece of work, should find many local readers.

Why Bismarck Was Left to Unite Germany.

The Mediæval Empire. By Herbert Fisher. (Macmillan. 21s. net.)

In this work Mr. Herbert Fisher offers us neither a history, properly called, nor yet merely a disquisition on history; but, in truth, something which is very much a mixture of both. It belongs to a class quite modern, the outcome of the philosophical method applied to history; and might well take by surprise the confiding reader who purchased under the assumption, fully warranted by its general and outward aspect, that he was purchasing a history of the mediæval German Empire. It blends history with inquiry; enough history to give a basis for the inquiry, enough inquiry to give a raison d'être for the history. Or, to drop antithesis and get to business, Mr. Fisher has a thesis with regard to the causes why the empire failed; and he summarises its history sufficiently to afford a groundwork for his examination and the conclusions which he draws from that examination. The book therefore presupposes in its reader a previous acquaintance with the general history of the mediæval empire. And we may be suffered to lament in passing that there is no good and scholarly history of Germany in the English language on a scale adequate to the subject. Why do none of our historical students occupy themselves to meet this want? Why have we no such work, in fact, dealing with the complete history of Austria, or Spain, no less than of Germany? One would think that cultured Englishmen had no historical interest in any nations save France and Italy.

But though Mr. Fisher makes this demand his summary is very able and clear; so that it is quite possible, with a little pains, to follow his views intelligently even without such a previous knowledge. It is excellently adapted to his purpose, entering into detailed statement precisely where it is necessary for the comprehension of his thesis; and he shows, moreover, a knowledge of the difficult art, how to omit and where to omit judiciously, so necessary to special historical treatment of this kind. His view is, briefly, that the Empire failed because it was a huge anachronism, because the emperors were misled by the will-o'-the-wisp of restoring the Roman world-empire. This leads him into a complete reversal of the ordinary estimates which historians have made of the several German emperors. Not Otto the Great, not Henry the IV., not Barbarossa and the mighty Hohenstauffens, but the generally reviled and bemeaned home-keeping emperors were, in his view, the enlightened rulers. The very ability of the others was their ruin, and the ruin of Germany, by tempting them to exercise it in pushing the empire beyond the Alps. This inevitably led to the transference of the seat of empire beyond the Alps, and so postponed for ages the unification of Germany. To support their Italian enterprises they needed men and treasure. These ought to have come from Germany, but Germany was not united. Every duke was a semi-independent prince. There was thus no fixed seat of empire in Germany. One emperor, indeed, attempted to identify the empire with Saxony. But the very steps he took to accomplish this admirable purpose were so injudiciously contrived as to rouse Saxony against him, and begin the long struggle between Saxony and the empire which, through many metamorphoses and under many disguises, finally passed into the disastrous feud of the Guelphs and Ghibellines (or, as Mr. Fisher, true to the Teutonic forms, prefers to call them, Welfs and Wibelins). There were only two resources left—either a seat of empire might be founded in the Danube provinces or it must be sought in Italy. The emperors left the former ultimately to be achieved by the House of Austria, and ruinously chose the latter. They first tried to seat themselves in Lombardy; and, expelled thence by the defeat of Legnano, established themselves in the Norman kingdom of Sicily. The seat of the Germanic Empire was carried out of Germany; ceased, in fact, to be German. The German princelings were left to strengthen themselves in their independence; and when the Hohenstauffen line, miserably baffled in its Sicilian designs on Italy, ingloriously faded out, there followed interregnum, anarchy, and the stereotyping for ages of a disunited Germany. The true policy of a German emperor was to have stayed at home and worked, as the French kings worked, for the union of his country. He should have left the Holy Roman Empire to go to the devil; he should not have left Germany to go to the devil. But the latter is precisely what Barbarossa and his successors did.

This is the main thesis which Mr. Fisher supports with admirable cogency by a convincing examination of the historical facts, from Otto the Great to the last Hohenstauffen. The political and fiscal system of the chief emperors is investigated luminously, both in Germany and Italy. Excellent and instructive maps accompany the work, the ability and interest of which should commend it to all historical students. To our mind, Mr. Fisher proves his case up to the hilt.

Books under the Cæsars.

Roman Life under the Cæsars. By Emile Thomas. (Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

This is a fairly competent, though by no means perfect, translation of a book which appeared in French a year or two ago. It is adapted rather for the general reader than for the student. Prof. Thomas has a wide acquaintance with the literature of his subject, and has made particularly good use of the Historia Augusta and of Friedländer's Sittengeschichte Roms, but he by no means brings to bear either the power of co-ordinating detail or the luminous width of historical conception which characterise, for instance, Prof. Dill's book recently reviewed in these columns. His chapters, though written in a lively fashion, and full of interesting and picturesque archæology, piece together rather into a mosaic than into an articulate social study. And the attempt to include in one survey the Roman life of several successive centuries is hardly consistent with scientific history. Prof. Dill more wisely limited himself to a well-defined epoch. The contents of the book may be briefly summarised. It opens with topographical chapters on Pompeii, the Forum of Rome, and the Palatine Hill. Then come descriptions of various sides of social life, amusements, gifts, funerals, and wills; then studies of the Roman attitude to country life, of education and bookselling at Rome, of the position of art and moral philosophy. Military matters are next considered, and the composition and life of the African legion taken as an example of the rest. A discussion of the barbarians of Germany and a sketch of "a typical Roman of the Empire," Pliny the Younger—not a bad choice—complete the work. The section on book-production contains some interesting facts. It is always a little difficult to realise how numerous the books of the Roman world were. Dictation to a number of slave copyists must have been nearly as cheap a way of multiplying literature as printing. A pamphlet of poetry could be sold for a few pence. Libraries of two thousand books or so were common. A third-century physician, Serenus Sammonicus, had sixty-two thousand, and the great public library of Alexandria is variously estimated as containing from four hundred thousand to seven hundred thousand. These were, of course, rolls of papyrus or parchment on painted or gilded rollers. The Dryasdust scholar buried under his pile of erudition, and the empty-headed collector of the outsides of books, were as familiar to the Romans as to ourselves. M. Thomas describes the arrangement of a Roman library as follows:

The rolls were placed in cupboards (armaria). On the door, or on top of each cupboard, a portrait of the author whose works were contained in it was fixed in a sort of frame or medallion, in accordance with a custom which dated back to the time of Varro or Pollio. In the library itself were placed statues, bearing on their pedestals either summarised catalogues or bibliographical notices or portraits: if the latter, care was taken to secure good likenesses, copies being made either at Rome or in the author's native country. Then there were mosaics (lapille), terra-cotta statuettes, pastels (ceræ discolorés) representing poets and orators. In the great libraries there were separate divisions for Greek and Latin literature. The works were further subdivided according to subject—law, medicine, geography, philosophy, theology, &c.

The three great Imperial libraries, the Octavian, the Tiberian, and the Palatine, were all burnt before the end of the fourth century. Probably the library founded by Pope Damasus in the basilica of St. Lorenzo closely resembles the classical type.

A Recondite Inquiry.

Yule and Christmas, their Place in the Germanic Year. By Alexander Tille, Ph.D. (Nutt.)

DR. TILLE is known in this country as a propagator of Nietzscheanism, but he is also no mean authority on questions of Germanic archaeology. Yule and Christmas is really a restatement, with amplified learning, of part of the argument contained in an earlier work on the history of the German Christmas, published at Leipzig. To the historian and the folk-lorist, who can read footnotes and tackle the scientific treatment of philology, every page of the learned and logical volume will be of interest. The evidence as to the evolution of the Germanic year which Dr. Tille has brought together is both rich and well-weighed; but the plain man will probably be willing to content himself with Dr. Tille's conclusions. We do not quite go along with all of these. We doubt, for instance, whether the primitive division of the year into summer and winter was a division into exact halves, so that it would be any use looking for an early seasonal feast about the middle of May, which should correspond to the beginning of winter feast about the middle of November. We take it that the normal agricultural summer covered two-thirds of the year, from February or March to November, and that the remaining third was left for winter. Subsequently a great religious ceremony, intended to secure the welfare of the growing crops, divided the summer into early summer or spring and late summer or summer proper, and of this ceremony, which may have originally taken place at dates differing according to weather and locality, and in any case must have been dislocated under Roman and Christian influences, the peasant celebrations of May are one relic. Those of Midsummer are another. On the other hand, we think that Dr. Tille has abundantly proved his main thesis. And that is, that the belief expressed by Grimm, and still held by Prof. Weinhold, in a Germanic mid-winter feast, at or about the winter solstice, is an erroneous one. He shows that the Germans really knew nothing of solstices until the astronomical wisdom of the East had filtered to them through the Roman Empire. Their year, as Prof. Rhys puts it of the cognate Celtic year, was thermometrical, not astronomical. Its critical points were the day in spring when the snow melted and allowed the cattle to go out to the pastures and the field-work to begin, and the corresponding day at the end of the year's labours when the first snows fell. This latter day began the new year. It was marked by a great feast, at which the cattle for which there was not enough winter fodder were slaughtered, and the domestic hearth was renewed to cook them. Ancestors were remembered in toasts and banquets. This feast survives in Martinmas, a great day in Germany, and once in England. When the Germans took over, in the first centuries of our era, the Roman calendar year, the New Year customs were transferred slowly and partially to the first of January. Finally, in the fourth century, the Christian Church made up its mind to celebrate the birthday of Christ on December 25, the day of the Mithraic Sol Invictus, and in the sixth began to count its years from that date. So, after the conversion, the New Year customs went shifting back from January 1 to December 25, and in fact came, in one place or another, to scatter themselves over the larger part of the winter season. Dr. Tille has also a very interesting discussion of the curious list of Anglo-Saxon month names given by Bede, and of some other evidence from which he deduces that before they adopted the Roman calendar the Germans used a division of the year into six tides of three-score days each. The beginning of one of those tides, the origin of which Dr. Tille traces somewhat hazardously to Egypt, probably coincided with the beginning of the thermometric year, and therefore no special dislocation of the winter feast was caused. There is a good chapter on the English mediæval celebration of Christmas, and on the miracle of the Glastonbury Thorn. But we must leave our readers to turn to the book for themselves.

Other New Books.

ROBERT RAIKES.

By J. H. HARRIS.

This is a belated, but a very thorough, biographical collection relating to the founder of the Sunday-school system. Its principal feature is the evidence collected by the editor's father, years ago, among aged Gloucester people who remembered Raikes's first school. A great deal of information which must be highly interesting to Gloucester people is displayed and sifted, and there is nothing of fulsomeness or partiality in the portrait of Raikes which is evolved. Raikes began his Sunday-school experiment in 1780, and Mr. Harris is at great pains to show that the claims which have been advanced on behalf of the prior action of the Rev. Thomas Stock, of Gloucester, do not rest on any sufficient basis of truth. Raikes himself was a printer when provincial printers were few. He was a prosperous man, and made a figure in Gloucester, and knew his consequence. He took snuff with elegance, and was known for his "buckishness" or style. As a printer and as editor of the Gloucester Journal Raikes was criticised and abused; even his piety was questioned by some who pointed out that he printed his newspaper on Sundays. In a chapter entitled "Mr. Raikes the Sabbath-breaker" Mr. Harris deals with this matter. It is certain that the Journal teems with evidence of Raikes's philanthropic leanings: his work in connexion with prison reform would alone have secured him a measure of fame. Living to a good age, Raikes became a comfortable patriarch, and we are told that when distinguished strangers came to town their visits were to the Lord Bishop, the Mayor, and Mr. Raikes. He was one of those whose deeds and rewards were alike conspicuous. In an appropriate introduction to the volume, Dean Farrar points out that four Lord Chancellors—Lord Hatherley, Lord Cairns, Lord Selborne, and Lord Herschell—have been

Sunday-school teachers. The book is rather formless and imperfectly digested; but it is certainly the last word on Raikes. (Arrowsmith.)

QUAKER CAMPAIGNS IN PEACE AND WAR.

BY WILLIAM JONES.

Mr. Jones was one of several members of the Society of Friends who were sent by that body into the war-ravaged villages of Alsace and Lorraine in 1870, in order to carry relief and supply food to the starving, distressed French peasantry. This is the central and most dramatic episode in these interesting pages, but Mr. Jones's humane activity took new shape in the Russo-Turkish war, and to many other parts of the world he has journeyed on some good errand. Throughout these pages we are in close touch with Quakerism, and the broad philanthropy which is its distinguishing mark. An interview which Mr. Jones had with Cardinal Antonelli, in the Vatican, makes piquant and remarkable reading. We are amused, too, by one of Mr. Jones's chapter-headings—"Casual Meeting with the Pope." Mr. Jones met the Pope (Pius IX.) on one of the Vatican staircases. "With his mild aspect and benevolent countenance, arrayed in a white flannel costume, edged with scarlet, and a very broad-brimmed hat, he reminded me of"—whom do you think? of whom?—"of some good old Friend of former times." We were aware that Frederick Lucas, of the Tablet, wrote a book maintaining that in essentials Roman Catholicism and Quakerism were identical. Mr. Jones makes the resemblance concrete. His book is full of human interest and kindly wisdom, and is extremely well produced by the official publishers of the Society of Friends. (Headley Brothers. 6s.)

ESSAYS.

BY WRAY HUNT.

We have here the literary remains of a good clergyman and a cultivated man. Mr. Hunt lived a quiet clerical life, and one is reminded of Amiel when one reads: "He was far too void of ordinary ambition, too contemptuous of his own mental power, to dream of seeking for success." Something of Amiel's pensive outlook on nature, too, is found in these quiet essays, mostly lightly-written records of days by river, or sea-shore, or mountain slope. Mr. Hunt sent them to the St. James's Gazette, the Spectator, the Gentleman's Magazine, and elsewhere; and they are now reprinted as a memorial of a gentle life. Mr. Hunt's choice of subjects reveals a temperament. Any green valley, any quiet corner, will set him musing and regretting; even a Staffordshire valley, with an old broken-down barge as its central object, and the smoke of the potteries in the distance, suffices him. In "A Cotswold Idyll" we visit the village school, not without amusement. To the question out of the Catechism, "Why, then, are infants baptized, when by reason of their tender age they cannot perform them?" a little girl replied—presenting her answer on her slate—"Why, indeed?" This is boating on the "Stripling Thames"—that "baby-river that ripples pure and peaceful through lonely Wiltshire meadows, and then between the westernmost lowlands of Oxfordshire and Berks":

And now, as the evening shadows lengthen, turning to look ahead, we catch sight of Lechlade spire, at first to the right of us, then to the left, as the river windeth at its own sweet will. Before long we are passing under Lechlade bridge, and call a halt for the night. We make our way through a village sad and grey and sleepy—Gloucestershire Lechlade, sleepier even than Wiltshire Cricklade—up to the village inn; and then, while supper is being prepared, turn into the churchyard hard by haunted by the shade of Shelley. Here, on some such evening more than seventy years ago, he watched the

Silence and twilight, unbeloved of men,
Creep hand in hand from yon obscurest glen.

Such writing is inherently pleasant, and there is a great deal of it in these pages. Mr. Hunt is not a "natural history" writer; his keen enjoyment of nature is allied less with the yellow primrose than with traditions of "old unhappy far-off things," and "battles long ago." (Privately printed by Hatchards.)

SPAIN.

BY LEONARD WILLIAMS.

This little book is the eighth volume in the "Children's Study" series. Mr. Williams has wisely simplified the history of Spain, suppressing a great many bewildering names and facts relating to the thrones, Christian and Moorish, of Aragon, Castile, Navarre, and the Moslem territory. "Now and again, however, a great fighting king stands forth, a head and shoulders above his fellows—a landmark, so to speak, amid the wilderness. Him I have endeavoured to throw into relief, so that even a child may be able to point to him, and say 'Here, at least, I find a fact and figure I can understand.'" One of the figures which the child is helped to understand is, of course, that debatable hero, the Cid. Mr. Williams very properly rejects the poetic legends which surround this outlaw, and represents him as "a robber, the most successful and unscrupulous of his age." The volume follows the traditions of the series to which it belongs, and can be warmly recommended. We should add that it includes the Spanish-American War and the settlement arrived at by the two Powers. (Unwin. 2s. 6d.)

THE MODERN ADAM.

BY A. W. À-BECKETT.

Mr. À-Beckett reprints in this book a number of his contributions to Punch. Therein we learn "How Things are Done" (the sub-title) with "the Voice," "the Sword," "a Pen," and "according to Experts." Mr. À-Beckett's style and humour are alike somewhat old-fashioned; but his advice is shrewd and his reminiscences interesting. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

Fiction.

Gerald FitzGerald the Chevalier. By Charles Lever.
(Downey & Co. 6s.)

THOUGH it was issued serially many years ago (small favour would it find with the editor of a modern popular magazine!), this novel is issued in volume form now for the first time. And to us, who happen to have read nothing of Lever's that belongs to his second and sedate period, it comes, indeed, as a book absolutely new. Approaching it with a certain coldness, and decidedly without enthusiasm, we have been impressed by its dignity, its work, its authentic excellence. It is a sound historical novel, largely and romantically conceived, imagined deeply, and executed with a fine feeling for atmospheres and the poetry of the past, which places it appreciably above the florid gimcrackery of Ainsworth, or the elaborate sterile ingenuities of to-day.

It has faults, and the most obvious fault lies in the style. Lever cared nothing for words. He never considered their values made them the subject of research. Like Dickens and George Eliot always, like Thackeray and the two Brontës generally, he was content to use the worn, common mintage, to do his thinking in ready-made phrases. The miraculous possibilities of language seem scarcely to have suggested themselves to that generation of writers, though they must have had some acquaintance with the past glories of English prose, and though young Ruskin was working the magic under their very noses. It is sufficiently strange; but in any case one would not expect verbal niceties or verbal grandeur from Charles Lever. One may not even rely on him for correct grammar.

Of course this defect of style, emphasised in Lever's case, touches and soils the imaginative quality of the work.

We have said that it is imagined deeply; at the same time one is conscious of a certain conventionality and lack of freshness, especially when the scenes are examined detail by detail. For example:

"Here's the Princess herself, I'll be sworn," said a coarse-looking fellow, as, seizing Mariette's arm, he tried to drag her forward.

With a blow of his clenched fist Gerald sent him reeling back, and then, drawing the short scimitar which he wore as part of his costume, he swept the space in front of him, while he grasped the girl with his other arm. So unlooked-for a defiance seemed for an instant to unman the mob, but the next moment a shower of missiles, the fragments of old Babbo's fortune, were showered upon them. Had he been assailed by wild beasts, Gerald's assault could not have been more wildly daring, he cut on every side, hurling back those that rushed in upon him, and even trampling them beneath his feet.

Bleeding and bruised, half-blinded, too, by the blood that flowed from a wound on his forehead, the youth still held his ground, not a word escaping him, not a cry . . .

Here, as in scores of other passages, each line, each phrase discloses an imagination perfectly content to spend its strength in doing an old thing in an old way, at every turn lazily choosing the hackneyed and the trite—declining, in fact, to be at the trouble to see life anew with individual eyes.

Yet there was strength and there was beauty, and when one finishes the book, and deliberately stands away from the details of it, this strength and this beauty become apparent. One grows conscious of the mournful, wistful charm of the central figure, that reputed son of Charles Edward, who, after a short life of petty intrigue at the courts of Italy and France, found death at the squalid hands of a drunken rascal. One perceives an essential and courageous realism of characterisation, particularly as regards the women, beneath the outer garment of conventionality. One appreciates the firmness and distinction with which historical persons such as Charles Edward, Mirabeau, Alfieri, Madame Roland, and Marat are handled. And, speaking broadly of the whole book, if it is not to be called great one may at any rate say that it is big, in the large manner. It impresses. It induces a mood. It has poetry.

A Millionaire's Daughter. By Percy White.
(C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd. 6s.)

WE do not consider that A Millionaire's Daughter is quite the author's best. Though full of Mr. White's gentle and effective satire, it has not the abundant cleverness of Mr. Bailey-Martin. Call it witty, sincere, capable—but not brilliant. Lawrence Durward, that needy and honourable aristocrat who became private secretary to a millionaire at a salary of a thousand a year, is scarcely the individual and recognisable figure that Mr. White's heroes are wont to be. And Margaret Blythe, heiress to millions, is a somewhat shadowy and elusive heroine. The sentimental relations of these two begin when the millionaire (a well-drawn character) is dead, and Mr. Durward enters upon his duties as trustee and executor. Had he liked, Lawrence might have married Maggie offhand, but he was over-scrupulous, too nice in his notions; and Maggie coquetted with another and less worthy lover, Lord Bellaton. Mr. White adopts an effete artifice when he makes Maggie engage herself to this second one on the strength of a false announcement of Lawrence's betrothal to a rich American girl. In the end Maggie and Lawrence find each other, and the scarcely-aroused sympathies of the reader are satisfied.

The most satisfactory character in the book, beyond all comparison, is Lady Durward, Lawrence's sister-in-law, a plotting and resourceful matron, to whom the aggrandisement of the Durwards is everything. The excellent dame fought with a Boudicean valour to break the engagement between Maggie and Lord Bellaton:

Dear Jane looked at me from the height of her magnificent superiority and said, "This is the man who faucies that he understands women! Listen to me, Lawrence! I am about to speak to you on a matter on which I must refuse all explanation, but you know that I am a woman of honour to be implicitly trusted."

"Certainly," said I.

"You know that I am some years older than Miss Blythe." She was fourteen years older, so I said, "Yes."

"But perhaps as a man—a man of the world—you cannot understand the strong sense of duty which one good woman feels for another."

"I think," I said modestly, "that I can."

"I hope you can," she answered, "for then you will not misunderstand me, nor my motives. As a married woman I have felt obliged to give Miss Blythe a serious warning. I, for one, was determined not to speak too late."

And Jane did not speak too late.

The Drones must Die. By Max Nordau.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

NORDAU enjoyed an enormous vogue through his Degeneration; but the vogue has passed, and he is now being rated lower than his true level. In fiction it would appear that he is improving, for The Drones must Die is a much better book than A Comedy of Sentiment. Whether it is quite good enough to merit translation we doubt.

It is a tale of cosmopolitan Paris; of adventurers; of the madness of speculation; of huge fortunes made and lost. With its heaped-up details of business, and its crowd of strange characters, it reminds one now of Soll und Haben and now of Numa Roumestan, with each of which it has something in common, though, of course, it is vastly inferior to either. It is an orgy of facts crudely observed; it deals chiefly with the inessential, the external, the superficial. Yet it has some fire, some real energy of movement. Henneberg's reception is a difficult bit of narrative skilfully handled. Henneberg is chief financier, and his relations with a certain Baroness make the most lurid and the best part of the story. The Baroness's recital of her early life—that "Odyssey of a girl," to use de Maupassant's phrase—is absolutely brilliant, steeped in colour, and convincing even in its commonness. The later scenes between these two are marred by the author's Teutonic heaviness of hand—a heaviness which not all his laborious absorption of French models has been able to cure.

"And now there is a corpse between us," she murmured dully: "that has been added to the rest!"

"What does it matter?" he answered, with blazing eyes and fiercely contracted lips. "I do not hesitate to step over it. Blood is a good cement—the very best. Whenever, in the time to come, you remember the man in there, you will remember also that I did not shrink from crime to win you for my own. Crime, I say, for had it been necessary I would have used my own hand to kill him as he has used his."

"You are horrible—go—go! I should wish at least to be able to think of you without shuddering." She clasped her hands over her face, and half turned her back upon him.

Henneberg was beside himself. He lost his last shred of self-control. Springing to his feet, he strode to the Baroness, laid his hand rudely on her shoulder—an action she suffered as if she had lost all power to resist—and burst out in a voice he hardly attempted to subdue: "I am to go, am I? I tell you I won't—I must have you. A dead man is lying in there, the roof is crumbling over my head, the end of the world has come for me! At a time like this, all disguises drop from us—our souls stand naked face to face."

Nevertheless, the intrigue of this miserably splendid pair saves the book. For the principal character, the pedagogic Koppel, we do not care in the least.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE ARM OF THE LORD. BY MRS. COMYNS CARR.

A hard old man is the central figure of Mrs. Carr's latest story. The conflict of religion and the world in his heart is sternly set forth, and the reader shares the curiosity of the villagers in watching to see whether poignant grief will soften and bend a man given to justice rather than mercy. (Duckworth. 3s. 6d.)

AT A WINTER'S FIRE. BY BERNARD CAPES.

Eleven short stories by the author of The Lake of Wine. One does not read half a dozen pages without being reminded that Mr. Capes is a bold seeker of phrase and epithet, and that he is apt to overdo his method. But these stories are vital and interesting, and one, "The Eddy on the Floor," is too weird to read after curfew. (Pearson. 6s.)

ORIENTATIONS. BY W. S. MAUGHAM.

A volume of short stories by the author of Liza of Lambeth. The title is explained by a passage from a French author, who states that for discovering what a young writer is really made of there is nothing like examining his novels, "which are like orientations for the ascertainment of a literary ego." The "novels" are various in character, but none touch the life depicted in the history of "Liza." (Unwin. 6s.)

PHILIP BENNION'S DEATH. BY RICHARD MARSH.

Mr. Marsh has quickly followed up his Frivolities, noticed in this page only a fortnight ago. The new work is fantastic melodrama. Bennion is killed in an entirely new way, which we will not reveal; but which, if Mr. Marsh's story has wide popularity, may have serious effects on the tobacco trade. (Ward & Lock. 5s.)

JESUS DELANEY. BY J. S. DONNELLY.

A story of Mexican life and character. The central figure is a young missionary, whose blood—Spanish, Irish, and Indian—is eventually too much for him and drives him to enlist as a soldier. The author would have been wise to have given his hero another name. We can believe that no thought of impropriety crossed his mind, but some of the sentences have a most unfortunate air, which interferes seriously with pleasure in a worthy book. To read it aloud, for example, would be literally impossible. (Macmillan. 6s.)

PETER BINNEY. BY ARCHIBALD MARSHALL.

Mr. Binney, aged forty-five, having made a fortune from Binney's Food for Poultry, decides to renew his youth by going to Cambridge and becoming an undergraduate. He does so, and his history is here recorded and dedicated to Mr. E. F. Benson, author of The Babe B.A. (Bowden. 6s.)

ROSALBA. BY OLIVE PRATT RAYNES.

The full title, Rosalba, the Story of Her Development; with other Episodes of the European Movement, more Especially as they affected the Monte Berici, near Vicenza, suggests that the story is historical, or at least political. But it is not. It is sprightly and feminine. The author offers it to the critics who approved of her first book, The Typewriter Girl—rather an odd form of dedication. (Pearson. 6s.)

SATAN FINDS SOME MISCHIEF STILL —. BY E. V. BEAUFORT.

This is described as "a character-study." It is a study of a modern, emancipated, fascinating girl and of the ruin she brings on other people's happiness as she advances with sure steps in her brilliant and selfish career. (Unwin. 3s. 6d.)

THE SHORT LINE WAR. BY MERWIN-WEBSTER.

A railroad story, told with much spirit by an American writer. The short line is the M. & T., a branch of the C. & S. C. Railway from Chicago to the West. Both by finance and muscle is the short line attacked; but Jim Weeks, the hero of the book and the President of the M. & T., is too much for the enemy. There is love, too. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE WINGS OF SILENCE. BY GEORGE COUSINS.

An Australian story of love and revenge and hidden treasure. The end: "He bent and kissed the girl at his side as he spoke, and then again addressing them, said, 'When I remember. . . . ' 'Look here, Clem,' protested Joe, 'don't remember; let's bury the past—' 'Yes,' cried Maud, interrupting in her turn, 'bury it for ever under 'The Wings of Silence.''" (Gay & Bird. 6s.)

THE DOLOMITE CAVERN. BY W. P. KELLY.

The author, in his preface, states that his story was refused by most of the firms in the kingdom before the present house accepted it; none the less, he says, it is uncommonly good—in fact, "a thing of beauty and a joy for ever." Without subscribing to this praise, we may say that it is a work of mysterious adventure on well-worn lines. (Greening. 3s. 6d.)

A MARITAL LIABILITY. BY ELIZABETH PHIPPS TRAIN.

The hero, Murray Voorst, is released from ten years' imprisonment for embezzlement. He is a gentleman, and the reader's sympathies are with him from the first, and, as it turns out, with good reason. The story deals with his new experiences with society and with womankind. A very readable novel. (Ward, Lock & Co. 3s. 6d.)

RUPERT BY THE GRACE OF GOD. BY DORA MCCHESENEY.

This "story of an unrecorded plot" is supposed to be told by Will Fortescue, and it deals with an attempt to place Prince Rupert on the throne of England. Such a plot may never have existed, but Miss McChesney, who has dealt with the period in other novels, and knows it well, considers Will Fortescue's story to be "strictly in accord with Prince Rupert's character and life; and not inconsistent with what is known of the current and counter-currents of the age." (Macmillan. 6s.)

LOVE THE PLAYER. BY HELEN V. SAVILE.

The story is laid among Irish Protestants in an Irish village. There is a good deal of village squalor and village gossip, but through it all strides the figure of John Craigie, a Catholic priest with two missions: "One to save souls from hell; the other, and the main object of my existence, is to destroy the body and soul of Hester's destroyer and of that child's father." (Sonnenschein. 6s.)

BUILDERS OF THE WASTE. BY THORPE FORREST.

"No, nurse," said Brenda, "I do not understand myself, I know; but every time I see him there is a something that repels me—a something that stretches out an arm and holds me off, and says, 'No further.' And I do admire him very much too," she added rather wistfully. The speaker is not a modern young woman discussing her lover, the scene is not a drawing-room. Brenda is a young British maid, the time is the year 545 A.D., and the scene is a small stockaded town in a clearing of the primeval Yorkshire forest. (Duckworth. 3s. 6d.)

RICHARD CARVEL. BY WINSTON CHURCHILL.

As we explained last week, this Mr. Winston Churchill is not the son of the late Lord Randolph Churchill—also a novelist—but is an American namesake. The novel before us is a romance of Maryland in the eighteenth century. (Macmillan. 6s.)

The Congress of Publishers.

It must, we feel sure, be admitted by all that the third International Congress of Publishers was, in every way, a great social success. Its Committee of Organisation worked indefatigably, and deserves the heartiest congratulation on the excellent arrangements made for the reception, entertainment, and comfort of the delegates and members of the Congress: the banquet given by the Stationers' Company was a most interesting literary function; the conversazione at the Guildhall was a brilliant, crowded, and representative gathering. One of the chief aims of the Congress was to promote among publishers of various nationalities an international friendliness. Complete success crowned the effort.

The Congress had its very practical business side. Papers were read dealing with many subjects purely of technical value, but we propose briefly to review one or two of the more important questions of general interest to English literature raised by its discussions.

The gravest problem the Congress had to face was certainly the steady cheapening of books. We confess to considerable surprise at the attitude of most of the speakers on this question—an attitude which seems to us unreasonable and unwise. Mr. John Murray, in his presidential address, spoke enthusiastically of the good old times, the glorious tradition of so many of the leading publishing houses of to-day, when books were prepared with the utmost deliberation, awaited with the utmost eagerness, when competition was almost unknown. He compared this "tradition" with the strain and stress of the present day, with its craving for cheapness, "the constant eagerness for what is new, the contemptuous neglect of much that is often but a few months old; the frequent failure of what is good and success of what is bad," and confessed that he was tempted to wish for a recurrence of the old times. But, in our opinion, Mr. Murray, and Mr. Bryce, and Mr. Lecky, who spoke in much the same strain, are mistaken in their premises, and therefore wrong in their conclusions. We admit at once that there is an enormous public that cares nothing for the highest things in literature and is content with "snippets and scraps which are always trivial, often worthless, not unfrequently pernicious." But this public is not the public of the good old times, but an entirely new band of readers. We believe that never before was the number of serious students of literature so numerous or so earnest. We believe that never before was the success of what is bad in literature so short-lived, so ephemeral; that never before was the ultimate success of what is good so certain. Even in the "good old times" much of the best literary work had to wait long for recognition and reward. In these days of much admittedly indiscriminate reading there is, too, a greater and more educated discrimination and appreciation than in the past. We are quite aware that the "public of snippets" is not a good judge of things literary, but we repeat that this public is a new one—a public that does not number in its ranks a single deserter from the old army of book-readers. It is a public nurtured by ever widening education—a public that in the early days of the century could not read at all. Compulsory education is bound to produce innumerable readers. Is it to be wondered at that, at first, these infants of letters do not attain to the heights of literary discretion? They are brought up on newspapers, which are more informative and educational to-day than ever before; they progress to the light food of snippets and illustrated magazines, of which, in the inevitable course of things, they are bound to tire. And then? Then they will join, one by one, the ever-increasing band of serious readers. They are joining every day, else what can you make of the success—and the remarkable success—of such series as Messrs. Cassell's "National Library" and Messrs. Dent's reprints? The huge sales of standard works at a popular price is no sign of decadence, but the outcome of the educated discrimination of a public which owes its first introduction to reading to the despised newspapers and "snippets." The publishers at the Congress seemed to wish to take upon themselves the education of readers, the selection of suitable books, the literary enlightenment of the world. It is a noble ideal, but surely a mistaken one. The publisher supplies a demand: does not create a demand.

We are sorry that the whole problem of registration was not raised in the debates of the Congress, for the present system is ridiculous and annoying. Mr. E. Bell read a paper on the exclusive right to titles, and suggested that there should be a separate registry of titles at the Copyright Office at Stationers' Hall, and that the Registrar should have a certain amount of discretion as to whether a title could be appropriated or not. We have nothing against this scheme, which is indeed a step in the right direction; but we are still of opinion that the whole work of Stationers' Hall should be done at the British Museum. The old grievance of presenting five copies of each book to the public libraries was brought up in a subsequent debate, and Mr. John Murray candidly told the meeting that publishers might protest if they liked, but that the Government, though frequently approached, held firm on the question. It is high time that registration became compulsory, and we are at a loss to see why the receipt of the British Museum authorities should not take the place of the receipt of Stationers' Hall. In the British Museum we have a complete and invaluable registry of all books issued, and if this were to be made of practical use to publishers they would have some compensation for the grant of free copies. We commend this suggestion to the Select Committee on Copyright now sitting.

Colonial copyright naturally came in for much discussion. Unfortunately, Mr. Putnam held out little hope of immediate change in the present American laws, for any change would mean a reversion of the protective policy. For the present, at least, all the tiresome formulae of simultaneous publication, separate printing, &c., will have to be adhered to in order to secure copyright in the United States. It is a great pity that the United States do not see their way to join the Berne Convention, but it must be remembered that under the present system the international rights of authors and publishers can be protected there much more satisfactorily than in Canada. Canada as a country, and Canadian politicians generally, refuse to look upon the Copyright question as one of any serious import. The present writer had a conversation on the subject not long since with a prominent Canadian, who declared that neither Premier nor Parliament were really greatly interested in the matter. The Canadians look upon copyright as some kind of noxious monopoly, and until a better understanding of the question is general there is little chance of satisfactory legislation. The position of Canada was long debated by the Congress—it was at least satisfactory to learn that Canada did not propose to withdraw from the Berne Convention—but seeing that the new Copyright Bill is likely to bring forward some definite proposals only a general resolution was passed. Prof. Mavor was hopeful of improvement, and suggested one or two minor reforms which might be carried out by English publishers, such as making impossible the simultaneous sales in Canada of the Canadian editions and the English Colonial editions of the same work; but it appears that Canada awaits the clauses in the new Copyright Bill before promising legislation. It is not a satisfactory state of affairs.

We have space only to mention one other discussion. Mr. Arthur Waugh read a paper on the length of quotations in reviews, but it was generally agreed that the present law was strong enough to deal with the question. It is not an easy thing to say whether even the longest quotations damage the sale of a book. If damage can be proved then the law can be brought into force.

Homage to Boz.*

WE can never see the hands of a public clock pointing toward the hour of one—we mean one o'clock in the afternoon, and not by any means one o'clock in the morning—without immediately recalling, and, as it were, expecting, the concussion of the mid-day gun as it saluted our ears in our native town. How often have we laughed in our thoughtless way (boyish and innocent enough, we dare affirm) when we have observed the effect of the unexpected bang on some bewildered old lady who recovered her wits just in time not to drop her reticule!

Sometimes the old lady took her revenge—if such an un-Christian idea could enter her head for a single moment—by laughing at our own fright when a cart-horse jumped at the sound, and the sudden jingle scattered our “seven wits,” to use a familiar term, these being already sufficiently confused by our morning’s task in school.

We have grown old and steady and subdued; and it would take much more than this to surprise us out of the mood of philosophical calm in which we are accustomed to take our one o'clock stroll down the Strand, the weather being sufficiently warm or cool. It was in the course of a perambulation of this kind that we found ourselves one day standing at the corner of Wellington-street. We were debating in our mind whether we would proceed to St. Paul’s to inspect the Dean and Chapter’s new wall papers or whether we would saunter towards the river and make a calculation of the speed of the Lambeth steam-boats—such harmless expeditions being much to our mind—when we were almost knocked over by a thin, tall, grey, eager individual, who was evidently swallowing, with some difficulty, the last mouthful of his luncheon, and wishing with all his heart and soul that he had washed it down with the beer he had providentially left in his tumbler. Something prompted us to follow this hasty person, but we had scarcely begun to do so when presto!—he disappeared. He had eluded our sight as quickly, and (it really seemed) with as much dexterity, as the clown who jumps over the riding-master’s head at Astley’s, having previously directed his master’s attention to the charms of Mademoiselle Pittilili.

The mystery was soon explained. Our impetuous friend had popped into Sotheby’s. Now Sotheby’s being familiar by name to everybody, as the place where they dispose of all sorts of books—that is to say, folios, quartos, octavos, duodecimos, and many other mo’s and to’s, some too big for their readers to lift, and some too small for them to see—Sotheby’s being, we say, the emporium of literature and the resort of literati, we no sooner discovered we were near its precincts than we felt a laudable desire to become better acquainted therewith; and, as the first object of our curiosity was to learn whether an auction was then in progress, we made proper inquiries, and were directed with great civility to the first floor.

The apartment which we entered was a plain, oblong room, at one end of which there was placed a desk which was more like a pulpit than any desk we have ever seen. And perhaps, if the truth were told, many a sermon has been preached from an auctioneer’s rostrum (as it is properly designated) which at least had the merit of not sending its hearers to sleep. Indeed, we have often thought what an interesting autobiography an auctioneer’s hammer could produce if it could only write down its own memories with half the emphasis that it squashes and annihilates other people’s.

Close to the rostrum we noticed a little boxed-in desk, with tiny railings round it, at which there sat, or rather bustled, for he was never at rest for a moment, a very dapper clerk. We have never been able to understand why auctioneers’ clerks are always dapper; but so it is, as you may discover for yourself if you have an atom of observation. As the minutes went on the room filled more and more, until it was full of black-coated gentlemen pushing among each other with pencils in their hands and pencils projecting from their lips, and catalogues in their hands and catalogues under their arms; so that just at first the catalogues and the pencils and the pencils and the catalogues made them all look exactly alike, which of course they were not. Suddenly we were aware that the auctioneer had taken possession of his rostrum. That is another peculiarity which we have noticed all our life at auctions. You are suddenly aware that the auctioneer is in the rostrum. Whence he comes, or how he comes, or in what manner he edges his way—no easy task, we do assure you, on a day like this—through the crowd of booksellers and connoisseurs we have never been able to discover with any satisfactory degree of exactitude.

But, while we were speculating, the bidding had commenced. If you imagine that there was a great deal of shouting, and disputation, and chinking of sovereigns and half-sovereigns, you are entirely and absolutely mistaken. Anything so decorous and so exceeding quick and soft as the bidding you never saw, or anything so gentle and alert as the auctioneer, who always spoke without excitement, even when he was running a mediaeval Who’s Who up to £100. “Thirty pounds,” he would say, and someone would say “Ten,” meaning £30 10s. We were much amused by observing one little pale-faced man with a very large forehead and a painfully restricted moustache, who wore a black cravat. This little man said “Ten,” “Ten,” “Ten,” “Ten,” like a bird, without so much as a wink, or even looking at the auctioneer; in fact, a careful scrutiny of his countenance had convinced us that he was a poor, weak fellow, when suddenly there ensued a long silence—“Well?” said the auctioneer, “Well?” and he wiped his spectacles to gain time—all auctioneers wipe their spectacles in their clients’ interest, except when they don’t happen to wear spectacles, and then they drop their pens on the floor and say “Oh dear!”—but no higher bid came, and when the hammer fell with a tap that would not have crushed a reasonably robust moth the man in the black cravat just said “Smithers,” and smiled faintly at a bucolic young man who wore a straw hat with a guard, being afraid of a little “breeze” arising between two rival booksellers, or so we were forced to conjecture.

If time permitted, and if we could support this amazing style of writing, which most willingly we admit is the Giant’s robe enfolding a literary Tom Thumb, we should select as our next portrait a very dear old gentleman of whose proximity to ourselves we had long been aware when he suddenly turned to us, and with a very puzzled and yet amiable expression inquired: “Pardon my intrusion, but have they finished selling the coins?” It was in our mind to answer that so far as our own unassisted observation went they had not yet finished raking them in;

* In another column we touch on the sales of Mr. William Wright’s Dickens collection at Messrs. Sotheby’s last Tuesday. A contributor, after pointing out that “Boz” did not include a Book Auction in his Sketches, although the subject must have proved congenial to him, has the boldness to attempt to give what might have been “Boz’s” description of a typical afternoon at “Sotheby’s.”

but our respect for age, and our instant perception of the old gentleman's amusing error—for he held in his hand a catalogue which had as much connexion with mediæval books as a quart pot has with Burgundy—led us to inform him that the sale of coins was probably being at that moment conducted on the next floor. A few moments later, happening to look toward the entrance, we caught sight of a pair of very clean white spats vanishing upward in the gloom of the stair-case. The incident sobered us, and something—we know not what—prompted us to put on our hat and depart. We fell into a train of reflection as we walked homewards upon the curious contradictions of life in this great metropolis; for here, in one building, were men who anxiously contended for the privilege of paying the coins of this age for the books of another, while others desired to obtain the coins of a period still more antique. Continuing our reflections, we soon alighted on the thought that these men were bidding for possessions which to the generality of mankind are for-bidden.

Things Seen.

The Pariah.

THE chestnut-trees were in full bloom, and something—it was not the chestnuts—took me to Hampton Court. Next to me on the top of the omnibus sat an old man. The conductor was taking the fares, and uttering the usual commonplaces of the district. Bushey Park was looking "just right," I gathered. Of all my fellow-passengers, my neighbour was the only one who appeared unappreciative. Each fresh remark—fresh only, it must be understood, to that load of passengers—made his sad look sadder. I felt that our sympathies were in common.

"You have not come to see the chestnuts?" I ventured.

"No," he answered wearily; "and you?"

"Chestnut-trees, particularly avenues of them, do not appeal to me," I said.

He looked at me with something of distrust at first, but seeing that I was in earnest, his face brightened a little.

"You can't think what it is to meet in this place at this time of year some one who is indifferent about chestnuts," he said. "Most of the people here think me eccentric. A few regard me in the light of a social outcast. 'There goes the man who does not like the chestnuts,' I hear them say. I can't help it though," he continued, gaining confidence. "I have lived among oaks—oaks that grow as nature planted them—and my years refuse to be reconciled to these long files of trees drawn up for all the world like some giant's army fighting for conventionality. And, do you know?" he whispered, laying his hand on my arm as he spoke, "I have a private notion that nature is all the time laughing at them. They are the overgrown babies of the tree world—these chestnut-trees, with their pointing blossoms. Flowers belong to little trees, in the same way that lace collars and curls belong to little children. Don't you think it is so?"

All around me rose a chorus of admiration from the sightseers as the omnibus entered Bushey Park.

Accident.

I HARDLY KNEW the familiar shop, for the window on either side was wrecked—that is the word—wrecked. The plate-glass was gone, save for jagged edges, that stuck out threateningly from the framework. Three policemen and a gaping crowd stood about the doorway, and against the curb rested what in the morning had been a hansom cab. The points of the shafts rested on the ground. The horse—there was no horse. But the routine of life must go on, spite of accidents, so I entered, and walked up the stairs to have my hair trimmed. For once, once only, in my life, I was willing that the barber should talk to me. "I was stropping my razor," he began, "when I heard the shouting, and there was the cab coming like mad down Chancery-lane. There was no cabman on the box, but a gentleman was inside, pale, but sitting tight. The horse was spread out like a windmill, and going like—like the wind. The wheel of the cab caught a cyclist and—and he went off his saddle like an arrow. My God! I never want to see another such sight; and there was the horse rushing straight for our door downstairs. Then came the crash; never heard such a thunder in all my life. The whole building shook. We all ran downstairs, some of the gentlemen with their chins all over lather. What did I see? I saw the horse, head and neck in the shop, and the cab sitting in the windows." "And what did the horse do?" "Do? What didn't he do. There was enough hairwash and tooth-powder on the floor to supply a regiment." "What then?" "Well, we got him out of the shop. The gentleman inside was one of our customers. He just walked up the stairs. 'Some cabs are quicker than others,' he said." "And the cyclist?" "Not hurt a bit. Nobody was hurt but the horse. They took him away. It was poor old Holocauste over again." A pause. "Yes," he said meditatively, "a barber's life has its excitements." "True," I replied, "true. Sometimes you cut a gentleman's chin."

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

FOR those who know little or nothing about the Royal house of Sweden, M. Christian Schefer's book on Bernadotte, lately published, will prove instructive and agreeable reading. Bernadotte he shows as a wise if not a great king, with a keen sense of duty and honestly attached to the country he adopted. We would admire him more if, when the moment came to change his religion and acknowledge that of his future subjects, he had made the change with something of Henry IV.'s genial cynicism. Paria vaut bien une messe is a frank and delightful way of yielding to circumstances. But Bernadotte, who knew as much about Lutheranism as he did about Buddhism, makes a solemn and hypocritical statement of sentiments he never possessed, to the delight of his easily gulled, solemn subjects. He informs the archbishop that, having had occasion to know some German Protestant ministers, in talking with them he has discovered that the Confession of Augsburg truly contains the word of God and the doctrine of Christ. Further researches strengthened him in the opinion that this is the true profession. And so, by persuasion and conviction, he publicly declares himself a follower of the Lutheran creed, to which at heart he had long been attached. There was not a word of truth in this statement; but as Bernadotte was a Gascon, doubtless before he came to the end of his harangue he believed it all.

Writing of his military career under Napoleon, M. Schefer says:

This man, who had always lived almost exclusively as a soldier, who had taken part in numerous campaigns and who distinguished himself on many an occasion, who was, by the admission of all, if not a superior general, a very able one, and whose bravery in every case was beyond doubt, this man—singular fact—had not, properly speaking, the military spirit. To be resigned to form but a part of a whole, to see only the general interest in making abstraction of his own individuality, to execute with intelligence and exactitude received instructions without wanting to substitute his own conceptions and without allowing himself to be influenced by considerations foreign to the service, these were all so many things he was radically incapable of.

His character had all the surprise and complexity of the Gascon temperament. General Marbot insists on his "nonchalance," and he was indeed extraordinarily indolent, loving to lie in bed until noon, and taking several hours to dress. Nobody could be more energetic than he when an effort was needed. We see him, under the spur of circumstances, ready to rise at four of a morning and stay till late at night in his cabinet, when minister, but the moment circumstances cease to have an imperious claim upon him, he returns to his indolent habits. As M. Schefer points out, he is habitually more restive than active. His temper is unquiet, suspicious; his angers are frequent and formidable in explosion. His wife, Queen Désirée, accustomed to these tempests, used to say: "He talks of killing everybody, and he would not harm a fly." The man was essentially, in all his moods, an actor. He was always on the scene, acting within an hour several parts. Without transition he could rush from fury to tenderness, drop from inflated eloquence into everyday familiarity; now indomitable, then crushed by a deception, a disappointment; now free and easy, then posing as the hero on a pedestal, generous and avaricious, hardened and sensitive, but always relatively sincere in all these various moods and attitudes, duping himself more readily than others, and ever the victim of a passion for applause. In spite of the theatrical emphasis of his moods, and a great deal of tall talk in his eternal harangues, he was never anything but a very mild Liberal without any precise notion of the meaning of Liberalism. "The words and sonorous phrases, which were the fashion of the hour," writes M. Schefer, "no doubt fascinated him, and his 'hatred of tyrants' his 'devotion to the country,' and his 'love of liberty,' must have been all the more sincere and lively in that he never felt any need to fathom their just significance, and his instinct made him always able to conciliate them with what he regarded as his interests."

What astonishes us the most in this life of a republican soldier of France transformed suddenly into a royal prince of a land so different from his own, is the man's perfect adaptability to circumstances so unexpected and so strange. Before his arrival, the Court of Sweden shuddered in anticipation of a coarse, ill-dressed, and swearing corporal. A marshal of Bonaparte, who had lived exclusively in camp and upon the highways of devastated Europe, must naturally, they thought, prove a kind of brute. Bernadotte arrived, a complete gentleman, perfumed, arrayed in fine linen, with boots so dainty and coquettish that the good people of Sweden stared, with manners and habits so fastidious and gallant and graceful that the queen, reassured, exclaimed: "Why, he is a perfect prince!" And so he was. Had he been born on a throne he could not have played the part of prince-royal more bravely, with a more seductive and picturesque show. He was so eminently elegant that even in later years, when he grew lazier and his days of vanity were over, he managed to give an air of majesty to his dressing-gown, which he wore till five o'clock of an afternoon. He could even inspire respect in receiving ministers in bed with his knees drawn up to his chin, while in that attitude he wrote or signed papers. The verdict of his subjects was that he was every inch a king.

M. Schefer tells the tale of his relations with Napoleon, but wisely refrains from making any futile apologies. This much, however, may be said for his disloyalty to his former chief: he had learnt his lesson in the school of the most heartless and unscrupulous of masters. If Napoleon had no faith in Bernadotte, Bernadotte had reason to feel far less in him; and in a fight for a throne, oddly enough it was the lesser man who won.

Memoirs of the Moment.

IN the event of a war with the Boers—a war which the party wire-pullers report as likely to be generally popular in the country—General Sir Evelyn Wood would be placed in command of the English forces. It is no secret that he has always thought his turn would come to pay off the old score which the Government at home withheld his hand from wiping out after the death of Colley at Majuba. It is a coincidence which places the biographer of Colley, General Sir W. Butler, in command at the Cape in these troublous times—a coincidence, or else a careful design. To him would fall the second part in any war we might wage against the men he has generously appreciated in his biography of the entrenched General whom, in their own vocabulary, "the Lord delivered into their hands."

THE reception of "Lucas Malet" into the Roman Catholic Church is only another instance of the working out of the laws of reaction. Charles Kingsley hated Popery with all his heart. It was his congenial task to show up the religion of his characters—the manliness of the Protestant, the cowardice of the Catholic. The verse of an English ballad that most commended itself to his sentiments was that which declared of Queen Mary's marriage:

The King of Spain—him
Is a Paynim,
A follower of Mahound;
And pity it were
If lady fair
Should marry a Popish hound.

Mrs. Harrison in becoming a Catholic modifies her father's extremes, and tones down his extravagances. His creations in real life correct the extravagances of his creations in fiction; and that is, perhaps, as he would wish it. Old age, such as were now his had he lived, softens asperities in minds that are still generously receptive. Even Cardinal Newman, the least forgiving of all adversaries, so far softened towards his old foe Kingsley as to suppress in his Apologia the most rhetorical passages of his scorn. "Away with you, Mr. Kingsley, and fly into space!" That sentiment he deleted before he died.

THE Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick, the Solicitor-General of Canada, will reach London in a few days. The astutest lawyer in the Dominion, and a man, besides, of large sympathies, he is particularly fitted to deal with the vexed question of the copyright laws relating to England and Canada. It is understood that Mr. Fitzpatrick brings over in his pocket a draft of the measure which will be brought before the Dominion Parliament in a few weeks, and which has for its double design the fostering of the printing and publishing trades in Canada (long sacrificed to American push) and the advantage of English authors, with whom Mr. Fitzpatrick intends to exchange views during his coming visit.

THE Venezuela Boundary Commission is likely to remain in session in Paris for some weeks, perhaps for some months. Elaborate as are the details to be discussed, the Commission enters on its labours with the best of hopes that a final settlement of the moot points and lines may be made. Lord Salisbury, it will be remembered, at first utterly refused to consider the English claims as open to arbitration. He talked of the Schomberg line as if it were a definite and easily to be ascertained boundary, by opposing which America would hurl herself against the might of England. A little investigation moderated that attitude, and the Commissioners meet each other with a very different front. They recognise that it cannot be easy to say where a stake was driven into the ground three hundred years ago, without the aid of recording charts or surveys. Happily the English Commissioner, Lord Russell of Killowen, will bring, first of all, common sense to the consideration of a problem which mere national dogmatism could never solve. Moreover, a happy accident has placed in Lord Russell's hands a certain amount of technical evidence from a quarter the most unexpected, —the Jesuits. That Society, of which a brother of Lord Russell's is a member, had its missions in Venezuela in ancient days; and in the home-letters of the missionaries are to be found allusions which, after the lapse of hundreds of years, serve to "place" a town here, or a river there, within the limits of this jurisdiction or that. Little did these sons of Ignatius Loyola imagine that the England from which they were then exiles would one day by their means be able to establish its remote borders in security and peace.

THE season at Boulogne began this week in sunshine, with the opening of the Casino and the drawing down of an army of bathing-machines to the sea-line. In some ways the most French of all towns—in the familiar costumes of the fisherwoman, for example—Boulogne keeps its integrity against the marks made upon it of necessity by its proximity to England. It is true that "Old England," "The George," and even "The Jubilee Restaurant" are among the signs which distress the eye of the tourist, but quite infrequently; and of real interest is the mixture of English with French in the patois of the fisher people—a marriage of dialects dating back to days when Boulogne was colonised by the English. A more modern association between the two countries is suggested by the statue of Jenner which faces England from the coast at Boulogne, and which France erected in grateful remembrance of the inventor of vaccination. Hard by you stumble over a pile of Dickens's reminiscences. In that little habitation he stayed one summer, and there is the dressing-room in which he finished Bleak House. The neighbours thought him every inch a Frenchman until he opened his mouth. At the unaltered Hôtel des Bains Thackeray was a guest, as readers of the Yellowplush Papers may easily remember.

THE house at Boulogne in which Dickens wrote Little Dorrit has been pulled down. It had, he thought, the most delightful of all the gardens attached to any house he had inhabited on the Continent. These grounds still remain, and little English, as well as French, children are playing in them to-day—the pupils of the nuns known as Ladies of Nazareth, who have built their chapel on the site of the house in which the children's author lived and wrote. Another memory, close at hand, is recalled by the reader of a recent popular biography. On these ramparts Sir Richard Burton first met Miss Arundell, the ruddy girl of whose hair owed nothing in those days to artifice. Here was their first love-making done, and you suspect this stone and that as being the guilty one on which the girl chalked the message of her mother's stubborn disapproval. Are there any disapproving mothers remaining? One would not think so in looking at the young girls on the ramparts on a sunny afternoon in June—the ramparts which, through all other mutations at Boulogne, have remained true to the old legend of love-making.

A Fable.

IN a certain inn yard dwelt fowls and ducks, kept thus near at hand that the hostess might in a moment dash upon one and bear it to the fire. Among them was a white duck of some age, called Top-Knot from a little tuft of feathers on her head. Of this crest she was insufferably vain, and she would pose and prink and put on a thousand airs whenever she thought herself observed, and boast of her youth and charms until she became almost unendurable to the other birds, particularly as she was never seized upon by the hostess. "You!" they would say, "you! Why, you're the oldest duck in the country. That's why you're never cooked." But Top-Knot took no notice, except to smirk the more, and suggest that her beauty was indispensable to the yard.

One day, with a great beating of hoofs on the cobbles, a carriage drew up and a grand stranger alighted. The host and hostess stood at the door and bowed to him by turns, and all the stablemen and wenches came out to help. "And what will your excellency have to eat?" the hostess asked him. "Duckling," said the great man, peering round the yard through his glasses, "duckling. A plump, tender duckling." At this moment Top-Knot strutted across the stones. "That one," said the stranger, pointing to her with his gold-headed cane. "With green peas." And he passed into the inn rubbing his hands.

Top-Knot died happy.

Correspondence.

"The Wine of Nature."

SIR,—May I be allowed to add two more moods in which the "Wine of Nature" is delightfully present?

The editor, merchant, banker, and man of sensibility has torn himself from the strenuous routine of his daily life. Newspapers and politics, stock exchange quotations and commercial intelligence, the hasty breakfast, the silk-hatted rush for the morning train were left far behind when the express headed for the woods, the downs, and the sea. He has slept well between the white, lavendered sheets, and now the glorious challenge of the cock and the blackbird's fluting mingle with the sun streaming in through his window, mingle in the fresh, delicious wine of early fragrant morn. He does not rise, but half in dream he hears the golden voices, the glamour of sleep still over him; soft and pleasant it is to lie there; all is green and sweet outside: this he knows because of the carolling he half hears and the murmurs he is faintly conscious of. He will not break the spell; he will not cross the threshold yet a little while. As the immortal and moral Watts says:

A little more sleep and a little more slumber.

He is content to be a—well, whatever the world may choose to call him.

The second of these moods comes after the fragrant coffee and foamy cream have been dispatched. He has no programme, all the roads are his, all the mystery of the woods, the perpetual voices of the sea, the fragrant hedgesides. He is free, gloriously free; and turning to his companion, how can he better express this sense of delight than by repeating Swinburne's "Love at Sea":

We are in love's land to-day;
Where shall we go?
Love, shall we start or stay,
Or sail or row?
There's many a wind and way,
And never a May but May;
We are in love's land to-day;
Where shall we go?

Is there not the very "Wine of Nature" in this?

I might add a third mood; but I will refer your readers to the late Roden Noel's poem, "Early April," a poem full of white light.—I am, &c.,

The Isaac Walton Inn.

SIR,—In your current issue Dean Hole recommends writers in want of a rest to go to the Isaac Walton Inn at Dovedale. Those who intend to take Mr. Dean's advice had better hurry up, for this classic inn (the best, too, as inns go, in the country) is to be turned into a mere private residence for the agent of the Right Hon. R. W. Hanbury, of Ham Hall, whose property it is. So the story runs in these parts.

It is rather an indignity, after having served with much generous fare many a generation of inoffensive anglers, to be thus converted to the mundane uses of domesticity! Private ownership in monuments of historic, literary, and artistic interest is not altogether a desirable institution. The disappearance as an inn of the old "Izaak Walton" will be a great blow to tired brainy men who have resorted thitherward; but what will be the effect upon piscators?

The May-fly is out on the Dove, Mr. Editor, and the great fat trout are rising!—I am, &c.,

Homer Nodded, Too.

SIR,—I notice, in your issue of June 3, that Mr. Algernon Ashton has suggested that a tablet should be affixed to No. 17, Elm Tree-road, St. John's Wood, "the house wherein the poet [Thomas Hood] died." Hood did not, however, die in Elm Tree-road, but at Devonshire Lodge, Finchley-road, a house which was pulled down some years ago.—I am, &c.

Garriick Club, W.C.: June 5.

Horace Smith and J. G. Lockhart.

SIR,—In Longman's Magazine for June, Mr. Andrew Lang has replied at some length to my observations concerning his remarks in his Life and Letters of J. G. Lockhart upon Horace Smith's connexion with the fatal Scott-Christie duel of 1821.

My view of what appears to be a complex affair is as follows: Mr. Lang had to make clear Lockhart's part in the literary squabble that led to the duel, and also to explain why he did not "take the field," there being, as Mr. Lang remarks, a tradition that Lockhart should have "come forward," and not have allowed his friend Christie to bear the brunt of the fray. In justice to Lockhart, however, it may be stated that there was a sufficient reason why he should not risk his life at that particular period, his wife's confinement being imminent; consequently, no imputation rests upon his courage.

Mr. Lang, in his natural desire to transfer all blame for the supposed "shufflings" which characterised the negotiations preceding the duel to other shoulders than those of Lockhart and his friends, found a scapegoat in the person of Horace Smith, who, according to Lockhart's biographer, "cuts a poor figure" in the affair. Accordingly, what Mr. Lang honestly believed to be a grave inconsistency between a statement made by Horace Smith in 1821 and another made by him twenty-six years later was brought prominently forward, in order to still further exonerate Lockhart. But I contend that no such inconsistency existed.

Scott led the public to believe, by means of circulars, &c., that Horace Smith had promised to act as his second in a possible duel with Lockhart. As a matter of fact, Scott had not obtained any such promise. All that Horace Smith undertook was to act as a "mediator," and this is confirmed by Cyrus Redding, a well-known writer and friend of Horace Smith, who, in his Fifty Years' Recollections (1858), says: "Horace Smith was named by Scott as an umpire in the affair, but he withdrew from it when he found the quarrel tended to a personal encounter of which he disapproved."

Yet in the face of this, and of Horace Smith's explicit statement in his Recollections (1847), Mr. Lang still appears to believe that Horace Smith did consent to act as a second. Moreover, Mr. Lang brings the following grave accusation against Horace Smith, a man of unimpeachable veracity and honour. He says:

The Mr. Smith of 1821 [in his letter to Scott] was inducing the public to believe that "satisfaction" [which Mr. Lang, in Longman's, interprets as "acting as a second"] would be given if a condition were fulfilled which he knew would not be fulfilled. The Mr. Smith of 1847 [in his Recollections] tells us that he never would have been a party to any such transaction [acting as a second in a hostile meeting] in any circumstances, and that Mr. Scott knew it.

Horace Smith's letter of 1821 stated that he was authorised by Scott to give Lockhart "satisfaction" if the latter would make the avowal required by Scott (i.e., in connexion with Lockhart's supposed management of Blackwood's Magazine).

In his Recollections, Horace Smith again makes use of the term "satisfaction." He says that he told Scott, in 1821: "Your charges [against Lockhart] are either false or true. If the former, you must instantly give the satisfaction required, by publicly retracting all that you have erroneously asserted, and by making a full, frank, unequivocal apology."

Has not Mr. Lang put a wrong construction upon the word "satisfaction" as used by Horace Smith, who obviously employed it in the sense of "atonement" or "amends," and not to indicate his willingness to act as a second in a duel?

Nothing, to my mind, can be more consistent than the two statements of Horace Smith; and his conduct throughout the miserable transaction was marked by the greatest common sense and humanity.

On the other hand, one cannot help noticing that Lockhart's carelessness in omitting to forward to Scott the all-essential portion of an explanation, which, if received by him, might, as Mr. Lang admits, have prevented a duel, was most reprehensible; while poor Scott's conduct in quoting Horace Smith as his second, without authority, was decidedly culpable.

If anyone "cuts a poor figure" in the affair, it is not the author of Rejected Addresses.

Mr. Lang apologetically says in Longman's: "I was obliged to tell all the truth I knew about the matter which tradition had perverted." And in my recent Life of James and Horace Smith it became my duty, as their great-nephew, to defend Horace Smith from what I considered undeserved and groundless censure.—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 36.

To ask for a list of the five most underrated living authors is easier than to decide upon the best list that is sent. Upon the whole, however, we think that Mr. S. K. Ratcliffe, The Clapham School, High-street, Clapham, S.W., should have the prize, although we do not admit participation in his opinion. His five are as follow:

Aubrey de Vere.
Michael Field.
Robert Bridges.
W. Hale White ("Mark Rutherford").
A. E. Housman.

Other contributors have included authors who are not precisely underrated, but are not highly rated by a sufficient number of readers—a different thing. Mr. Meredith and Mr. Swinburne, for example, whom some lists include, are not underrated, but are merely unpopular. Other names which are mentioned more than once are Mrs. Meynell, Mrs. Clifford, Mrs. Woods, "Lucas Malet," Mr. Gissing, Mr. Henley, Mr. Samuel Butler, Mr. Baring Gould, Mr. Francis Thompson, Mr. Henry H. James, Mr. Alfred Austin, Mr. J. H. Pearce, and Mr. F. W. H. Myers. It is possible that one or two of these might, with advantage, take the place of names in the prize list, but the list, as a whole, is the best.

Replies received from: A. H. M., Eccles; J. P. E., London; C. E. H., Richmond; M. H. L., Sheffield; T. J., Lincoln; G. A. F., Uxbridge; S. P., Manchester; B. B., Birmingham; W. E. T., Bristol; W. H. Competition No. 37.

During the week a statue of Charles Darwin has been unveiled at Oxford. We offer a prize of a guinea to the author of the best inscription suitable to have been placed on its pedestal. The competitors, in attempting the task, should remember that the lapidary style, as it is called by the Spectator, which is just now conducting an excellent correspondence on mural inscriptions, has certain important characteristics. We limit the inscription to forty words, in which Darwin's character and achievement must be set forth.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, June 20. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 615 or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

Announcements.

MR. JOHN LANE announces for early publication a reprint of Robert Stephen Hawker's poems. The volume will be edited by Mr. Alfred Wallis, and will contain a memoir and bibliography. Included also in the volume will be the Trelawney ballad, famous for the controversy respecting its authorship, which has lasted down to the present day, and in which such literary giants as Sir Walter Scott and Lord Macaulay once took part.

LADY DILKE, who, it is well known, has for some years made a study of French art of the last century in all its branches, has in the press for publication in the autumn a volume entitled French Painters in the Eighteenth Century. It will be richly illustrated.

MESSRS. METHUEN have just published a work entitled The Heart of Asia, by Mr. F. H. Skrine and Prof. E. D. Ross. It is an account, historical, political, economical, and descriptive of Russian Central Asia.

streets were blocked with snow. With what we had brought them, the garrison had a good supply of food, but scarcely enough fuel to cook it, and none whatever wherewith to keep themselves warm.

I made inquiries for the Pasha in command, and was directed to a house occupied by him. Through the interpreter I asked the guard in what room he was to be found, and he pointed out the door to me. On entering, I saw, literally, a pile of bodies, a dozen or more heaped up together and all asleep. They were awakened by the noise we made, and as they uncoiled themselves, the Pasha was discovered at the bottom of the heap, where he had kept himself warm by having men instead of blankets piled over him.

When he learned that a steamer had come to him with provisions, he soon got over his resentment at having been so

The Literary Week.

THE Art Workers' Masque, to be produced at the Guild-hall next Tuesday and following nights, deserves close attention. The pains and thought and time that have been devoted to this experiment by the Art Workers' Guild alone render it worthy of all encouragement, apart from the interest that naturally attaches to a careful and accurate revival of so beautiful a form of entertainment as the masque, the delight of Elizabethans and Stuarts. The Art Workers' Masque tells the story of "The Sleeping Beauty," with allegorical circumstances added; and everything has been done to make it charming and sumptuous and historically right. The fact that the Prince of Wales will probably be present introduces the element of royalty which seems indispensable to a masque's successful performance.

AN extra Summer Number of the Studio will shortly be ready, containing not only the text of the masque, but also illustrations of a large number of the designs for this unique undertaking.

THE great bazaar just held at the Albert Hall, in aid of Charing Cross Hospital, derives literary interest from the elaborato Souvenir volume which Mr. Beerbohm Tree, assisted by Mr. Lionel Hart, has edited. The contents include contributions from authors so far apart as the Poet Laureate and Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Hall Caine and Mr. Max Beerbohm; and consist of poem, essay, play, and anecdote, while the ranks of the artists have also been levied upon. The literary contributors are represented by a portrait and a scrap of autograph.

MR. BIRRELL, who is always pertinent, moralises prettily on Dr. Johnson's remark that, though Fleet-street is animated, the full tide of existence is at Charing Cross. Mr. Lang also contributes a literary essay, Mrs. Humphry Ward a sunny account of an Italian villa in spring, and Mr. Sidney Lee describes Shakespeare's first summons to Court.

POETRY is represented by the Poet Laureate, Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Henley, Mr. Watts-Dunton, Mr. Watson, Mr. Davidson, Sir Lewis Morris, and certain other lyrists better known by their prose. Mr. Swinburne sends three roundels—"At a Dog's Grave"—from which we quote one:

To die a dog's death once was held for shame;
Not all men so beloved and mourned shall lie
As many of these, whose time untimely came
To die.

His years were full; his years were joyous; why
Must love be sorrow, when his gracious name
Recalls his lovely life of limb and eye?

If aught of blameless life on earth may claim
Life higher than death, though death's dark wave rise high,
Such life as this among us never came
To die.

Mr. Alfred Austin's verses celebrate the courage displayed at the wreck of the Stella.

AMONG the poets better known for their prose is "John Oliver Hobbes," with a little song from her new drama "Osborn and Ursyne":

"Adieu," said he. Adieu she could not say.
"Farewell," said he. "Farewell; this is a day
That we must long remember, you and I."

"He's gone," said they. "Come forth, clouds, fill the sky,
The rain will fall ere you have felt the sun"
"Shines the sun still? I thought rain had begun."

MME. BERNHARDT'S Hamlet is not Hamlet at all, and the French text is as ineffectual as, say, a version of "In Memoriam" by the late Martin Tupper might be. The shell is there, the sombre background, the moving incidents; but the temper, the vigour, the pathos of the lines have gone. "There's the rub" becomes "C'est l'obstacle." "Hamlet" at the Adelphi is but a strong and extravagant melodrama, and yet the performance kept the present writer and, indeed, the whole audience enthralled for close upon four hours. Why? Because Sarah Bernhardt is just herself: because that active, intelligent, penetrating brain glimmered and shone and cut like lightning through every phase of her impersonation. Hamlet? No! Hamlet was a man of fine breeding, and fine feeling, impatient of fools, intellectually arrogant, if you will, but a gentleman. Not the man to throw a book at the head of Polonius, or to climb the throne like a cat and snarl in the king's face, or to thrust a torch between his eyes at his cry for "Lights! Lights!" Hamlet's anger becomes vindictive, feline. Of the large utterance of great grief that informs his purpose—justice rather than revenge—there is small hint. The soliloquies from Mme. Bernhardt's lips do not impress. In a word, this is not Hamlet. It is Sarah Bernhardt in black doublet and hose—brilliant, fascinating, magnetic in every utterance and gesture—Sarah Bernhardt, not another. When she is on the stage, you lean forward, stimulated, entranced, annoyed; when she is off, you lean back and wish her on.

WE have never seen a better Ophelia. In the hands of Mdlle. Marthe Mellot, Ophelia becomes what she should be—a subsidiary character, an aid to the development of the tragedy—no more. Her hour's traffic, like that of Polonius, but advances the development of the tragedy to that ultimate line, suggested rather than spoken by Mme. Bernhardt, with finger on lip—"The rest is silence."

IN the July number of the Bookman a number of reviewers will give their opinion on the question of "Multiple Reviewing."

MR. MAURICE HEWLETT'S new book, which is now in the press, will be entitled Little Novels of Italy.

LORD ROSEBURY'S volume of Appreciations and Addresses will be issued on Saturday by Mr. John Lane.

M. HURET's monograph on Sarah Bernhardt, which has just been published in an English form by Messrs. Chapman & Hall, has a preface by M. Rostand in the form of a letter to the author. Among other things, M. Rostand says: "It seems to me, Jules Huret, that the life of Mme. Sarah Bernhardt will perhaps form the greatest marvel of the nineteenth century. It will develop into a legend. To describe her tours round the world, with their ever-changing scenes and actors, their beauties and absurdities, to make the locomotives and steamers speak, to portray the swelling of seas and the rustling of robes, to fill up the intervals of heroic recitative with speaking, singing, shouting choruses of poets, savages, kings, and wild animals: this would need a new Homer built up of Théophile Gautier, Jules Verne, and Rudyard Kipling."

AMONG the stories which M. Huret has collected is this: "One day Madame Bernhardt happened to enter a Protestant church and heard the minister denounce her as an 'imp of darkness, a female demon sent from the modern Babylon to corrupt the New World.' Before the day was over, the clergyman received this note—

MY DEAR CONFRÈRE,—Why attack me so violently? Actors ought not to be hard on one another.

SARAH BERNHARDT."

ACCORDING to a writer in the Atlantic Monthly the time has come for English novelists to cease from reading in public in America. America is not in need of them, says this critic: "lecturing people who are lectured, without alien aid, to the full measure of endurance, and telling stories to people who need restraint rather than example in such practices, are things that lack even the saving merit claimed by St. Paul for his sermons, to wit, foolishness." This may be true; but whether or not the practice of public readings will stop depends, we fancy, less upon the Atlantic Monthly than Major Pond.

THE house in Cromarty where Hugh Miller was born is reported to be fast falling into ruins for want of any attention. The thatch on the roof has rotted, and large patches have fallen off; the rafters are decaying, and the walls are in a parlous state. Cromarty is a quaint old place, but it cannot afford to lose so inspiring a landmark as Hugh Miller's birthplace. Besides, the house is worth preserving quite apart from that, for it was built by Hugh Miller's great-great-grandfather, John Feddes, the buccaneer, associated with whose life is a happy romance. John loved a pretty girl, Jean Gallie, but his suit was rejected. On the wedding night he disappeared, and it was reported that he had committed suicide. Tradition adds this graphic touch to the story, that Jean, looking through the window, saw lights on the firth, which she was told were boats looking for John's body. Jean's married life was unhappy, and her husband drank himself to death. Many years afterwards John returned a wealthy man, and married Jean out of her poverty. It turned out that he had boarded a smuggler on the night of the wedding, and had made a good thing out of buccaneering, and he built the cottage, now so badly in need of repair, with Spanish gold.

ONE's first feeling in looking at The Political Struwwelpeter which Mr. H. Begbie and Mr. F. C. Gould have prepared is wonder that the old book has never done duty in this way before. Nothing could be more natural than the line which these parliamentary satirists have taken; Dr. Hoffmann seems to have held out his arms to them with the promise of every assistance. Our fear is, that the simplicity of the way having been shown, other versions of Struwwelpeter will follow, for the idea is good enough to be worked again and again. This time, for example, Cruel Frederick is personated by Mr. Chamberlain, Harriet by Lord Rosebery, the Great Agrippa by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and Little Suck-a-thumb by Mr. Balfour. To-morrow they might all be changed again, and so on through unceasing combinations. We trust that such a prospect is not in store; but there is, with all its cleverness, a want of inevitableness about this skit which suggests it.

MR. BEBBIE figures the British Lion as his Shock-headed Peter:

See the British Lion pose,
Wildly groping for his foes!
Men who tinker up the laws
Never manicure his claws;
And you will observe with pain
No one ever crimps his mane;
Seeing that he's so neglected,
Do you wonder he's dejected?

The other verses are in a similar vein, and they all leave the impression that a little more care would have made them twice as telling. Mr. Gould's adaptations of the original drawings are masterly.

THE results of earthquakes are of two varieties—immediate and remote. The immediate result of the Hereford earthquake of 1896, for example, was to rattle crockery, crack windows, and project feeble residents of Shrewsbury and its neighbourhood out of bed. Its remote result is the publication of a new kind of book, the most elaborate study of a seismic disturbance ever yet produced, at any rate in this country, where seismology is not exactly a paying branch of science.

THE work has been compiled, under the title of The Hereford Earthquake of 1896, by Mr. Charles Davison, Sc.D., F.G.S., who has certainly spared no pains to make it exhaustive, and it is published by Messrs. Cornish, of Birmingham, and more than half of it consists of testimonies of persons in the affected districts. To the mind not attracted by seismology these testimonies are the most interesting part, if only as a study in analogies. For instance, one witness, at Hereford, compares the noise to six traction engines, another to the booming of heavy artillery, another to a heavy steam-roller, another to a bomb, another to a heavy cart and a falling chimney, another to a train in a tunnel, another to a blasting. To someone at Clifton the sound resembled "the pedal notes of a great organ, only of a deeper pitch than can be taken in by the human ear, shall I say a noise more felt than heard?" To someone else less poetically constructed it recalled sewing machines being moved overhead.

SOMETIMES the reports have something of the solemnity of "Revelation." Here is one: "When in the wood I was startled by a sort of hissing noise, followed by a rumble which made the ground shake under me. The trees seemed to clash together, then tear one another apart. I had not gone many steps before the second report, louder than the first. . . . The whole woods seemed in an uproar, the birds flying about, sheep running as though chased by a wild beast. In that part of the wood two streams of water meet; it seemed to stand still at the time of the shock." As a patient memoir of an interesting natural phenomenon, Mr. Davison's book deserves the highest praise.

Two very different, but at the same time very interesting libraries, are now in the market. Prof. Foxwell, of the chair of Political Economy at University College, London, is disposing, says the Economic Journal, of his collection of over 25,000 volumes and pamphlets bearing upon his special subject. Prof. Foxwell's library has been called by Dr. Bonar "the finest English economic library in the world." The late Mr. Gleeson White's art books are also now ready for the inspection of collectors at 16, Shaftesbury-avenue. A catalogue has been prepared in two forms, one being strictly a list of the books, and the other containing a portrait of Mr. White and a memoir by Prof. York Powell.

Among the French Academy prizes awarded last week was 1,000*fr.* to Mme. Darmesteter for her Vie de Renan. This work, we may point out for the benefit of readers who do not know it, was written twice by its accomplished author—first in the French form, which has just been deservedly honoured, and then in English.

THE ingenious Nebraska magazine, the Kiote, grows in merit, if not in modesty. This month, as a special concession, it prints a poem by Mr. W. Schuyler-Miller, with the warning that such excellences must not be looked for often at the present rates of subscription. This being so, we are the more disposed to quote Mr. W. Schuyler-Miller's poem, which is a good little piece of sterling homely human nature:

LOVE AND DUTY.

It's been the derndest, slowest afternoon
I've seen for more'n a month. It ain't because I've worked so awful hard. I ain't plowed half
What any other fellow'd done, I s'pose.
The team's all right; the ground's a-workin' fine;
The field's a-needin' plowin', too. You'd think
I'd keep 'em goin' lively, but, I jing,
I jest can't do it. When I turn around
Down at the other end, there, next the house,
Or stop a bit to clean the shovels off,
Jest like as not I'll fool around and take
Three times as long's I really ought to do.

A fellow shouldn't act jest this-a-way
An' waste the whole endurin' afternoon,
An' keep a-lookin' all the time to where,
Down to the house across the pasture lot,
She's visitin' our folks.

WE find also in the Kiote, hidden away in an essay on "The Noble Liar," the following poem. It may be new, it may be old; it does not rhyme; it is not metrical. And yet it is good:

I carried the old Bishop a bunch of roses this morning,
And when I handed them to him he said,
"Wait, my daughter, there are thorns upon them."
Then he took out his knife, saying,
"Give me one at a time."
I watched him while he carefully cut away each thorn.
"Do you always cut off the thorns, Bishop?"
He looked at me with an appreciative twinkle in the dark of his eye,
Set deep under the shaggy brows, and said, "Yes; don't you?"
"No," I said, "I am a woman;
I only hold my rose tight, and smile,
And let the blood trickle, and say,
'My rose has no thorns!'"

If the Kiote can continue to print such striking and unaffected truthfulnesses as these it will do a good work.

MR. ALFRED WALLIS, the editor of the complete edition of The Poetical Works of Robert Stephen Hawker, which Mr. Lane has just published, writes in his introduction that "a biography of this remarkable man, whose strong individuality and mental power are impressed indelibly upon his poetical work, is a desideratum." This is certainly true. An edition of Hawker's prose might also well be prepared. Mr. Wallis thus sums up the famous Cornish parson: "As a priest of the Church of England, he was honest, conscientious, sincere; as a man, just and upright in all his dealings with mankind; and as a poet, few writers of our own day can equal him. None can claim a better title to the esteem, and even affection, of those who will only know him through the medium of his works."

MR. RICHARD MARSH writes: "Will you allow me to state that my story, Philip Bennion's Death, referred to in your current issue among the fiction of the week, was originally issued some three years back by Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. at a shilling? Why they are now re-issuing it as a new novel at three shillings and sixpence I cannot say. The copyright not being mine, I have no voice in the matter. I shall esteem myself further favoured if you will let me say that no book containing fresh matter of mine has appeared since The Beetle in September, 1897, and that the first story I have written since then will be published in September of this year."

THE last of the old wood-engravers, Mr. Henry Duff Linton, died on Saturday last at Norbiton. Born in the early years of the century, he lived far into days of "process" work: days in which wood-engraving is no longer really regarded as an art. A brother of William James Linton, he was associated with him and Orrin Smith in the production of the illustrations for the early numbers of the Illustrated London News. He was also a partner with his brother and others in various venturesome publications, in which many beautiful specimens of his work may be found. Mr. Linton is mourned by his family, but most of his contemporaries have already passed away.

AT a time of Tammany revelations and Chicago investigations, it is worth remembering, writes a correspondent, that Shadwell (Dryden's "MacFlecknoe"), in his Epsom Wells (1672), makes Clodpate, the country justice, "a hearty, true English coxcomb," describe the London justices thus: "They are the greatest Malefactors there: they make a pretty Trade on't in the Suburbs, with Bribes receiv'd from Pads, Pickpockets, and Shop-lifts, with the Taxes they raise from labouring —, and contributions from Tributary —" If this was even approximately true, Londoners should not exult at Transatlantic revelations of official iniquities, nor the citizens of New York and Chicago despair.

ONCE again have the women writers dined and smoked together. On this occasion the number of guests was two hundred. Miss Elizabeth Robins ("C. E. Raimond") took the chair and proposed the health of the author of Leaves from a Journal in the Highlands; Miss Honnor Morten, the honorary secretary, reviewed the progress of the Society and exulted in their passage from ridicule to numerical strength; Mrs. Steele spoke wittily and well; and Mrs. Meade expressed the belief that critics neither aided nor abetted the sale of books.

THE ninth volume of Miss Hetherington's Annual Index to Periodicals, covering the year 1898, is now in the press and will be issued shortly.

A LITERARY parallel has been discovered by a correspondent of Literature, which, if accidental, is most extraordinary. In Mr. Hall Caine's novel, The Christian, one of the characters, Lord Robert Ure, describes the effects of John Storm's dramatic prediction of the destruction of London:

I counted seventeen people on their knees in the streets — upon my soul, I did! Eleven old women of eighty, two or three of seventy, and one or two that might be as young as sixty-nine. Then the epidemic of piety in high life too! Several of our millionaires gave sixpence apiece to beggars—were seen to do it, don't you know? One old girl gave up playing baccarat and subscribed to "Darkest England." No end of sweet little women confessed their pretty weaknesses to their husbands, and now that the world is wagging along as merrily as before, they don't know what the devil they are to do.

The picture is convincing or not according to the reader's temperament. The reason for detaching the passage from the novel, however, is to place beside it the following sentences from Swift's "True and Faithful Narrative of What passed in London During the general Consternation"—following the prediction of the imminence of the end of the world by the preacher William Cheston. Swift wrote:

I . . . counted at least seventeen who were upon their knees and seemed in actual devotion. Eleven of them, indeed, appeared to be old women of about four score; the six others were men in advanced life, but (as I could guess) two of them might be under seventy. . . . It was remarkable that several of our very richest tradesmen of the city in common charity gave away shillings and six-pences to the beggars who plied about the church doors. . . . Three great ladies, a valet de chambre, two lords, a Custom House officer, five half-pay captains, and a baronet (all noted gamblers) came publicly into a church at Westminster and deposited a very considerable sum of money in the minister's hands. . . . I forbear mentioning the private confessions of particular ladies to their husbands.

Mr. Hall Caine's reply has yet to come. The likeness between the two descriptions may be purely accidental, and Mr. Caine may never have seen Swift's document. But if he has intentionally adapted an actual account of such a panic, it is a great pity he did not acknowledge the loan. No one would think less of his own narrative powers.

Bibliographical.

THE late Mr. Augustin Daly comes within the scope of this column, if only on account of his fondness for printing and circulating, privately, handsomely got-up brochures on subjects in which he was especially interested. One of these, for instance, he devoted to the professional career of Miss Ada Rehan, the "leading lady" for whom he did so much, and who, in her turn, did so much for him. Mr. William Winter, I believe, was the author of this narrative and éloge, which, produced originally in 1891, was, seven years later, revised, reprinted, and issued to the public on both sides of the Atlantic. Another of Mr. Daly's brochures was on Peg Woffington (1888), and one of the twenty-five copies printed is in the British Museum. Yet another was entitled Memories of Daly's Theatres, printed privately in 1897. This was not written by Mr. Daly, but it embodies, in effect, his biography. It is charmingly illustrated, and ought some day to be made generally accessible, for, besides telling the story of Daly's life as critic, playwright, and manager, it illustrates very largely the history of the American stage between 1862 and 1895.

In the various obituary notices of Mr. Daly in the English Press very much less than justice has been done to his fecundity and (I may say) importance as a playwright (I do not say "dramatist"). Few people seem to know that he was the author of that version of Dr. Mosenthal's "Deborah"—"Leah the Forsaken"—in which Miss Kate Bateman made so great an impression both in the States and over here, and which has beaten all other versions out of the field. It was Daly's first acted work. His second was an adaptation of "Dorf und Stadt," his third an adaptation of "Le Papillon" (called "Taming a Butterfly"). Then came a dramatisation of Reade's "Griffith Gaunt," a melodrama called "Under the Gaslight," an adaptation of "The Pickwick Papers," a drama named "The Red Scarf," and a melodrama entitled "A Flash of Lightning"—all written and produced before their author became, in 1869, a theatrical manager.

After 1869 came an adaptation of "Frou Frou"; dramatisations of Wilkie Collins's "Man and Wife" and "No Name"; a drama called "Divorce"; adaptations of Belto's "Article 47," of "Alixé," of Mosenthal's "Madeline Morel," of Sardou's "Maison Neuve," of Dumas fils "Monsieur Alphonse," of Augier's "Gabrielle"—all before 1875, in which year Mr. Daly began, with "The Big Bonanza," that long series of adaptations from the German by which he is best known to English audiences. After that he wrote two original plays—"Pique" and the "Dark City"—and half-a-dozen or more adaptations from the French. Of all these pieces, only two, so far as I can discover, have been printed in England—"Under the Gaslight" and "Leah the Forsaken," the former of which is published both by French and Dicks.

I see we have a new story from the pen of "Rolf Boldrewood." Robbery Under Arms, I confess, is the only tale by that writer which I have ever been able to get through; but that he has a public in England would seem to be proved by the numerous books by him which have been published in this country. Robbery Under Arms was brought out in three-volume form by Remingtons in 1888, and in the following year was issued by Macmillans in much cheaper shape; last year they issued it at the nimble sixpence. Since 1889 we have had a whole flight of "Boldrewood" books: A Colonial Reformer, A Miner's Right, and The Squatter's Dream, all in 1890; A Sydney-Side Saxon (1891), Nevermore (1892), A Modern Buccaneer (1894), The Crooked Stick and The Sphinx of Eaglehawk (1895), The Sealskin Cloak and Old Melbourne Memories (1896), My Run Home (1897), and Plain Living and A Romance of Canvas-Town and Other Stories (1898). Clearly there must be those for whom the work of "Rolf Boldrewood" has attractions. Meanwhile, it would seem that his first book brought out in England was that called Ups and Downs, which was published here more than twenty years ago.

The promoters of the Alfred the Great commemoration have done well. I think, to issue a book which should "diffuse, as widely as possible, public knowledge of the king's life and work." I may be wrong, but I fancy that "public knowledge" is small, and assuredly I see no signs of enthusiasm in the matter. The Poet Laureate published not so long ago a dramatic poem in which he described Alfred as "England's darling," but I doubt if England cares very much about Alfred now. "Truth-teller was our English Alfred named," sings Tennyson in his Ode on Wellington; and the late Tom Hughes wrote for the "Sunday Library" a monograph on the king which it might be worth the publishers' while to reproduce. Apart from this, what have we to show? A dramatic poem on Alfred, written by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and printed in 1876; a verse-play by the late lamented Mr. Martin Tupper, called "Alfred," and actually performed at Manchester, with the late Walter Montgomery in the title-part; a verse-play by Sheridan Knowles, called "Alfred the Great," produced at Drury-lane in 1831, with Macready as Alfred; a musical drama by Isaac Pocock, produced in 1827; a tragedy by John Home, brought out in 1778; a drama by John O'Keefe, which saw the light in 1776; and that famous masque by Thomson and Mallet, in which "Rule Britannia" first had a hearing. It will be seen that within the past half century Alfred has been celebrated only by Martin Tupper, by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, by Tom Hughes, by Mr. Alfred Austin, and by Tennyson in a single isolated reference. It was high time that something was done to "diffuse public knowledge" of "our English Alfred."

Gille-Shakespeare.

Shakespeare in France under the Ancien Régime. By J. J. Jusserand. (Fisher Unwin. 21s.)

FEW Frenchmen—and, for the matter of that, few Englishmen—have M. Jusserand's intimate knowledge of the literary history of these islands, or can wear their cap of erudition with so jaunty a cock and so gay a stride. The present volume is built upon a bewildering variety of remote reading, and is full of entertainment from cover to cover. The central topic is the fortune of Shakespeare's reputation in France during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; but M. Jusserand is nothing if not discursive, and what he really gives us is a picture of the general literary and social relations between ourselves and our neighbours during, and even before, his period.

The modern Frenchman is an Anglomaniac; but until the Restoration of the Stuarts English influence on French letters practically did not exist. Eustace Deschamps praised Chaucer, but only as the translator of the Roman de la Rose and of Deschamps himself. Poets went and came between the countries: Sir Thomas Wyatt, Bryan, Sackville, serving as ambassadors to Paris, Du Bartas fulfilling the same function in London. But though the Englishmen borrowed, they lent nothing in return. France had no ears for alien poets, unless they came from Italy or from Spain. Frenchmen travelled to England and wrote guide-books or accounts of their travels, without whispering a word of literature. They dwelt on the beauty of the English women, and on the drinking habits of the English men. One thirsty soul, according to Etienne Perlin, will cry: "Drind you in plaigion"; and another will reply: "Tanque artelay." But even Ronsard, even Brantôme, have nothing to say of Spenser or of Sidney. Works written in Latin by Englishmen or Scotchmen, such as the Utopia of More or the Latin tragedies of George Buchanan, alone seem to have found their way across the Channel. Under Louis Quatorze there was a moment in French dramatic history when the romantic spirit, represented by Cyrano de Bergerac in France, as by Shakespeare in England, seemed likely to become dominant on the stage; and this might have led to some sympathetic appreciation of English tragedy and comedy. But the moment passed, and romanticism went down before Racine and Corneille and their panoply of pseudo-Aristotelian unities. Everything that was least Shakespearean came into favour. Rule and Order were adopted as the watchwords of literature:

Fine, regular, straight avenues are drawn across the parks; the language, like the parks, is trimmed, cleansed, and chastened; the Academy prunes it of all those technical terms formerly praised by Ronsard and Malherbe, who wanted a language both rich and strong; now it is wanted above all noble and dignified. Old words, "les vieux mots," are excluded from the great national vocabulary; also new ones, "nouvellement inventés"; also "terms of art and science"; also expressions of anger or offensive to modesty—"les termes d'importement ou qui blessent la pudeur." No such improper words have been "allowed into the dictionary, because honest men avoid using them in their speech," and academicians do not write dictionaries for clowns. The word "essor" (soar) is accepted out of favour, although tainted with "falconry."

Under such conditions it is obvious that France had no room for Shakespeare. He sinned against all her canons, kicked over all her traces:

What place could be found in the favour of a public thus formed for an author who accepts words of all sorts, old or new, lewd, technical, choleric, or learned; every sentiment and every idea, and far from attenuating them in order to keep them within the bounds of nobleness and decorum, carries them to extremes with the view of rendering his contrasts as decided as possible; an author who falls into the most execrably bad taste, reaches the loftiest heights of sublimity, writes plays with or without heroes, plays with whole legions of personages, among which he admits not only the whistling valet and swearing drunkard, described as in a nightmare by pessimist La Bruyère, but even dogs, and even a bear ("Exit, pursued by a bear"); an incommensurable dramatist, now full of tears, now of jokes, who watches the martlets fly (in the middle of a tragedy), wonders whether the crickets are listening ("Yond crickets shall not hear it"), sings the sweetest love-songs the world has ever heard, divines all our joys, weeps for all our sorrows; coarse beyond endurance, lyrical beyond all possibility of adequate praise; in a word, what place was there for Shakespeare in the France of Louis Quatorze?

M. Jusserand has taken great pains to trace the earliest mentions of Shakespeare in France. He finds none until quite the end of the seventeenth century, when Shakespeare himself had been re-written and re-modelled by the egregious adapters of the Restoration. Then at last Muralt, writing of his voyage to England, names "Schakspear, one of their best ancient poets," and Moreau de Brasey tells his fellow countrymen that: "One Shakspear, who lived in the last century, has left the reputation of a master owing to his excellent historical plays, and M. Addison has perfected this taste in his admirable 'Cato.'" Even earlier a copy of the Second Folio had found its way into the library of Louis Quatorze, and in cataloguing it Nicholas Clement wrote on a slip, which M. Jusserand has come across, that: "This English poet has a fine enough imagination, thinks naturally, expresses himself neatly; but these excellent qualities are marred by the filth which he puts into his comedies."

With the eighteenth century comes a change. The classic rigidity breaks down. Shakespeare is admitted, read, studied, imitated, even acted; and as the rage for the "natural," under the influence of Rousseau, grows, is suddenly found to be popular. The most interesting episodes in this development are those which illustrate the attitude of Voltaire to the new spirit. It was Voltaire's instinct to allow liberty to everyone except a poet. But he had been himself to some extent responsible for the introduction of Shakespeare. In 1726 he visited London, and remained there until 1729. He was taken by Pope and Bolingbroke to the theatre, and saw, among other things, the "barbarous irregularities" of Julius Caesar. In his Lettres Philosophiques of 1734, designed to satirise his own countrymen through the medium of praise of England, he included a Lettre sur la Tragédie. Here he says: "Shakespeare, whom the English take for a Sophocles, flourished about the same time as Lope de Vega; he created the drama, he had a genius full of strength and fecundity, of naturalness, and sublimity, without the least spark of good taste, and without the slightest knowledge of rules." Then he goes on to criticise "Othello" and to translate "To be, or not to be" from "Hamlet." He concludes with something like enthusiasm: "The poetic genius of the English is, up to now, like a bushy tree planted by Nature, throwing out a thousand branches and growing unsymmetrically with strength. It dies if you try to force its nature and to clip it like one of the trees in the Marly Gardens." Voltaire intended the Lettres Philosophiques to make a furor, and they did. They were, in fact, torn and burnt by the public executioner, in the courtyard of the Palais de Justice, as "scandalous, contrary to religion, good morals, and to the respect due to the powers that be." It is probable that in his desire to magnify things not French Voltaire had spoken very much more warmly of Shakespeare than in his heart of hearts he felt. However, he had set a stone rolling that could not easily be stayed. The magic of Shakespeare began to work. He became a subject for conversation and for controversy. Translations were set on foot. La Place wrote a Discours sur la Théâtre Anglais. "L'Anglicisme nous gagne," wrote D'Argenson in 1750.

There followed a singular epoch, during which English and French exchanged ideas. The English tendency was all in favour of classicising Shakespeare. Garrick for instance, put Shakespeare's plays on the stage, not as they were, but as he would have wished them to be: he suppressed the grave-digger's scene in "Hamlet," running the risk of having "the benches thrown at his head" by the rabble, but sure thereby to obtain the approbation of Voltaire. He gave a "King Lear" with a happy ending; he awoke Juliet before the death of Romeo; and never allowed old Capulet to call his daughter "green-sickness carrion," nor any such names. "Winter's Tale" became in his hands "Florizel and Perdita"; "Midsummer Night's Dream" became "The Fairies"; "Taming the Shrew," "Catherine and Petruccio"; Bianca lost her lovers and the play its drunkard.

On the other hand, in France nature and romance—pastoral nature and sophisticated romance, indeed—were all the vogue. The fame of Shakespeare reached its height in 1776 with a grand translation in twenty quarto volumes, due chiefly to Pierre Félicien Le Tourneur. Meanwhile Voltaire had watched from afar with bitterness in his heart. Whatever he had been in 1734, in 1776 he was a classic of the classics. Kings and churches were fair game for his mordant wit; but the great writers at least he held sacred. The hermit of Ferney flung himself into the battle. It is no longer a time for criticism. Shakespeare now is l'infâme, and must be crushed. He is flouted as "Gille-Shakespeare," for, indeed, "Gille, in a country fair, would express himself with more decency and nobleness than Prince Hamlet." Of Le Tourneur's translation—"that wretch Le Tourneur"—he writes: "a collection of plays meant for booths at the fair, and written two hundred years ago. . . . There are not enough affronts, enough fools'-caps, enough pillories in France for such a knave. . . . The worst of it is, that the monster has a party in France, and, worse than the worst, I was myself the first to speak of this Shakespeare; I was the first to show the French a few pearls that I had found in his enormous dunghill." Voltaire composed his famous letter to the Academy, which was read in a solemn session, after a mass and a panegyric by D'Alembert, best reader of his day. It was a formal onslaught on the "mountebank" Shakespeare, "so savage, so low, so unbridled, and so absurd." Two years later came the final triumph of Voltaire's life in the performance of Irène and the plaudits which it won him. He took the occasion to renew the attack upon the enemy in a second letter to the Academy, which concludes: "Shakespeare is a savage with sparks of genius which shine in a horrible night." And, after all, that is what, in their hearts, the French still think of Shakespeare.

The Poet of the Muscovite.

Translations from Poushkin. By C. E. Turner. (Sampson Low & Marston. 7s. 6d. net.)

RUSSIA has just been effervescing over the centenary of her national poet, Poushkin. It has been veritably a national—nay, more—a racial affair. It has been not merely Russian, but Slavonic. Finally, seizing occasion by the ear, Mr. Charles Edward Turner, English Lecturer at the Petersburg University, has published a volume of translations from Poushkin, that we English may learn for ourselves, so far as translation will permit, what the greatest of Russian poets is like.

The reader who wishes to know the correct thing to say of Poushkin we refer to any comprehensive encyclopædia or biographical dictionary. Our business here is to record faithfully the impression made by these selected translations. Seldom is mastery of Russian joined with mastery of verse; and Mr. C. E. Turner is not among such exceptionally favoured beings. The minor poems hardly attempt verse, but are pretty much literal translations, in rhymeless lines. Better had they been frank prose, and frankly literal, like the Revised Version of the Bible, keeping the original lines, but not trying to make them metrical. The major poems are also unrhymed, in metrical form; the tragedies being in very limping and listless blank verse. All should have been prose, for Mr.

POUSHKIN.

Turner has no manner of metrical gift. His expedients for bringing translation within verse form are most clumsy. Awkwardly stilted inversion is one, reminding us of the play in "Midsummer Night's Dream": "When lion rough in wildest rage doth roar," and so forth. Docking the article is another;

How sting of conscience hope to still?

Or again:

Perish on the block in city-square;

and yet again:

Such is the will of Tsar and his Boyards.

These tricks, constantly repeated, give a hopeless impression of impotence to control verse. Prose is better than all but fine verse-rendering, certainly better than verse like this. It is a pity Mr. Turner did not give his knowledge of Russian unchecked scope by a downright literal translation.

Under these circumstances, much has to be allowed for in our impression of the Muscovite poet. He studied and imitated Shakespeare, but especially Byron. He does not, however, like Shakespeare in German, and Byron in all languages, translate well. The loss of metrical beauty and beauty of poetic diction is evidently fatal with him. Frankly to speak, he is disappointing in English guise. A certain Byronic straightness to the matter is his. But he has not those turns of eloquence and rhetorical art, the point, the antithesis, the balance, the studied and abrupt contrast—the oratorical devices, in fine, which make Byron translate so effectively. At the same time, he has all the Byronic lack of great imagery. Nay, there is no need for the adjective; purely and simply, he lacks imagery. Throughout the book there is not one image either beautiful or striking; not one which the most minor English poet would not think trite and beneath his capacities. We do him an injustice in speaking thus; for he can scarce be said to aim at or desire imagery. In this respect he is altogether opposed to the spirit of Teutonic poetry, with its thick-coming figurative opulence, and akin to the spirit of French or Greek poetry. Yet hardly any Greek, hardly any French poet even, of like lyric impulse, is so bare of images, has a style so unfeared by imagery or the research of imagery. Now, to translate well, a poet must have great or at least striking ideas; or, failing that, he must have the arts of eloquence and rhetoric to which we have referred. Poushkin has none of all these things. Fire and directness seem to be his chief qualities, and they come ill out of translation.

His famous masterpiece, the tragedy "Boris Godounoff," is not impressive in English and to the countrymen of Shakespeare, under whose influence it was written. Plainly, it is a very elementary effort as a play; and if it be a vast improvement on previous Russian plays, the fact does not speak much for Russian drama. It imitates the weakest features of Shakespeare's historical plays not wisely but too well. Russian history is followed literally in a series of scenes which succeed each other without art. The drama is almost void of dramatic structure. It meanders as history meanders, and the last three scenes pass after the death of its hero, who is so little heroic that the interest is equally divided between him and the Pretender Grigory, a much more taking figure, who in his turn disappears totally from the final scenes, leaving the stage entirely to featureless subordinates. There is nothing in the play that we understand by poetry, nor yet the rhetoric and eloquence which replaces the poetic convention in the best French drama. It depends purely on the dramatic power which it has not got. Nevertheless, individual scenes show much true dramatic spirit, so that one marvels Poushkin did not outgo this—as it seems to us—tentative effort. "The Stone Guest" is an able little version of the Don Juan legend, but scarcely more. "The Bronze Cavalier" is Byronic, and doubtless has a rush and fire in the original which (as we have explained) disappear in translation. It is the same with "Pultava." But let us take the minor poems, where we can form some better idea of the true Poushkin. Here, even through the veil of translation which is not veritably verse or prose, we can get some conception of direct, clear-cut, forcible expression and masculine strength of sentiment. "A Study," one can see, is a grimly tragic vignette of peasant life, with a Heinesque turn at the close. "A Winter Morning" must be vivid in the original. "The Poet" and "My Monument" breathe an austere independence which, given the poet's diction, that we have not here, must be noble and monumental. So it is with other work, mixed with some which is second-hand Byron—and second-hand Byron is intolerable to us, however it may be in Russia. But quite the finest thing in translation is the invective against "The Calumniators of Russia." Given English form by a poet, it would make a fine and burning patriotic poem. In a book which is not very quotable, it is the most quotable thing; and we cite the final stanza:

Your threats are loud; now, try and prove as loud in deed?

Think ye the aged hero, sleeping in his bed,
No more has strength to wield the sword of Ismail?
Or that the word of Russian Tsar has weaker grown?

Or have we ne'er with Europe warred,
And lost the victor's cunning skill?

Or are we few? From shores of Perm to southern Tauris,
From Finnish cliffs of ice to fiery Colchis,

From Kremlin's battered battlements
As far as China's circling wall
Not one shall fail his country's call.

Then send, assemblies of the West,
Your fiercest troops in full array!

In Russian plains we'll find them place
To sleep with those who fell before!

Clearly a strong poet with a trumpet note in him, and worthy, we do not doubt, of his country's homage. Yet this book leaves us with a surmise (necessarily doubtful and hesitant) that the nation in which he is the greatest poet is not one of the nations great in poetry; and, in any case, we fear Mr. Turner's volume will not achieve its laudable purpose of making him known and honoured in England. It is perhaps impossible; certainly it will need more than a knowledge of Russian to do it.

Old Histories and New Discoveries.

Authority and Archaeology. By S. R. Driver, D.D., and Others. Edited by David G. Hogarth. (John Murray. 16s.)

THIS book seems to have been begun with one purpose and finished with another. The original scheme, as indicated in its First and Third Parts, was apparently to show how modern research has affected our view of the Bible as history; but later it seems to have occurred to the projectors that they might as well throw in something about pre-historic Europe and the latest ideas on the constitution of the Roman Empire. We do not complain of the result, which has produced what the French call a "Bulletin" of Archaeology, but it makes it necessary that we should consider the book from two different points of view.

And, first, as to the effect of archaeological discovery upon the authority of Scripture. On this, as might be expected, Prof. Driver speaks with no uncertain sound. He gives up, in fact, all the points over which science and religion have wrangled for the last fifty years, and declares that the view which regards the cosmogony of the Book of Genesis as literally true "is no longer tenable." He also considers it as proved that the account of the Creation contained in it is dependent on Babylonian sources, and, therefore, has as little claim to originality as it has to authenticity. Readers of the ACADEMY have been kept too well-informed of the advance of knowledge in this respect (see, for instance, the review of Prof. Sayce's Early History of the Hebrews in the ACADEMY of June 4, 1898) for it to be necessary to dwell much upon this, and it will be sufficient to notice that while Prof. Driver is willing to allow that "the Biblical teachers respecting Joseph embody a genuine nucleus of historical fact," he thinks "not so much can be said of the testimony of the inscriptions to the oppression and the Exodus." "Of course, those who accept these facts as narrated in the Book of Exodus will find in the inscriptions interesting antiquarian and topographical illustrations of them; but those who seek corroboration of the facts from the monuments will be disappointed." When he comes to the Book of Kings, he finds that the monuments explain as well as confirm the Bible, as, for instance, the British Museum inscriptions of Sennacherib, which make it plain, although, as he says, it "would not be suspected from the Biblical narrative," that Hezekiah's rebellion was part of a preconcerted plan in which many cities of Phœnicia and Philistia took part. Prof. Sayce's theory that Jerusalem was besieged and taken by Sennacherib's father, Sargon, he cannot away with, and he speaks with some heat of his brother professor's strictures upon the Higher Critics, which, he says, are due to misapprehension of the facts of the case: "Either the critics have not held the opinions imputed to them, or the opinions rightly imputed to them have not been overthrown by the discoveries of archaeology."

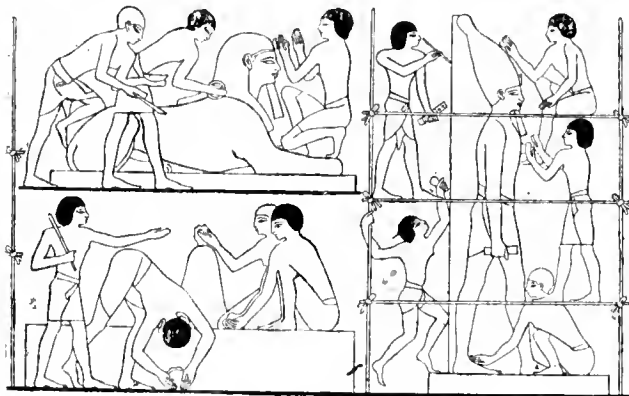

The part relating to the New Testament is entrusted to Mr. Headlam, of All Souls', who treats of the additions lately made to our knowledge by the inscriptions discovered in Phrygia and the catacombs, the logia of Jesus, and the Gospel and Apocalypse of Peter. On the whole, he considers that these discoveries are of service in bringing before us in lifelike form the early history of Christianity and of the transition period when the multitude was both Christian and heathen at the same time; "but on the actual evidence for the doctrines of the earliest Christians, the life and death of the Redeemer (archæology) is silent," and he gives excellent reasons why it is likely to remain so.

We turn to those parts of the book which give an account of the most recent results of research where it is not necessary to compare them with the Biblical traditions, and find that each department is in charge of a master of his craft. Mr. F. L. Griffith is responsible for a chapter on "Egypt and Assyria," and is no doubt right in discrediting the earlier parts of Herodotus' history, though he hardly goes so far in this respect as Prof. Sayce has done in his earlier writings. In the latter parts he sees "a decided improvement," and one gathers that he thinks valuable facts are still to be gathered from Diodorus and Plutarch. It may be doubted, however, whether he will long maintain Borchardt's theory that the tomb discovered by M. de Morgan at Negadah was really that of Menes, the first king of Egypt. An excellent chapter by the editor on "Pre-historic Greece" gives a clear account of the discoveries made by Schliemann and Mr. Arthur Evans, and will convince most people that there flourished round the shores of the Mediterranean, at least twenty centuries before our era, a high civilisation which owed nothing to Semitic influence. The story is continued by Prof. Ernest Gardner in a chapter on "Historic Greece," in which he advances the theory that Greek art of the best period was but a survival and renaissance of Mycenaean tradition. Mr. Haverfield, of Christ Church, winds up this part of the book with a too short chapter on "The Roman World," which is one of the best things in the book. He perhaps somewhat strains the evidence when he suggests that the Etruscan civilisation was really an importation from Lydia; but his picture, largely taken from Mommsen, of the vast complex of the Roman Empire and of the lessening importance of Rome in it should be read by everyone. Altogether, the book may be heartily recommended as the best attempt that we are likely to have in English to keep the general reader abreast of the progress of archaeological discovery in the field most likely to interest him.

Light from the East. By the Rev. C. J. Ball, M.A., &c. (Eyre & Spottiswoode. 15s.)

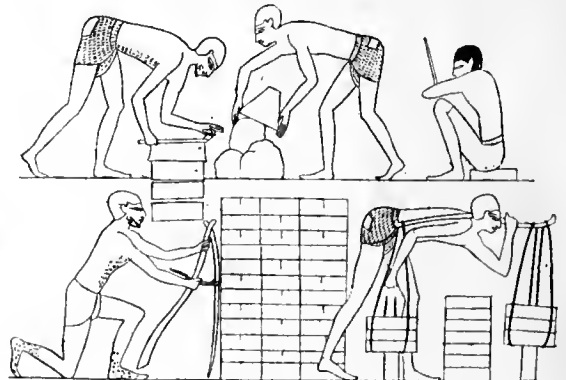

SIMULTANEOUSLY with the above there has appeared a book which might have been, though it certainly was not, designed as its complement. If there is an omission in the scheme of Mr. Hogarth's book it is that it contains no precise references to a number of monuments such as the Chaldean Account of Genesis and the like, with which many of its readers may be unfamiliar. But in the nick of time comes Mr. Ball's book to supply the defect, so far as Biblical archæology is concerned, with illustrations and explanations of the monuments themselves. Here the reader will find excellent reproductions of the tablets containing the Babylonian Legends of the Creation, the Flood, and of Nimrod, together with all the historical inscriptions on which Prof. Driver relies for his arguments in favour of the historical accuracy of the Book of Kings. He will also get all the known monuments of the Hittites and many scenes from contemporary sculptures of scenes in the daily life of the Assyrians and Egyptians. When we add to these the Moabite Stone and some of the more famous bilingual inscriptions, such as the Canopus and the Rosetta Stone, and much philological information as to the origin of the Hebrew alphabet, it will be seen that the purchaser of the book gets plenty of value for the very moderate price at which it is published. The name of Mr. W. H. Rylands, the secretary of the Society of Biblical Archaeology, who is, we understand, responsible for the two hundred illustrations it contains, is sufficient guarantee for their excellence, while they have been excellently reproduced.

EGYPTIAN STATUARIES AT WORK.

A Hard-headed Christian.

Extracts from the Diary and Autobiography of the Rev. James Clegg. Edited by Henry Kirke. (Saunders Low. 6s.)

THE author of this quaint diary, now for the first time printed, was a Nonconformist minister who spent his life in the little Derbyshire village of Chapel-en-le-Frith. Here he laboured to keep together a congregation formed in 1662 by the Rev. William Bagshawe (called the "Apostle of the Peak") after the Act of Uniformity had driven him from his living in the Church of England.

Mr. Clegg succeeded to the pulpit in 1703, and occupied it for over fifty years. His stipend being only £20 per annum, he took a small farm, which he worked to his profit. A busier man than Clegg could not have been found in the countryside. He was doctor as well as minister, and was often dealing with small-pox. Innumerable church and family affairs took him hither and thither on his mare. He prayed with widows, dined with justices, and disputed with fanatics. On a Sunday he would preach sometimes for three hours, give the Lord's Supper to a hundred communicants, and catechise thirty or forty children in the afternoon. And doing a hundred things well, Mr. Clegg still found time to keep a record of his life.

The diary is a veritable document. It reveals Mr. Clegg as a man to whom faith and works were equally important—an all-round Christian, able and willing to make the best of both worlds. His faith in God was the mere rule of his commonplace life. He recognised His arm in everything. Whatever happened, it was "Thank God," or "Thy Will be Done." The smallest daily occurrences were from Him. Mr. Clegg simply revelled in providential escapes and "merciful deliverances." His "good black mare" must have been a joy to him, for she was continually pitching him over her head or dropping him into swamps or rivers. This is the sort of thing:

March 10, 1729-30.—Mr. White and his wife dined with me, and I returned with them to Martinside. . . . We stayed too late, and the night being very dark, I narrowly escaped a dangerous fall into a stone pitt which my mare jumped into before I was aware of it. How many and how great deliverances . . .

Sometimes the mare arranged a tableau with a distinct eye to the grotesque. Thus:

May 10.—I set out for home [from Manchester]. . . . When I was on horseback to return, in passing through a yate, an iron hook it was hasped with catched hold on my great coat, and stuck through ye top of my strong boot, and ye mare rushing forward from under mee, I fell on my head and shoulder to the ground with great violence, the rest of my Body hung by my Boot on ye Hook. Francis Thompson with difficulty disengaged me. . . . This was a great and remarkable deliverance; I desire I may never forget it. Blessed be God for this merciful and seasonable appearance to me.

And again, out of a dozen instances:

June 2, 1737-8.—I had a very merciful deliverance when mounting my mare.

In short, the mare could generally be counted on to test Mr. Clegg's faith at short intervals, and elicit from him a rapturous, if rather shaky, hymn of praise. Between times Mr. Clegg would be harmlessly tossed by "a maddening cow," or he would stand under a falling tree, "narrowly escaping ye loss of an eye, blessed be God!" or he would set his bed on fire with a candle and escape roasting, "blessed be God!" or he would find a fish-hook in his mouth when eating turbot at dinner . . . "but thro' Mercy," &c.

Mr. Clegg was no ascetic. He played bowls and shuffleboard, fished in the river Wye, accepted a barrel of oysters, and was even "innocently merry" on occasion. And he enjoyed his books:

July 6.—I receiv'd Bayle's Great Historical and Critical Dictionary. It cost me 4 guineas. I spent most of ye day in it.

In it! Charles Lamb would have found great virtue in the preposition. It was a matter of concern, too, to Mr. Clegg to sell his live stock and garner his crops. In the midst of entries about village disputes, cases of illness, and schisms, we come on such a pure lyrical note as this: "I was at home with ye reapers." And, again, what a day of health and success was March 2, 1737: "We had six teams came to plow for us. They did a great deal of work and did it well. And blessed be God no disaster befell any of them." Another day of triumph: "Dec. 22, 1724—Ye flatt swine was killed." Again: "Sept. 1st, 1747—I sold my two fat cows to a butcher of Ashton for 6 pounds 15 shillings. Our second crop of clover grass was well got in yesterday."

Farmer and doctor, as well as parson, Mr. Clegg was in no danger of becoming a visionary. He had a goodly measure of the Spirit; never was he carried away by it. Not for him was George Fox's ecstacy. The Quaker died to the world, and valiantly stitched himself a pair of leather breeches. But James Clegg was not so minded, for we read:

June 23, 1747.—Two taylors came from Prestbury to make me cloaths.

There you have the difference between the prophet aflame with his gospel and the pastor carrying on the gospel tradition in a comfortable and regular way. Mr. Clegg would even apply commercial standards to spiritual matters. On July 20, 1751, a year before his death, he complains in his diary of Mr. Joshua Wood's neglect to repair a certain piece of road: "After . . . some weeks . . . I threatened to have it indicted at the Sessions, upon which he sent Mr.

Slack to let me know that he relinquished his seat in our Chapel, and was determined never more to come there." On this action of Mr. Wood's the minister sorrowfully remarks: "Thus my endeavours to serve yt family in all their sicknesses and to promote their Eternal Salvation above 52 years are requited."

But Mr. Clegg's quaintest blend of heavenly and worldly considerations occurs in another entry. Here it is:

Dec. 4, 1753.—I was under apprehensions of dying shortly, and my greatest concern was for ye continuance of ye means of Salvation in these parts after my Decese, but God can provide, and on him I rely. With a view to this I have a ticket purchased for me in the Irish Lottery. If Providence shall favour me with a prize, I have determined that one halfe of it shall be applied to that use, or to some other that shall appear more pious and charitable.

We do not know whether Mr. Clegg won a prize in the Irish Lottery, but we may feel quite certain that if he did he shared it according to his promise.

Our feeling to the editor of this curious work is one of deliberate gratitude. For time has made James Clegg's diary a true book, valuable for its picture of English country life in the reigns of Anne and the first two Georges, and lovable for its revelation of the hard-headed Christian who wrote it.

The Varieties of Man.

Man Past and Present. By A. H. Keane, F.R.G.S. "Cambridge Geographical" Series. (Pitt Press. 12s.)

THE learned and interesting volume is intended as a successor to the author's Anthropology in the same series. The first two chapters, therefore, sum up and restate the conclusions already arrived at. Prof. Keane briefly discusses the "missing link"—missing until 1892, and then discovered by Dubois in the Pithecanthropus erectus or Homo javanensis of the pliocene beds of East Java—the probable dispersion of the species in the pleistocene period from a single centre, and the gradual differentiation in distinct habitats and under various conditions of the existing human types or varieties. Then he traces the sequence of the ages of culture, the stone ages, paleolithic and neolithic, the copper, bronze, and iron ages, and the evolution of those essential instruments of progressive culture, systems of writing. The bulk of the talk which follows takes one by one the primary divisions of man, and discusses in considerable detail their subdivisions, probable migrations and characteristics. These primary divisions are four: there are the Negroes (African and Oceanic), the Mongols, the aborigines of America, and the Caucasians. The last of these are, of course, except to the scientific anthropologist, far and away the most interesting group: they include, but for the Turks, Finns and Huns, all the peoples of Europe, together with the Semites, the Egyptians, and the majority of the peoples of India. They claim all the civilisations, except the extinct civilisations of Mexico and Peru, and the stationary civilisations of China and Japan.

One naturally looks to Prof. Keane for some light on the moot points between the philologists and the craniologists as to the constituent elements of the populations of Europe and of these islands in particular. So far as language goes it is notorious that, if Mongols and the unique Basques are set aside, the whole of Europe speaks tongues which may be assumed to have developed from a common original, and which may be grouped as Teutonic, Celtic, Slavonic, Greek, Latin, and so forth, under the general head of Aryan. The craniologists, however, claim that this uniformity of speech is no index to uniformity of blood; and they hold that all European peoples are blends in varying degrees of three distinct types or varieties. These are, firstly, Homo Mediterraneus, the dark-haired, dark-eyed South European; secondly, Homo Alpinus, the reddish haired, brown or grey eyed Central European; and, thirdly, Homo Europæus, the light-haired, blue-eyed, North European. The first and third of these types have long (dolichocephalic) heads; the second, round (brachycephalic) heads. Prof. Keane's view appears to be that the Aryan language properly belongs only to Homo Europæus, and that it has been borrowed from him by the two other varieties. The cradle of all these, he says, was North Africa; from here Europe was first peopled by Homo Mediterraneus, who crossed by a bridge of land which formerly connected Africa with Sicily: he is the Iberian, the Pelasgic, the Silurian, the Pict, the man of the British long barrows; his language survives in Basque. Numerically, he still forms a large proportion of the peoples of South Europe, and a considerable proportion of our own race, especially in the Welsh and Irish districts; but he has been conquered, and his language swamped, first of all by what the philologists call the Celts—that is, Homo Alpinus—who came into Europe from the Eurasian plains, having gone round by that route from Africa, and apparently having learnt the Aryan tongue from Homo Europæus before he entered Europe at all; and, secondly, by Homo Europæus himself, who is represented by what the philologists call the Teutonic race, and who exists in the purest state among the Scandinavians: he also came in from Asia. The difficulty, as it seems to us, is to understand quite how or why the round-headed Homo Alpinus took it into his round head to borrow the language of the long-headed Homo Europæus. They may have been near each other on the Eurasian plains, but they did not, for all that, amalgamate. Is it possible that they were one stock when the language was formed, and that the differentiation of head form grew up later? The anthropologists ought to tell us what are the conditions which determine round-headedness, and how long it presumably took to develop a varietal distinction of skull. Then, again, did the Homo Alpinus borrow the civilisation, and, notably, the religion of the Homo Europæus with his language, for in all essentials the religion of Celt and Teuton is the same? In any case, what became of the religion of the Homo Mediterraneus? Is he responsible, as Mr. Gomme thinks, for agriculture and the earth-worship of the agriculturist? Or did he really, as Nietzsche said, develop our altruistic morality and impose it upon the self-regarding morality of the blond Aryan beast who conquered him? Or were the religions of all these European varieties developed under similar conditions in North Africa, and, therefore, originally identical? Obviously anthropology has some pretty problems still before it.

Come, Spur Away.

The Open Road: a Little Book for Wayfarers. Compiled by E. V. Lucas. (Grant Richards. 5s.)

WHEN starting on a journey of a day, or a year, this little limp, apple-green coloured book is the book to slip into the pocket. It is meant for the right kind of wayfarers—those who have time to observe, who can spend a morning sitting under a tree with a book for company. It is meant not only for those whose inward call is for great poetry, such as the Intimations Ode and the Grecian Urn, but also for those to whose general mood haunting verse makes appeal—verse like this snatch of Stevenson's:

In the highlands, in the country places,
Where the old, plain men have rosy faces
And the young fair maidens
Quiet eyes.

Or that wholesome, invigorating Boy's Prayer of Mr. Beeching's:

God, who created me
Nimble and light of limb,
In three elements free,
To run, to ride, to swim:

Not when the sense is dim,
But now from the heart — joy,
I would remember Him:
Take the thanks of a boy.

Or Ada Smith's

London streets are gold—ah, give me leaves a-glinting
'Midst grey dykes and hedges in the autumn sun!
London water's wine, poured out for all unstinting—
God! For the little brooks that tumble as they run.

Or that poem of Mr. Yeats's beginning with the haunting line:

I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree;
mysterious in its way, and prescient of the untoward, as that earlier line:

Childe Roland to the Dark Tower came.

Poems that stir, poems that touch, poems that haunt, poems that give a lilt to a man's mood—all kinds are to be found in this anthology of The Open Road. Now, there are many anthologies upon the town. In reviewing a new collection, it seems to us, that there are two questions to be asked—(1) Does the anthologist show good taste? (2) Has he been severely loyal to the scope of his anthology as planned by himself? If the answer to these questions be in the affirmative, there is no need for criticism; only appreciation. We are quite aware that the accepted method of reviewing an anthology is to go through it page by page, exclaiming against the inclusion of this poem and the exclusion of that. Here is a case in point. We pick up a copy of a contemporary, which happens to contain a notice of The Open Road. The eye at once falls upon this passage: "Mr. Beeching's verses about coasting on a bicycle are charming, but a still better bicycling poem was written some years back by Mr. T. W. Rolleston."

The question at issue, it seems to us, is, not what the reviewer would have done, but how the reviewed has done what he set out to do; and whether, he being what he is, the task were worth his doing. An anthology should be the expression of a temperament, the choice of a mature mind. Everybody, at some period or other of his life, should make an anthology. It is not necessary to go to the expense of printing. The titles would serve.

The volume before us is just what it calls itself—a little book for wayfarers. As the expression of a temperament, and of a roving and sensitive mind that has kept a definite plan before it, we accept this little volume with gratitude. The book is divided into sections: "Farewell to Winter," "The Road," "Spring and the Beauty of the Earth," "The Sea," "The Reddening Leaf," and so on. A careful examination of these sections reveals the scheme of the volume, explains the inclusion of the Intimations Ode, "Lycidas," and "The Grecian Urn." To each hour of the day, and to each mood of the hour, here is offered the particular moment's solace. In the early morning of brisk step and bounding pulse there is Walt Whitman's fine song of "The Open Road"; for high noon, Shelley's "Hymn of Apollo"; for the drowsy hour after sip and sup, "The Hill Pantheist" from Jefferies' The Story of My Heart. "The Angler's Rest" from Izaak Walton would go well with a cup of tea; at nightfall, going softly through the pines, there is Wordsworth with the Ode, and some lines from Tintern Abbey; after dinner, over a long pipe, with legs stretched out, there is a merry-serious thing called "Jack," and for the last thing at night, when the tired limbs nuzzle into the cool sheets, what better than Herrick's "Thanksgiving to God," or that great Dirge:

Fear no more the heat o' the sun,
Nor the furious winter's rages,
Thou thy worldly task hast done,
Home art gone, and ta'en thy wages:
Golden lads and girls all must,
As chimney-sweepers, come to dust.
Fear no more the frown o' the great . . .

WORDSWORTH AND THE COLERIDGES. BY ELLIS YARNALL.

Mr. Yarnall is an American gentleman who visited Wordsworth in 1819, not long before his death. He found him "a tall figure, a little bent with age, his hair thin and grey, and his face deeply wrinkled. The expression of his countenance was sad, mournful I might say; he seemed one on whom sorrow pressed heavily." Wordsworth said that, considering the extension of the English language, it behoved those who wrote to see to it that what they put forth was on the side of virtue. The remark was made in a serious, thoughtful way, and Mr. Yarnall was much impressed by it; and he could not but reflect that to Wordsworth a deep sense of responsibility had ever been present: to purify and elevate had ever been the purpose of all his writings. Wordsworth subsequently said that he loathed the very memory of Henry VIII.; that Herodotus was the most interesting and instructive book next to the Bible; and that Bishop Thirlwall had a sneering way of talking. Then they went out of doors, and Wordsworth walked with one hand thrust into his half-unbuttoned waistcoat and with an encroaching gait. His trousers were grey. "The last subject he touched on was the international copyright question—the absence of protection in our country [America] to the works of foreign authors. He said mildly that he thought it would be better for us if some acknowledgment, however small, was made. The fame of his own writings, as far as pecuniary advantage was concerned, he had long regarded with indifference; happily he had now an income more than sufficient for all his wants." From these quotations from the most interesting of Mr. Yarnall's papers it will be seen that his beer is not exactly triple X. The other papers deal with smaller men. Among them is Charles Kingsley, who is reported to have said that Lowell's "Fable for Critics" was worthy of Rabelais. The book is kindly, and it records a few sayings which we are glad to read; but we are bound to say that Mr. Yarnall is not an ideal interviewer, and, for the most part, the literary acquaintances whom he visited did not talk to him by any means at their best. (Macmillan. 10s.)

DINNERS AND DINERS. BY LIEUT.-COL. NEWNHAM-DAVIS.

Lieut.-Col. Newnham-Davis wrote a long and popular series of articles in the Pall Mall Gazette on "Dinners and Diners." Therein he reviewed a great many London restaurants, described the dinner he consumed in each, and stated the price he paid for each meal. He has now marshalled these articles into a book, a very good book of its kind. Here are some bits of the author's wisdom:

The manager is the man to look for, if possible, when composing a menu. The higher you reach up that glorious scale of responsibility which runs from manager to marmite, the more intelligent help you will get in ordering your dinner, the more certain you are to have an artistic meal, and not to be spending money unworthily.

In Paris no man dreams of drinking champagne, and nothing but champagne, for dinner; but in London the climate and the taste of the fair sex go before orthodox rules, . . . and as the ladies, as a rule, would think a dinner at a restaurant incomplete without champagne, ninety-nine out of a hundred Englishmen, in ordering a little dinner for two, turn instinctively to the champagne page for the wine card. It is wrong; but until we get a new atmosphere, and give up taking ladies out to dinner, champagne will be practically the only wine drunk at restaurants.

"I will give you soup, fish, roast—nothing more," said Joseph; and misinterpreting my silence, he went on: "In England you taste your dinners; you do not eat them. An artist who is confident of his art only puts a small dinner before his clients. It is a bad workman who slurs over his failures by giving many dishes." This is exactly what I have been preaching on the housetops for years.

Lieut.-Col. Newnham-Davis makes capital out of his guests in a very entertaining way, so that his book is a budget of human nature and conversational pleasantries, as well as of culinary lore—in fact, it is compounded, like a successful dinner, of good food and good talk. Of course, one notes omissions, as one does in any anthology. There is an unmentioned restaurant in Panton-street which would please the old gentleman who said, "None of your d—d à la's, and remember I won't get into dress clothes for anybody"; and ejaculated later on, "Damme! they understand what a steak is, here." (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

ANNALS OF SHREWSBURY SCHOOL. BY G. W. FISHER.

School histories can considerably vary in interest: the fault partly of the historian, but more, we think, of the school. Thus, it would be a very difficult feat to be dull about Eton or Winchester, so extensive and varied is the material to draw upon; but the work before us is distinctly solid. Solidity, however, may be a better quality than the power to interest, and in the present instance it would be unfair to call it a drawback. Mr. Fisher, who gave so much time and care to the preparation of the history, died in November last, before the printing was completed, and the last touches have been added by Mr. Spencer Hill, himself an O.S. The result is a full account of a notable and illustrious home of education, from its beginning in 1548 to the present day. Shrewsbury was founded in Edward the Sixth's reign, but not until Thomas Ashton took command, in 1561, did it take its place as a great school. Among the eight hundred scholars who were admitted during his first six years of mastership were Philip Sidaay and Fulke Greville, afterwards Lord Brooke; and Sidney remains a hero to all Salopians. Stage by stage we are brought down the three and a half centuries, the latter part being more familiar to us by reason of the same ground being covered in the recent Life of Shrewsbury's great headmaster, Dr. Samuel Butler. Mr. Fisher's preference for fact above anecdote makes his account of Butler's rule less interesting than it might be; but he tells the story of the neighbouring resident who called to complain of the honourable Shrewsbury habit of chorusing, and who was shown to the door with the remark: "What! my boys not sing? But my boys shall sing." A list of the favourite songs is given, and very full-bodied, stirring songs they are; beginning with "Spankedillo [in Sussex he is called Twankeydillo], the prince of jolly fellows," and ending with "Rule Britannia" and "God Save the Queen." Among more recent Salopians who have made a name in the world are mentioned the present headmaster of Dulwich, Mr. Gilkes, Mr. T. E. Page of Charterhouse, Dr. R. F. Horton, Mr. Stanley Weyman, Mr. Owen Seaman, and Mr. Graham Wallas. The book is one which all old boys who honour their school are bound to possess. (Methuen. 10s. 6d.)

EUGÉNIE, EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH. BY CLARA TSCHUDI.

This book (translated by E. M. Cope) is described on the title-page as "A Popular Sketch." That is exactly what it is. It is a popular sketch, with the admixture of candour or malice—the author may be described as seeing-sawing between the two—which a certain class of readers demand in royal biography. The authoress, we are told, "has tried to be impartial in her judgment, and to distinguish, as in the case of Marie Antoinette, between weaknesses and faults." Well, if one wants to write an unkind book about a person, there is no surer method than to devote one's space to distinguishing between his or her weaknesses and faults, which are thus both assured of a show. Some allowances, of course, must be made. The fierce light which beats upon a lost throne cannot be softened beyond a certain point; and those who want to see poor royalty turned inside out will find these pages entertaining. Personally, we find them rather pitiless; and as the book makes no pretension to historical weight, we need add nothing to this indication of its qualities. The chapter on "Eugénie as a Leader of Fashion"—the Empress revived and maintained the great crinoline fashion of the sixties—is curious reading, not without historical value. Small errors slightly mar the book, as on p. 80, where "incredible" should clearly be "incredulous." (Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 6s.)

GIANTS OF THE GAME. BY THE HON. R. H. LYTTLTON.

The game is cricket, and the giants begin with Daft and Carpenter and V. E. Walker, and work down to the present day, Ranjitsinhji figuring on the cover. They are not all precisely giants, but the term will serve; nor is Mr. Lyttelton the only author, the book being a compound of articles by that gentleman, Mr. W. J. Ford, Mr. C. B. Fry, and George Giffen. Of these writers Mr. Lyttelton is the most accomplished and Mr. Fry the most sprightly. Mr. Lyttelton ranges from the fifties and sixties to the batting of Mr. Jessop. Mr. W. J. Ford, who can himself lift a ball over the pavilion with some ease, recalls big hitters—who are becoming, by the way, rather a favourite subject for his pen. Mr. Fry describes cricketers with whom he has played, and Mr. Giffen confines himself to the giants of Australia, old and new. We are not quite sure whether Mr. Fry's practice of turning his associates into copy is to be commended: it seems to bring the pen rather too near the bat; but he certainly does it very entertainingly. We cannot, however, consider that in the following passage Mr. Murdoch's powers as a humorist are exactly proved: "He does not commit puns, of course, nor sputter epigrams; he is simply, genuinely, and unaffectedly amusing. Instead of 'It will rain hard to-day,' he says, 'Boys, the sparrows will be washed out'; instead of 'I'm in good form,' he asks, in a concentrated voice, 'Where's Surrey?'" Nor are we able quite to follow Mr. Fry when he compares Mr. Newham, of Sussex, to D'Artagnan. But there is no call to find fault with a book which means so well and passes so many great names in review. (Ward, Lock. 1s.)

STORIES FROM SHAKESPEARE. BY M. SURTEES TOWNSEND.

It may be laid down as an axiom that a book which has been written well should not be written again. Hence, Charles and Mary Lamb having retold Shakespeare's dramas in a manner perfectly suited for children, there was no call for the present volume. Here is the opening of the first story in the book, "Miranda; or, The Tempest":

"It certainly is a terrible storm," said Miranda to herself.

All night long the glare of the lightning and the boom of the thunder above the roar of the wind and the waves had kept her awake. She had trembled with fear as she lay sleepless upon her little bed lest there should be any ships out in such a tempest.

That phrase "little bed" condemns the author utterly. Miranda thereby becomes a child, and one of Shakespeare's sweetest creations is made ridiculous. It is no fit preparation of a child for these dramas to serve them up in the style of an "Aunt Jane's Gift-book." (Warne.)

MODERN ENGLAND.

BY JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

Mr. McCarthy has already written of modern England before the Reform Bill for the "Story of the Nations" series. He now contributes to the same series a volume dealing with England under Queen Victoria. It is all old ground to Mr. McCarthy; and it may be said that no living writer could deal with the subject with more ease. In rather fewer than 350 pages Mr. McCarthy surveys the great facts and careers of the last sixty years, beginning with the gloomy subject of "The Convict Ship," then passing to "Tithes and State Church in Ireland," "Queen Victoria," "The Foundation of the Canadian Dominion," "The Chartist Collapse," &c., &c. We have separate chapters on Peel, Lord Beaconsfield, and Mr. Gladstone; and the book concludes with a kind of pemmican presentation of the "Literature, Art, and Science" of the reign. The portraits and illustrations are numerous and good. (Unwin. 5s.)

THE TRIAL OF JESUS CHRIST.

BY A. TAYLOR INNES.

Mr. Innes is a member of the Scottish Bar, and in his monograph treats his subject altogether in a forensic spirit. Here is his conclusion:

We have found that it was a double trial, conducted with a certain regard to the forms of the two most famous jurisprudences of the world. In both trials the judges were unjust, and the trial was unfair; yet in both the right issue was substantially raised. Even the form which that issue took was, in a sense, the same in both. Jesus Christ was arraigned on a double charge of treason; the treason in the Theocratic court being a (constructive) speaking against God, while in the Imperial court it was a (constructive) speaking against Caesar. But under these tortuous traditions of a twofold law the real historical question was twice over-reached, and the true claim of the accused was made truly known. He died because in the ecclesiastical council He claimed to be the Son of God and the Messiah of Israel, and because before the world-wide tribunal He claimed to be Christ a King.

In the dry light of the trained analytical mind the august tragedy, as Mr. Innes handles it in the course of his inquiry, is touched with a new gleam of realism. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 2s. 6d.)

THE BRITISH EMPIRE DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE. EDITED BY REV. E. D. PRICE.

A simple, useful dictionary, with an unnecessarily imposing title. "Wase, wāz, n., a circular straw head-covering used by porters when carrying loads." Wases are common objects of the London pavement, and we learn their name for the first time. (George Newnes, Ltd.)

Fiction.

Hunger. Translated from the Norwegian of Knut Hamsun by George Egerton. (Leonard Smithers & Co.. 6s.)

THIS is that one book which every man has it in him to write—a fragment of life itself, hacked apart and flung at the reader all raw, bleeding, crude, and amorphous. But what does it mean, what does it signify morally, this record of the starving of a young journalist in the most sprightly of northern capitals, Christiania? It means nothing, it carries no significance; it has neither beginning nor end, for though the youth does take ship for Scotland on the last page, he might as well have done so on the hundredth or the two hundredth. There is no climax, no accumulation of impressiveness; no large idea looming in the background of this amazing, seething multitude of trivial facts. The cleverness, the graphic power, the audacious realism, the saturnine fantasy of wit—these qualities are undeniable. We admit them with gladness. Someone said of Anna Karenina that it was not like life, it was life itself. Eulogy was doubtless intended, but actually the phrase contains a condemnation. Hunger is not like life, it is life; and there it fails. Art is not life, but something far less crude, less sprawling, and more essentially significant.

The translator says that Hunger made a sensation in Christiania. We can believe it. There are passages of miraculous reporting. The hero's interview with a dealer, to whom he wants to sell a blanket (pp. 134-5), is done simply to perfection; the cadger's shiftiness and resource, the dealer's divine indifference—a cinematograph working at forty to the second couldn't beat the rendering. Then the quasi-seduction scene just a hundred pages later is certainly meant to startle. Not many London publishers would have passed such a scene. Yet London will probably not experience the slightest sensation over Hunger. At once less keen for novelty, and more secure in its critical poise, London will accept Hunger with a cold, inimical calm. For the unlettered will ignore it, and the lettered will perceive that, though it may be surgery, it is not fiction.

George Egerton is evidently an admirer of Knut Hamsun. In her preface she pleads that Hunger is a first book, written ten years ago, and that since then the author has produced more mature work. If she wished to introduce him to England, surely it would have been better to begin by translating his best.

Both Great and Small. By A. E. J. Legge.
(John Lane. 6s.)

THOUGH this domestic novel discloses Mr. Legge's ability with much distinctness, it cannot be called an unqualified success. It has shortcomings of imagination, of construction, of observation, and of attitude. Its imaginative power is middling—not weak, but not strong; the lyric note, which occurs somewhere in every really strong novel, is never attained. The plot is too elaborate, and does not cohere. There are really two plots—the coming together of Lord Chesterton and Beatrice Felsted, and the drifting apart of Jim Burgrave and his wife; and these two schemes are not vitally connected. Fifty years ago unity of theme was not necessary to a fine novel; to-day it is: the technique of fiction has advanced. Many incidents and descriptions are quite irrelevant to the progress of the tale. The final scene, in which the reconciled Jim Burgrave and his wife are caught by the rising tide, is merely annoying. Mr. Legge should know that the rising tide, as an instrument of tragedy in fiction, is completely and eternally exhausted. The observation is a curious mixture of first-hand and second-hand. Lord Chesterton, his diffident sisters, Beatrice, and Jim and his wife, are well and genuinely observed; they have authenticity. On the other hand, Miss Roote, Mrs. Burgrave's father, and some minor people, are concoctions, having no life. Throughout the book there is a frequent lack of "documentation." As to the author's attitude, we consider that he has taken no trouble to understand some of his characters. We refer particularly to Miss Roote. Miss Roote is a spinster and not young, and Mr. Legge can only see the absurd aspect of her. He grins continually at the inevitable mannerisms of her age and state. Such facetiousness would suit Halfpenny Snippets. Yet Mr. Legge might feel aggrieved if we denied him the title of serious novelist.

In spite of his sins and lapses, we will not deny him that title. Quite two-thirds of the book is admirably sincere, just, and unstrained—especially when considered in detail and not as a whole. In the relations between Mr. and Mrs. Burgrave, Mr. Legge sometimes overcomes enormous difficulties with brilliance. He has a pretty turn for psychology. Burgrave's description to Lord Chesterton of the beginning of love is as good as need be:

"Doubts! My feeling is plain enough. It's the nature of the feeling that puzzles me. Look here, Russley, you know I don't brag, and I don't think I imagine things about women's view of me, as a rule. I may be vain, but my vanity doesn't take that form. When that woman came on board the ship I hardly thought of her at all. I admired her to a certain extent, and when I got to know her I found her clever and interesting. But, I can't help telling you that I saw at once that she had fallen in love with me, and my only feeling was one of regret. I know I wasn't mistaken about it, for she has told me it was so, since. And though most people would call me a liar for saying so, I wasn't a bit pleased, and my vanity wasn't touched. I tried to avoid her, and I tried to persuade myself that it was all imagination. But do what I could I couldn't help seeing it, and then gradually I came to realise that she had become of tremendous importance to me. It wasn't the sentimental sort of thing that one expects. It was just a feeling as if I were becoming possessed by some spirit, a sort of mania that was creeping over me and giving me no power to think of anything but this idea. I really believe if it hadn't soon come to a satisfactory understanding I should have gone mad."

We have the right to expect something of real importance from Mr. Legge in the future. Simplicity, authority for every detail, a widened sympathy: at these things he should aim.

Well, After All— By F. Frankfort Moore.
(Hutchinson & Co. 6s.)

THE title of this book fairly describes the story; and perhaps Mr. Frankfort Moore, when he invented it, was being humorous at his own expense. For the novel does not, in fact, amount to much. Starting with a murder mystery and a jilted girl, Mr. Moore did but follow a beaten path in fiction in arranging that the girl should avenge herself by allowing her lover to fall in love with the daughter of the man who (she believed) had killed his brother. Mr. Moore displays a more original ingenuity when he swings the vengeance back upon its contriver; but in the dénouement, so crudely "happy," he returns again to the tactics of the serialist.

The tale is just a tale, a system of more or less improbable events, recounted in straightforward English, with a hint here and there of Mr. Moore's old wit and satire, and a few rather pointed touches of actuality which put a date on the book. Of the latter here is one. We are at the murder trial:

The judge upon this occasion was not the one whose anxiety to sentence men and women to be hanged is so great that he has now and again practically insisted on a jury returning a verdict of guilty against prisoners who, on being reprieved by the Home Secretary, were eventually found to be entirely innocent of the crime laid to their charge. Nor was he the one whose unfortunate infirmity of deafness prevents his hearing more than a word or two of the evidence. He was not even the one whose inability to perceive the difference between immorality and criminality is notorious. He was the one whose ingenuity is made apparent by his suggestion of certain possibilities which have never occurred to the counsel engaged in a case.

Some people would say that in such a passage Mr. Moore had committed a peccadillo against the proprieties of fiction, and we should be disposed to agree with them.

Loup Garou! By Eden Phillpotts.
(Sands & Co. 6s.)

THIS is a collection of West Indian stories. Brisk, bright, and sensational, they afford peculiarly easy reading. In each of them the interest lies in something held up the writer's sleeve, as in a conjuring trick. Curiosity is excited, and when it is appeased, the book is unlikely to claim a reperusal. The title-story, in which a hypocritical robber is shot while wearing the disguise of the West Indian "werewolf," is by no means the best—the types are outworn. Far better, and a story which may be pronounced literature, as distinct from a literary time-killer, is "The Skipper's Bible." Capt. Greenleaf was bringing a negro convict to Kingston to be hanged, and the poor fellow yearned for a Bible. Only the captain possessed a copy, and it took the mutiny of the mate to extort it from him. But when his quarrel with the mate had terminated to the advantage of the convict's soul, the captain was affable enough. He informed the convict that he lent the book "on one condition. If ever you gets there [i.e., to "the golden shore"] you can put in a word for this ship. Just a remark in a gen'ral sort of way—needn't mention no names. Carn't do no harm. Rub it into 'em up thar—see? I didn't lend that book kinder easy, but now you've got it you can hold on to it till we get to Kingston. And here's a bit o' lead pencil. Just mark the notions as seem sort o' best to you." "The Enigma of the Doubloons" is too reminiscent of "The Gold Bug" to be quite worth reading. In "Pete and Pete," another sea story, Mr. Phillpotts again reaches a high level. The sketch of the little negro who had to "sing second" to his namesake, the captain's pet monkey, and was less afraid of a sea full of sharks than of the captain's rage if he found his treasure missing, is genuinely humorous and not without a suggestion of pathos too.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

SILENCE FARM.

By WILLIAM SHARP.

Mr. Sharp's novels are always carefully wrought; they challenge careful criticism. Here we have an intense love drama set in a lonely farm, with uncompromising descriptions of cow-byres and pig-sties and hen-coops, and all the sights and sounds of farming. These unceasingly pervade the story, compressing the drama, as it were. But the breath of the fields and the moors also sweeps in. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

WAR TO THE KNIFE.

By ROLF BOLDREWOOD.

Rolf Boldrewood's new novel is a stirring romance of the Maori wars in New Zealand. "Of the Maoris," remarks one of the characters, "it may be said most truly, as Sir Walter Scott said of the Borderer:

Let nobles fight for fame;
Let vassals follow where they lead.
Burghers to guard their townships bleed;
But war's the Borderer's game."

So most truly it is the Maori's. Next to the chance of killing his enemy, the chance of being killed himself is the most delightful excitement known to him." (Macmillan. 6s.)

JASON.

By B. M. CROKER.

A volume of short stories by the author of Diana Barrington and a number of other well-read novels. "Jason" is the account of an impostor who succeeded for a while in deceiving a section of Anglo-Indian society; and Anglo-Indian society of a rather rapid variety plays its part in some of the other tales. All are brisk and tersely told. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)

A RATIONAL MARRIAGE.

By FLORENCE MARRYAT.

A gay fantasia based on the "marriage question." Joan Trevor marries Larry O'Donnell on the understanding that they hide the fact, and live separate lives, with liberty for Larry to call on Joan and take tea in her flat, and with "secret outings in the evenings," &c.; in short, marriage in moderation is Joan's ideal. How it worked out is the story, which is pleasant reading. (F. V. White & Co. 6s.)

JENNIE BAXTER, JOURNALIST.

By ROBERT BARR.

The second of Messrs. Methuen's Sixpenny novels. The heroine, who passes through a number of adventurous episodes, belongs to the same family as Mr. Grant Allen's latest heroine, Miss Cayley. Her inductive powers and presence of mind are alike wonderful. Mercy that all women are not as clever. (Methuen. 6d. and 1s.)

AN OBSTINATE PARISH.

By M. L. LORD.

The parish was Hurstwell, and the story is of ritualism and kindred ecclesiastical matters, serving, indeed, as a kind of footnote to recent public occurrences. The conflict between the natural man and the ordained man; the impact of the natural woman on the ordained man—these are the author's themes. (Unwin. 6s.)

WILLOW THE KING.

By J. G. SNAITH.

Willow is not a monarch of flesh and blood, but of wood: in plain English, a cricket-bat. For this is a novel of cricket. Everyone talks cricket and plays cricket, including the heroine, who is for that reason called Grace, when her real name is Laura Mary. The narrator awkwardly chooses to propose to her at the very moment when she is making out the first-class averages. "You've gone and bowled me neck and heels," he says. "You are a jolly rotter," says she. A high-spirited, slangy story. (Ward, Lock. 5s.)

WHEN THE WAVES PART.

By B. M. M. MINNIKEN.

This novel contains, on a low estimate, nearly 250,000 words, and the author says at the end that she casts her pen away with "extreme reluctance," but with the hope of "resuming its use ere long." A circumstantial account of trivial people. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

THE TEMPTATION OF EDITH WATSON.

By SYDNEY HALL.

A Scotch story of Scotch people. Edith confesses to a difficulty with Mr. Meredith: "His meaning is often very obscure." Mr. Davidson, however, applauds him: "Lucy, in Richard Feverel, a different type, but equally charming, with her gentleness, her sweetness, her femininity." Edith's temptation was to join Davidson when she was still Mrs. Morrison. But she conquered it. Then her husband dies. On the last page Davidson asks her again, and she kisses him on the lips. (Gardner.)

SHADOWS; OR, GLIMPSES OF SOCIETY.

By E. MARTIN.

Seven crude stories or sketches dealing with moral wrecks. "A Syren of Modern Babylon," "A Prince of Iniquity," "A Veteran in Vice." The author assists his characterisation by bestowing such names as Lady Vane-Glorie and Lord Lepper Lycence. (Greening. 2s. 6d.)

A FAULTY COURTSHIP.

By EDITH G. HOARE.

Probably most courtships are faulty. This one, with its rivalries and mistakes and consequences, passed in the Tyrol, the heroine being Gretchen Forbach, who is introduced as the most popular girl in the village school. Village fêtes, market days, and chamois-hunting provide the background. (Warne & Co. 3s. 6d.)

IN KINGS' HOUSES.

By JULIA C. R. DORR.

"A Romance of the Days of Queen Anne." The plot turns on a question of birth, a living child having been made to personate a dead one; but this familiar theme is recommended by charming backgrounds at Windsor, state pageantries, and royal condescensions. A pleasant story, suitable for young people. (Duckworth & Co. 6s.)

BY THE GREY SEA.

By THE AUTHOR OF "AN OLD MARQUISE."

The characters argue at great length on the differences between the Anglican and Roman Catholic standpoints. (Sands & Co. 6s.)

THE FORTRESS OF YADASURU.

By CHRISTIAN LYS.

"A narrative prepared from the manuscript of Clinton Verrall, Esq.," and dedicated "to Daria I., Daria II., Daria III., with the author's homage." The circumstance that Daria is the heroine of the book renders this inscription very mystifying. The story is of adventures in the Caucasus among a people with mediæval habits. (Warne. 6s.)

The Spectre of Byron at Venice.

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!

On Suli's rock and Parga's shore,

Exists the remnant of a line

Such as the Doric mothers bore:

And there, perhaps, some seed is sown,

The Heraclidean blood might own.

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!

Our virgins dance beneath the shade—

I see their glorious black eyes shine;

But, gazing on each glowing maid,

My own the burning tear-drop laves,

To think such breasts must suckle slaves.

Place me on Samium's marbled steep,

Where nothing, save the waves and I,

May hear our mutual murmurs sweep:

There, swan-like, let me sing and die!

A land of slaves shall ne'er be mine—

Dash down yon cup of Samian wine!

TO-DAY, in a little restaurant off the beautiful Piazza, I stopped to lunch, and in looking over the wine-list was struck by the offer of Samian wine. I ordered some Samian wine with my modest cutlet, and memory flew back to a far-off day when enthusiasm was the natural measure of my existence and I landed for the first time on Grecian shores, and drank what I fondly called "a cup of Samian wine," while reciting the "Isles of Greece."

The eternal magnetism of Byron! Here, to-day, when I had imagined Byron to be as dead as Queen Anne, as my lips touched the glass, it was not Greece I remembered but Byron, and the Song of the "Isles" seemed as fresh an inspiration as when I first read it. My glass was a common glass, probably manufactured in Germany, and I was reminded that under no circumstances could I transform it into a cup, and dash it down in a burst of exuberant emotion as Byron bids us do. And dwelling upon the vividness of this sudden revival of a forgotten literary thrill, I came to examine our present supercilious attitude towards Byron. Why does the man's magnetism outlive our superior knowledge? Alas! he possessed what none of those to-day who sneer at him possess in an infinitesimal degree—genius. You may write bad verse as Byron did, but if you have genius you may shake the universe: and without it you may write the most excellent verse in the world, as all the poets of England now do, and when you die be assured the universe will not go into mourning as it did for Byron. To be sure, now we make so much of our tenpenny great men, that imagination stands aghast and bewildered in contemplation of the consequences of such a comet as Byron again flashing across our sky, I fear we should wish to greet his exit from his house upon a private errand with the roar of artillery, and send him to rest with fireworks.

Genius has, with odd inaccuracy, been described as the capacity for taking infinite pains. That this painstaking quality is a very desirable addition to the triumph of genius there can be no doubt. Greek and Latin and French are there to prove it. But we are here to-day to prove that in itself it will not avail. To-day everybody takes pains; everybody writes well; the thinnest minor poet that ever twittered of thrushes and rushes, of saints and altars and dead loves, could teach Byron his ignored business. Talent is universal, but where is genius? What part does magnetism play in our latter-day literature? It is all very well to insist on Byron's vulgarity, on his cheap success, on his meretricious brilliance. But the fact remains that he took Europe by storm; and such was the rush of his glory, that it shook at the very foundations of British stability. Where else will you find such passion, such a sincere revelation of self, such contempt of sham even in his very prose, such a triumph of barbaric frankness? If he shouted on the housetops with imperinent fatuity: "See what a terrible dog I am," it was characteristic of the man that he had the moral courage of his attitude. He was no make-believe sinner, at any rate. And then his wit! Where will you find anything so rakish, so spontaneous, so unstudied? Ah, that is the keynote of his genius, the secret of his magnetism, the alluring charm of Byron in all his worst moods—spontaneity! Here was a man who studied neither dictionary nor metre; who took you by the throat on impulse; who swore and laughed, and writhed and cursed, as nature impelled him; who was child and man and woman and animal and brute all in one, with the multiple facets of a violently tintured and impressionable temperament.

Better poetry has been written since his time, but no personality has risen to diminish the abnormal splendour of his. Whatever the pedants may say, the triumph remains his. It is the fashion to decry him, but wherever we move on the Continent his is the spectre that pursues us. When I walk along the Lido I look for the mark of his horses' hoofs upon the soft earth. When I stand on the much overrated Bridge of Sighs, I wonder Byron should have chosen it for immortality. I think of him standing there in his eternal pose of inflated boyish self-consciousness. Venice since she ceased to be the Great Republic has become a romantic protégée of Byron. He has made the town so insistently his; indeed, all Italy is so engrossed by her undying remembrance of him that we come to understand here that his is a glory which a few modern cultivated and pedantic versifiers cannot hope to diminish. They may not read him (I own it is long since I have read him), but they cannot bid the world forget him: his spectre haunts all Europe. Wherever his foot has trod, the guide-books and the natives draw the traveller's attention to the fact, and the world at large is the monument of his fame. You look down upon the Grand Canal from the windows of his palace; you glide across the silver plain of the wide lagoon, and his is the only modern form that rises between you and the peopled past. Of whom else in the literatures of all lands can so much be said? Do the pedants of the day pretend to make us believe that this is all sham, that the glory is but the reflection of spurious tinsel? You may polish prose or verse till it gleam like bright metal, but if you have nothing but perfect verse and faultless prose you will never cause a heart to leap, a pulse to throb, and Byron fluttered the hearts of an entire generation in every land—and they were no common hearts that leaped at the bidding of his untrained and imperious voice. He thrilled the frigid Goethe. Pushkin, Lermontoff, Lamartine, George Sand, and Musset were under his spell, and counted themselves privileged to wrap themselves in his cast-off mantle, when Death found him in an unbuckled hour before Greece had time to make him king.

It will be time to dethrone Byron when we can prove that the world has forgotten him and when we can explain his colossal magnetism, the towering altitude of his fame above that of every European figure of his day except Napoleon's, by some more probable definition than the imperfect and vulgar taste of other days.

Caricature.

THE art of caricature has had few English exponents. Comic draughtsmen we have produced in abundance, portrait painters in profusion; but those pictorial wits who any sitting, but the summary of long acquaintance. It permits just enough emphasis to make its critical, autobiographical point, but otherwise it is realistic. Mr.

come between the two, and touch off a man's nature in a pigmentary, or plumbago, epigram—these are rare indeed. The reason, possibly, is that our national character is averse from oblique methods. We like broad fun or facts; satire is not to the English mind. And the caricaturist is necessarily a satirist.

With most persons, who have no time for elaborate distinction, the word "caricature" covers any humorous portrait; but it has, of course, a finer and more exact meaning than that. The dictionary defines it as "a figure have seen many drawings in which beauties were concealed and blemishes exaggerated that still did not deserve to be called caricatures. The true caricature is more. In the hands of a master, it is a portrait of a man as he is. The ordinary portrait, whether a painting or photograph, shows the sitter at his best, self-conscious, in special clothes, with features formed to suit the occasion. The caricature is merciless, but not necessarily cruel. It allows no affectations—unless they are in the nature of a man, and then it allows little else. It is not the result of Sargent sometimes comes very high caricature. His portrait of Mr. Wertheimer in last year's Academy was as near it as a painter may approach. It said everything, whereas the ordinary Academy portrait says only two or three things.

The contrast between fine caricature by a master and less excellent varieties can be studied in the collection of a Hundred Victorians from Vanity Fair, which the proprietors of that paper have just published in commemoration of the reign. Only a comparatively few are caricatures worthy the best use of the word, and most of these are signed "Ape," the pseudonym of the famous Carlo Pellegrini. The others are frequently good, but they lack the masterly touch; and often they are not caricatures at all, but merely coloured portraits or distortions. The artists are not to be blamed, for the essence of a good caricature is familiarity with the subject, and as often as not the order for the Vanity Fair plate, which must be completed in a few days' time, is the first occasion on which the draughtsman has even heard of his next sitter. But, taking such conditions into consideration, this collection, even after "Ape's" contributions have been deducted, is remarkably excellent; and Vanity Fair is worthy of high praise for doing its best to foster the art of caricature as it does. Only one complaint have we with it, and that is, that the legends beneath the plates often convey too little.

Pellegrini was an Italian, or perhaps he could not have managed caricature so deftly. To his skill with the pencil he added that instinct which plays a larger part in the composition of a genius than any amount of taking pains can. With everyone he was not equally successful; but his best caricatures are superb, instinct carrying him straight to the heart of the matter. Look, for instance, at the Disraeli, one of the seven Vanity Fair cartoons which we reproduce in black and white. Even in that medium—for which it was not he did not quite rise to Mr. John Morley. And yet how good they are, still!—the Carlyle has something of the melancholy of his best portraits.

"THE REALISATION OF THE IDEAL" (MR. RUSKIN). FEBRUARY 17, 1872.

"GREEK" (BENJAMIN JOWETT). FEBRUARY 26, 1876.

"THE DIOGENES OF THE MODERN CORINTHIANS WITHOUT HIS TUB" (THOMAS CARLYLE). OCTOBER 22, 1870.

is also mischief, a necessary quality in the caricaturist.

The death of Mr. Alfred Bryan the other day seriously intended—and many times reduced, it is still convincing. Cynicism, race, diplomatic craft, power, the vein of dandyism—all are there. Pelligrini had a great subject, and he rose to it. His Mr. Swinburne is less profound, and in the Carlyle and the Ruskin criticism is sacrificed to comic effect. Pellegrini, it must be remembered, was a flaneur, a haunter of cafés, and the father of cigarette smoking in this country, and it is natural that it should please him to make the Sage of Chelsea grotesque and the Sage of Brantwood ridiculous. Similarly,

The fantasia on Jowett, played by Mr. Leslie Ward, whose pseudonym is "Spy," is among that clever artist's best work. But here again we miss profundity. The caricaturist, however, is at liberty to confine his energies to one aspect of a man, and, if we miss the wiser and more serious side of Jowett from this picture, the benign and dapper "Jowler" is there to the life. The Matthew Arnold is unsigned, and we are unaware of its artist; but it is very rich. Confidence and the knowledge of intellectual superiority are both indicated. And there depleted the ranks of draughtsmen who understand caricature. On occasion he was excellent. There remain Mr. Leslie Ward and others, who do not, however, quite satisfy. Mr. Furniss is too wilful, too unwilling to suppress himself. He draws less from the original than from his own notions of the original. Mr. Max Beerbohm is sometimes inspired, but he stops at the body. The mind is beyond his powers. Mr. F. C. Gould has the wit, but lacks the execution. Mr. Reed is too broadly comic. Probably Mr. Sims would excel in caricature if he gave his attention to it. It is our continual surprise that Mr. Whistler has not fostered the art.

To the plates which we reproduce, by permission, from Vanity Fair, we have been careful to append dates. Considering that so many years have passed since Mr. Swinburne and Mr.

Morley were "taken off," they might well be treated again. We wish we had room to print the concise judgments of "John Junior," who must have summed up more men than any critic now practising.

Things Seen.

Incident.

THE "Accident" described last week under "Things Seen" gave us a run-away cab dashing down Chancery-lane, and breaking into a hairdresser's window in Fleet-street. Down Chancery-lane yesterday a gentler pilgrim took his way: a garden butterfly. All through the summer butterflies are common enough in the streets: they are probably brought into town on the Covent Garden market carts, whence escaping they wander through London like lost children. But this butterfly did not suggest the lost child. Still less was he the flushed tourist. He neither hurried, nor lingered. He was interested in all he saw, but with self-possession. He rose and fell, and turned to right and left as reason offered. Now he fluttered amusedly over a cabman's whip, now he rose to a 'bus top and danced a dainty pas seul on a lady's parasol, now he made pretence of settling on a lamp-post; and always his movements made a fool of calculation while they lured the eye.

He never swerved from Chancery-lane. Over cabs and 'busses and vans, dipping, soaring, avoiding, and challenging—on he went until Fleet-street was reached. There I saw the barber's boarded window. My butterfly made no rash assault on the opposing buildings. With a laughing flutter, he soared and soared, until, meeting the June wind, he was blown softly over the roofs into the Temple Gardens.

Law.

As you enter the public park, you are confronted by an admonitory notice-board, on whose surface are inscribed forty-and-two by-laws, to break one of which entails expulsion from the park, and possibly the infliction of a fine. A triangle of dusty turf is set apart for the use of children. Here, on a warm afternoon in spring, a dozen ragged urchins sit, roll, and tumble as the law permits. In the background, upon the creaking, straining wires which bound the park, two tiny lawbreakers essay ungraceful feats of strength and agility. A park-keeper strolling down the path, red-faced and gold-buttoned, notes the little delinquents—draws a whistle from his breast, and blows a sharp note. Every child becomes motionless: every eye is fixed upon the park-keeper. He, observant only of the unlawful acrobats, shakes his stick threateningly.

Panic descends, alike upon the innocent and the guilty. Every child starts to its feet—little bare feet that scamper so noiselessly through the dust. The rout is complete; the dust settles again upon the deserted playground; and the park-keeper resumes his walk.

The Power of Print.

Two street urchins leaned over Tower Bridge and watched the shipping.

"Bill," asked the younger boy, "'ave yer ever seen real waves?"

"No, Jim, I can't say I 'ave," answered Bill; "but my bruvver 'as, and 'e says"—here he raised the palm of one hand two feet above the palm of the other—"they are that 'igh."

Bill looked puzzled, and then disappointed. "Only that 'igh?" he said. "I was reading the other day they was mountains 'igh."

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE daily paper which definitely announces that Sir Redvers Buller will take the command at the Cape in the event of a war is altogether premature. No such contingent appointment has been made; and Sir Evelyn Wood is still, as he was last week, the officer on whom the ugly responsibility is most likely to fall.

It is against all etiquette that a general in command at the Cape or anywhere else should express his opinion on the chances, or even the fitness, of peace or war; and Sir William Butler's prescription of "no surgical operation, but rest" for the Transvaal was, of course, an obiter dictum made in private conversation, and never intended for transmission home and publication in the daily Press. Yet there are few who will refuse on this score to welcome the pronouncement as the most peace-making one made during recent weeks. It comes with particular grace from the biographer of Colley; and it comes amusingly enough from the excellent next-door neighbour of Mr. Rhodes on the outskirts of Cape Town.

LORD LOVAT, who has just returned home from his Abyssinian tour laden with huntsman's spoils, is a young man of whom something more is likely to be heard. A sportsman and an ornithologist, he is also a keen lover of literature, and part of his love of adventure, which does not seem quite in accord with a very gentle personality, has come to him by way of Stevenson and Kipling, the two modern authors of his admiration. Lord Lovat's Abyssinian bag was a heavy one, since it included ten elephants and two lions; but his greatest interest was in his collection of birds, of which he has brought home between three hundred and four hundred varieties.

Two guineas was the modest price fetched in the sale-room the other day by a letter from Queen Victoria to Napoleon III. It was a long letter, dated in the June of 1856, and it showed the Queen in various capacities: as a patron of the arts, or of an artist (Guren) whom she presents to the French Court; as ruling Queen of England when she declares that, whatever the change of ministries, none "will ever compromise the good understanding existing between our two countries"; as hostess, begging the Emperor to "pay that kind little visit in the month of October" and to come accompanied by the Empress, who, by the way, had not at that date any relations with Queen Victoria likely to lead up to the friendship established between them by common sorrows in later life; and, if you will, as a grammarian who cannot quite realise the superfluity of the "and" before a relative which is not a reiterated one—"We are in the midst of a ministerial crisis, and which I am afraid will be followed by others." Many and ridiculous are the stories invented à propos of the cordial understanding between Her Majesty and Lord Beaconsfield; and somebody may one day suggest that it had its rise in an habitual attraction felt by Queen and Minister alike towards this particular slip in the Queen's English. "His presence was a relief to an anxious family, and who were beginning to get alarmed." Again: "He had become possessed of a vast principality, and which was not an hour's drive from Whitechapel." The two sentences are lighted upon at once in a random opening of Endymion, after the incorrigible author had been lectured for this particular lapse over a period of nearly fifty years.

THE work which Mr. Coningsby Disraeli is carrying out at Hughenden Manor will not involve any destruction of the old house so beloved by both Isaac and Benjamin Disraeli, nor any alterations in the grounds that will obliterate landmarks. The addition of a new wing to the house was necessary to make it a really habitable place for a family of any size; and, if it was to be built at all, the most historic builder after Lord Beaconsfield himself was certainly to be found in his own direct heir, interesting as a nephew who had walked in that domain with his uncle, with whom he was doubly associated by a romantic blending of names.

SIR JOHN AUSTIN was one of the very few baronets of Lord Rosebery's creation; and nobody seemed less likely than the sturdy Radical member to have to face any of those personal crises in politics which it has been the lot of Lord Rosebery to encounter. The Local Veto Bill, a plank in the Liberal platform which is Sir William Harcourt's, and none of Lord Rosebery's, setting, has, however, been tilted and warped to trip up Sir John, himself allied to "the trade" as a maltster of immense business. Sir John loves a fight as only a Yorkshireman can, but Yorkshiremen love him on that very account; hence follows an impasse. Sir John is an excellent sportsman, who rides straight to hounds in his own county, and has a moor in the Highlands. He can sing a song, too, at any local entertainment, even though it be to benefit a Wesleyan Chapel and the performer is himself a Roman Catholic. With all these qualifications, the Osgoldcross constituency is hardly in a mood to demand that its member should be a Vetoist or go. No doubt, to vote against Local Veto in Scotland, when that measure is supported by a large majority of Scottish members, is not exactly a good illustration of the Home Rule principle; but the daily paper that foresees in Sir John a future Unionist candidate is quite mistaking its man, and is unaware how largely his adhesion to the cause of Home Rule for Ireland has dominated, not only over his career as a politician, but also over his interests and friendships in private life.

To some literary reminiscences of Boulogne appearing in this page last week let another be linked. In that town died Campbell, though it is to Westminster Abbey that you must go for his tomb; and on the anniversary of his death-day, last week, a little group of English visitors paid him their homage by discovering as best they could the whereabouts of that memorable departure in the June of 1844. It seems a little irony of death that the greatest author, until Kipling, of English patriotic sea-song should yield his last breath away from the country he loved and sang. But another memory robs the situation of its pangs: Campbell was in England still when he was not geographically there, and it was not here, in his own environment, but away in Hamburg, that, in the first year of the dying century, "Ye Mariners of England" was actually composed.

Correspondence.

John Scott, Horace Smith, and J. G. Lockhart.

SIR,—As I entertain no prejudice against the honour and veracity of Mr. Beavan's distinguished kinsman, I am ready to meet him half way. If by "offering satisfaction" Mr. Smith habitually meant "making an apology," and was known to mean it, then his statements of 1821 and 1847 are correct and consistent. But no misunderstanding could have occurred if, in 1821, Mr. Smith had told Mr. Christie that, if Mr. Lockhart offered an explanation, his principal, Mr. Scott, would apologise. He did not say that; he wrote that "I am authorised by you [Scott] to offer satisfaction." The words were taken in their then established sense. The world, and Mr. Christie, could not but suppose that Mr. Scott, if he received an explanation, meant to fight, whereas he meant to apologise, and, ex hypothesi, Mr. Smith knew it. His choice of words, however blameless on his part, was eminently misleading, and Lockhart said that Mr. Scott "might as well have sent him to Aldgate pump" as to Mr. Horace Smith.

Mr. Scott himself was either misled by Mr. Smith's phrase, and therefore "quoted him as his second," or—the alternative is obvious. Mr. Beavan does not appear to understand the ideas of 1821. Had Lockhart shirked a duel because his wife was expecting a baby his character for courage would have been totally lost, and his father-in-law, Sir Walter Scott, would never have spoken to him again. I can only regret Mr. Smith's use, in the circumstances, of the phrase, "I am authorised to offer satisfaction," when he meant that Mr. Scott would apologise. Mr. Smith, judging by his paper of 1847, seems to have habitually used "satisfaction" and "apology" as synonymous. By the world they were regarded as alternatives, to the best of my knowledge; and hence the deplorable misunderstanding arose. Mr. Scott, finding that his readiness to "go on the sod" was impeached, challenged Mr. Christie, with whom he had really no quarrel. I cannot acquit Mr. Smith of an error in his choice of language—an unfortunately misleading error—and I must prefer evidence of 1821 (evidence then not contradicted, as far as we know, by Mr. Smith) to evidence of 1847, and of 1858. But that Mr. Smith intended to mislead I am very far from asserting. Mr. Beavan's citation from the article of 1847 shows that, to Mr. Smith, "satisfaction" meant "apology." But the construction which I placed upon his words was the usual construction—in 1821. Mr. Smith must have been ignorant on that point.—I am, &c.,

An Author's Complaint.

SIR,—The Society of Authors has for some months past been exercised as to what steps should be taken with regard to the complaint which I made upon the boycott of my novel, God is Love. The committee of management considered the topic frequently. Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins, as deputy chairman, took an active interest in it, and, having occasion to read the book, wrote: "Considering the serious and sincere character of the story, it appears to me that the title is not open to any valid objection on the score of irreverence or impropriety. Such is my individual opinion"; and he adds, "your picture of peasant life is grim indeed, but it is vivid and incisive, and holds the reader."

I may be pardoned quoting such an expression of opinion from an author of Mr. Anthony Hope's eminence, considering the damage to the circulation of my book which Messrs. Smith's veto has naturally cast upon it; but the protest I raised has been of advantage to authors generally in that it brought about other protests from men of leading, including Mr. Rudyard Kipling and Mr. Conan Doyle, as well as from the principal journals.

The Society of Authors, though it has expressed sympathy with me in the most courteous manner, has not yet made any definite protest. It has, however, passed a resolution to do so, in combination with booksellers and publishers, if such combined action be practicable. The very raison d'être of the Society of Authors is to champion the cause of "the independence of the writer," and if it does not take official action upon this clear case of interference with an author's rights it will abdicate its claim to the general support of writers.—I am, &c.,

John Barleycorn and the Arts.

SIR,—Schoolboy blunders often find their way into the newspapers. Some of them often appear to be manufactured for the press. But here is the genuine article from the Licensing World, the "official organ of the Central Board." A recent number contains the following passage:

Wines have been called "free" by Horace—

"Et Juvenum curas et libera vina referre."

"And wines carry off the cares of the young man."

He also points out that wine opens those things which are hidden in the heart, and is frequently a revealer of dark and dangerous secrets—

"Condita cum verax aperit praeordia liber."

Indeed, the odes of Horace abound with allusions to the wine-cup—

"I, pete unguentum, puer, et rosas, Et Cadum Marsi memoram duelli."

"Go, boy, bring unguents and roses,

And the wine-cup on which the Marsian war was painted."

I read that the "Trade" is testing the sort of education given to the children at the Licensed Victuallers' School, the children being paraded at the annual dinner at the Crystal Palace. I hope they will not depend upon the opinion of the writer who is so free with his Horace, and with his Liber, God of Wine. They buy their spirits through an expert. Even the much-abused competitive examinations are better tests than the figure of merit this writer would be likely to assign.

Another "Trade" paper sends a reporter to Christie's (for the wine sales). The Licensed Victualler man has written an article on "The Licensed Trade at the Royal Academy." Is he chaffing? This is an extract:

Altogether it is a first-rate Academy; and, some day, when we can get an hour off [his column and a-quarter was the result of half-an-hour at the Royal Academy] we shall have another look round. To our mind the gem of the exhibition is "Wandering Musicians," by Walter Langley, R.I. Of course, a licensed victualler must study the wishes of his customers. Under a former management, we read, at the "Bear," at Esher, an unlimited supply of coppers was given from the bar till, to put into the slots of the automatic musical machines, to keep wandering musicians at a distance. But, on a wet night, it has often almost made our heart bleed to hear the words, "Not this side, please"; and there could not be much human nature about a manager who would refuse standing room in the passage to this little girl and her fiddle, accompanied by her mother on the guitar.

ROLAND BELL.

A Case for Grammarians.

SIR,—The melancholy inference in last week's ACADEMY, that the proposed "Choate Jest Book" is for ever to remain an "Inchoate Jest Book," recalls to mind a remarkable kind of choateness (presumably unknown to His Excellency the American Ambassador) introduced to notice by a leading Northern provincial paper in 1895. In discussing the claims of one of the candidates before a Parliamentary constituency, a leader in the paper in question gravely summed up: "But he must know, and after his speech last evening the constituency must know, that his views are not yet sufficiently choate to be presentable on a platform." What a vista of new (and valuable?) word-formations arises in this comprehensive theory of the prefix in! Dex will, without more ado, be the negative of index, fectionous of infectious, digenous of indigenous, sular of insular, and so on.—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of Competition No. 37.

OUR request for an inscription of not more than forty words, suitable to be engraved on a statue of Charles Darwin, has not been met by the ready response which awaits many of the subjects set for competition. The best inscription is that composed by Mr. Edwin Cardross, 22, Seymour-street, Portman-square, W., which runs thus:

"Charles Darwin, the great naturalist, memorable for his demonstration of the law of evolution in organic life, achieved by scientific imagination, untiring observation, comparison, and research; also for a blameless life, characterised by the modesty, the angelic patience, of genius."

The phrase "the angelic patience of genius," we may point out, is Balzac's.

Other inscriptions follow:

"In memory of Charles Darwin, theorist, philosopher, psychologist. A student of Nature, he searched for the truth, endeavouring to understand the beginning of all things, thus to make clearer the mysteries of Nature, the revelation of which was his ambition."

[G. W., Hull.]

Carolus Darwin.

Quod vidit meminit;
Quod meminit in luce patefecit;
Quod patefecit manet.

Ἐν δὲ φάει καὶ ὀλέσσει.

Charles Darwin.

What he saw he remembered,
What he remembered he revealed,
What he revealed remains.

"Give us light though thou slay us!"

[J. C., Buxted.]

"To the memory of Charles Darwin, whose extraordinary abilities and indefatigable energies, ordered by steadfast honesty of purpose and inherent modesty, combined to make him the greatest scientist of the age, the first exponent of the theory of human evolution."

[J. D. Q., Shrewsbury.]

"Charles Darwin, whose patient and acute observation compelled Nature to reveal her great secret, the origin of species.

"He never turned one inch out of his course to gain fame."

[W. E. T., Caterham.]

"Charles Darwin, on patient experiment and observation, founded a theory of evolution, which, in explaining the successive appearance of more complex forms of life in the world's history, has furnished a basis and example for all modern scientific investigation."

[J. D. A., Ealing.]

Lastly comes E. H., Ledbury, with this witty, but flippant, suggestion:

"In searching for the missing link he did a tail unfold."

Competition No. 38.

WE ask our readers this week to draw up a list of six books, or shorter compositions, to be read on a holiday: (a) in bed, before getting up; (b) in the middle of the morning, while resting; (c) after lunch, in a hammock; (d) after tea; (e) after dinner; (f) in bed, before sleep. The whole field of literature is open to choose from. To the author of the best list a cheque for one guinea will be sent.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, June 27. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found in the first column of p. 692 or it can not enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given: we cannot consider anonymous answers. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.

Words for Plain Readers of Holy Scripture. By Mrs. ASHLEY CARUS-WILSON (MARY L. G. PEARCE, B.A.). Crown 8vo, 2s., cloth boards.

"There is a fine freedom in the author's methods and recommendations, the result of distinguishing the matter from the spirit of Scripture. We shall have no time by reading this book, though it is often lost time to read books about the Bible and leave the Bible itself unread. And it is so saturated with clever modern examples of the mistakes that are made in misreading the Bible, that the reading of it is a very great delight." Expository Times.

This book is a story of Hindu life in South India, full of incident and detail, drawn by Mr. Lewis from his almost unique experiences and success as an itinerant missionary. His object was to enable readers, and especially young readers, to understand clearly the difficulties which Hindu children and young people have to surmount in order to become Christians.

A GENTLEMAN FROM THE RANKS.

By H. B. FINLAY KNIGHT,

Author of "A Girl with a Temper," "The Courage of Sylvia Fulgent," &c.

"Those who read Mr. H. B. Finlay Knight's clever story will doubtless think of one of the greatest novels of this generation—the late Guy de Maupassant's 'Fort comme la Mort.' But whereas the tragedy of that wonderful work turned upon a man's passion for the daughter of the woman with whom he had been in love for many years, the circumstances of the present story are rather the reverse, and the interest of Mr. Knight's powerful work is contained in George Lepel's hopeless passion for Captain Martin, who is in love with her mother, a still young and attractive widow." The Daily Telegraph.

NOW READY.

Fourteenth Edition.—Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.
